The troubles growing in thoſe parts, by reaſon of our civil wars, after one or two years abode there, he was forced for his own ſafety, to betake himſelf to Warder caſtle in Wiltſhire, where he had not continued long, but the caſtle was beſieged by the king's party. Upon the news of their approach, he was minded to have gone for London, but being deſired by colonel Ludlow, the governor of that caſtle, he remained there during the ſiege. A little before the caſtle was delivered up, as they were in treaty about the ſurrender of it, Mr Balſam walking upon the roof of the caſtle, heard three ſoldiers ſay, That they had ſworn upon the bible, to take away the life of one in the caſtle: he aſked one of them, Who is that ye mean? Is it our miniſter? They replied, Yes, for he is a witch; which they affirmed upon this ground, becauſe the caſtle had divers times been very ſtrangely relieved with proviſion: as at one time with a herd of ſwine coming down to the gates, which they took in; and at another time, by ſome deer and conies; the ſiege then being not cloſe, but ſtraitening them at a diſtance. He aſked them, what was their names? they told him, they were the three merry boys: he replied, your names are very ſuitable to the times. And ſo, after ſome farther diſcourſe, parted with them.

After the ſurrender of the caſtle, and the enemies entry, they preſently ſeized on Mr Balſam, and clapt him up in a cloſe low room. About twelve o'clock at night, the key of the room was given to the three ſoldiers that had ſworn his death: They having received the key, preſently entered the room where he was, with another ſoldier, who was hanged the next morning. No ſooner came they into the room, but they put off their hats, and ſtanding ſtill, looked on him at a diſtance, ſaying nothing to him: he ſuſpecting them to be the men that had ſworn to take away his life, ſpake to them thus, 'Friends, what is your buſineſs? are not ye the men who have ſworn to take away my life? They anſwered to this purpoſe, We have taken a wicked oath, God forgive us; but we will do you no hurt. He deſired them to come near unto him, but they ſtood trembling, perſuaded him to make an eſcape, voluntarily offering him their beſt aſſiſtance: he anſwered, now I ſuſpect you, you are aſhamed to take away my life, now I am in your hands, but would perſuade me to a flight, that you might with the more colour kill me in the purſuit. They aſſuring him they intended really the ſetting of him at liberty; he aſked what they thought would become of them? They anſwered, they would go along with him: he replied, That you ſhall not do; for if I be taken again, I ſhall be but in the ſame caſe I am; but if you be taken, it will coſt you your lives. And therefore I will rather ſuffer the utmoſt that God ſhall ſuffer them to inflict upon me, than hazard the lives of thoſe that have ſhewed themſelves ſo friendly to me.

Upon this they had him forth into the freſh air, and in the mean time made clean his room, and ſo left him.

The next morning, a council of war was called, and as they were debating to put him to death, a captain of the council ſtood up, and ſaid, I will have no hand in the blood of this man; ſo went out of the room, and no further progreſs was made as concerning him.

Afterwards they carried him in a cart to Salisbury: as he was carried through the town to the priſon, the people of the town entertained him with great ſcorn and contempt: and that night a council of war was called, and picked for the purpoſe, by which he was condemned to be hanged: hereupon the high ſheriff of the county went unto him into the priſon, and after much ill language that he uſed towards him, he told him that he was come to tell him, that he muſt prepare himſelf to die, for he was condemned by the council of war, to be hanged the next morning at ſix o'clock; but withal aſſuring him, that if he would aſk pardon of the king for his offence, and ſerve his majeſty for the future, as he had formerly ſerved againſt him, he ſhould both ſave his life, and have what preferment he could reaſonably deſire. He anſwered, 'For me to aſk pardon, where I am not conſcious of an offence, were but the part of a fool; and to betray my conſcience in hope of preferment, were but the part of a knave; and if I had neither hope of heaven, nor fear of hell, I had rather die an honeſt man, than live a fool or a knave.

The next morning he roſe about five o'clock, being ſomething troubled that he had ſlept ſo long. About ſix o'clock the officers came into the room to bring him forth to execution.

While he was preparing to go with them, he heard a poſt ride in, aſking haſtily, Is the priſoner yet alive? who brought him a reprieve from Sir Ralph Hopton, to whom he was carried to Wincheſter. As he came to the gates of the town, Sir William Ogle the governor met him, and told him, that he would feed him with bread and water for two or three days, and then hang him. Then he was brought to Sir Ralph Hopton, who ſpake thus to him, Mr Balſam, I little thought one day that you ſhould have been my priſoner, and I cannot but wonder, that ſuch men as you ſhould be engaged in a rebellion againſt the king. To whom he replied, Sir, I cannot but wonder that ſuch men as you ſhould call this rebellion. Sir Ralph deſired him to give an account of the grounds upon which he and his party proceeded, promiſing him, that he ſhould not ſuffer for any thing that he ſpake to him. After about half an hour's diſcourſe, he committed him to his own marſhal, with this charge, Keep this man ſafe, but uſe him well. The marſhal received him, and after ſome little rough entertainment, upon his entrance into his houſe, he at length uſed him with great ſeeming reſpect. Long he had not been there, but a gentlewoman came to him with a bottle of ſack, urging him to preach a recantation ſermon the next morning, before the lords, promiſing, that if he would do ſo, the king would make him a doctor: he replied, Sure you do but mock me; for ſhould I preach upon ſuch ſhort warning, the lords would never hear ſuch extempore ſtuff; but if you be in good earneſt, and would make me a doctor indeed, then let me have the ſame law ye uſe to give your doctors, viz. a quarter of a year's time to make a ſermon, and by that time you may know more of my mind.

The

The next morning an order was brought for the conveying of him to Oxford, whither he was accordingly carried: he lighted firſt at the blue boar, whether they brought a company of the queen's followers, who with much fury oftentimes ſwore, that he ſhould not go alive out of the room; but the muſqueteers, who were ſet as a guard upon him, deſired them to be quiet, telling them that he was their priſoner, and ſhould not ſuffer there, but they would ſuffer with him.

Thence he was conveyed to the caſtle, where after two or three days abode, he enjoyed the ſame liberty with other priſoners: and a while after, he ſet up an expoſition lecture in the priſon twice a-day, to which, not only the priſoners, and ſome of the ſoldiers, but divers courtiers, and many out of the town, often came. Being prohibited once or twice to go on in this exerciſe, he anſwered, 'If ye are weary of me, I am not willing to trouble you any longer; ye may turn me out of doors when ye will; but while I have a tongue to ſpeak, and people to ſpeak to, I will not hold my peace.

After ſome months of impriſonment he was releaſed by exchange. As he was departing thence, ſome courtiers and others, that had formerly ſhewed him ſome favour, perſuaded him to cloſe with their party, and to ſtay with them: he utterly refuſing, divers of them accompanied him out of the town; and as they were parting, one of them ſaid, Sir, if any of us ſhould fall into your hands, we ſhould deſire no better entertainment than you have had amongſt us: he replied, Gentlemen, I could wiſh that ten thouſand of you might fall into our hands within this month, that you might ſee how kindly we would deal with you. Thence he was ſent for by the lord general Eſſex, to be chaplain in his army, with whom he continued during his command.

Then he went to Berwick, where he was received with great affection of the people, and ſaw, in a ſhort time, great ſucceſs of his labours in the miniſtry.

During his abode there, two things were very remarkable: One, Whereas there was a child that had been ſtrangely viſited with ſuch a weakneſs, as neither phyſicians or divines could gueſs at the cauſe, or find out the cure: Mr Balſom moved ſome Chriſtians there, to ſeek God with him by faſting and prayer, which accordingly they did, and obtained a ſudden and extraordinary anſwer. For, as the mother of the child came home from the exerciſe, her child met her, and told her, ſhe was very well, who before had kept her bed a long time.

The other thing remarkable was this; A Scottiſh lord, by name the lord Granſon, took up his habitation for a time in Berwick, and brought with him his family, in which, amongſt many others, was the ſteward of his houſe, formerly reputed a godly man, who was very much afflicted in mind: Mr Balſom came to viſit him, and adminiſtered ſome comfort to him for that time; but two or three days after, he being ſorely afflicted again, Mr Balſom was ſent for, who finding him very much weakened, and worn out by the violence of temptation, began to ſpeak comfortably to him; but perceiving that no words of comfort would faſten on him, he whiſpered to him in his ear to this purpoſe, I doubt there is ſomething within that you would do well to diſcover: whereupon immediately the man's tongue ſwelled out of his mouth, inſomuch, that he was not able to ſpeak. Mr Balſom continued ſpeaking to him, till at length, to the aſtoniſhment of thoſe in the room, being many, and ſome of them perſons of quality, a ſhrill voice was heard, as from out of his throat (having not any uſe of his tongue), to this purpoſe: 'What doſt thou talking to him of promiſes, and free grace? he is mine.'

Mr Balſom, apprehending it to be the voice of the devil, replied: No, Satan; thou doſt not know any man to be thine while there is life in him.

But this is a notorious wicked wretch, and therefore is mine.

The blood of Jeſus Chriſt cleanſeth us from all ſin.

If God would let me looſe upon you, I ſhould find enough in the beſt of you to make you all mine.

But thou art bound, Satan.

And ſo turning himſelf to the people, with a ſmiling countenance, he ſaid, What a gracious God have we, that ſuffers not Satan to have his will upon us?

Then the devil began to curſe and ſwear, and blaſpheme the Trinity in a moſt fearful and horrid manner.

'The Lord rebuke thee.'

But this man is mine, for he hath given himſelf to me, and ſealed it with his blood.

I do not believe that the father of lies ſpeaketh truth; and I do believe, how confident ſoever thou art, that thou wilt loſe thy hold before to-morrow morning.

The devil continued to curſe and ſwear further, ſaying, How canſt thou endure to hear thy God blaſphemed? I will never give over blaſpheming, ſo long as thou ſtayeſt in the room.

I will pray for him.

Wilt thou pray for a man that is damned?

I will go home and pray for him, and get all the force I can in the town to join with me.

After this, there being no more voice heard, Mr Balſom went home about eleven o'clock at night, where he found in his houſe divers Chriſtians, which he intended to have ſent for, waiting for him; and upon the ſight of them, he ſpake to them to this purpoſe; Friends, I wonder at the providence of God, in bringing you hither at this time, for otherwiſe I muſt have ſent for you. And ſo declaring to them what had happened to the afflicted man, he deſired them to ſpend ſome part of the night with him, in ſeeking God for him, which accordingly they did. The next morning Mr Balſom going to viſit him again, found him in a comfortable condition; and aſking of him how he did? he anſwered, Through the goodneſs of God, I have overcome; and am now as full of comfort as I was before of trouble. And ſo continued all that day cheerful, but in great weakneſs, and the next morning died, no diſeaſe appearing upon him.

After ſome time of Mr Balſom's abode there, he was earneſtly entreated to return into his own country, to which, for ſome important reaſons, he was inclined, but was as earneſtly importuned by many of the inhabitants of Berwick, either to abide with them, or to return again to them; and after many arguments, as he was juſt parting with them, as their laſt argument to perſuade him to ſtay with them, they preſented him with a liſt of about threeſcore that had been (as they were verily perſuaded) ſavingly wrought on by his miniſtry, during the time of his continuance there.

He left them, but with a mind of returning to them again, if providence croſt it not; but his return was prevented by his death, which happened about two years after, as he was endeavouring to get himſelf free from the place where he then was, to return to them. In the ſpace of which time he did much good, as in converting many, ſo in reducing many that were drawn away by ſectaries, in the year 1647.

The Life of Mr HERBERT PALMER, B. D. late Maſter of Queen's College in Cambridge, who died Anno Chriſti 1647.

HERBERT PALMER was deſcended of an antient family of that name, allied to divers other families of note, of the nobility and gentry: his father was Sir Thomas Palmer of Wingham in Eaſt Kent, about ſix miles diſtant from Canterbury; his mother was the eldeſt daughter of Herbert Pelham of Crawley in Suſſex, eſq; he was born at Wingham, and was there baptized, March 29. 1601.

He had the happineſs of a prudent and pious education; his father, beſide his piety, being a very wiſe man, and of a more than ordinary underſtanding, as well in ſtate affairs, as thoſe of a more private concernment: his mother, beſide her prudence, and other accompliſhments more than ordinary in her ſex, was alſo eminently religious, and both of them exceeding careful of his education: himſelf alſo, being even from his infancy, much addicted to the ſerious ſtudy both of religion and learning, in both of which he made more than ordinary proficiency in a ſhort time, and continued the exerciſe and improvement of them afterward.

The ſymptoms of grace and piety began betimes to put themſelves forth to the view and obſervation of others, as ſoon almoſt as the exerciſe and uſe of reaſon; ſo that we may not, without good ground, eſteem him ſanctified even from the womb.

When he was about the age of four or five years, he would cry to go to his lady mother, that he might hear ſomewhat of God; ſo ſoon had theſe her religious diſcourſes made pleaſing impreſſions on his apprehenſion. Neither did theſe, and ſuch like expreſſions of affection to good things ſoon vaniſh away, as childiſh apprehenſions uſe to do, but continued and increaſed, according as his years and the uſe of reaſon increaſed.

Hence was it, that even from a child, being aſked at any time what courſe of life he beſt liked to follow, whether to be a lawyer, a courtier, a country gentleman, &c. he would ſtill anſwer, that he would be a miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt: from which, while ſome of his friends, for trial ſake, would ſeem to diſſuade him, as being too mean an employment for a gentleman, telling him that miniſters are hated, deſpiſed, and accounted as the off-scouring of the world, &c. he would reply, It was no matter for that; for if the world hated him, yet God would love him.

He was early acquainted with the book of God, which he much delighted in, and read with great affection; inſomuch, that while he was but a child, little more than five years old, he wept in reading the ſtory of Joſeph, and took much pleaſure in learning of chapters by heart: and here was laid the firſt foundation of that great exactneſs in the knowlege of the ſcriptures, to which he did afterwards attain.

He had excellent natural parts, both intellectual and moral; which as they were ſoon capable of being employed, ſo they were ſoon ſet on work: his parents vigilancy being ſuch, that they ſuffered no time to be neglected.

He learned the French tongue almoſt as ſoon as he could ſpeak Engliſh; even ſo ſoon, as that he hath often affirmed, he did not remember his learning of it. And he did afterwards attain ſo great exactneſs of ſpeaking and preaching in that language, together with a perfect knowlege of the ſtate and affairs of that kingdom, eſpecially of the proteſtant churches amongſt them, that he was often by ſtrangers, thought to be a native Frenchman; and did not doubt but to entertain diſcourſe with any perſon of that nation, for ſome hours together, in their own language, concerning the affairs of that kingdom, who ſhould not be able, by his diſcourſe, to diſtinguiſh him from a native Frenchman, but judge him to be born and bred in France; ſo well was he furniſhed with an exact knowlege both of the propriety, and due pronunciation of that knowlege, and of the perſons, places, and affairs of that kingdom, and the churches therein. A thing not often ſeen in one who had never been out of England.

When he learned the Latin tongue, with ſuch other parts of learning as younger years are uſually employed in at ſchool, his diligence and proficiency therein was ſuch, as produced both commendation and admiration. And while others, at vacant hours, were following their ſports and recreations, he was conſtantly obſerved to be reading ſtudiouſly by himſelf, taking as much pleaſure in good employments, as others in ſports; and counting that the beſt paſt-time, wherein the time was beſt paſſed.

His carriage towards his parents was dutiful and obſequious; not only during his minority, but even afterwards; which was very evident in that honour and reverend reſpect which he continued to expreſs to his godly aged mother to the day of her death, which happened not long before his own; being alſo a ſpecial helper to her in the ways of holineſs.

And what he thus practiſed himſelf, he did frequently commend to others, being always (though himſelf unmarried) a great aſſertor of parental authority, as well from that great emphaſis which God puts upon it through the whole current of ſcripture, as from thoſe remarkable judgments which in ſcripture, and in his own experience, he had obſerved to be inflicted on diſobedient and undutiful children, (whom, as he was wont to ſay, he had ſcarce ever known to eſcape ſome viſible judgment for it in this life, though poſſibly otherwiſe godly perſons), as alſo from thoſe unavoidable miſchiefs, which do frequently enſue in civil ſocieties, where the authority of ſuperiors is vilified or contemned, and which, if well conſidered, will be often found to take their firſt riſe, and original from the contempt of paternal authority.

He was about the year 1615, admitted fellow-commoner in St John's college in Cambridge, where he continued his former diligence, as well in the exerciſe of religion, as the improvement of his learning, both in his private ſtudy, and in the performance of exerciſes in the univerſity and college, notwithſtanding the exemption which fellow-commoners in colleges are ready to plead from the performance of them.

After that he had there taken the degree of maſter of arts, about the year 1622, he was in the year 1623, conſtituted fellow of Queen's-college in that univerſity; where, although he were a gentleman, that beſide his fellowſhip, had an eſtate of his own, and ſo had the leſs need in point of maintenance, to take that trouble of pupils upon him: yet, not ſatisfying himſelf, to take a place upon him, without performing the office thereunto belonging, he took many pupils, of whom he was more than ordinarily careful, being very diligent both in praying with them in his chamber, and inſtructing them in the grounds of religion; as alſo keeping them to their ſtudies and the performance of diſputations, and other exerciſes of learning, privately in his chamber, beſide the more public exerciſes required of them by the college, to the great benefit of thoſe that were his pupils.

While he was fellow of Queen's college, about the year 1624, he was ſolemnly ordained to the work of the miniſtry, whereunto from a child he had addicted himſelf; and about the year 1626, he was called to the public exercife thereof, as a lecturer in the city of Canterbury; where, for divers years, (notwithſtanding the great oppoſitions he there met with, from ſuch as were enemies to the power of godlineſs,) he did with much diligence and very great ſucceſs diſcharge that great work, to the ſpiritual edification and comfort of many yet alive, to whom his memory to this day is precious.

The occaſion of his coming thither was this; coming from Cambridge, to give a viſit to his brother, ſir Thomas Palmer at Wingham, he did at the intreaty of ſome friends, preach a ſermon at the cathedral church in Canterbury, and that with ſo much true zeal, and real ſavour of piety, as did much affect the godly hearers. The report hereof coming to the knowlege of Mr Delme (a godly, faithful, prudent, and laborious miniſter of the French church in Canterbury) he made a journey to Wingham, on purpoſe to gain a further knowlege of him, and acquaintance with him, with whom he was already not a little in love, from that good report he had heard of him, though as yet by face unknown to him; and hereby not only obtained the knowlege of the man, but was alſo, by his gracious and ſavoury diſcourſe and carriage, very much confirmed in that good opinion which he had before conceived of him. And this was the firſt foundation of that entire and chriſtian friendſhip, which with much ſpiritual advantage to them both, was contracted between theſe two holy men, which continued, and encreaſed daily to their mutual comfort, and contentment while they were both living, and the memory thereof is ſtill precious to him that doth yet ſurvive.

After this, before his return to Cambridge, having, at the requeſt of Mr Delme, preached a ſecond ſermon at St George's church in Canterbury, on a week day lecture; the moſt godly and beſt affected in the city, were more and more taken with him, and expreſſed great deſires of enjoying his miniſtry amongſt them, if it might be obtained.

Hereupon, Mr Delme with ſeveral others of the moſt conſiderable gentlemen and citizens, having earneſtly ſought direction from God in a matter of ſuch concernment, did ſeriouſly adviſe about it; and being firſt aſſured of the concurrent deſires of many others, did by letters and meſſages to Cambridge, ſignify to him the deſire of the godly in that city, that he would undertake to preach a lecture amongſt them.

This invitation after mature deliberation, he thought good good to accept of, preferring the opportunity and probability of doing good in that populous place before the hopes of preferment, either in the univerſity or elſewhere which, by reaſon of his many friends and acquaintance, great at court, and otherwiſe, he might likely have attained unto; holding ſteady to that reſolution, which long before that time he had taken up, ſo to employ himſelf as might probably moſt promote the work of God, whatever became of his own advantages. Whereupon a licence being obtained for him from George Abb, then arch biſhop of Canterbury, authoriſing him to preach a weekly lecture on the Lord's day, in the afternoon at Alphage church in that city; he left his fellowſhip in the univerſity, and undertook this work.

During his abode in this employment, he did much edify the people there, both by ſound doctrine and exemplary converſation. His ſermons were altogether ſpiritual and heavenly, full of ſolid explications and practical applications of the word of God; whereby the city was well ſeaſoned as with ſavoury ſalt, and much preſerved from theſe innovations and corruptions, both in doctrine and worſhip, which in thoſe days were creeping on apace; by reaſon whereof that leaven of formality, which many of the cathedraliſts were promoting, who preferred pompous ceremonies before the power of godlineſs, was ſtopped from ſpreading and corrupting ſo much, as otherwiſe it might have done. For although he was not then perſuaded of the unlawfulneſs of the then government, and ſome ceremonies then in uſe, yet he could noway approve of the corrupt innovations coming on in thoſe days, but did with all wiſdom and zeal reprove them, countenancing goodneſs and good men.

And by this means, he was a great ſtay and comfort to the godly miniſters and people, both in the city and country thereabouts; whom, not only by his public preaching, but by many other chriſtian and miniſterial helps adminiſtred in his more private converſes, he did very much encourage in true piety. Of this very many families in that city had great experience, even thoſe of the meaneſt rank, whom he was wont often to viſit as he had opportunity, that he might the better underſtand their ſpiritual condition; admitting alſo perſons of all ranks freely to apply themſelves unto him as they had occaſion, and to partake the benefit of private conferences, prayers, and other religious exerciſes; as likewiſe affording his Chriſtian advice and direction in caſes of difficulty, eſpecially to diſtreſſed conſciences; in which caſes, by moſt of his prudent and judicious reſolutions, he was frequently conſulted with as a kind of oracle. And that not only during his abode at Canterbury, but wherever elſe the providence of God did caſt him. And herein he had an excellent ability and dexterity, and took much delight in it.

And his aſſiſtance he afforded not only to thoſe of that city, but alſo to many of the moſt religious families of the nobility and gentry thereabouts; to whom, both by his perſonal converſes, and his Chriſtian letters, of which there are great numbers yet to be ſeen, he afforded frequent directions and encouragements in the ways of God; and particularly the noble family of Thomas late earl of Winchelſey, then viſcount Maidſton, whoſe abode at that time was at the Mote, a place near Canterbury: the exemplary piety of whoſe family, and the ſeveral noble branches thereof was by him in a ſpecial manner promoted.

The like aſſiſtance he afforded alſo to thoſe of the French congregation in Canterbury, whom, by reaſon of his exact knowlege in the French language, he was able to edify very much. And at the requeſt of their elderſhip, he did twice preach to them in that language upon moſt ſolemn days, to the great aſtoniſhment and edification of the whole congregation. It is memorable, that an ancient French gentlewoman, when ſhe ſaw him the firſt time coming into the pulpit, being ſtartled at the ſmallneſs of his perſonal appearance, and the weakneſs of his look, cried out, in the hearing of thoſe that ſate by her, Hola! que nous dira cett enfant icy? Alas, what ſhould this child ſay to us? But having heard him pray and preach with ſo much ſpiritual ſtrength and vigour, ſhe lift her hands to Heaven with admiration and joy, bleſſing God for what ſhe had heard.

Yet this his faithful diſcharge of the miniſtry was not without ſome oppoſition. On the one hand thoſe of the ſeparation, and ſuch as were inclineable thereunto, were ſomewhat troubleſome to him; but could get no advantage upon him, nor did prevail any thing (while he remained there) upon his hearers.

On the other ſide, the cathedraliſts and their favourers did oppoſe him, fearing ('tis like) leſt his godly courſes and exact walking might be a blemiſh to their looſe and carnal ways. And therefore, though the greatneſs of his birth and friends, hindered them ſomewhat from proſecuting of him, as probably they would otherwiſe have done; yet once ſome of the chiefeſt of them adventured to exhibit articles againſt him: but his cauſe and anſwers proved ſuch, as that they were not able to hurt him.

After three years, or thereabouts, his lecture there was put down by the dean and arch deacon, upon certain inſtructions then on foot concerning Afternoon ſermons, to the great grief of his godly hearers. But not long after, upon the petition of great numbers of the gentry and citizens, to the then arch biſhop, by whoſe licence and authority he had been before eſtabliſhed accompanied with the laudable teſtimony of divers miniſters concerning his orthodox doctrine, and unblameable converſation, together with the concurrent teſtimony of ten knights, and divers others of the gentry and chief citizens, he was again reſtored.

During his continuance here, he was twice, by the procurement of his friends at court, likely to be made one of the prebendaries of Canterbury. But he often admired and praiſed that providence of God, that his friends endeavours therein ſucceeded not; ſeeing himſelf by this means delivered from many temptations and dangers, which had been incident, if he had been one of that company; they being afterward, by the ſucceeding arch-biſhop, mainly ſet on work, for the ſetting up and promoting ſuperſtitious innovations.

After ſome years he was removed from Canterbury, to the vicarage of Aſhwel in Hartfordſhire, whereunto he was preſented by William Laud, the late arch biſhop of Canterbury, which in his defence before the houſe of peers in parliament, was by the arch-biſhop inſiſted upon as one of his good deeds; to which he received inſtitution, February 7. 1632, where he continued the ſame zeal, diligence and care, which he had before diſcovered, in ſeeking the good of thoſe ſouls that were committed to his charge.

Beſide his conſtant preaching there twice every Lord's-day, he did alſo very frequently preach to them occaſionally, as any opportunity was offered; not willing to let paſs any advantage offered of doing them good. Wherein, notwithſtanding the excellency of his learning, whereby, if he had ſought it, he might have attained great applauſe and admiration, even from knowing men, in the oſtentation thereof: yet he choſe always to condeſcend to the capacities of his hearers, with ſo much plainneſs, as that, if poſſible, he might be underſtood by all, even thoſe of the meaneſt capacities, as being moſt ſtudious, both for the matter and manner of his preaching, how he might be able moſt of all to profit thoſe that heard him. And on this ground upon any emergent occaſions, he endeavoured as much as might be, to ſuit his matter thereunto, and ſo the word of God, and the providence of God, might one edge unto the other, and both jointly become the more effectual. And for the ſame reaſon, he did the more approve of funeral Sermons, for that at ſuch times the minds of men, eſpecially thoſe more immediately concerned, are thereby rendered the more penſive and ſerious, and ſo the more fit to take impreſſions by the word. On the ſame ground alſo was he careful to obſerve the advantages of ſickneſs, or any other conſiderable afflictions, becauſe his admonition and Chriſtian advice, were like to be at ſuch a time the more effectual, when God had, as it were, ſoftned their heart, and opened their ear to hear.

He was alſo careful by catechiſing, both in public, and at his own houſe, to inſtruct in the principles of religion, not only the children and youth, but even thoſe that were aged, in caſe he diſcerned them ignorant, and ſuch as ſtood in need thereof; and yet not ſo as might expoſe them to ſcorn and reproach, but ſo as might moſt conduce to their edifica-edification in the knowlege and fear of the Lord. To which end, he had prevailed with thoſe of his pariſh, at leaſt the far greater number of them, and thoſe the moſt conſiderable perſons to concur with him in it; by ſending their children and ſervants conſtantly to be catechized one the the Lord's-day before the afternoon-ſermon, ſome of whom he catechized publicly in the congregation, and others more privately in his own houſe either by himſelf or his aſſiſtant, that ſo the public catechizing might neither be too tedious, nor intrench upon the time allotted for other exerciſes, as praying, reading, expounding, preaching, &c. nor yet the examination of others for want of time, be wholly omitted; as alſo by their own endeavours at home to help on this work: and likewiſe to contribute their aſſiſtance in perſuading others to the ſame willingneſs. As for thoſe who were more eminent, but yet needed inſtruction, he labboured both by his own perſuaſion, and the perſuaſion of others, to work in them a willingneſs to repair to him in private at convenient times, that by conferences with them, and friendly diſcourſe in a familiar and gentle manner, he might bring them to ſuch a ſufficiency of knowlege, as was neceſſary for their own ſalvation.

And the better to perſuade people to a willingneſs thus to receive inſtruction he uſed by way of encouragement, eſpecially to thoſe of the meaner ſort, to give Bibles to ſuch as could read, and five ſhillings in money to ſuch as could not, when they attained ſuch a meaſure of knowlege, as that they were judged fit to partake of the Lord's ſupper. And ſuch like rewards and encouragements he uſed to beſtow on others, as he ſaw occaſion; furniſhing them with books and writings, and otherwiſe encouraging them according as they ſhould manifeſt their diligence in gaining and improving their knowlege. All which the generation to come, and the children yet unborn, may have cauſe to bleſs God for, when they ſhall receive the benefits thereof communicated from their parents to them, while others do as much in them lies, entail ignorance and Atheiſm upon their poſterity.

And becauſe he found it difficult, to bring thoſe of ſhallow memories and weak capacities to underſtand and remember the principles of religion; diſcerning, that many who could not diſtinctly repeat the words, did yet underſtand the matter, and therefore were not to be deſpiſed or diſcouraged; and others of firmer memories, who were able to learn the words, did underſtand little or nothing of the meaning of them. He did therefore ſtudy how he might beſt remedy both thoſe evils; and to that end framed ſeveral forms of catechiſms in divers kinds. At length he pitched on that form, as the moſt convenient that he could think of, which he publiſhed in print in tituled An endeavour of making the principles of the Chriſts an religion plain and eaſy, of which ſo many thouſands have been printed of late years, and entertained with great approbation.

His method therein is this; the anſwers which make up the main body of the catechiſm, are ſo many diſtinct aphoriſms, or entire propoſitions in themſelves, without dependance on the queſtions to make the ſenſe entire, containing in themſelves a brief model of divinity: and to that purpoſe ſo much of the queſtion is ſtill repeated in the anſwer, as is neceſſary to make the ſenſe perfect. Hereby the learner is freed from a double inconveniency: the one is, that when the ſenſe of an anſwer is imperfect, he is forced to charge his memory with learning the queſtion alſo, or elſe to make uſe either of this book or another's help to aſk the queſtion, that ſo that anſwer which he hath learned may be perfect ſenſe. The other is, that aptneſs in the learner to miſapply the anſwer to a wrong queſtion, when he learns only the predicate of the propoſition without the ſubject. Both which inconveniencies are in this way in a great meaſure prevented.

Another thing mainly conſiderable in this method, is that beſide the main queſtions, and the anſwers thereunto, there are alſo annexed divers explicatory queſtions, which require no other anſwer but yes or no; without any further charging of the learner's memory, do direct him to the diſtinct obſerving of what is contained in the principal anſwer, and ſo to the underſtanding thereof; whereas otherwiſe heedleſs learners are apt (parot like) only to learn the words without at all regarding the meaning of them. The ſame alſo will direct to help a weak memory the better to recite the larger anſwer, if he be firſt required to give a particular anſwer to thoſe expoſitory queſtions; for he will then have nothing to expreſs in the full anſwer, beſide what in the prepatory queſtions had been ſuggeſted to him. As for example, queſt. 'In what condition was man created by God at the firſt?' Was he made miſerable? No, or very happy? Yes. In the image of God? Yes. 'In what condition then was man created by God at firſt?' Anſ. Man was created at the firſt in a very happy condition, in the image of God.

And in the ſame method he intended to digeſt the leſſer catechiſm, compoſed by the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter, (and authoriſed for public uſe) if God had afforded him life to have ſeen that catechiſm perfected, to the compiling whereof he had contributed no ſmall aſſiſtance; which therefore ſince his death hath been performed, by one that was intimate with him, and fully acquainted with his reſolutions in that particular.

As he was careful thus to inſtruct his flock, ſo was he alſo vigilant to prevent diſorders and miſdemeanours among them in point of practice, wherein he was not contented to uſe his own perſonal endeavours, but did alſo engage his pariſhioners to contribute their beſt aſſiſtance thereunto; whereunto they did oblige themſelves in divers excellent reſolutions and agreements, concluded by common conſent among them, and ſubſcribed by their hands, viz. for the preventing and puniſhing of drunkenneſs and tippling or profaning the Lord's day, and of other prophane, or diſorderly demeanours during the exerciſe of divine worſhip; by ſleeping, talking, playing &c. as likewiſe of ſtealing and pilfering: of prophane ſwearing and curſing, of railing ſlandering, whoredom, fighting, and quarreling, diſobedience to parents and governors, and of other miſdemeanours in whomſoever.

In the religious ordering of his own family, he was extraordinary vigilant and painful, that it might be, ſo much as in him lay, a garden without weeds; and that thoſe which were under his roof, might either not periſh, or at leaſt not through his default. Indeed his houſe was a ſchool of religion, ſuch as there are very few to be found; inſomuch that it was counted a great happineſs to live under his roof, under the conſtant enjoyment of ſo much means for the ſouls good.

It was his great care to entertain none in his family, but ſuch as were either truly godly, or at leaſt willing to be inſtructed and educated in the ways of God, and who would be ready and willing to attend the exerciſes of God's worſhip, both publicly and privately, and to avoid all ſcandalous converſation.

It was his conſtant practice twice every day to pray with his family, not allowing any to be abſent; at which times he read to them ſome portion both of the old and new Teſtament.

He was careful alſo to catechiſe his family twice every week, and likewiſe on Friday and Saturday to require an account from them of the ſermons preached the Lord's day before, which he then repeated to them.

Having alſo while he was at Aſhwel, the ſons of divers conſiderable perſons of the nobility and gentry, ſojourning in his houſe, for their better education in religion and learning, (he maintaining in his houſe an aſſiſtant as a ſchool maſter to teach them) he required of them the like account in catechiſing and repetitions as of his own ſervants.

He had alſo daily, after dinner and ſupper, a chapter read by one of thoſe gentlemen in courſe, and he whoſe turn was to read, was required alſo, after he had read, to repeat the ſubſtance out of his memory, which (by conſtant cuſtom) they had attained an ability to perform very exactly; after which, himſelf uſed to go over the ſame briefly, by way of expoſition, of what appeared difficult, and noting ſuch obſervations as were moſt obvious from the moſt remarkable paſſages therein.

Beſide this, he required his ſervants, after every meal to have ſome portion of ſcripture read amongſt them, or ſome other religious treatiſe concerning the fundamentals of religion, if in both.

But eſpecially he was careful that all his family ſhould ſanctify

ſanctify the Sabbath day. And therefore would not ſuffer them to be employed late the night before, about their ordinary employments, but cauſed them to conclude ſooner than on other days, that they might not be indiſpoſed for the duties of the day following. And on the Sabbath day it ſelf, he was careful that they ſhould not ſpend any part of it idly or vainly, no not in any unneceſſary preparations of diet or the like, but only of ſuch and ſo much as was neceſſary for their comfortable refreſhment that day; but would have them ſpend the whole day, as much as might be, in the exerciſes of ſome of God's ordinances public or private, inſomuch that if he had known of any diſh that had kept any of his ſervants from attending on any of God's ordinances, he would not at all eat of it.

And for better ſanctifying of that day, he was careful not only to perform private duties in his family, as prayer, reading, ſinging of pſalms, &c. but alſo when he went to the public ordinances, he would call all his family together to go along with him, that ſo they might be preſent at the whole ſervice of God. And in the evening of the day, he required of all his ſervants, and the young gentlemen that ſojourned with him, an account of ſuch portions of ſcripture as had been read in buplic; that as they recited particular paſſages thereof, he gave brief expoſitions of them, and obſervations from them: preſſing them to meditate in private of what they read in public.

Beſides this great care of his family jointly, he was alſo frequent in giving them perſonal counſel and direction in the ways of God, exhorting them alſo to a daily conſtancy in the performance of ſecret duties betwsen God and their own ſouls; ſo that ſcarce any family enjoyed the like meaſure of helps and encouragements in the ways of holineſs.

His exact walking in his own ſecret devotion, was alſo exceedingly remarkable. He was a man much in communion with God. Twice every day, he was in ſecret a ſuiter at the throne of grace, and oftner, as any particular occaſion was offered. He would very ſeldom enter upon any buſineſs, either by himſelf, or with others, without firſt ſeeking of God. He did often ſet days apart to humble himſelf in ſecret by faſting and prayer, according as either public or particular occaſions did ſeem to call for it; as alſo in ſolemn thankſgiving, for mercies received, whether public or private.

He was a great admirer of the holy ſcriptures, and much converſant in them. Beſides what he had read and heard read in his family, he did every day by himſelf read ſome part both of the old and new Teſtament, and conſtantly writ ſhort meditations and obſervations of what he ſo read whereof he hath left behind him many hundred ſheets written in characters. He was ſo throughly acquainted with it, that it was not eaſy to name a chapter or verſe, but he would preſently tell the contents of it; nor to name any ſentence of ſcripture, but he could preſently tell in what chapter or verſe it was to be found; yea, ſcarce any particular could fall out in practice, but that he would be able to ſhew what particular directions the word of God afforded for it.

He was alſo a great obſerver of providence, and took ſpecial notice how the providences of God, and the word of God did conſtantly agree together. And from hence was able to give very near conjectures, if not evident predictions in many caſes, what God was about to do, and what good or evil events were likely to come to paſs; by comparing preſent actions with ſuch precedents as he had before obſerved, in the providence and word of God in like caſes.

And as he was very careful to order all his actions according to this conſtant rule, of being ſubſervient to the glory of God, and the good of ſouls, ſo that even his journeys, viſits, diſcourſes, and familiar converſes with any, were not undertaken without a ſpecial eye hereunto; ſo did he alſo keep an exact account of what had paſſed; every night before his going to reſt, ſetting down in writing (in his uſual character,) the paſſages of that day, what actions or diſcourſes he had been employed in, what ſucceſſes or diſappointments, what mercies or croſſes he met withal, and what failings he obſerved in himſelf: all which he ſurveyed again at the end of every week, writing down the chief paſſages of that week, and ſo from month to month, and year to year. By means whereof he was throughly accquainted with his own ſpiritual condition, and did maintain a conſtant exactneſs, and even walking with God; which being ſo uniform, might perhaps by ſome be the leſs obſerved. Like the ſun's conſtant brightneſs, produceth leſs admiration, than ſome blazing ſtar that appeareth but for a while; men uſually more admiring things rare than excellent.

In the year 1632, he was by the univerſity of Cambridge made one of the univerſity preachers (having proceeded batchellor of divinity about two years before;) a matter of honour and repute, rather than of profit or employments. Yet alſo a matter of ſome advantage in ſome caſes, (as times then went) being in the nature of a general license, whereby he was authoriſed to preach, as he ſhould have occaſion in any part in England.

At the beginning of the parliament, he with Dr Tuckney, were choſen clerks of the convocation, for the dioceſe of Lincoln; wherein he might have been of good uſe, in caſe it had been thought fit to have kept up that kind of aſſembly, to have acted in concurrence with the parliament as in former times.

In the year 1643. he was by authority of parliament, called to be a member of the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter. And after ſome time he was choſen one of the aſſeſſors, appointed to aſſiſt the prolocutor in caſe of abſence or infirmity. He was in that aſſembly an eminent and very uſeful member, exceeding diligent and induſtrious, being very rarely abſent, and that not but upon urgent and unavoidable occaſions. For as he accounted it an honour to be employed by God in ſo public a ſervice for the good of his church: ſo he did conſcientiouſly attend upon that ſervice preferring it before all other more particular employments, which tho' in themſelves excellent, yet ought, in his judgment, to give way for this.

And he was exceeding well fitted for this employment, having a clear and ready apprehenſion, and firm and vaſt memory, a ſolid and ſteady judgment, and a good ability, freely to expreſs himſelf. In matters of deliberation, he manifeſted much integrity and chriſtian wiſdom. In matters of debate, whether about doctrine or diſcipline, he diſcovered a great ſagacity in ſearching out the true ſenſe of ſcripture, a clear judgment, and ſtrength of reaſon, as well in the accurate ſtating of queſtions for debate, as in confirming the truth, and diſſolving objections againſt it; in all, a great meaſure of zeal, piety and prudence. All which procured him much reverence, and eſteem, from the reſt of his brethren, who judged his preſence and aſſiſtance a very great help, and advantage in that difficult work, and believed his death as an unſpeakable loſs.

His judgment was known to be for the preſbyterian government; the principles whereof he did throughly underſtand, and was well able to defend, and was a very great inſtrument for the promoting of it. Yet in two things he was at firſt much unſatisfied, but by the debates of the aſſembly, did profeſs himſelf to receive ſatisfaction in both.

One was concerning the divine right of ruling elders, wherein he afterwards profeſſed himſelf to be fully convinced, principally by the authority of thoſe two places, 1 Cor. 12. 28. (where government is attributed to a diſtinct rank of officers inferior to teachers,) and 1 Tim. v. 17. which implieth, that there are other elders which rule well, beſide thoſe that labour in the word and doctrine.

The other was, why there ought not to be continued in the church an office ſuperior to that of preſbyters. For although he did not approve of the hierarchical government as it was of late eſtabliſhed and practiſed amongſt us: yet ſince it is confeſſed that Timothy and Titus, as evangeliſts, did exerciſe an authority, ſuperior to that of ordinary preſbyters, the object of which authority, ſeemed to be of perpetual continuance in the church, it ſeemed probable to him, that the office alſo of an evangeliſt, was no extraordinary office, but ought to be continued in the church. But hereunto he received ſatisfaction, principally from hence, that in caſe the holy Ghoſt had intended the continuance of that office, he would withall, have deſcribed the work, and qualifications of perſons fit for it, and taken ſome courſe for continuing the ſucceſſion thereof, as is done in that of elders and deacons. But this being wholly omitted, there being no more extant in that kind, than concerning the apostolical office, the power of working miracles, &c. We are rather to esteem that office, as well as these, to be extraordinary, and but of a temporary continuance, expiring with the persons.

Being thus called to attend the assembly at Westminster, he was forced to intermit his ordinary residence at Ashwel; being able only to exercise such a care of them as might be performed at a distance, and by making occasional journies thither, as he could obtain opportunities so to do. But the ordinary exercise of the ministerial work there, together with the profits of the place, he put over to a godly and able divine, to be performed in his absence; reserving notwithstanding his title to the place, not knowing how soon God might afford him opportunity of returning to them again.

But, unwilling to intermit the exercise of his ministerial function, he did at first preach occasionally (as he was requested) in divers churches in and about London, resolving notwithstanding within himself, to accept of the the first invitation for the constant exercise thereof.

And accordingly being soon after requested by the inhabitants of Dukes place in London, (who were then destitute of a minister) to preach amongst them, he did (notwithstanding their inability to raise any considerable maintenance, which might invite him) willingly to accept that employment.

This work he performed amongst them with much faithfulness, and diligence, as well by public reading, praying and preaching among them twice every Lord's day, and at other times as there was occasion; as also by administring the sacraments, public catechising, and exposition of such portions of scripture as were read amongst them. And likewise (as his custom had been elsewhere) by more private acquaintance, and converse with them in their families, whereby he might be the better able to afford personal directions, and other ministerial helps to them, as their several conditions might require. All which was performed with so much meekness, wisdom, and piety, and accompanied with such a blessing from God, as that it made a very great impression on them for their good, and was entertained by them with much approbation and affection, they being ambitious who should enjoy most of this heavenly communion and converse with him. Hereby in a short time he did much good, informing such as were weak in knowlege, settling and confirming such as were wavering in judgment, and stirring up in all, both by his heavenly conversation and christian counsel, a greater zeal and affection to the power of godliness. By reason of all which during the time of his abode amongst them, they were much preserved both from errors and divisions, whereunto the great unsettledness of the times did much expose them.

Afterwards, when the new church at Westminster was perfected and made fit for use, the inhabitants there, and others concerned therein, did sollicit him to undergo the charge of that great people; with proffer of far larger maintainance than he received or could expect from those of Dukes place, where the inhabitants were neither many nor of great estates.

But this consideration did not at all prevail with him, who regarded the work more than the wages. For although he doubted not that both religion, and reason did require a comfortable and honourable maintenance, for those that laboured in the work of the ministry, yet for his own part he was willing to deny himself in that particular, if so doing might ought advance the service of God. And so much the rather, because being a batchellor, and intending so to continue, not at all addicted to pompous vanities or excess, either in diet or apparel (in both of which he was exceedingly moderate) he had the less need of being sollicitous in getting riches; being indeed much more sollicitous, how (like a faithful steward,) to dispose and order what he had, as might be most for God's honour and service, than how to encrease it.

Yet his removal being much press'd upon grounds of another nature, he did at length, with the approbation of those concerned on both parts, refer the whole business to be considered and concluded by divers of the most eminent of his reverend and godly brethren of the assembly, whom he did frequently desire that they would wholly lay aside the continuation of maintenance, and deliver their judgments, what in other considerations they judged to be most agreeable to God's will and his duty.

Hereupon they to whom the matter was referred, meeting several times about it, and hearing at large on either side what could be alledged either for his stay or removal; after mature deliberation had, and seeking of God's direction, agreed in this opinion; that setting aside the consideration of maintenance, yet in regard of the eminency of the place, the greatness of the auditory, the many persons of quality residing there, and the great need of instruction to those of an inferior rank, many of whom were extremely ignorant, (by reason that amongst such a great multitude of people, there had in former times been so great a scarcity of preaching) together with divers other reasons of the like nature, which did more than countervail what could be alledged on the other hand, his obligations also to those of Dukes place not being absolute; they judged it most fit that he should leave Dukes place and undertake that charge at Westminster.

To this their resolution he consented, yet with this proviso, that those of Dukes place, should be first provided of an able faithful pastor to succeed him, being utterly unwilling to leave them destitute. And accordingly, having prevailed with Mr Thomas Young, (since doctor in divinity, and master of Jesus college in Cambridge) to succeed him there, (who was also an eminent member of the assembly of divines, a man of great learning, of much prudence and piety, and of great ability and fidelity in the work of the ministry) he took his leave of them: commending them to the grace of God, and the pious care of his successor, taking on him the charge of those belonging to the new church in Westminster, and was the first pastor of that church.

He was here also eminently faithful, and laborious in the work of the ministry, in public praying, reading, expounding, preaching, administring the sacraments, and catechising, with brief and clear expositions and confirmations of the principles of religion, as had been his usual custom in other places. Beside which he was also one of the seven, that by appointment of parliament did carry on that daily morning lecture at the Abbey church; into much that it seems almost a miracle, that so weak a body of his should possibly be able to do so much as constantly he performed, continuing oft times to speak in public for the space of six or eight hours on a Sabbath day, beside much time spent in more private exercises of prayer, repititions, &c. in the family, yet when his friends have perswaded him to favour himself, judging so much pains to be more than his body could endure; his answer had been, that his strength would spend of it self, though he did nothing; and it could not be better spent than in God's service. Yea, so far was he from favouring himself in this kind, that it was a rule with him which he constantly observed, never to favour himself by declining any ministerial exercise which he was requested to perform, whether in public or private, if he were possibly able to perform it.

Neither did he here neglect, what had been his constant practice else where, to afford private assistance to those of his flock and others, as he had opportunity. But what time he could gain from the more public affairs of the assembly, he spent for the most part in such duties, not willing to lose an hour which could be employed in doing good. And to this end, beside that free access that persons of all ranks might have unto him, as they had occasion, he spent much time in visiting them at their own families, to communicate some spiritual good to them, as directions, consolations, and encouragements in the ways of godliness, which made his company both very profitable and much desired. Hereby, besides others, very many considerable families of the nobility and gentry, (whose practice commonly hath a great influence on others) were much quickned and encouraged in the visible practice of godliness, and the power of religion, which thereby was much improved; and very many of them are ready upon all occasions, to profess that it was their great happineſs to be acquainted with him, and bewail the want of it as a great loſs.

And he was hereunto the more fitted, for that he was naturally of a loving and friendly diſpoſition, of a courteous and affable carriage, even towards inferiors, and thoſe of mean rank, eſpecially if he diſcovered in them ſigns of grace, which he did honour and encourage wherever he met with it. Hereby he gained much love and affection from thoſe with whom he had to do, by reaſon whereof his counſels and advice became ſo much the more effectual.

To which we may add alſo his birth and education, and his frequent converſing with perſons of quality to whom he was related and allied, by reaſon whereof he was well qualified with ſuch accompliſhments as might render his company acceptable, as knowing well how to give due reſpect to all, according as their places and conditions did require, and yet to preſerve the honour and reverence of his miniſterial authority, which by the gravity, ſobriety, and holineſs of his converſation, was much ſecured.

In that great ordinance of the Lord's ſupper, which in theſe broken and diſtracted times hath been in many places wholly laid aſide, and in many more too much neglected: he took much care and pains how to manage that great buſineſs, ſo as it might be neither diſpleaſing to God, nor juſtly offenſive to good men.

The difficulty herein hath been, not concerning the manner of adminiſtration, which hath afforded leſs matter of conteſt, but concerning the perſons that might be judged fit to be admitted thereunto; which to many men hath been attended with ſo much perplexity, that they have apprehended a neceſſity of a total intermiſſion, and almoſt an impoſſibility of adminiſtering it in any tolerable manner; while, on the one hand, they durſt not promiſcuouſly admit all, by reaſon of the great ignorance of many, and the prophaneneſs or looſeneſs of others; and yet, on the other hand, ſaw not how they might be able, for want of authority, to debar any: waiting ſtill for the ſettling of a government in the church, whereby this great difficulty might in ſome meaſure be removed; till at length, through the long intermiſſion of this ordinance, thoſe that are profane and carnal began to ſlight and ſcorn it, and thoſe of better principles do too much abate in their affections to it.

And that remedy, which though late, began at length to be applied, in beginning to eſtabliſh the preſbyterian government, hath been yet ſo much defective in want of power, and ſo much expoſed to ſcorn and reproach, which men of prophane or turbulent ſpirits caſt upon it, either from principles of prophaneneſs, or of ſeparation, or from ſome other bitter root, which renders men unwilling to have their luſts, errors, unlawful liberties, or licentious courſes, in any kind whatſoever, to be checked or contradicted, that the matter is now almoſt grown deſperate, unleſs God will be pleaſed, in ſpecial favour, to afford ſome unexpected remedy.

Herein this holy man did manifeſt a great meaſure of ſingular prudence and piety, wiſely avoiding both rocks; neither totally omitting the celebration of the ſacrament, nor yet promiſcouſly admitting all unto it; but thoſe only of whoſe ſufficient knowlege he was aſſured, and whoſe lives, ſo far as he could diſcern, were unblameable and free from ſcandal.

And this he did, not only of late years, but even formerly, from his firſt undertaking a paſtoral charge; at that time it may well be ſuppoſed, to have been a thing both of greater difficulty and danger, than of late years, to keep off unworthy receivers from prophaning that holy ordinance.

In order hereunto, his firſt work was to abate, as much as might be, the number of ignorant people, by perſuading them to be willing to receive inſtruction, which with much care and diligence he was ready to afford unto them, in ſuch ways as is before expreſſed; which, though a difficult work, was yet carried on with ſo great ſucceſs, thro' God's bleſſing on his endeavours, that in his pariſh of Aſhwel, where was no ſmall number of people, he had in a ſhort time brought them to ſo great a meaſure of knowlege, that there was either none or very few, either old or young, who were not able to give a good account of the principles of religion.

When he had once prevailed with them to be ſo far ſenſible of their own ignorance, as to be willing and deſirous to learn, it was then no hard matter to perſuade ſuch of their own accord to forbear a while, till they had attained ſo much knowlege as that they might come with comfort, which would be ſo much the ſooner, according as they were the more diligent in labouring to attain knowlege.

When they had attained a competent meaſure of knowlege, if their lives were anſwerable, and not obnoxious to juſt exception; or at leaſt, they willing to redreſs what was amiſs, and ready to follow ſuch good advice and directions, as were given them for the ordering their converſations aright towards God and man; there was then no reaſon why they ſhould be longer debarred, but rather ſuch good beginnings cheriſhed and encouraged; yet with cautions frequently inculcated, to beware of hypocriſy and formality, and not to reſt in theſe beginnings, but to preſs forward to perfection.

But in caſe they did either obſtinately refuſe inſtruction, or, notwithſtanding their knowlege, were ſcandalous and incorrigible, or ſuch as in point of converſation he could not judge fit to be admitted to that ordinance; then probably they would either be found ſuch as were obnoxious to ſuch ſcandals as might endanger a more public proſecution, and ſo durſt not be refractory; or elſe, by the conviction of their own conſciences, when the danger of unworthy receiving ſhould be laid open to them; or by friendly perſuaſions from himſelf or others: or by the reverence and awe of his holy and grave carriage, and miniſterial authority, backed with the concurrence of others amongſt them, eminent for worth and piety; or for fear of being aſhamed, in caſe they ſhould be openly reproved, or refuſed in the face of the congregation, or upon ſome other the like conſideration, would be perſuaded to forbear, in caſe he judged them as yet unfit to be admitted to that ordinance. So that ſcarce any whom he judged utterly unfit, have ever peremptorily preſſed upon him to partake of it. And by theſe means, even in times of greateſt danger, was he able to avoid the mixture of profane and unworthy perſons at the Lord's table.

Hereunto his naturally courteous and affable diſpoſition did much conduce, whereby he could with the more eaſe gain acceſs both to the perſons and affections of all ſorts of people; together with an excellent mixture of meekneſs and courage, which being managed with ſingular prudence, and indefatigable induſtry, enabled him happily to carry on that difficult work, which might otherwiſe ſeem almoſt inſuperable.

And by the ſame couragious and prudent carriage he obtained a like intereſt in the affections of his people, both at Duke's-place and Weſtminſter, inſomuch as thoſe who were fit to be admitted to that ſacrament, were either otherwiſe ſufficiently known to him, by his converſing with them, or elſe would willingly, upon that occaſion, approve themſelves to him, both in point of knowlege and converſation; and others who were unfit, nor cared to attend a fitneſs for it, would rather of their own accord forbear, than venture the hazard of being refuſed; by means whereof, himſelf, and ſome hundreds of godly perſons who did communicate with him, could with great comfort join in that holy communion and fellowſhip.

On the 11th of April, in the year 1644, he was conſtituted maſter of Queen's college in Cambridge, by the earl of Mancheſter, then employed by ordinance of parliament, for the reforming of that univerſity.

He had a great influence upon the general reformation of that univerſity, and by his advice and counſel did very much help forward that work, exciting alſo and encouraging others therein, notwithſtanding the difficulties in the way, that were repreſented as almoſt invincible; and did improve all that intereſt which he had, both in that noble religious earl of Mancheſter, and in the aſſembly of divines, who were to give their approbation to all ſuch as ſhould be put into the places of ſuch as were ejected in that univerſity, whether maſters or fellows, that all poſſible care and circumſpection might be uſed, that ſuch only as were both learned and religious, might be commended to, or approved for thoſe places, leſt, inſtead of thoſe that were caſt out, others as bad as they ſhould ſucceed them, as well in their vices as their places.

But more especially in reference to that place, to the government whereof he was designed (whereof also he he had formerly been a fellow), it cannot easily be believed how exceeding circumspect he was, how cautious and wary in the choice of those who (as fellows) were to join with him in the government, that they might be learned, pious, and unanimous: the happy effect of which care, in so quiet and peaceable establishment of that society, as could not easily be expected in so troublesome a time, was, to the great astonishment and amazement of all, even of those that hated them, and hath had a very great influence upon that happy and flourishing condition thereof ever since. What his aim was in that place did continually appear, by his constant expressions and prayers, which sounded of nothing more than the advancement of religion and learning; and he was as true to those expressions in his continued endeavours and actings.

His first and main care was the advancement of religion and practical piety, knowing that where this took place, a conscionable improvement of time in other things could not well be wanting. This made him extraordinary solicitous for the constant presence of the whole society at the public worship of God, which he did carefully look to, when he was present amongst them, and was usually one of the last things he gave in charge to all the students, when his more public employments at the assembly called him away, and whereof he was very inquisitive in his absence.

He took great care also for the constant instruction, not only of the young scholars, but likewise of all the college servants, in the principles of religion. The exercises of common places, or sermons in the chappel, which had formerly been in use, only in term-time, he caused to be continued weekly all the year: besides which, when he was present in the college, he did frequently himself either preach or expound scripture to them.

He also took special notice of the several conversations of the particular persons in the college, as well by his own inspection and observation while he was present, as by faithful informations in his absence; and was frequent in giving them personal counsel and direction in private. Consonant hereunto was also the care of the particular fellows, who beside the instruction of their pupils in learning, caused them to come to their chambers to prayers every night, and to repetition of sermons on the Lord's day. By all which the practice of religion was much promoted.

His next care was for the advancement of learning, which he endeavoured to promote by his frequent exhortations, and encouraging all to diligence in their studies, and conscionable improving their time and opportunities; as also by requiring the constant performance of public exercises, by persons of all ranks; and exciting the fellows to a diligent inspection, as well jointly over the college in general, as severally over their own pupils in particular, for the same ends.

On the same ground also he took care to have the college library furnished with good authors, giving considerable sums of money for that end, and persuading others also to do the like: and some dues payable to the college, which formerly used to be employed in feasting, were by his means converted to a better use, in buying of such books which might feed the minds, both of the present society, and those that shall succeed.

He bestowed also a considerable part of his profits there upon the yearly maintainance of poor scholars; and at his death he gave a considerable sum of money for the same purpose, to be disposed of by the present society to such as stood in need.

Indeed his resolution was, that so long as he was hindered from residing constantly amongst them, by reason of his attending on the assembly at Westminster, he would not be a gainer by the place: but whatsoever profits he received, more than would defray the charges of journeys, and other expences occasioned by it, he would bestow some way or other for the good of the college.

In elections to places of preferment in the college, he was exceedingly careful that they might be bestowed on those that were most deserving; and to that end he did, with the unanimous consent of the fellows, make a decree, that in all future elections, none should be admitted to a scholarship or fellowship in the college, till they did first approve themselves for learning by a public trial or examination, for two or three days successively in the audience of the whole college, which hath already produced very good effects for the improvement of learning in that college, and more are like to ensue.

In case any solicited him for preferment of their friends, his constant answer was, that if they were found to deserve it better than others, they should have it; but if otherwise, they must expect to go without it; and his actings were exactly consonant hereunto: as indeed in all things, his resolutions, words, and actions, were so exactly consonant, and kept so perfect harmony as is seldom seen: whereas in many, their words are more than their intentions, and their actions less than their words.

In his converse with the fellows, it was his great care to preserve unanimity, that as well elections, as all other affairs of the college, should be carried on by a universal consent; to if that in the proposal of any thing, there were any dissent, his usual manner was to defer the determination of it, till every one should see reason to concur with the rest; and was himself as ready to hearken to any argument produced, though contrary to his present sense which he would either fully answer or yield to it; so that, scarce any thing was over-ruled merely by plurality of suffrages, but all with universal consent; and nothing more ordinary, than for all differences to be quite reasoned down.

In his absence from them his mind was still present with them; being more thoroughly acquainted with all the affairs of the college, and more careful of them than most heads of houses are when they are present: for by reason of that sweet harmony and agreement betwixt himself and the fellows, he had constantly faithful intelligence of all affairs, and did communicate his counsel and advice therein, making the good of that college, as he was wont to call it, his Magna cura, by reason whereof that college hath flourished in a very eminent manner: and I may safely say, without prejudice to any, that scarce any society of either university, since the late reformation, both for the general improvement of religion and learning, and the unanimous harmony amongst themselves, have been comparable hereunto; yea, so great was that unanimity and reciprocal affection between him and the society; that scarce ever any head of a society was taken from them with more general sorrow.

Beside what hath been already said, much more might be added concerning the worth of this eminent servant of God, much of which hath been already penned by himself, in that small tractate, 'Of making religion one's business,' together with the 'Appendix, applied to the calling of a minister,' which, with other small tracts, are printed together, with this title, 'Memorials of Godliness and Christianity,' wherein you may read a true character of his thoughts, as well as his actions, of which I shall only add this, That his constant practice was so exactly consonant to the strict principles that are there expressed, as can hardly be believed by those who have not seen it.

He was a man indeed of a very public spirit, and wholly laid himself out for God; and therefore, though he was ready to deny himself, and condescend freely, where his own interest was only concerned; yet was he zealous and tenacious in things that concerned God's glory, reserving his heat to encounter sin.

Hence was it, that notwithstanding his natural meekness, he acted in the things of God with much courage and resolution; as in those free and resolute expressions of himself (yet with humility, meekness, and sobriety) in preaching at the cathedral church at Canterbury, in presence of the dean and prebends, wherein he spared not to set before them such things as were notoriously amiss; yet, for the most part, expressing in Latin what did chiefly concern them, that they might take notice of it, not the people; which, though it procured him some trouble and opposition, yet he did not for that abate of his courage and resolution.

In like manner, when he was to preach at the bishop of Lincoln's visitation at Hitchin, he went thither with a resolution ſolution to ſpeak fully and freely againſt the corrupt innovations then in practice, whatever might be the iſſue; and did accordingly perform it, though he were ſenſible of the great danger of ſo doing.

The like reſolution he manifeſted in the queſtion about the Sabbath, when oppoſition was made againſt the perpetuity thereof, and the morality of the fourth commandment, a matter wherewith his heart was deeply affected, as being an high affront to the majeſty and authority of God, the thoughts whereof ſeemed to be continually in his mind, as was evident by his prayers, diſcourſes, counſels, and endeavours; and particularly by that elaborate diſcourſe, which he, in conjunction with that judicious, learned, and pious divine, Mr Daniel Cawdrey, publiſhed to the world, entitled, Vindiciæ Sabbathi: the latter parts whereof were long ago fitted for the preſs, and want but invitations of publiſhing, which might encourage the ſtationer to undertake the charge. And therefore, when reading the book for ſports on the Lord's day, bowing to the altar, reading the ſervice book there, &c. were urged, he was moſt reſolute againſt them, reſolving rather to loſe all, and ſuffer any thing than to comply therein, and with that reſolution went to the archbiſhop's viſitation at Welling, held by Sir John Lamb, where yet he found, beyond expectation, rather a connivance at him, than an enforcement thereof. And the like he did concerning the convocation oath, in the new book of canons, in the year 1640, which he vigorouſly oppoſed, and took a great deal of pains in evincing the unlawfulneſs thereof.

It is well known alſo what freedom and faithfulneſs he hath uſed in reference to the public affairs, as well in his ordinary ſermons at the new church, the Abbey, and Margaret's in Weſtminſter, to which places the greateſt number of parliament men did uſually reſort, as in thoſe, by ſpecial order, preached to one or both houſes of parliament, (ſome of which are to be ſeen in print) where he ſpared not to declare, fully and plainly, what God expected from them, and freely to reprove what was amiſs: for, as he was wont to ſay, he did not in that place preach before them, ut coram Judice, but to them (authoritative) as by commiſſion from God; and how much ſoever they might be ſuperior to him in other regards, yet he was in that place ſuperior to them, as acting in God's name; and therefore would not be afraid to ſpeak, whatever was the will of God that he ſhould tell them, notwithſtanding any diſpleaſure or danger which might by this means befal him for ſo doing.

And upon this conſideration, we may look upon it as a wiſe providence of God, ſo ſeaſonably to take him away a little before thoſe great tranſactions about the change of government; which were ſo directly contrary to his deliberate and ſettled judgment, that he would certainly have thought it his duty to ſpeak much more than others would endure to hear: for although his judgment was clear for the lawfulneſs of defenſive arms (which was the parliament's caſe, as it was firſt ſtated, as doth fully appear in that treatiſe, entitled, 'Scripture and reaſon pleaded for defenſive arms,' wherein himſelf of all others had the greateſt hand;) yet was as peremptory againſt offenſive arms, or attempting the king's life, whoſe perſon he judged ſacred and inviolable, and hath oft expreſſed himſelf to that purpoſe, that in caſe this ſhould ever come to be the queſtion, which he hoped he ſhould never ſee, he thought himſelf bound in conſcience, by ſpeaking, preaching, and otherwiſe, to oppoſe it to the utmoſt of his power, whatever danger he might incur by ſo doing; which zeal of his, though at that time he were like to have prevailed very little with men otherwiſe reſolved, yet it might have proved an occaſion of much hurt to himſelf, and therefore God, in wiſdom and mercy, thought good to excuſe him that piece of ſervice.

He was in his converſation a man of much temperance and ſobriety in his diet he abſtained from ſtrong drink altogether; wine he drank very ſparingly, ſo far forth only as the neceſſities of nature did require, and did uſually content himſelf to eat but of one diſh at a meal, and that none of the daintieſt, even when he had more before him.

In his apparrel he did neither affect to be gay nor coſtly, but decent; nor to ſpend time in needleſs curioſity in dreſſing. As for recreations he ſcarce uſed any; but inſtead thereof refreſhed himſelf with the Chriſtian converſe of friends; accounting time ſo precious, that he would redeem it, not only from ſports, but from ſleep alſo, ſo far as the neceſſities of nature would permit.

He was neither waſteful nor covetous, but very liberal; doing many acts of charity (beſide what hath been mentioned before) to ſuch as ſtood in need; beſtowing plenteous relief, according as he was able, both by his own hands, and the hands of others, ſo that thoſe who received it knew not oft times whence it came. And when that eminent work of charity was on foot in Cambridge, while he was fellow of Queen's college, whereby divers young ſcholars, who were forced by reaſon of the wars to fly out of Germany, eſpecially of the Palatinate, were ſent for hither and educated, partly in the univerſity, and partly under able and godly divines in the country, whereby they might be fitted to do God and their country ſervice, when God ſhould give them opportunity to return, having been here educated in the knowlege of our language, and the way of practical preaching, which hath been no where more eminent than in England, which work ſucceeded beyond expectation; he was one of the great actors therein, and did contribute liberally thereunto. The like aſſiſtance alſo he afforded to divers Hungarians, Tranſilvanians, and other ſtrangers, who came over into England for the ſame reaſon.

The time of his ſickneſs was not long; for having ſpent much of his natural ſtrength in his conſtant labours in the ſervice of God, there was the leſs work for ſickneſs to do; his deportment therein was holy and heavenly; his humility, faith, patience, and ſubmiſſion to God's will, eminently appearing from time; and his diſcourſe, full of heavenly expreſſions, till the time of his death.

Not long before his death, when one had read to him the 38th chapter of Iſaiah, (having then ſome little hopes of his recovery) and ready to go to prayer, he deſired him to ſtay a while that he might pray firſt, which he did briefly, as his weakneſs would permit, but very fully, both for himſelf, the kingdom, the church of God, and all to whom he ſtood in any relation; the heads whereof were ſoon after written, as near as might be in his own words, ſo far as the memory of thoſe that were then preſent could call them to mind.

First, bleſſing God for his goodneſs the night paſt.

'Bleſſed be God that hath been ſo good to us this night.'

Then praying in behalf of himſelf.

'Great God, heal the ſinfulneſs of my nature;
'Pardon all my tranſgreſſions;
'Take from me a heart of unbelief, that I may not depart from thee the living God;
'Deliver me from tentation;
'Accept of Jeſus Chriſt for me;
'Teach me to improve all providences;
'To live upon the promiſes:
'Let Chriſt be my life.
'O Lord, let me never ſhrink from thee.'

For the good of the public.

'Lord, turn the hearts of this nation, and all our hearts;
'Turn the heart of the king;
'Sanctify the parliament, and make them faithful;
'Bleſs the aſſembly, and make them faithful and upright with thee;
'Let not the army do unworthily, but what thou wouldeſt have them to do.
'Bleſs all the miniſters.'

For other nations.

'Lord, do good to Scotland, and the churches in France.
'Bleſs New England, and foreign plantations.'

For the places to which he was related.

'Lord, provide a faithful man for Queen's college.
'A faithful man for this place. [New church in Weſtminſter.]
'A faithful paſtor for thoſe in the country.'

For friends, and those about him.

'Lord, remember all those that have shewed kindness to me, and have taken pains with me, and recompense them. Thou hast promised, 'that he which giveth a cup of water in the name of a disciple, and he that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall have a prophet's reward."

Afterwards, having forgotten to crave a blessing upon somewhat given him to take, he prayed, 'Lord, pardon my neglect and forgetfulness of thee; and deliver me from temptation, and the evil of temptation. Thou art holy, if thou shouldest forsake us. Our fathers trusted in thee, and were delivered. Lord, glorify thy name in my poor spirit; and let none of thy people ever see me shrink from thee, for Jesus Christ's sake.'

Being spoken to, to cast the burden of his sickness and pain upon God, he answered, 'I should do very unworthily, if when I have preached to others, that they should cast their burdens upon God, I should not do so myself.

In these, and many other the like Christian expressions, he did manifest the same favour of holiness, even to the time of his death, which had been constantly discovered in the time of his life.

He departed this life in the year 1647, and of his age forty-six, having served God faithfully and painfully in his generation, being a very great instrument of much good, and an excellent pattern for imitation. His body lieth interred in the New church at Westminster, and his memory yet liveth in the minds of those that knew him.

The Life of Mr John Cotton, who died Anno Christi 1652.

John Cotton was born at Darby, in the year 1584. his parents were persons of considerable quality, and of good reputation: their condition, as to the things of this life, competent; neither unable to defray the expences of his education in good literature, nor so abounding as to be a temptation, on the other hand, unto the neglect thereof: and God, who had then pre-determined this tender plant to be a tree of life, for the feeding of many thousands, and to be a chosen vessel to bear his name before the nations, in way thereunto, he inspired his parents with an effectual solicitude concerning the ordering of this their son in his minority.

This care in his parents was quickly above expectation answered, in the first fruits of their son's proficiency, who more and more increased great hopes concerning him, throughout the whole time of his minority, wherein he was trained up in the grammar-school of Darby.

When he was about the age of thirteen he was admitted into Trinity college in Cambridge, where his industry was great, and his profiting in the arts and languages above his equals, so far commended him to the master and fellows, as that he had undoubtedly been chosen fellow of that college, had not their extraordinary expence about building their great hall at that time put it by, or at least deferred their election until some time longer.

From Trinity he was removed to Emmanuel, that happy seminary both of piety and learning; and in that society the Lord gave him favour, so that in due time he was honoured with a fellowship amongst them; and when he was elected to it, after a diligent and strict examination, according to the statues of the college, wherein this is not unworthy the taking notice of, That when the poser came to examine him in the Hebrew tongue, the place that he made trial of him by, was that portion of scripture, Isaiah iii. wherein the prophet declaims against the pride and haughtiness of the daughter of Sion; which text hath more hard words in it than any other place of the Bible, within so short a compass; and therefore, though a present construction, and resolution thereof, might have put a good Hebrean to a stand, yet such was his ability and dexterity, as made those hard words facil and easy, and rendered him a present respondent. And this providence is further remarkable about him, That whereas his father, whose calling was but towards the law, was but plodure, and had not many clients that made use of his advice in law-matters before; it pleased God after his son's going to Cambridge, to bless him with great practice, so that he was very able to keep him there, and to allow him full and liberal maintenance; insomuch as this blessed man hath been often heard to say, 'God kept me in the university.'

Being thus advanced, he was in the place of improvement, beset with examples as so many objects of better emulation. If he slacken his pace, his compeers will leave him behind: and though he quicken it, there are still those that are before him: but he was, not only a lover of labour, but communicative of his learning, and therefore he proved a diligent tutor, and had many young students committed to his care. He was a didactical man, both able and apt to teach: and truly ability to instruct youth argues a wise man: and to be willing to teach, argues a good man: for goodness is communicative: and such was his academical dexterity, that he could impart, as Scaliger speaks, the felicities of his wit to his hearers, so accommodating and insinuating the matter in hand, as that his pupils might both perceive their profiting, and taste the sweetness of that wherein they profited. Thus by his school stratagems, he won the hearts of his pupils both to himself, and to a desire of learning: they were each to other as the Prophets, and the sons of the Prophets: his pupils were honourers, and he was a tutor, a friend and a father unto them.

The manner of his conversion, according to his relation was thus. During his residence in the university, God began to work upon him by the ministry of Mr William Perkins of blessed memory: but the motions, and stirrings of his heart which then were, he suppressed, thinking, that if he should trouble himself with matters of religion, according to the light he had then received, it would be an hinderance to him in his studies, which then he had much addicted himself unto. Therefore he was willing to silence those suggestions, and inward callings which he had from God's Spirit, and did wittingly defer the prosecution of that work until afterwards. At length, as he was walking in the fields, he heard the bell tolling for Mr Perkins, who lay a dying, whereupon he was secretly glad in his heart, that he should now be rid of him, who had, as he said, laid siege to, and beleaguered his heart. This became matter of much affliction to him afterwards, God keeping it upon his spirit, with the aggravation of it, and making it an effectual means of convincing and humbling him in the sight, and sense of the natural enmity that is in man's nature against God.

Afterwards, hearing Dr Sibs, (then Mr Sibs), preaching a sermon about regeneration, wherein he shewed, first, what regeneration was not, and so opening the state of a meer civil man, Mr Cotton saw his own condition fully discovered, which, through God's mercy, did drive him to a stand, as plainly seeing himself destitute of true grace, all his false hopes and grounds now failing him; and so he lay for a long time in an uncomfortable despairing way: and of all other things this was his heaviest burden, that he had wittingly withstood the means, and offers of grace, and mercy which he found had been tendered to him. Thus, he continued, till it pleased God to let in a word of faith unto his heart, and to cause him to look unto Christ for his healing, which word also was dispensed unto him by the same Dr Sibs, which begat in him a singular and constant love to the said doctor, of whom he was also answerably beloved.

That which first made him famous in Cambridge, was his funeral oration for Dr Some, master of Peter house, which was so accurately performed in respect of invention, elegancy, purity of stile, ornaments of rhetoric, discretion, and oratorious beauty of the whole, as that he was thenceforth looked at as another Xenephon, or Muse Attica, throughout the university.

Some space of time intervening, he was called to preach at St Maries, where he preached a university sermon, with high applause from the academical wits, insomuch as the fame of his learning grew greater and greater. And afterwards being again called to preach in the same place, as one oration of Pericles left his hearers with an appetite after another, so the memory of his former accurate exer-

pies, filled the colleges, especially the young students, with a freſh expectation of ſuch elegancies of learning, as made them flock to the ſermon with an Athenian itch after ſome new thing, as to the ornaments of rhetoric, and abſtruſer notions of philoſophy, but his ſpirit now favouring of the croſs of Chriſt more than of human literature, and being taught of God to diſtinguiſh between the word of wiſdom, and the wiſdom of words, 'his ſpeech, and preaching, was not with the enticing words of man's wiſdom, but in the demonſtration of the ſpirit, and of power.'

The diſappointed expectation of the auditory, ſoon appeared in their countenances, and the diſcouragement of their non-acceptance, returned him unto his chamber, not without ſome ſad thoughts of heart: where yet he had not been long; but, lo! Dr Preſton, then Mr Preſton, knocks at his chamber door, and coming in, acquainted him with his ſpiritual condition, and tells him how it had pleaſed God to work effectually upon his heart by that ſermon: after which Dr Preſton ever highly prized him, and both fully and ſtrongly cloſed with him: which real ſeal of God unto his miniſtery much comforted his ſoul, far above what the preſent leſs acceptance of the auditory had dejected him, or their former acceptance had encouraged him.

His Concio ad Clerum, or Latin ſermon, which he preached when he proceeded batchelor of divinity, which was after he had been at Boſton about half a year, was very much admired, and commended. His text was, Matth v. 13. Vos eſtis ſal terræ: quod ſi ſal infatuatus fuerit, quo ſalietur? Ye are the ſalt of the earth; but if the ſalt hath loſt its ſavour, wherewith ſhall it be ſalted? In handling of which text, both the weight of the matter, the elegancy of phraſe, rhetorical ſtrains, grave, ſweet, and ſpiritual pronunciation, rendered him yet more famous. The like did his anſwering of the divinity act in the ſchools, having a very acute opponent, Mr William Chappel to diſpute with him. So that in Cambridge the name of Mr Cotton was much ſet by.

Unto this earthen veſſel, thus filled with heavenly treaſure, the inhabitants of Boſton in Lincolnſhire, made their addreſs, ſaying, 'Come and help us.' And in that candleſtic the Father of lights placed this burning and ſhining light: To whom he removed from Cambridge about the twenty-eight year of his age. At his firſt coming, he met with ſome obſtructions from the dioceſan, then Biſhop Barlo, who told him, that he was a young man, and therefore unfit to be ſet over ſuch a divided people: Mr Cotton being ingenious, and undervaluing himſelf, thought ſo too, and purpoſed to return to the college again; but ſome of his Boſton friends, underſtanding that one Simon Biby was to be ſpoken with, who was near to the biſhop, they preſently charmed him, and ſo the buſineſs proceeded without any further trouble, and Mr Cotton was admitted into the place after their manner in thoſe days.

Two things are here not unworthy our obſervation, which Mr Cotton would ſometimes ſpeak of to his friends: firſt, That in the beginning of his miniſtry, he was exerciſed with ſome inward troubles which much dejected him. And indeed, good ſpirits are much bettered by their conflicts with the worſt of ſpirits: ſpiritual preachers are often trained up in the ſchool of temptation. So true is that theological maxim, meditation, prayer, and temptation make a divine. This diſpenſation of the all-wiſe God, he afterwards found, not only to be beneficial unto him, in preparing his heart for his work: but alſo, that it became an effectual means of his more peaceable and comfortable ſettlement in that place, where the people were divided amongſt themſelves, by reaſon of a potent man in the town, who adhered to another Cambridge man, whom he feign would have brought. But when he ſaw Mr Cotton wholly taken up with his own exerciſes of ſpirit, he was free from all ſuppoſition of his being pragmatical, or addicted to ſiding with this or that party: and ſo both he and his party began to cloſe more fully with him.

Secondly, Whereas there was an Arminian party in that town, ſome of whom were witty, and troubled others with diſputes about thoſe points: by God's bleſſing upon his labours in holding forth poſitively ſuch truths, as undermined the foundation of Arminianiſm, thoſe diſputes ceaſed, and the tenets of Arminianiſm were no more pleaded for. Thus God diſpoſes of the hearts of hearers, as that generally they are all open, and loving to their preachers at their firſt entrance.

For three or four years he lived, and preached amongſt them without oppoſition. They accounted themſelves happy (as well they might) in the enjoyment of him; both the town and country thereabouts being much bettered, and reformed by his labours. But after he was not able to bear the ceremonies impoſed, his non-conformity occaſioned his trouble in the biſhops court at Lincoln, from whence he was adviſed to appeal to an higher court: and employing Mr Leveret (who afterwards was one of the ruling elders of the church of Boſton in new England) to deal in that buſineſs, and he (like Jacob) being a plain man, yet pioufly ſubtile to get ſuch a ſpiritual bleſſing, ſo far inſinuated himſelf into one of the proctors of that high court, that Mr Cotton was treated by them, as if he were a conformable man, and ſo was reſtored unto Boſton.

After this time he was bleſſed with a ſucceſsful miniſtry unto the end of twenty years, in which ſpace he on the Lord's days in the afternoons, went over the whole body of divinity in a catechiſtical way thrice, and gave the heads of his diſcourſe to thoſe that were young ſcholars, and others in the town, to anſwer his queſtions in public in that congregation: and after their anſwers, he opened thoſe heads of divinity; and finally applied all to the edification of his people, and of ſuch ſtrangers as came to hear him. In the morning of the Lord's days, he preached over the firſt ſix chapters of the goſpel of St. John: the whole book of the Eccleſiaſtes; the propheſy of Zachariah, and many other Scriptures; and when the Lord's ſupper was adminiſtred (which was uſually every month) he preached upon 1 Corinth. 11. and 2 Chron 30. the whole chapter, beſides ſome other Scriptures concerning that ſubject. On his lecture days, he preached through the whole firſt, and ſecond epiſtles of John; the whole book of Solomon's ſong; the parables of our Saviour ſet forth in Matthew's goſpel to the end of Chapter the 16th. comparing them with Mark and Luke: he took much pains in private, and read to ſundry young ſcholars that were in his houſe, and to ſome that came out of Germany, and had his houſe full of auditors: afterwards ſeeing ſome inconvenience in the peoples flocking to his houſe, beſides his ordinary lecture on the Thurſdays, he preached thrice more in public, on the week days: viz. on Wedneſdays and Thurſdays early in the morning, and on Saturdays at three o' clock in the afternoon. Only theſe three laſt lectures were performed by him but ſome few years before he had another famous colleague.

He was frequent in duties of humiliation and thankſgiving: ſometime he continued five or ſix hours in prayer, and opening the word ſo indefatigable was he in the Lord's work. ſo willing to ſpend and be ſpent therein. Beſides, he anſwered many letters that were ſent him far and near, wherein were handled many difficult caſes of conſcience, and many doubts cleared to great ſatisfaction.

He was a man exceedingly beloved and admired of the beſt, and reverenced of the worſt of his hearers. He was in great favour with Dr Williams, the then biſhop of Lincoln, who much eſteemed him for his learning, and when he was lord keeper of the great ſeal, he went to king James, and ſpeaking of Mr Cotton's great learning and worth; the king was willing, notwithſtanding his non-conformity, to give way that he ſhould have his liberty in his miniſtry without interruption. which was the more remarkable conſidering how that king's ſpirit was carried out againſt ſuch ways. Alſo the earl of Dorcheſter, being at old Boſton, and hearing Mr Cotton preaching about civil government, he was ſo affected with the wiſdom of his words and ſpirit, and that he did ever after highly account of him, and put himſelf forth what he could in the time of Mr Cotton's troubles to deliver him out of them, that ſo his Boſton might ſtill enjoy him as formerly; but his deſires were too ſtrongly oppoſed to be accompliſhed.

About this time he married his ſecond wife, Mrs Sara Story than a widow. He was bleſſed above many in his marriages, both his wives being pious matrons, grave, ſober, and faithful. By the firſt he had no children: the laſt, God made a fruitful vine unto him: his firſt born was brought forth far off upon the ſea, in his paſſage to New England: ſo that he being childleſs when he left Europe, arrived a joyful father in America: in memorial whereof, he called his name ſea-born, to keep alive, (ſaid he,) in me, and to teach my ſon, if he live, a remembrance of ſea mercies, from the hand of a gracious God: he is yet living, and entered into the work of the miniſtry. A ſon of many prayers, and of great expectation.

The corruption of the times being now ſuch, that he could not continue in the exerciſe of his miniſtry without ſin and the envy of his maligners having now procured letters miſſive to convent him before the high commiſſion court, which letters a debauched inhabitant of that town undertook to ſerve upon him (who ſhortly after died of the plague.) Mr Cotton having intelligence thereof, and well knowing that nothing but ſcorns and impriſonment were to be expected from them, according to the advice of many able heads and upright hearts, (among whom that holy man of God, Mr Dod, of bleſſed memory, had a ſingular influence) he kept himſelf cloſe for a time, in, and about London, as Luther ſometimes did at Wittenberg; and Paræus ſince at Anvilla; yet was not that ſeaſon of his receſs unprofitable: for addreſſes during that time were made unto him privately by divers perſons of worth, and piety, who received ſatisfaction from him in their caſes of conſcience of greateſt concernment. And when he went into New England, it was not a flight from duty, but from evident danger, and unto duty: not from the profeſſion of the truth, but unto a more opportune place for the profeſſion of it.

When Mr Cotton arrived at New england, his manner of entrance unto them was with much bleſſing. For at his firſt coming he found them not free from troubles about ſettling the matters both of church and common wealth. At which time, being requeſted, he preached before the general court: his text was, Haggai ii. 4. 'Yet now be ſtrong, O Zerubbabel, ſaith the Lord; be ye ſtrong, O Joſhua the ſon of Joſedek, the high prieſt; and be ſtrong all ye people of the land, ſaith the Lord, and work: for I am with you ſaith the Lord of Hoſts.' And the Lord working mightily by this ſermon, all obſtructions were preſently removed, and the ſpirits of all ſorts, as one man, were excited unanimouſly, and vigorouſly in the work of the Lord from that very day.

In order whereunto, the court conſidering that all the members of that republic, were alſo church members, and therefore to be governed according to the law of God, they deſired Mr Cotton to draw an abſtract of the Judicial laws delivered from God to Moſes, ſo far forth as they were of moral, i. e. of perpetual and univerſal equity; which accordingly he did, adviſing them to perſiſt in their purpoſe of eſtabliſhing a theocracy, i. e. God's government over his people. From this time it was a uſual thing for the magiſtrates to conſult with the miniſters in hard and difficult caſes, eſpecially about matters of religion: yet ſo as notwithſtanding occaſional conjunction, religious care was had of avoiding confuſion of councils After which time how uſeful Mr Cotton was to Old England, to New England, to magiſtrates, to miniſters, to people, in public, in private, by preaching, by counſel, and reſolving difficult queſtions, all know that knew him, and conſequently ſaw the grace of God evidently manifeſted in him.

In the courſe of his miniſtry in New Boſton, by way of expoſition he went over the Old Teſtament to Iſaiah the 30. The whole new Teſtament once through, and the ſecond time in the middle of Hebrews the 7th. Upon the Lord's day, and lecture days, he preached through the Acts of the apoſtles: the prophecies of Haggai, Zechariah, Ezra, the Revelations, Eccleſiaſtes, Canticles: the ſecond and third epiſtles of John, the epiſtle to Titus; both the epiſtles to Timothy: the epiſtle to the Romans, with other Scriptures. The preſence of the Lord being with him, and crowning his labours with the converſion of many ſouls, and the edification of thouſands. Beſides the aforementioned labours, he hath many pieces in print, which being well known, need not to be here enumerated.

His youth was unſtained, whence he was ſo much the more capable of being an excellent inſtrument in the church in his elder days. He that will do good in the church, 'muſt have a good report of them which are without, leſt he fall into the reproach and ſnare of the devil, 1 Tim. iii. 7. St. Auguſtine tells us, that 'a good life is requiſite in reſpect of ourſelves, but a good name is requiſite in reſpect of others.' We may be good men if we have a good conſcience, but we are not like to do much good, if we have not a good name.

He was a general ſcholar, ſtudious to know all things, the want whereof might in one of his profeſſion be denominated ignorance; and pioufly ignorant of thoſe things, the neſcience whereof made him more learned. Deſervedly therefore is his praiſe great in all the churches, that he not only gave himſelf to the acquiring of learning, but exceeded many that had done vertuouſly therein. He excelled in the greater part of the Encychpaidia.

Thoſe which beſt knew his goings out, and his coming in, cannot but give a large teſtimony to his piety. He was a ſaint (above many of the ſaints) manifeſtly declared in the conſciences of the godly amongſt whom he walked, to be the epiſtle of Chriſt, 'known and read of all men.' In his houſe he 'walked with a perfect heart.' He was an example to the flock; clothed with love and humility, amongſt his brethren: one of a thouſand in reſpect of his worth: but (as it is reported of Dr Whitaker) as one of the multitude in reſpect of his facile, and companion like behaviour. Both ability and modeſty in ſuch a degree, are ordinarily to be found in the ſame man. Others with much affection beheld the beauty of his face, whilſt himſelf was one that knew not that his face ſhined. He was a father, friend, and brother to his fellow elders, and a ſhining light unto all men.

He well knew that a biſhop ought not to be defective in the well government of his family: he muſt be 'one that rules well his own houſe:' in conſcience whereof, he himſelf riſing betimes in the morning, as ſoon as he was ready, he called his family together (which was alſo his practice in the evening) to the ſolemn worſhip of God, reading and expounding and occaſionally alſo applying the ſcriptures unto them, always beginning, and ending with prayer. In caſe of ſin committed by child or ſervant, he would call them aſide privately (the matter ſo requiring) laying the Scriptures before them and cauſing them to read that part which bore witneſs againſt ſuch an offence: ſeldom or never correcting in anger, that the diſpenſation of godly diſcipline might not be imputed, or become leſs effectual, through the intermixing of human paſſion.

He began the Sabbath, on the Saturday evening; and therefore then performed family duties after ſupper, being larger than ordinary in expoſition, after which he catechiſed his children and ſervants, and then returned into his ſtudy. The morning following, family worſhip being ended, he retired unto his ſtudy until the bell called him away. Upon his return from the congregation, he returned again unto his ſtudy (the place of his labour and prayer) unto his private devotion; where (having a ſmall repaſt carried him up for his dinner) he continued till the tolling of the bell. The public ſervice being ended, he withdrew for a ſpace into his forementioned oratory, for his ſacred addreſſes unto God, as in the forenoon: then came down and repeated the ſermon in his family, prayed, and after ſupper ſang a pſalm, and towards bed time, betaking himſelf again to his ſtudy, he cloſed the day with prayer. Thus he ſpent the Sabbath continually.

In his ſtudy, he neither ſat down unto, nor aroſe from his meditations without prayer: whilſt his eyes were upon his book, his expectation was from God. He had learned to ſtudy, becauſe he had learned to pray. An able ſtudent is a goſpel ſtudent, becauſe unable to ſtudy without Jeſus Chriſt. The barrenneſs of his meditations at ſome times, yea though his endeavour was moſt intenſe upon a good matter, convinced him: whence it was, that his heart muſing upon the ſame ſubject at another time, his tongue became as the pen of a ready writer. As he was not (comparatively) wanting in parts, learning or induſtry; ſo was he moſt careful not to truſt in them, but to fix his dependance wholly upon God. Herein he was not unlike to bleſſed Bradford who ſtudied kneeling. Another Syeſius, who was wont to divide his life between prayer and his book. Like unto Paul, 'Not ſufficient of himſelf to think think any thing as of himself,' and profeſſing all his 'ſufficiency to be of God. But we will give ourſelves (ſay the apoſtles) continually unto prayer, and to the miniſtry of the word.) Men of labour, they were, and men of prayer.

As any weighty cauſe preſented it ſelf either in the church, common wealth, or his family, he uſed to ſet days apart to ſeek the face of God in ſecret: ſuch were the bowels of this ſpiritual father, 'The horſemen, and chariots of this Iſrael.' He might ſay with Paul, 'He was in faſting often,' his converſation upon earth was a trading in heaven. A demonſtration of the praiſes of him who hath called him. A temperature of that holineſs, ſweetneſs and love, which continually gained upon the hearts of many ſpectators. The habitual gracious ſcope of his heart in his whole miniſtry, is not illegible in that uſual ſubſcription of his at the end of all his ſermons, tibi domine. Unto thy honour, O Lord. A taſte of the divine ſoliloquies between God and his ſoul, you may pleaſe to take notice of from theſe two tranſcribed poems left behind him in his ſtudy, written with his own hand.

A thankful acknowlegement of God's Providence.

In mother's womb thy fingers did me make,
And from the womb thou did'ſt me ſafely take:
From breaſt thou haſt me nurſt my life throughout,
That I may ſay I never wanted ought.
In all my meals my table thou haſt ſpread,
In all my lodgings thou haſt made my bed:
Thou haſt me clad with changes of array,
And chang'd my houſe for better, far away.
In youthful wandrings thou didſt ſtay my ſtide,
In all my journies thou haſt been my guide:
Thou haſt me ſav'd from many an unknown danger,
And ſhew'd me favour even where I was a ſtranger.
In both my callings thou haſt heard my voice,
In both my watches thou haſt made my choice:
Thou giv'ſt me ſons, and daughters, them to peer,
And giv'ſt me hope thou'l't learn them thee to fear.
Oft have I ſeen thee look with mercy's face,
And through thy Chriſt have felt thy ſaving grace:
This is the heav'n on earth, if any be:
For this, and all, my ſoul doth worſhip thee.

Another made by him (as it ſeems) upon his removal from Boſton into that wilderneſs of New England.

I now may expect ſome changes of miſeries,
Since God hath made me ſure,
That himſelf by them all will purge mine iniquities
As fire makes ſilver pure.

Then what though I find the deep deceitfulneſs
Of a diſtruſtful heart?
Yet I know with the Lord is abundant faithfulneſs,
He will not loſe his part.

When I think of the ſweet, and gracious company
That at Boſton once I had,
And of the long peace of a fruitful miniſtry
For twenty years enjoy'd.

The joy that I found in all that happineſs
Doth ſtill ſo much refreſh me,
That the grief to be caſt out into a wilderneſs
Doth not ſo much diſtreſs me.

For when God ſaw his people, his own at our town,
That together they could not hit it,
But that they had learned the language of Aſkelon,
And one with another could chip it.

He then ſaw it time to ſend in a buſy elf,
A joiner to take them aſunder;
That ſo they might learn each one to deny himſelf
And ſo to piece together.

When the breach of their bridges, and all their banks arow,
And of him that ſchool teaches,
When the breach of the plague, and of their trade alſo
Could not learn to ſee their breaches.

Then God ſaw it time to break out on their miniſter
By loſs of health and peace;
Yea withal, to break in upon their magiſtrates,
That ſo their pride might ceaſe.

A diſputation is well called the ſieve of truth: ſo in his polemical labours he was a ſeeker thereof in love: his ſcope was, the glory of God, unity of the church, and the edification of men, not the oſtentation of wit. It was his holy ambition, not to ſeem to be learned, but indeed to be bettered. A ſincere ſeeker of light, not of victory. Witneſs his brotherly acceptance of Dr. Twiſs his examination of Mr Cotton's treatiſe of predeſtination, from whom he acknowleged that he received light thereby, and was ready to atteſt the great abilities of the doctor, that ſtar (if any of this age) of the firſt magnitude. It is true Mr Cotton's mind was then exerciſed about the point of reprobation. Touching the point of election, it is ſufficiently known that he was not only orthodox, but alſo clear. As there were of old that pretended the predeſtinarain hereſie to have had it's riſe from St. Auſtin, and Grevinchovius of late, bluſhed not to ſay of famous Dr Ames, who was Arminianorum malleus; ameſius pelagianizat. Dr Ames plays the plagian: ſo the wonder is leſs, if this ſound, and judicious divine hath not eſcaped the imputation of arminianiſm from ſome, notwithſtanding the redundant teſtimony of his doctrine, and generally of all that knew him to the contrary; yea, that occaſionally he hath been heard to ſay, by teſtimony yet alive, and above acception, that he looked at arminianiſm as another goſpel, and directly contrary to the covenant of grace. What Melanchon ſometimes ſaid to Eccius, may be here truly applied to him. Mr Cotton in his diſputations ſought not his own glory, but God's truth. So able an opponent was rare, ſo candid an opponent was more rare. He that fell into his hands, was likely to fall ſoft enough ordinarly (except through his own default) not likely to loſe any thing ſave his error.

A man's wiſdom makes his face to ſhine: he had an happy, a quick, comprehenſive, and benign underſtanding, as having received the manifeſtation of the ſpirit, for the ſervice and profit of others. To diſcover the mind of God and therewith the ſentence of judgment, in matters too hard for inferior judges, was no ſmall part both of the worth, and uſefulneſs of him that was to miniſter before the Lord. So it ſeemed good to the father of lights to make this happy inſtrument, not only to excel his brethren, but in many reſpects, upon this account, to excel himſelf: a grace ſo far acknowleged in him, that as all ſorts, both the magiſtrates and private perſons, whether learned or unlearned, exerciſed with their reſpective cales of conſcience, waited under God, in a ſpecial manner upon his lips for knowlege, 'and ſought the law at his mouth.' So equal a contention between learning and meekneſs, is ſeldom viſible in any one perſon. The conſciences of thoſe that knew him being appealed to, he will be acknowleged among the meekeſt on earth in his days.

So conſpicuous was this grace in him, that multitudes beheld it, without making extraordinary mention thereof. It is true, he had an advantage above many of his natural conſtitution, and it's influence from his education, heightened intellectuals, and moralities was not inconſiderable; but that which gave the being of meekneſs, which ſanctified and perfected all, was the grace of Chriſt. He was of an accute apprehenſion, and therefore ſenſible of, but yet ſo little in his own ſight, that he was not eaſily provoked by an injury.

Senſibleneſs of diſhonour done to God by ſin, or of what the offender had done unto himſelf by ſinning, left ſuch impreſſions upon him, as that his taking notice of any injury done unto himſelf, was not uſually taken notice of. He had well learned that leſſon of Gregory: 'It is better many times to fly from an injury by ſilence, than to overcome it by replying. It was Grynæus his manner, to revenge wrongs by christian taciturnity. If inferiors expostulated unnecessarily with him, he would patiently hear them, and give them a brotherly account, pacifying their minds with a gentle, grave and respective answer. Take one instance of this kind instead of many; unto one of his hearers, then sick of singularities, and therefore the less able to bear sound doctrine, following him home, after his public labours in the congregation, and instead of better encouragement, telling him that his ministry was become either dark or flat, he gently answered? both, brother; without further opening of his mouth in his own defence, choosing rather to own the imputation, than to expostulate with the imputer.

Disputations are great trials of the spirits of intelligent men. Hooper and Ridley were patient martyrs, but somewhat impatient disputers. The synod held at Cambridge in New England, as matters were then circumstanced, was unto this good man an hour of temptation, above what had originally befallen him in his pilgrimage; yet such was his eminent behaviour throughout, as argued in the consciences of the spectators singular patience, and left him a mirror for the temperament, mildness, and government of his spirit. Pious meekness fit for church society. Yet though he was so gentle, meek, and flexible, that men might persuade him above what could be expected usually from a man of his worth, in the things of God he was stedfast and unmoveable.

The sanctuary cannot want the fire that is from heaven, neither may it be touched with the fire that is from hell. Gentleness of disposition, when actuated by Christ, makes us so much the more acceptable and profitable unto man; but if the spirit withdraweth his assistance, we fall short of reaching God's ends, and the seasonable suppressing of exorbitancies. If this good man had always had that voice sounding in his heart, which one wished that mild Lantgrave of Hessen might have heard from the smith's forge: Durescе, durescе; utinam et Lantgravius durescat. Happily there are that think some disorders, disturbances, and irregularities might, by God's blessing have been prevented.

But ordinarily, and in matters of greatest weight, the Lord was with him. Though his forbearance was both observable, and very imitable, in things that concerned himself; yet he could not forbear them whom he knew to be evil. An experience whereof he manifested, when some heterodox spirits, by their specious discourses about free grace, and subtile concealings of their principles, so far deceived him into a better opinion of them than there was cause, as that notwithstanding they fathered their errors upon him in general, and abused his doctrine, to the countenancing of their denial of inherent grace in particular, yet was he slow to believe these things of them, and slower to bear witness against them. But so soon as the truth herein appeared to him, hear his own words taken out of his letter to Mr Davenport; 'The truth is, saith he, the body of the island is bent to backsliding into error and delusion; the Lord pity and pardon them, and me also, who have been so slow to see their windings and subtile contrivances, and insinuations in all their transactions, whilst they propagated their opinions under my expressions diverted to their constructions.' Yea, such was his ingenuity and piety, as that his soul was not satisfied without often breaking forth into affectionate bewailing of his infirmity herein, in the public assemblies, sometimes in his prayer, sometimes in his sermon, and that with tears.

He was a man of an ingenious and pious candour, rejoicing, as opportunity was offered, to take notice of, and to bear witness to the gifts of God in his brethren, thereby drawing the hearts of them to him, and of others to them, and that to the encouragement of them, and the edification of many. He did not think himself a loser by putting honour on his fellow labourers, but was willing that they should communicate with him in the love and esteem of the people.

He was not only a son of peace, enjoying continually the feast of a good conscience, with serenity and tranquillity of affections at home, but also a peace-maker, qualified by the graces afore-mentioned, to be a choice instrument, in the hand of the Prince of Peace, amongst the churches, where if any difference arose, Mr Cotton was ready, being called thereunto, to afford his help for the composing of them; and had a singular faculty and ability therein, by reason of that excellent wisdom and moderation of spirit which God in Christ had given him, whose blessing also did ordinarily crown his endeavours with good success.

He was one, the reality of whose profession gave many cause to bless God for the kindness of the Lord shewed to all sorts by him. His portion in the things of this life exempted him from being an object of envy in that behalf; yet behold Quantum ex quantillo, so much communicated out of so little; we may not here be altogether silent concerning the grace of God bestowed upon him, whereby, according to his power, yea, above his power, he was beneficent unto others, but especially to those of the household of faith. The gospel opened his heart, his lips, and the doors of his house. He well remembered that scripture, 'There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.' As also, 'The liberal soul shall be made fat.'

Amongst others, his fellow labourers in the ministry were entertained with peculiar contentment. By one instance see his spirit in the rest; A certain minister who had gotten into the fellowship of that eminent man Mr Arthur Hildersam, and many other good preachers, being acquainted with their secrets, betrayed them into their enemies hands. This man coming afterwards to Boston, and meeting with Mr Cotton, this Gaius had not the heart to speak to him, nor to invite him to his house, which, he said, he never neglected, to his knowledge, to any stranger before, much less to any of his own order.

Some years since there was brought unto Boston a report of the necessity of the poor saints at Sigatea, a little church, whereof the rev. Mr White was their faithful pastor, which suffered much extremity by reason of the persecution of their then prevailing adversaries, forcing them from Bermudas into the desart continent: the sound of whose distress was no sooner heard of, but you might have heard the sounding of his bowels, with many others, applying themselves to a speedy collection, and sending it to them, on purpose for their seasonable relief; the sum was about seven hundred pounds, two hundred whereof he gathered in the church of Boston, no man in the contribution exceeding, and but one equalling his bounty. And it was remarkable that his contribution arrived there the very day after these poor people were brought to a personal division of that little meal then remaining in the barrel, and not seeing (according to man) but that after the eating thereof they must die a lingering death for want of food; and upon the same day their pastor had preached unto them (it being the Lord's day) upon that text, Psal. xxiii. 1. 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want.' At such a time the good hand of the Lord brought this succour to them from afar.

Whilst he was in Old England, his eminent piety, the success of his labours, and his interest in the hearts both of superiors, inferiors, equals, drew upon him much envy, and his non-conformity added thereunto, so that he was delivered in a great measure to the will of his adversaries, who gave him not over till they had bereaved him of much of his livelihood, his liberty, country, and therewithal of the sweet society of lovers, friends, and many ways endeared acquaintance, more precious to him than life itself.

Yet the measure of the afflictions of Christ, appointed to be suffered by him, was not to be fulfilled; but lo! in the time of his exile, some brethren, provoked by the censure of authority, though justly, and not without some inflicted upon them, singled out Mr Cotton as the object of their displeasure, who (though above other men) declining irregular and unnecessary interessing himself in the actions of the magistrate, and, while opportunity lasted, endeavouring their healing, yet they requited him evil for good, and they, at least some of them, who were formerly companions with him in the tribulations of that Patmos, yea, respecters of him, had 'taken sweet counsel together, and they had walked in the house of God' as friends; hence was he, with tongue and pen, blasphemed by them, for for whom he formerly entreated, and for whom, he both then, and afterwards wept, and put on ſackcloth.

As touching any tenet wherein he may ſeem ſingular, remember that he was a man, and therefore to be heard and read with judgment, and happily ſometimes with favour. St Hierom makes a difference between reading the writings of the apoſtles, and of other men; 'they, ſaith he, always ſpeak the truth; theſe as men, ſometimes err.' But no man did more placidly bear a diſſentient than he. It contributes much towards the fuller diſcovery of truth, when men of larger capacities, and greater induſtry than others, may be permitted to communicate their notions; only they ſhould uſe this liberty by way of diſquiſition, not of poſition, rather as ſearchers after ſcripture-light, than as dictators of private opinions.

But now this weſtern ſun haſtens to his ſetting; being called to preach at a neighbour church, he took wet in his paſſage over the ferry, and, not many hours after, he felt the effect of it, being ſeized upon with an extreme illneſs in his ſermon-time. This ſad providence, when others bewailed, he comforted himſelf in that he was found ſo doing. Decet imperatorem ſtantem mori. It is the honour of a commander to die ſtanding. St Auſtin's uſual wiſh was, that when Chriſt came he might find him, Aut precantem, aut prædicantem, either praying or preaching. Calvin would not that when the Lord came he ſhould find him idle.

After a ſhort time he complained of the inflamation of his lungs, and thereupon found him ſelf aſthmatical, and afterward ſcorbutical, (which both meeting in a complicated diſeaſe, put an end to his days) inſomuch, that he was forced to give over thoſe comforting drinks which his ſtomach could not want. If he ſtill uſed them, the inflamation grew unſufferable, and threatened a more ſharp and ſpeedy death. If he left them, his ſtomach forthwith ceaſed to perform its office, leaving him without hope of life.

By theſe meſſengers he received the ſentence of death, yet in the uſe of means he attended the pleaſure of him in whoſe hands our times are: his labours continued whilſt his ſtrength failed. November the 18th, he took in courſe for his text the four laſt verſes of the ſecond epiſtle to Timothy, 'Salute Priſca and Aquila, &c. Giving the reaſon why he ſpake of ſo many verſes together, becauſe otherwiſe he ſaid, he ſhould not live to make an end of that epiſtle. He chiefly inſiſted upon theſe words, 'Grace be with you all:' ſo ending that epiſtle, and his lectures together, upon the Lord's day following he preached his laſt ſermon, upon John i. 14. 'And the word was made fleſh, and dwelt among us; and we beheld his glory, as of the only begotten ſon of the father, full of grace and truth.'

Now he gave himſelf wholly to prepare for his diſſolution, making his will, and ſetting his houſe in order: when he could no more be ſeen abroad, all ſorts, magiſtrates, miniſters, neighbours, and friends afar off, and thoſe near at hand, eſpecially his own people, reſorted to him daily, as to a public father.

When the neighbour miniſters viſited him, in which duty they were frequent, he thanked them affectionately for their love, exhorting them alſo, as an 'elder, and a witneſs of the ſufferings of Chriſt, to feed the flock;' encouraging them, that when 'the chief ſhepherd ſhall appear, they ſhould receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.'

Finding himſelf to grow weak, according to that of James, he ſent for the elders of the church of Boſton, to pray over him, which laſt ſolemn duty was performed, not without much affection, and many tears. Then, as Polycarp a little before his death, ſaid, 'That he had ſerved Chriſt fourſcore and ſix years, neither had he ever offended him in any thing;' ſo he told them, Through grace, he had now ſerved God forty years, (it being ſo long ſince his converſion,) throughout which he had ever found him faithful to him; and thereupon he took occaſion to exhort them to the like effect, that Paul ſometime did the elders of Epheſus, a little before they were to ſee his face no more, 'Take heed therefore to yourſelves, and to all the flock, over which he hath made you overſeers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchaſed with his own blood.'

Particularly he lamented, that the love of many, yea, and ſome of their own congregation, was grown cold towards the public ordinances, calling upon them ſo much the more for their watchfulneſs in that reſpect; which done, he thanked them for their loving and brotherly aſſiſtance to him in their holy fellowſhip, and commended them to the bleſſing of God.

His pious conſort, and thoſe olive-plants that ſat lately about his table, now gathered together about the bed of a dying huſband, and departing father. This was his laſt ſolemn tranſaction with man in this world: ſilver and gold, tho' he wanted not, he had not much to give them, but the bleſſing of a righteous parent he left with them.

That rev. and godly man Mr Wilſon, (who excelleth in love, as Mr Cotton did in light) the faithful paſtor of that church, taking his laſt leave of him, and moſt ardently praying unto God that he would lift up the light of his countenance upon him, and ſhed his love into his ſoul, he preſently anſwered. 'He hath done it already, brother.'

His work now finiſhed with all men, perceiving his departure to be at hand, and having nothing elſe to do, but only that great work of dying in the Lord, he wholly compoſed, and ſet himſelf for his diſſolution, deſiring that he might be permitted to improve that little remnant of his life, without impediment to his private devotions, and divine ſoliloquies between God and his ſoul; and for that end he cauſed the curtains to be drawn; and a gentleman and brother of that congregation that was much with him, and miniſtered to him in his ſickneſs, he cauſed to promiſe him that the chamber ſhould be kept private. But a while after, hearing the whiſper of ſome brethren in the room, he called to that gentleman, ſaying, Why do you break your word with me?

Not long after (being mindful, no doubt, of that great helpfulneſs which he received from that aforementioned brother throughout his viſitation) he left him with this farewel, 'The God that made you, and bought you with a great price, redeem your body and ſoul unto himſelf. Theſe were his laſt words; after which he was not heard to ſpeak, but lying ſome hours ſpeechleſs, he quietly breathed out his ſpirit into the hands of him that gave it, December 23. 1652, being entered into the ſixty-eighth year of his age.

The Life of Dr THOMAS HILL, who died Anno Chriſti 1653.

MR THOMAS HILL was born at Kingſton in Worceſterſhire, of godly parents; and David accounted it his great honour and bleſſing to be the ſon of God's handmaid, Pſal. lxxxvi. 16.

His parents dedicated him unto God from his childhood, deſigning him to the work of the miniſtry, and in order thereunto they trained him up in ſchool learning in the country: and being there well fitted, they ſent him to Emmanuel college in Cambridge, where the roſe was not cankered in the bud, his youth not corrupted nor debauched, as too many are; but this morning (like that 2 Sam. xxiii. 4) was without clouds, not ſullied with any noted miſcarriage; but, on the contrary, as it is ſaid of Sampſon when young, that 'the ſpirit of the Lord began to move him,' Judg. xiii. 25, ſo in his then ſober and ſtudious behaviour the ſun looked out betimes in that ſummer morning, and through God's grace (otherwiſe than it oft falls out in nature) he gave promiſing hopes of an after clearer day.

This being taken notice of by the governors of the college, they thereupon, after examination, had choſe him ſcholar of the houſe, he (as his Saviour) ſtill 'growing in wiſdom and ſtature, and in favour with God and man. And then, after ſome time ſpent in his private ſtudies in the college, for his further perfecting, and the more happy ſeaſoning of his ſpirit, he went and ſojourned with that man of God (now alſo with the Lord) Mr Cotton, at Boſton in Lincolnſhire, where, by God's rich bleſſing upon his moſt godly directions and example, and the ſociety he he had with him, and other eminent Chriſtians in that place, he was much improved and furthered, as otherwiſe, ſo eſpecially in heaven's way. which happily went along with him to his journey's end.

Upon his return from thence to the college, it was not long before he was choſen fellow with general approbation, though upon a moſt ſtrict and double examination, more (I think) than ever was in that college before, or hath been ſince, though it ſtill is, and ever hath been, according to the ſtatutes, very ſtrict and ſerious, and which hath been bleſſed to be a ſpecial means of holding up true worth and learning in that happy ſociety.

And now, through God's good hand of providence leading and ſtrengthening him, he proved a diligent, painful, and ſucceſsful tutor of very many pupils, and divers of them perſons of quality, who ſince have proved great bleſſings both to the church and common wealth: and thus, as he was before a pattern to young ſcholars, ſo after he was a tutor, no diligence was wanting whereby he might be inſtrumental to God's glory, and the good of thoſe who were committed to his charge.

But this our wiſe maſter-builder ſatisfied not himſelf as a tutor in poliſhing of builders; but, as a faithful and painful miniſter, he laboriouſly endeavoured to ſquare other lively ſtones for God's temple, 1 Pet. ii. 5. And ſo, as he read to ſcholars in the college, he alſo diligently and conſcionably preached to a neighbour congregation [St Andrews] in the town, that ſo many poor ſouls long after had cauſe to bleſs God for him.

Nor was he an hireling to fly when the wolf came, but when the plague, in this time of his miniſtry, raged in the town, he ſtill continued with them in his miniſterial employment; the better ſhepherd he, who not only fed the ſound, but alſo healed and bound up the torn and weak of the flock.

This alabaſter box of precious ointment thus poured out, filled the whole houſe with its odour, and the ſweet fragrancy of it did ſpread abroad, ſo that now he came to be more taken notice of by many, both great and good men; and ſo by ſome of eminent worth and honour, he was called to the paſtoral charge of Tichmerſh in Northamptonſhire, where he laboured faithfully in God's harveſt, for the ſpace of about eight or nine years, and partly by preaching and converſing up and down with others, but eſpecially with his own parochial charge, he proved a great bleſſing, not only to that town, but alſo to the whole country. in every place where he came, ſpreading a good favour, and leaving it behind him.

During the time of his being at Tichmerſh, he ſometimes repaired to Warwick caſtle, to that noble Robert Lord Brook, who highly eſteemed him, and in whoſe family he grew acquainted with Mrs Mary Wilford, at that time governeſs to the lady Frances Rich, a young lady of rare parts, daughter to the right honourable Robert earl of Warwick, and mutual affections growing betwixt them, he was married to her, who, ſince his death, was re-married to the rev. learned, and pious Dr Tuckney, maſter of St John's college, and Regius Profeſſor in Cambridge, my much honoured friend, ſo that ſhe hath been made happy in the enjoyment of two ſuch huſbands, as few women in our times have attained to.

Whilſt he was labouring, as aforeſaid, in the work of the Lord, for more public ſervice, he was choſen by the parliament for one of that county, to attend and aſſiſt in the aſſembly of divines, called together by their authority at Weſtminſter; where being of very good uſe, he was often ordered by the parliament to preach before them at their public faſts, and upon other their more ſolemn occaſions. He was alſo choſen by them to be one of their morning week-days preachers in the Abbey at Weſtminſter, beſides his conſtant Sabbath-days labours in another great congregation, (St Martin's in the fields) where he was a bleſſing to many thouſands.

From thence he was ordered to be maſter of Emanuel college in the univerſity of Cambridge, which being not a ſphere large enough for his activity, he was after a while removed to the maſterſhip of Trinity college, where what great good he did, many that lived under him can give an ample teſtimony; and that happy change proclaimed, from that confuſion (by reaſon of thoſe diſtracted times) in which he found it, to that orderly compoſure and frame in which, through God's bleſſing, he left it. How ſolicitous he was for their beſt welfare, his frequent preaching in their chappel to them all, and his writing to their ſeniors, ſpeaks out fully; and many can bear witneſs how humble and loving he was to them in his carriage, how ſtudious he was to keep up college exerciſes, how zealous to advance piety and learning; and for that purpoſe to countenance and prefer ſuch as he obſerved to be eminent in either.

As he was a univerſity man, he was zealouſly careful,

1. Of its honour, which the parliament can witneſs, in an unkindly conteſt about it; and alſo his care in collecting the decayed antiquities of that univerſity, whoſe pains in that argument, it is pity but they were communicated to the world.

2. Of its privileges, as always, ſo eſpecially in thoſe two years together in which he was vice-chancellor, for which he ſuffered in ſome mens reputes unjuſtly.

3. Of its profit and emolument, being a ſpecial means of procuring to it, from the parliament, the Lambeth library, which of right, as it was judged, fell to that univerſity; as alſo from a worthy knight, Sir John Wollaſton, alderman of the city of London, a yearly ſtipend for a mathematic lecturer, and alſo large ſums of money for the fitting of the public library, that it might be of general uſe; for the accompliſhment whereof the univerſity is more ways than one his debtor.

4. Laſtly, Of the general good and well ordering of it. Surely it was his careful thought in private with himſelf, as appeared by his making it the ſubject of his diſcourſe with others; ſcarce was there a time wherein he met with his intimate and judicious friends, but he would be aſking or propoſing ſomething that way.

By this it appeared, that his care was to keep up thoſe univerſities, which ſome in thoſe times would have ruined; upon which occaſion Grotius pronounceth many Chriſtians to be worſe than the Philiſtines; for they, 1 Sam. x. 5. would let the company of prophets alone, even where they kept a garriſon.

As he was a divine, he was found in the faith, orthodox in his judgment, firmly adherring to the good old doctrine of the church of England; even that which in the univerſity was taught, and maintained by famous Whitaker, Perkins, Davenant, Ward, and many others, in their times: and in the other univerſity, amongſt other great names there, he was a great admirer of the right reverend and judicious Dr Abbot, biſhop of Saliſbury; and well were it, if there he had many more ſuch admirers. The doctrine of God's ſovereignty in his decrees; Of his inconditionate free-electing love; Of his free grace againſt free will, and the power of nature in ſpirituals; Of juſtification by the imputed righteouſneſs of Chriſt, againſt the perfection of inherent righteouſneſs now attainable by us in this life; Of perſeverance in grace, againſt the apoſtacy of the ſaints, and the like, were not with this pious and learned, as they are now called by ſome, ſects and notions, matters only of learning and curioſity, and of the Preſbyterian faction, but of the life and blood of faith, which at his death, as he expreſſed to a friend of his, he had ſingular comfort from; and in his life firmly believed, conſtantly preached, and by his pen endeavoured to maintain and defend, and that againſt the great daring champion of the contrary errors, whom the abuſive wits in the univerſity, with an impudent boldneſs could ſay, none there durſt adventure upon, whoſe immodeſt ſcurrility, his learned anſwer to that daring adverſary, (which he had made ſo far a progreſs in) had ſhortly confuted, had not he, by his more ſudden death, been thereby prevented.

As a miniſter of the goſpel: In his preaching he was plain, powerful, ſpiritual, frequent, and laborious; for beſides what in that kind he did, as to the univerſity of St Mary's, and in the college chappel, which was very happy in his often pains there, in the town he ſet up one lecture every Sabbath morning, in the pariſh of St Michael, performed only by himſelf, and cheerfully frequented by a great confluence, both of ſcholars and townſmen; and another in the church of All-hallows, every Lord's day in the afternoon, in which he did bear at leaſt the fourth part of the burthen, and both of them gratis: as there were many many more ſuch lectures there performed, much about the ſame rate, weekly, by other pious learned men, and more indeed than are in any town or city, upon thoſe terms, in all England, or are like to be there again; which is mentioned, that God may have the glory in the firſt place, and then for the honour of that reformation which ſo many traduce and ſpit at; as alſo of thoſe more noble ſpirited preachers, who ſo freely offered unto God that which did coſt them ſo much, for which of men they received nothing.

But that place of Cambridge did not bound the courſe of this our laborious preacher's miniſtry, but, as it is ſaid of our Saviour, Matth ix. 35. 'That he went about all cities and villages, teaching and preaching;' and of St Paul, Rom. xv 17. 'That from Jeruſalem, and round about, and that to Illyricum' (which was in right line three hundred and thirty German miles, as Pareus upon the place computes it) 'he did fully preach the goſpel:' imitating herein, as Jerom obſerves, his Lord and Maſter, that ſun of righteouſneſs, 'whoſe going forth is from the ends of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it,' Pſal. xix. 6. In theſe their bleſſed ſteps our brother rode, and followed them in his painful miniſtry, diligently preaching, when he had occaſion to be abroad in remoter parts; but eſpecially in many towns and villages nearer hand, round about the univerſity, being a means to ſet up lectures in many of them, and very often aſſiſting in them. And as our Saviour is obſerved by ſome divines, to have preached the more frequently the nearer he was to his departure; ſo this his faithful ſervant, as it were, preſaging that his day would be but ſhort, towards his evening he made the more haſte and ſpeed in his journey towards his end, and yet more 'abounded in this work of the Lord,' and now finds, 'that his labour is not in vain in the Lord, 1 Cor. xv. 58. Thus of him as a miniſter.

And laſtly, as he was a Chriſtian, he was active for God, as his Saviour, Acts x. 38. 'Going up and down, and doing good:' and though otherwiſe modeſt, yet when the caſe required it, bold in a good cauſe. He was ſpiritual in communion, and a quickener of thoſe with whom he converſed: fruitful in diſcourſe, by which the frame of his ſpirit might eaſily be diſcovered: frequent in aſking queſtions, which was both his humility, and good Chriſtian huſbandry, thereby to improve himſelf, his time, and company.

Affable he was to others, of much humility, and low thoughts of himſelf; and of great integrity and ſingleneſs of heart towards God, his truth, ordinances, ways, and ſervants; of a very public ſpirit, and much affected with the various conditions of the ſtate, but eſpecially of the church and people of God.

He was a moſt loving huſband to his wife, and a dutiful ſon to his parents; and in his lifetime very helpful to his other relations. Many poor, both of the univerſity and town, do now feel the want of his bounty, which they taſted of in his life time; and both they and others had done more at his death, as appeared by his intentions of it in the draught of his will, had not the ſuddeneſs of his change prevented it.

In a long continued quartan God had knocked at his door, which in the interim of his recovery, awakened him to get all within ready againſt the coming of his Lord, which, though to his friends was unexpected, yet found not him unprepared.

In his ſhort ſickneſs, he expreſſed to an intimate friend his great comfort and joy in God's diſcriminate electing-love; and to a reverend doctor, about half an hour before his departure, who enquired of him about the ſettling of his outward eſtate, and inward peace, he readily, and without the leaſt heſitancy, anſwered, that through the mercy of God in Chriſt, his peace was made, and that he quietly reſted in it; whereby it ſeems (as was ſaid by one) he had his faith at his fingers ends, and having before 'given all diligence to make his calling and election ſure,' though he was ſomewhat ſuddenly called out of this life, yet had he 'an abundant entrance ſet open to him, into the everlaſting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt,' departing quietly in the Lord, December 18. 1653.

As to himſelf he had lived a fruitful and gracious life; and therefore, as Clemens Romanus ſpeaks of ſome of the firſt and beſt biſhops, he cloſed up all with a happy and bleſſed death; and as to others, he lived approved, and died deſired, and very much lamented.

He was a great friend to the publication of the lives of godly and eminent miniſters and Chriſtians, and aſſiſting to me in procuring information concerning the lives of ſome of thoſe worthies whom I have formerly printed.

The Life of Dr William Gouge, who died Anno Chriſti 1652.

William Gouge was born in Stratford-Bow, in the county of Middleſex, November 1. 1575. His father, Mr Thomas Gouge, was a godly gentleman: his mother was the virtuous and pious daughter of Mr Nicholas Culverel, a merchant in London, and ſhe was ſiſter to thoſe two famous preachers, Mr Samuel and Mr Ezekiel Culverel; ſhe had alſo two ſiſters who were married to thoſe two famous and learned divines, Dr Chaderton the maſter of Emmanuel college in Cambridge, and Dr Whitaker, the Regius Profeſſor of divinity in the ſame univerſity; ſo that by the mother's ſide he came of a ſtock of eminent preachers.

Our William Gouge, in his younger years, was firſt trained up in Paul's ſchool, London, and was afterwards ſent to a free ſchool at Felſted in Eſſex, where he was trained up three years, under the public miniſtry of his uncle, Mr Ezekiel Culverel, by whoſe labours he was much wrought upon, and if not firſt begotten, yet much built up in his holy faith, as himſelf often expreſſed. From thence he was ſent to Eaton, where he was educated other ſix years, during all which time he was more than ordinarily ſtudious and induſtrious; for when other boys, upon play days, took liberty for their ſports and paſtimes, he would be at his book, wherein he took more delight than others could find in their recreations, whereby he profited beyond many his equals.

At this time, whilſt he was a ſcholar at Eaton, he was poſſeſſed with an holy fear of God, was conſcionable in ſecret prayer, and in ſanctifying the Sabbaths, and was much grieved at the ordinary prophanation thereof by ſports and paſtimes, which were then and there too much allowed, as he did oft times in his life, with much thankfulneſs unto God, expreſs.

From the ſchool of Eaton, he was choſen to king's college in Cambridge, whither he went in the year 1595; and at the firſt entrance of his ſtudies, he applied himſelf to Peter Ramus, his logic, and grew ſo expert therein, that in the public ſchools he maintained and defended him, inſomuch, as when on a time divers ſophiſters ſet themſelves to vilify Ramus, for which end the reſpondent had given this queſtion, Nunquam erit magnus, cui Ramus eſt magnus, which ſome of the ſophiſters hearing, and knowing the ſaid William Gouge to be an acute diſputant, and a ſtiff defender of Ramus, they went to the divinity ſchools, where he was then hearing an act, and told him how in the other ſchools they were abuſing Ramus, he thereupon went into the ſophiſters ſchools; and upon the moderator's calling for another opponent, he ſtepped up, and brought ſuch an argument as ſtumbled the reſpondent, whereupon the moderator took upon him to anſwer it, but could not ſatisfy the doubt: this occaſioned a ſophiſter that ſtood by, to ſay with a loud voice, Do you come to vilify Ramus, and cannot anſwer the argument of a Ramiſt? Whereupon the moderator roſe up, and gave him a box on the ear, then the ſchool was all in an uproar; but the ſaid William Gouge was ſafely conveyed out from amongſt them.

When he was ſenior ſophiſter, he was choſen moderator of the ſophiſters acts in the public ſchools, which was a place of great credit, and he began every act with a ſolemn ſpeech in Latin, which was not uſual in thoſe days, and it added much grace to the act.

The ſaid William Gouge took his degrees in order, performing for every one of them all thoſe exerciſes in the public ſchools, which by the ſtatutes of the univerſity were required. And during his firſt three years, he kept the college ſo cloſe, that he lay not one night out of the walls thereof; thereof; and at the three years end he was admitted fellow, and then went to visit his friends.

He was a very hard student; for as he was a lover of learning, so was he very laborious in his studies, sitting up late at night, and rising early in the morning.

He continued in the college for the space of nine years; and in all that time (except he went out of town to his friends) he was never absent from morning prayers in the chappel, which used to be about half an hour after five o'clock in the morning: yea, he used to rise so long before he went to the chappel; as that he gained time for his secret devotions, and for reading his morning task of the scriptures; for he tied himself to read every day fifteen chapters in English out of the Bible, five in the morning, five after dinner, before he fell upon his other studies, and five before he went to bed. He hath been often heard to say, that when he could not sleep in the night time, he used in his thoughts to run through divers chapters of the Scripture, in order as if he had heard them read to him; and by this means he deceived the tediousness of his waking, and deprived himself also sometimes of the sweetness of his sleeping hours, though by that, which administered to him better rest, and greater sweetness; for he preferred the meditation upon the word before his necessary food with Job, and before sleep with David.

The like practice he used in the day-time when he was alone, whether within doors, or abroad; for which end, as an help, he wrote in a little book, which he always carried about him, the distinct heads of every particular passage in every chapter of the Bible, that so, when in any place he meditated on the word of God, and was at a loss, he presently found help by that little book. By this means he made himself so expert in the text, that if he heard any phrase of scripture, he could presently tell where it was to be found.

Besides, he had his set times of study for the more difficult places of scripture, that he might find out the true meaning of them; by which he attained to a great measure of exactness in the understanding of the scripture.

During his abode in the university, he did not only apply his own studies, but used also to send for others whom he observed to be ingenious and willing, and instructed them in the arts, whereby he was a great help to many, and brought them also to be better proficients.

While he was a scholar in King's college, there came a Jew to Cambridge, who was entertained in sundry colleges to teach them the Hebrew tongue, and, amongst the rest, in King's college; and Mr Gouge took the opportunity of learning of him, as many other of the students also did; but most of them grew soon weary, and left him, only Mr Gouge kept close to him so long as he tarried: but when he was gone, those which before had lost their opportunity, now seeing their own folly, they came to Mr Gouge, and entreated him to instruct them in the grounds of the said language, which he accordingly did, and thereby himself became an excellent Hebreian.

And as he was expert in the learned languages, so was he likewise in the arts, and all other necessary literature, that he might have nothing of these to learn when he should come to make use of them.

Being chosen a lecturer both of logic and philosophy in the college, he made conscience of observing all the times appointed by the statute for reading, and never omitted any of them; and his readings were so exactly composed, that thereby he profited his auditors exceedingly, and procured much credit and applause from them; but withal, some envy from his successors, who by his example were now provoked to a more painful and frequent reading of their lectures, which in former times were performed seldomer, and in a more perfunctory manner. He was so cautious and strict in the whole course of his life, that thereby he got the name of an arch Puritan, which was the term then given in scorn to those who were conscientious in their ways.

In the first year of his fellowship he began his Common Place book for divinity, in which he made references of all which he read. He had also white paper bound betwixt every leaf of his Bible, wherein he wrote such short and pithy interpretations, and observations on the text, as could not well be referred to any head in his Common Place-book.

He took such pleasure in, and was so addicted to a university life, that he was resolved to have spent many more years than he did, if not his whole life therein.

But his father, after he had been two or three years master of arts, much against his mind, took him from the university, upon the occasion of a marriage which he prepared for him; and God, by his providence, turned this to the great good of his church: for, by this means, though it were somewhat late before he entred upon the ministry, yet it is very probable that he entred upon, and exercised that sacred calling much sooner than he would have done, if he had been left to his own choice.

His wife was the daugter of Mr Henry Caulton, a citizen and mercer of London, but an orphan when he married her.

Having thus changed his condition, and entered into a married estate, that he might not be distracted nor impeded in his studies, by worldly business, he committed the whole care of his family affairs to the management of his wife, and still applied himself wholly to his studies, and to the weighty business of his heavenly calling.

He lived with this his wife for the space of two and twenty years, in much love and peace, and had by her thirteen children, seven sons, and six daughters, whereof eight lived to mens and womens estate, and were all of them carefully educated, and sufficiently provided for.

It was his earnest desire, and daily prayer to God for his sons, that they might all be preachers of the gospel, so highly did he prize the function, that is so vilified and contemned by too many others; for he himself found such comfort, and content in that calling, that he thought no greater could be found in any other; and he often professed for his own part, that the greatest pleasure he took in the world was in the employments about the work of the ministry, insomuch, as he was wont to say to divers honourable persons of his acquaintance, and particularly to the Lord Coventry, keeper of the great seal of England, 'that he envied not his great place and employment.'

In the order and government of his family, he was very exemplary. His house was another Bethel, for he did not only constantly, upon conscientious principles, use morning and evening prayer, and reading the sacred scriptures in his family; but also he catechized his children and servants, wherein God gave him a singular gift for their edification; for in teaching them, he used not any set form, but so, as he brought them whom he instructed, to express the principles taught them in their own words; so that his children, as Gregory Nazianzen saith of his father, found him as well a spiritual as a natural father. Yea, never any servant came to his house but gained a great deal of knowlege therein: so likewise did divers others, who at the request of their parents were instructed by him.

He was in special manner a strict and conscionable sanctifier of the Lord's-day, and that not only in the exercise of public duties incumbent upon his office, but also in the private sanctification of it in the duties of piety in, and with his family, and secret in his closet; and for this end, as he did forbear providing of supper the Eve before the Sabbath, that servants might not be occasioned thereby to sit up late; so neither would he suffer any servant to stay at home for dressing any meat upon the Lord's-Day for the entertainment of friends, whether they were great or mean, few or many.

On the Sabbath, after his public labours were ended, divers neighbours (wanting helps in their own families) came to his house, where he repeated his sermons, after so familiar a manner, that many have professed, that they were much more benefited by them in that his repetition, than they were in the first hearing of them; for he did not use word by word, to read out of notes what he had preached, but would by questions and answers, draw from those of his own household, such points as were delivered; and his exercise being ended, his constant course was to visit such of his parish as were sick, or by pain and weakness were disabled to go to the public ordinances, with each of them, he would discourse of some spiritual and heavenly subject suitable to their condition, and after that, he prayed with them, wherein he had a more than ordinary gift, being able in apt words and expressions to commend their ſeveral caſes unto God, and to put up petitions ſuitable to their ſeveral needs.

His uſual courſe was, to pray eight times in the public congregation, on the Lord's-Days; for, as he prayed before, and after each ſermon; ſo alſo before and after his reading, and expounding the ſcriptures, which he performed, both in the forenoon and afternoon. And, in his family, his conſtant courſe was, to pray thrice every Lord's-Day, and that in a ſolemn manner, viz. in the morning and evening, and after his repetition of the ſermons.

He was ordained miniſter in the two and thirtieth year of his age, and about a year after, which was in June, 1603, he was called to the exerciſe of his miniſtry in the pariſh of Black-Friars, London, where he continued to his dying day, which was about five and forty years, and ſix months, never accepting of any other miniſterial employment, though he had the proffers of many great places; his manner of coming to Black Friars was thus.

That pariſh being deſtitute of a preaching miniſter, Mr Hilderſam, a famous, pious and powerful preacher, being in company with ſome of the better ſort of the inhabitants of Black-Friars, who complained of their want, he told them, that there was one living at Stratford-Bow, who was out of employment, whom he judged very fit for them. Hereupon divers of them went thither on the Lord's-Day, where he frequently preached gratis, to help the miniſter that then was there; and, upon hearing of him, they liked him ſo well, that upon making report thereof to their neighbours, he was by an unanimous conſent, nemine contradicente, choſen to be their miniſter, which election being made known to him, he accepted of it, and ever after ſhewed a great reſpect to the inhabitants of that place.

Before Mr Gouge came to them, they had not ſo much as a church of their own to meet and hear the word of God in, nor any place where to bury their dead, but by ſuch means as he uſed, the church and church-porch, together with the miniſter's houſe, and church yard, all which they enjoyed before but upon courteſy, were bought in: ſo, as now, they all, as their proper inheritance, do belong to the pariſh of Black Friars. And five years after his coming thither, the old church being found too little to entertain thoſe multitudes that flocked thither from all parts of the city to hear him, he was the inſtrument of purchaſing in certain rooms adjoining, whereby the church was enlarged almoſt as big again as it was before. The ſum of purchaſing a new building, and beautifying of which church, amounted to above one thouſand five hundred pounds, all which was procured, partly by collections at his lectures, and partly by the voluntary contributions of his pariſhioners, without any public collections in other places.

After this, there being divers rooms under the ſaid church belonging to ſeveral land-lords, he uſed ſuch means as to purchaſe them for the benefit of the pariſh, which he did the rather to prevent all dangers that by wicked minded perſons might have befallen God's people in that church, by any contrivance in the rooms under the ſame.

Thus they who had nothing of their own at his firſt coming, have now, through his procurement, the whole church, the church porch, a church-yard, a vault to bury their dead in, a very fair veſtry, with other adjacent rooms, beſides the houſe wherein he himſelf dwelt ſo long as he lived; all which they hold as a perpetual inheritance.

They have alſo a leaſe of certain tenements of a conſiderable value for three hundred years; all which were procured by his prudence, intereſt and induſtry.

Such was his love and reſpect to this pariſh, as though he was oft proffered places of far greater value, yet he refuſed them all, oft ſaying, That the height of his ambition was to go from Black Friars to Heaven.

At his firſt coming to Black Friars, being in the thirty-third year of his age, he preached conſtantly, beſides twice every Lord's-Day, a weekly lecture, viz. on the Wedneſdays in the forenoon, which for the ſpace of thirty-five years was very much frequented, and that not only by his pariſhioners, but by divers city miniſters, and by ſundry pious and judicious gentlemen of the Inns of Court, beſides many other well-diſpoſed citizens, who in multitudes flocked to hear his heavenly doctrine; yea, ſuch was the fame of Dr Gouge his miniſtry, that when any country miniſters, and godly Chriſtians came to London about their affairs, they thought not their buſineſs fully ended, unleſs they had been at Black Friars lecture.

And it pleaſed God to give ſuch a bleſſing to his miniſtry, that many of his auditors, though living in other pariſhes, upon trial before ſundry elderſhips, have confeſſed, that the firſt ſeeds of grace ſown in their hearts, were by the bleſſing upon Dr Gouge's miniſtry: and, indeed herein, God wonderfully honoured his labours, by making him an aged father in Chriſt, to beget many ſons and daughters unto God, and to nouriſh up others in the ways of righteouſneſs, thouſands having been converted, and built up by his miniſtry.

He uſed alſo every month to preach a preparation ſermon before the communion, on the Eve before each monthly ſacrament.

He was eminently laborious and faithful in the work of his miniſtry even to his dying day, preaching ſo long as he was able to creep up into the pulpit, 'As a tree planted in the houſe of the Lord, he was fruitful even in his old age,' Pſal. xcii. 13, 14. He often uſed to ſay in his later days, that he could preach with more eaſe than he could get up into the pulpit, the reaſon whereof doubtleſs was this, becauſe as the encreaſe of his aſthma diſabled him to preach with more eaſe than in his younger days.

His preaching was always very diſtinct: firſt, he opened his text, giving the true and proper ſenſe of it, then gave he the logical analyſis of it, and then gathered ſuch proper obſervations as naturally flowed from it, and properly and pertinently improved, and applied the ſame; by which method, his miniſtry proved very profitable to his hearers. Many have acknowleged that in regard of the logical reſolution of his text he went beyond all that ever they heard, as alſo in clearing difficult and doubtful places of ſcripture as they came in his way. And, as his method was clear, ſo was his expreſſions plain, always delivering the ſolid points of divinity in a familiar ſtile to the capacity of the meaneſt.

As for his life and converſation, it was holy and exemplary, himſelf practiſing what he preached unto others, and living over his own ſermons; his doctrine and his practice concurred, and went hand and hand together.

Before theſe times of examination of perſons, before their admiſſion to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he uſed to go to the houſes of the better ſort in his pariſh, where he appointed a time for them, and their whole families to meet together, that he might examine how fit they were to be admitted to that ordinance: yea, he appointed ſundry ſmall families to meet together on a certain day, that he might make trial of their fitneſs alſo; and then his manner was, not to admit any of the younger ſort to the Sacrament, till in his judgment he found them fitted for it.

Though he addicted himſelf much to his ſtudies, and carried himſelf peaceably, yet wanted he not thoſe that did envy, and malign him, and that took all occaſions to do him what miſchief they could: as, in the caſe of Serjeant Finch, his book about the 'Calling of the Jews, which Dr Gouge only publiſhed, and the author himſelf owned it, yet for his publication of it, he was committed to priſon, and kept there for the ſpace of nine weeks together.

King James being informed, that the ſerjeant had in that book declared, and endeavoured to prove, that the Jews ſhould have a viſible kingdom, which ſhould be above all other kingdoms, which doctrine he abhorred, he thereupon grew extreme impatient: Biſhop Neal, alſo with others, provoked him againſt the publiſher of the book, which ſo incenſed him, that he would admit of no apology. Yet after a while, Dr Gouge was moved diſtinctly to declare his judgment and opinion about that point 'of the calling, and converſion of the Jews,' which he did in theſe enſuing propoſitions.

All that I can gather out of the holy ſcriptures about this point is:

1. 'That the calling of the Jews, importeth more than a ſpi-a ſpiritual calling to believe in Jeſus Chriſt, and to embrace the goſpel.'

2. 'This their ſpiritual calling, may be called an outward glorious calling, in regard of the viſibility and generality of it; to put a difference betwixt the promiſed calling of the nation, and the continual calling of ſome few perſons. For in all ages ſince the rejection of the Jews, ſome few here and there have been called. Thus the calling of the Gentiles in the Apoſtle's time, when Chriſtians had no pompous civil government, was an outward glorious calling, by reaſon of the viſible famous churches which they had.'

3. 'It is probable that at, or after their calling, they ſhall not be ſcattered as now they are, but ſhall be gathered together into churches, and be freed from the bondage and ſlavery wherein they have been many years together.'

4. 'To give them a ſovereignty over all the whole church ſeemeth to me to be derogatory to that abſolute ſovereignty which Chriſt the head of his church hath, in whom the promiſes of the perpetuity of David's ſceptre of the extent of his dominion, of the ſubjection of all nations are accompliſhed.'

5. 'To ſet down the diſtinct time, place, and other like circumſtances of their calling, needeth more than an ordinary ſpirit, and implies too much curioſity.

6. 'The point of the calling of the Jews being no fundamental point of Chriſtian religion, to be over ſtiff in holding one thing or other therein, to the diſturbance of the peace of the church, comes near to ſchiſm.'

Upon which, being examined by Archbiſhop Abbot, and his anſwer approved, he was releaſed from his impriſonment.

Ordinarily in the ſummer vocation, he was with his family in the country; but not ſo much for his own eaſe as for the further ſervice of God's church: for beſides his preaching every Lord's day in the place where he reſided, he improved his time for the publication of thoſe his treatiſes which are now in print. viz. The whole Armour of God; Domeſtical Duties; an explanation of the Lord's Prayer; God's three Arrows, of the Plague Famine and Sword, upon occaſion of thoſe judgments then raging. The Saint's ſacrifice of Thankſgiving, upon his recovery from a dangerous ſickneſs. To which is now added his commentary upon the whole epiſtle to the Hebrews, which was the ſubject of his Wedneſdays lectures for many years.

While he was ſettled at Black-Friars, he commenced Batchellor of divinity anno Chriſti 1611. which was the eight year after he had taken the degree of maſter of arts.

Anno Chriſti 1628, he proceeded doctor of divinity, at which time eight London miniſters proceeded doctors, upon which occaſion, Dr Collins, the then regius profeſſor, put up Mr Gouge's degree, and procured it to paſs in the Regent houſe, before he had any notice thereof, and without his conſent, whereby he did in a manner force him to take his degree; yet ſo as when he heard what was done, he readily went to Cambridge, and performed all his acts according to the ſtatutes of the univerſity, as he had done at the taking of all his former degrees.

Such reſpect was generally ſhewed to him, as that in ſundry public employments he was choſen a truſtee or Feoffee. As in the year, 1626, he was choſen one of the truſtees for Mr Whetenhall's three lectures.

Alſo in the year 1616, he was choſen one of the truſtees for buying in of impropriations, and for many other pious and charitable uſes, wherein indeed he always approved himſelf a careful, a faithful truſtee, and in ſome caſes, by his great pains and coſt, he procured to be ſettled for ever ſuch pious donations, as would otherwiſe have been wreſted away, and alienated from their intended uſe.

The buſineſs about the buying in of impropriations was this.

There was a ſelect ſociety of thirteen perſons who joined themſelves together as truſtees, to ſtir up, and encourage ſuch as were piouſly affected, to contribute towards the buying in of impropriations, and giving them freely towards the maintaining of godly and able miniſters. And theſe were ſo faithful to their truſt, as albeit they met very frequently, and ſpent much time and pains in conſultation about that buſineſs, yet did they never ſpend one penny out of the public ſtock, for the refreſhing of themſelves; yea though they had ſundry agents, and meſſengers whom they employed about that buſineſs, and that both far and near, yet did they never diminiſh that ſtock wherewithal they were intruſted to the value of a penny; but themſelves, at leaſt moſt of them, contributed out of their own purſes for the diſcharge of all by expences. And when they had the opportunity of buying in any great impropriation, and wanted money in ſtock to go through with it, they did amongſt themſelves give, or lend ſo much as might effect it; and amongſt others, our Dr Gouge at one time lent 300 l. gratis for that uſe, beſides the monthly contribution which he gave. By this means in a few years ſpace, thirteen impropriations were bought in, which coſt between five and ſix thouſand pounds; into which their care was to put godly, able and orthodox miniſters; and their deſign was to plant a learned and powerful miniſtry, eſpecially in cities and market towns in ſeveral parts of the kingdom where there was the greateſt need, for the better propagation of the goſpel in thoſe parts.

Indeed this was it that raiſed up ſo much envy againſt them, and made Dr Laud, the then biſhop of London to conſult with Mr. Noy, the king's attorney general, about diſſolving this ſociety: and hereupon Mr Noy brought them all into the court of exchequer, picking this quarrel againſt them, for that they had made themſelves a body incorporate, without any grant from the king. When the caſe had been debated by learned council on both ſides the reſult was, that the court adjudged their proceeding, to be illegal, that their truſt ſhould be taken from them, and that what impropriations they had thus purchaſed, ſhould be made over to the king, and that the king ſhould appoint ſuch as he thought meet to diſpoſe of thoſe impropriations which they had bought in.

The aforeſaid attorney, that ſtrictly examined all their receipts, and diſburſements, found that they had laid out of their money, at that time when they were queſtioned a thouſand pounds more than they had received, and thereupon had received an order of the court, that thoſe debts ſhould be firſt diſcharged out of the revenues of the impropriations, before they ſhould be diſpoſed to particular uſes. Thus was their truſt quite wreſted out of their hands, and that excellent work fell to the ground.

Anno Chriſti 1653, Dr Gouge was, by the authority of parliament, called to be a member of the aſſembly of divines, wherein his attendance was aſſiduous, not being obſerved during the whole time of that ſeſſion to be one day abſent, unleſs it were in caſe of more than ordinary weakneſs, ever preferring that publick employment before any private buſineſs whatſoever, and therein he was not one to make up the number only, but a chief and uſeful member.

For he was choſen, and ſate as one of the aſſeſſors, and very often filled the chair in the moderator's abſence; And ſuch was his conſtant care, and conſcientiouſneſs in the expence of time, and improving it to the beſt advantage, that in caſe of intermiſſion in the aſſembly affairs, he uſed to apply himſelf to his private ſtudies: for which end, it was his conſtant practice to carry his Bible and ſome other books in his pocket, which upon every advantage he drew forth, and read in them, as it was obſerved by many.

Epiſcopacy alſo being voted down by both houſes of parliament, and ſo no ordinary way being left for the ordination of miniſters, the parliament thought fit to ſet up an extraordinary way by three and twenty miniſters, who for the ſpace of a year, were to ordain ſuch as tendred themſelves according to the rules preſcribed by them, with the humble advice of the aſſembly, of which number Dr Gouge was one, and acted with his brethren therein; at which time I obſerved his ſtrictneſs in keeping of faſts: for on an ordination day, which was always accompanied with faſting and prayer; in the afternoon one proffered him a piece of a candied orange pill, which (though he was then very ancient) he refuſed to accept of till the work of the day was finiſhed.

He was likewiſe choſen by a committee of parliament, amongſt amongſt others, to write large annotations upon the Bible, being well known to be a judicious interpreter of Scripture, and how well he performed that taſk, is, and may be evident to all that read his part, which was from the beginning of the firſt book of the Kings to Job. In which the intelligent reader may obſerve ſuch ſkill in the original, ſuch acquaintance with the ſacred ſtory, ſuch judgment in giving the genuine ſenſe of the text, and ſuch accurateneſs in raiſing pertinent obſervations, that without the help of any other commentators, a man may accomodate himſelf with the ſenſe, doctrines, and uſes of moſt of thoſe Scriptures that came under his hand, in thoſe brief annotations.

Before this, when the Book allowing ſports and recreations on the Lord's days, was by public authority enjoined to be read in all churches throughout the kingdom, he as ſundry others godly and faithful miniſters refuſed to read the ſame, reſolving rather to ſuffer the uttermoſt, than to manifeſt the leaſt approbation of ſo wicked and ſacrilegious a practice, it being ſo contrary to the expreſs letter of the Scripture.

By reaſon of his ability and dexterity in reſolving caſes of conſcience, he was much ſought unto for his judgment in doubtful caſes and ſcruples of conſcience, and that not only by ordinary Chriſtians, but by divers miniſters alſo, both in the city and country, ſometimes by word of mouth, and other ſometimes by writing: and indeed he was accounted the father of the London divines, and the oracle of his time.

He was likewiſe a ſweet comforter of troubled conſciences, wherein he was exceeding ſkilful and dexterous, as many hundreds in the city have found from time to time, being ſought unto far and near to ſuch as groaned under afflictions and tentations, many of whom, through God's bleſſing upon his labours, were reſtored to joy and comfort out of unſpeakable terrors and torments of conſcience.

He was of a meek and ſweet diſpoſition; yea, ſuch was his meekneſs of ſpirit, that it ſeemeth not to be paralleled. For though he lived with his wife above twenty years, yet neither child nor ſervant, could ever ſay that they ſaw ſo much as an angry countenance, or heard ſo much as an angry word proceed from him towards her all her life long.

Some have obſerved, that towards his latter end in his visage he did much reſemble the picture that is uſually made for Moſes. Certainly he was the exact effigies of Moſes his ſpirit, and in this reſembled him to the life, that he was one of the meekeſt men that this generation hath known.

He was, a great peace keeper, ſo a great peace maker, having an excellent dexterity in compoſing of differences; he was far from doing wrong to others, and as far from revenging wrong done to him by others.

Notwithſtanding which, he ſuffered much, both by the ſpeeches and alſo by the actions of evil, and envious perſons; yet his manner was, rather to pray for them, than in any harſh manner to retaliate like for like. He always judged that revilers, and injurious perſons wronged themſelves more than him.

Sundry ſcandalous and falſe aſperſions were caſt upon him, yea, by ſuch perſons as were guilty of thoſe very crimes which they laid to his charge. For ſome who lived by the unwarrantable trade of uſury, to juſtify their own unlawful practices, have not ſtuck to charge the ſame upon him, though he was always free from it, never putting out any money to uſe, either by himſelf, or any other for him, neither directly, nor indirectly, as he hath been often heard to affirm, both in his life time, and not long before his death.

Being choſen preſident of Sion College, according to the cuſtom, when he left his office, he preached a learned, and polite Latin ſermon ad clerum, which he delivered by the ſtrength of his memory, without the help of his notes, which ſhewed that tho' his body was decripet, and feeble, yet his intellectuals were vivid, quick and vigorous.

He was very charitable, eſpecially to the godly poor, according to that direction of the apoſtle, Gal. vi. 10. where he exhorts us 'to do good to all but eſpecially to the houſhold of faith.' He maintained ſome poor ſcholars in the univerſity wholly at his own charge, and contributed liberally towards the maintenance of others. Indeed he ſet apart a ſacred ſtock as he called it, a portion for the poor, proportionable to his receipts, which he faithfully diſtributed.

Yea, he was of ſuch a charitable, and bountiful diſpoſition, that tho' his father left him a competent eſtate, yet ſuch were his annual diſburſements for his kindred, and others that ſtood in need of relief, that from the time of his father's death till his children came to be of years, and ſo to call for their portions, he laid up nothing of all his comings in; whereby it may appear, that they, who out of envy cry up his eſtate to be greater than it was, do conſequently cry up his bounty and charity: for that whatſoever his eſtate was, it was wholly laid out for the relief of ſuch as ſtood in need (neceſſary expences for his family only excepted) which as it doth appear by his papers, ſo in his life time he profeſſed it to ſome of his children; and truly as in other things he excelled many others, ſo in this he excelled himſelf.

He was very conſcientious in the expence of his time, from his youth to the very time of his death. His cuſtom was to riſe very early both in the winter and ſummer. In the winter time he conſtantly roſe ſo long before day, as that he always performed all the exerciſe of his private devotions before day light: and in the ſummer time he roſe about four o' clock in the morning: by which means he had done half his work before others began their ſtudies. If he happened to hear any at their work before he began his ſtudies, he would ſay (as Demoſthenes ſpake concerning the ſmith) that he was much troubled that any ſhould be at the works of their calling, before he was at his.

He was a man of much temperance and ſobriety, both in his eating, drinking, and apparel: and for recreations, howſoever many pious perſons do ſpend time therein, and that lawfully in warrantable recreations, yet he ſpent none of his ſo, whence it was that he was never expert in any kind of ſports: he hath been often heard to ſay, that he never took any journey merely of pleaſure in all his life time. Study and pains were always, both in youth and age his chiefeſt pleaſure and delight; yea it 'was his meat and drink to be doing the will of his heavenly father,' wherein he took as much pleaſure and delight, as natural men do in their eating and drinking, or in their diſports and paſtimes.

Such was his deportment in his converſation, that there was ſcarce a lord, or lady, or citizen of quality, in or about the city, that were pioufly affected, but they ſought his acquaintance, and were ambitious to enjoy his company, wherein they took much content, and found much benefit to their ſouls thereby.

And whereas many perſons of quality out of their great reſpect to him, came to viſit him, he would ſo endeavour to order their conference as might tend moſt to their edification; and if their viſits were merely complimental, he ſoon grew weary, and accounted it a burden to him.

He was always of a very friendly, and courteous diſpoſition, in ſo much as the meaneſt, not only of his own pariſh but of the city, found eaſy acceſs to him, and he was as eaſy to be intreated, yet ready to do what good he could to all.

And amongſt other graces, his humility was very eminent and examplary: though others knew not when his face did not ſhine, yet he knew not when it did. He that readily could obſerve the leaſt glimpſes or appearances of any worth in others, would not acknowledge them in in himſelf: he was (as it was ſaid of Nazianzen) high in employments and abilities, but low in his diſpoſition, and reſentment of his own worth. He was not obſerved to be puffed up either with the multitudes that flocked into his miniſtry (which were many and great) nor with any applauſes of men; but would ſtill ſay, 'that he knew more by himſelf to abaſe him, than any could know to extol him; yea, ſo eminent was his humility, that he charged his executor, to whom he committed the care of his funeral, that there ſhould no green ſtaff be laid upon his herſe, tho' this uſual reſpect is given to thoſe who in their life time were governors of the hoſpital of Bridewell, one of which number this worthy doctor was, yea and a benefactor nefactor too to that house: as also that he should not affix any escutcheons to his herse, tho' he was a gentleman of an antient descent, as if he had thought that the poverty of Christ was his patrimony, and coat of arms, and his interest in him, his greatest and best atchievment; or as if both living and dead he would be (as the apostle speaks) 'clothed with humility.'

He was much in communion with God, and contented not himself only with his constant daily, and ordinary holy duties, but was also frequent in extraordinary exercises. In the bishop's times, when it was not permitted to keep fasts in the public congregation, he was one of those ministers who frequently helped private Christians in their more retired humiliations. In times of fears and dangers, he with divers others had sometimes monthly, yea sometimes weekly fasts, whereof many were kept in his own house, and others of them in his vestry; which he was observed to perform with extraordinary reverence and awefulness of spirit. His confessions were accompanied with much sense of, and sorrow for sin, brokenness of heart, self abhorrency, judging of the creature, and justifying of God: his petitions were pertinent, judicious, spiritual, seasonable, accompanied with faith and fervency; like a true son of Jacob, he wrestled with supplications and tears, as resolving not to depart out of God's presence without a blessing.

But there was none like him in thanksgiving, when a man would have thought that he had spent the last drop of his spirits and strength in confession and prayer; O how would he recollect his spirits when he came to the work of thanksgiving, wherein he would be so large, particular, warm, and vigorous, that in the end of the day when mens affections grew flat, he would so revive and quicken them, as if the work had been then but newly begun, and as if that had been the only work of the day; and herein indeed he may be a pattern to all his surviving brethren in the ministry.

He was very inquisitive after the state and condition of the church of Christ, both at home and abroad, that he might accordingly order his prayers in their behalf, of whom he was never unmindful in his addresses unto God. And when he heard that it went ill with the church of God in any place, like another Nehemiah, 'he sate him down, and wept, and mourned, and fasted, and prayed, unto the God of heaven in their behalf.'

His study was as great to advance Christ, as to debase himself. He used frequently to say, 'When I look upon myself, I see nothing but emptiness, and weakness; but when I look upon Christ, I see nothing but fullness and sufficiency. When the hand of his body was weak and shaking, that of his soul, his faith was strong and steddy. When he could not hold the cup at the sacrament, nor scarce carry it to his own mouth, by reason of his palsy hand, yet then with a firm and fixed assistance did he lay hold upon Christ, and with a strong and eager appetite applied his blood to his soul, and his manner was sweetly to breath forth joyful thanksgivings for his refreshment by the blood of Christ, when he was returned to his house after the Lord's supper; yea when he could hardly creep with his body to the place where it was celebrated, and was forced many times to make use of the help of others to support him in his passage thither, even then did his faith run swiftly, and was upon the wing to carry him to Christ. When wordly supports failed him, when health and strength forsook him, he made Jesus Christ the staff of his old age, often professing, as his great misery and impotency without him, so his holy and humble recumbency upon him.

Great was his patience under the visiting hand of God, especially in his old age, when God exercised him with painful maladies: though by reason of the sharpness and bitterness of his pains, occasioned by the stone, and acuteness of his urine, and that Lethalis arundo, as he oft called it, that deadly arrow in his side, which he knew could never be plucked out but by death, I mean his asthma, which he got by an excessive cold in attending upon public employments; notwithstanding, I say, by reason of these he was often heard to groan, yet never did he once grumble against the dispensations of God. Never did he complain of God for his sufferings, though oft of himself for sinning.

He never cried out, 'A great sufferer,' but oft, 'A great sinner!' and yet he would overtake that expression again, with the discoursing of, and comforting himself in 'A great Saviour!' And in the deep of his torments he would say, 'Well, yet in all these there is nothing of hell, or of God's wrath.'

His sufferings were never so deep, but he could see the bottom of them, and would say, 'Soul, be silent; soul, be patient; it is thy God and Father that thus ordereth thy estate; thou art his clay, he may tread and trample on thee as pleaseth him: Thou hast deserved much more; it is enough that thou art kept out of hell. Though thy pain be grievous, yet it is tolerable: thy God affords some intermissions, he will turn it to thy good, and at length put an end to all; none of these can be expected in hell.'

He used often to make mention of the extent of obedience, which he said was not only to endeavour to do what God requireth, but also patiently to bear what God's will is to lay upon his creature, as Christ himself, though he was the Son of God, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered.

In his greatest pangs he often used this speech of holy Job, 'Shall we receive good from the hands of God, and not evil.'

He often commended his soul unto Christ, and used to say, 'I am perswaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day.'

When any of his friends went about to comfort him in those gifts which God bestowed on him, and his works which he had wrought by him, he would answer, 'I dare not think of any such thing for comfort; Jesus Christ, and what he hath done and endured, is the only ground of my sure comfort.'

Many that came to visit him in his weakness, profest that they went away better than they came, by reason of those savoury and gracious speeches and expressions that proceeded from him.

Though towards his latter end his fits of the stone were frequent and sharp, having sometimes four or five of them in an hour, yet such was his desire to finish that his so much desired commentary upon the epistle to the Hebrews, that so soon as the bitter pain of his fit was over, he fell returned to his work, making some further progress therein. And thus he continued labouring in that employment, through many pains, till Tuesday the 6th of December, 1653; about which time, as his natural strength was exceedingly decayed, so now also his intellectuals began to fail; and for the following three days a drousiness seized upon him, insomuch that he could not hold up his head to look into a book, but slumbered away his time in a chair; and upon Friday, being the third day after he had given over his studies, enquiring what day it was, he cried out, 'Alas! I have lost three days. The day following, being Saturday, he had no desire to arise out of his bed, neither indeed could he, in regard of his weakness, which was such, and he was so sensible of it, that he said, 'Now, I have not long to live in this world, the time of my departure is at hand, I am going to my desired haven;' the apprehension whereof was no little joy unto him, for he had often said to such of his friends as came to visit him in his sickness, 'I am willing to die, having, I bless God, nothing to do but to die.' Indeed, sometimes he seemed to be in the same strait with St Paul, between life and death, 'having a desire to depart that he might be with Christ, which was best of all.' But yet very desirous he was to finish his commentary upon the epistle to the Hebrews, which he knew would be very useful to the church of God, and in that respect he was willing to live; and God so far answered his design in that particular, that he lived to finish it within half a chapter. But when he perceived that his time in this world could not be long, O! how sweet and joyful was the apprehension of death unto him, which he often termed his best friend, next to Jesus Christ. So that he came willingly; he was not plucked and dragged to death: death was his familiar acquaintance; it was his privilege as well as his task.

When his good sister said to him in his sickness, Brother, I am afraid to leave you alone: 'Why, sister, (said he) I shall, I am sure, be with Jesus Christ when I die.'

The

The meditation of death was not more frequent than ſweet unto him. His ſoul was upon the wing, and was haſt heaven-ward, even whilſt it was in the cage of his decrepit body.

Upon Saturday, though he kept his bed through weakneſs, yet was he more wakeful, and his ſpirit more lively and cheerful, than for ſeveral days before, which queſtionleſs was from his joyful apprehenſion of his approaching departure.

His ſpeeches that day were more than ordinary heavenly: he ſpake much in the admiration of God's free grace, and riches of his mercy in Jeſus Chriſt.

As while he led a heavenly life, ſo about the time of his death, by thoſe comforts and joys that he found in his ſoul, he ſeemed to be in heaven, even while he was upon the earth; and ſo he continued full of ſweet and divine comfort, and heavenly expreſſions, to the laſt of his underſtanding and ſpeech, which continued to Monday morning, when both of them failed him; from which time he lay breathing, yet ſhorter and ſhorter, till eight o'clock at night, about which time, in the preſence of all his children, and divers of his friends, he quietly ſlept in the Lord, making an happy change from earth to heaven, which was December 12. 1653, being ſeventy-nine years old, after he had ſerved God faithfully and painfully in his generation.

A commentary on the epiſtle to the Hebrews,

My reverend friend Mr Thomas Gouge, eldeſt ſon to this famous doctor, deſired me to inſert this Life, amongſt theſe other Worthies contained in this volume.

The Life of Mr Thomas Gataker, who died Anno Chriſti, 1654.

Mr. Thomas Gataker, or Gatacre, (for ſo he wrote himſelf, till of later years to prevent miſcalling, occaſioned frequently by the view of the letters, he changed it into Gataker), was a branch of a very ancient family, ſo firmly by God's providence planted in Shropſhire, that the ſtock hath continued in the ſame houſe, carrying the name of its owner, and known by the title of Gatacre hall, by an uninterrupted ſucceſſion from the time of king Edward the confeſſor.

His father, Mr Thomas Gatacre, (being a younger ſon of William Gatacre), was deſigned by his parents to the ſtudy of the law, in order whereunto he was admitted a ſtudent in the Temple: and during his abode there, he occaſionally went to viſit ſome of his kindred, who were then high in place and power, whereby he was often preſent at the examination of ſome Chriſtian confeſſors of the goſpel, in thoſe bloody times wherein Satan armed all his forces to ſuppreſs that dawning light which threatned ruin to his kingdom of darkneſs.

The harſhneſs and cruelty of thoſe proceedings, together with the conſtancy of thoſe weak, yet ſincere Chriſtians, who, with the evidence of truth, and reſolution of mind, maintained faith and a good conſcience, were very prevalent with him to facilitate his entertainment of that purer doctrine of the goſpel which began to ſhine into his ſoul.

This being apprehended by his parents, fearing his change in religion, they ſent him over to Louvaine in Flanders, and to win him to a compliance with them in religion, they ſettled upon him an eſtate in a leaſe of an hundred pounds per annum, in old rents: but, like St Paul, Phil. iii. 8. 'He counted all outward advantages as nothing in compariſon of the knowlege of Jeſus Chriſt.'

His father therefore perceiving how fixt and unmoveable he was in his choice of religion, in which yet he had nothing to except againſt, but only the novelty of it, he recalled him to England, and in great diſpleaſure revoked his former grant of one hundred pounds per annum, which yet could not be aſſected without his ſon's conſent: but this young diſciple had already learned the hard leſſon of ſelf-denial, and of forſaking all to follow Chriſt, and therefore to preſerve his conſcience pure and entire, he gave up that which was intended as a bait to apoſtacy. But the Lord, who hath promiſed to his faithful followers reparation and ſatisfaction for all their loſſes for his ſake, raiſed him up friends, by whoſe aſſiſtance and encouragement he purſued his ſtudies at Oxford; and in proceſs of time, when, not only the clouds of ignorance and ſuperſtition were diſpelled, but alſo thoſe bloody ſtorms in the Marian days were blown over, he took upon him the public miniſtry of the goſpel, and he was houſehold chaplain to that great favourite Robert earl of Leiceſter, and afterwards paſtor of St Edmund's in Lombard ſtreet, London; in which parſonage houſe, by his wife, (who was of an honeſt family of the Piggots in Hertfordſhire) amongſt other children, he had this Thomas, who was born Sept. 4. 1574.

In his childhood he was ſo addicted to thoſe means which his parents applied him unto, for the implanting in him the ſeeds of good literature, that he rather needed a bridle than a ſpur: for his love of learning, equal to that admirable capacity wherewith the Father of Lights had furniſhed him, was ſo active in the acquiring of it, that his father was fain often gently to chid him from his book. Neither were his nimble wit, ſharp judgment, and vaſt memory perverted to be the inſtruments of that debauchery wherewith the corruption of our nature doth too often ſtain and deflower our firſt days; for he had a lovely gravity in his young converſation, ſo that what Gregory Nazianzen ſaid of the great Baſil might be averred of him, 'That he held forth learning beyond his age, and a fixedneſs of manners beyond his learning.'

Having happily finiſhed his Tyrocinia of firſt exerciſes in the grammar ſchools, wherein he overcame, by his ſtrange induſtry, the difficulties which thoſe times, deſtitute of many helps which our preſent days do enjoy, conflicted withal, and outſtripped many of his fellows which ran in the ſame courſe; ſo that before he had compleated ſixteen years, viz. in the year 1590, he was by his father placed in St John's college in Cambridge.

Not long after his ſettlement there, his father (being called of God to receive the reward of his labours) left him, not wholly deſtitute, and yet not ſufficiently provided for any long continuance of his ſtudies in that place. But God, who hath engaged his truth and mercy to the upright, and even to his ſeed alſo, Pſal. cxii. 1. 2. eſpecially when the ſon doth not degenerate nor thwart the providence of God, by a forfeiture of his title to the promiſes, provided friends and means for him, who was by an hidden counſel then deſigned to be an inſtrument of doing much ſervice to the church of Chriſt. Thus the fruit was not nipped in a promiſing bud, by the froſt of want.

Now not from meer favour, but from merit, upon the proof of his learning, he was choſen ſcholar of that worthy ſociety, wherein he continued his ſtudies with unwearied diligence, and happy ſucceſs, till he, with abilities bilities answerable to his degree, commenced master of arts.

For an instance of his industry take this, viz. That he was a constant auditor of that eminent light of learning, Mr John Boyes, who read a Greek lecture in his bed to certain young students, that preferred their nightly studies to their rest and ease. The notes of those lectures he kept as a treasure, and being visited by Mr Boyes many years after, he brought them forth to him, to the no small joy of the good old man, who professed that he was made some years younger by that grateful entertainment.

About this time was contracted that strict friendship betwixt our Mr Gataker, and that faithful servant of Jesus Christ Mr Richard Stock, which continued to the death of this rev minister, as appears by Mr Gataker's testimony given unto him at his funeral.

An evidence of that good esteem which Mr Gataker had now acquired, for his learning and piety, was this, That a college being then to be erected by the munificence of the countess of Sussex, the trustees of that foundress, being persons eminent for prudence and zeal, did chuse him for one of that society, and they transplanted him into that new nursery of arts and religion, being confident that he would, as indeed he did, by Christ's assistance, prove very fruitful both for the ornament and benefit of that seminary.

Indeed they laid hold of him before the house was fit for inhabitants, fearing lest so fair and promising a flower should be taken up by some other hand.

But while the college was in building, that he might not lose any opportunity of doing good, he retired himself to the house of Mr William Aylofes in Essex, who had prevailed with him to instruct both himself in the Hebrew language, and his eldest son in that literature which was proper to his age.

In this family, partly by his own inclination, and partly by the encouragement of the governors thereof, he performed family duties for the instruction and edification of the whole household, expounding to them a portion of scripture every morning, that the Sun of Righteousness might as constantly arise in their hearts, as the day brake in upon them.

In this exercise, whereby he laboured to profit both himself and others, he went over the epistles of the apostles, the prophecy of Isaiah, and a good part of the book of Job, rendering the text out of the original languages, and then delivering clear explications, and also deducing useful observations.

Dr Stern, the suffragan of Colchester, on a time visiting the mistress of the family, to whom he was nearly related, happened to be present at one of these exercises, at which time Mr Gataker explained the first chapter of St Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, which is known to be most pregnant of divine mysteries; but this portion of holy writ he treated upon with such happy elucidations, that the judicious doctor was much satisfied with his pains therein, and admiring the endowments of Mr Gataker, exhorted him instantly to be ordained to the work of the ministry, whereby those his gifts might be authoritatively exercised for the public good, and improved for the building of the church, and withal offered him his assistance in that business: but Mr Gataker well weighing the burden of that calling, and judging modestly of his own abilities, which he perceived disproportionable for that office, (to the full discharge whereof the apostle hath set, Tis icanos? "Who is sufficient?") thanked the doctor for his kind offer, but deferred the matter to further consideration. But afterwards, by the advice of the reverend Mr Henry Alvey, formerly his tutor, and whom in this business he now took for his counsellor, upon his remonstrance of divers reasons, and the importunity of Dr Stern afresh reiterated, he assented to be ordained by the suffragan.

The fabric of Sidney-Sussex college being now finished, he betook himself to the station, and employment whereunto he was before designed, and to the work depending thereon, wherein his pains in seasoning young students with principles of piety and learning, were both great and very successful: for some of them that watered their gardens at his spring, or kindled their lamps at his light, grew up to great eminency, as Mr John Hoyl, and Mr Thomas Pell, who were afterwards worthy fellows of that society.

About that time there were certain persons in the university, zealous of promoting the glory of God, and of gaining souls to Christ, that lay in a sad condition through the defect of pastors able to teach and lead the people in the ways of truth, life, and peace, especially Mr Abdias Ashton of St John's college, and Mr William Bedel of Emanuel, who set on foot a design of preaching in places adjacent to Cambridge, even to a considerable distance. These men invited Mr Gataker to be a partner in this good employment, who being drawn and encouraged by them, preached every Lord's day at Everton, (a village in the meeting confines of Cambridge, Bedford, and Huntingtonshire) where a decrepit man, who was reported to be fixscore and ten years old, sustained the name of vicar; Vix magni nominis umbra. Here a family of the Borgoines, resident in that place, deserveth this honourable remembrance, that Mr Burgoine, during that time, used Mr Gataker with great humanity and respect, which by him was construed to be an effect of his piety.

After he had thus religiously employed himself for the space of half a year, manifesting his public spirit therein, he had some causes that moved him to retire from the university, at the motion of Mr Ashton before mentioned, who had been his tutor, whereupon he removed to Sir William Cook's family, then resident in London.

This place and employment occasioned a more public discovery of his ministerial gifts, with the singular approbation of many persons of note, not only for their outward estate, but also for their affection unto, and judgment in religion. Hereupon the lecturer's place of Lincoln's-Inn falling void, some principal persons of that honourable society, who had been his auditors occasionally elsewhere, made addresses unto him, inviting him unto that place, offering their assistance, and alleging the facility of his introduction by lord chief-justice Popham's interesting himself in the business, whom they knew to have loved his father Mr Thomas Gataker, (being once his intimate friend and contemporary in the study of the law) and to favour this his son very highly, for his own worth and work in the ministry; but he, according to his usual modesty, declined the undertaking of it, and resisted the importunities even of his friend Mr Stock, till Dr Stourgue, master of Sidney college, repairing to London, and being made acquainted with the design in hand, thought he had it in his thoughts to invite Mr Gataker back to the college, that he might read an Hebrew lecture, which had a salary annexed to it by lord Harrington; yet laying that aside, he pressed Mr Gataker with arguments and authority, encouraging him against his own diffidence, and so wrought him at last to assent, that without any suit made by him, lord Popham should recommend him to that society.

Thus was he chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn, where he spent ten years, to the great advancement of piety amongst them, and with an happy reformation of some abuses of the Lord's day, as he himself testifies in his apologetical discourse against Lilly, p 16. 17.

But notwithstanding that engagement, Mr Gataker did not totally abandon the family of Sir William Cook, to whose lady he was near by blood, and dear to them both, upon the account of his pious and profitable labours amongst them. Therefore in the vacation times, being disengaged from his attendance at the inns of court, he resided in that family, exercising his ministry, either in their chapel, or in the parish church, as occasion offered itself; and this he did with an apostolical mind, not for filthy lucre, but freely; making the gospel a burden only to the dispenser of it; yet such was the care and piety of that religious pair, that they also would not serve God with that that cost them nothing; for afterwards, in consideration of those his pains freely taken amongst them, they settled upon Mr Gataker an annuity of 20 l. per annum, which also he received for some few years; but afterwards he saw reason to remit it to the heir of that family, forbearing to make use of his right he had to it, and forbidding his executor to demand any arrears of that annuity.

This

This is mentioned the rather to shew the generous temper of this holy man of God, who aimed at the spiritual good of others, more than at his own temporal advantages; and how infinitely he was removed from the sordid acquisition of gain, or the prostitution of his sacred function unto secular designs, which may stop the mouth of malice, and the impudent clamours of some, whose consciences being either galled or cauterized, spared not to traduce him for covetousness; but his own pen wrote the best apology, as indeed, according to that of Nazianzen, they that will give him a just character, have need of his eloquence.

Whilst he attended on that flock at Lincoln's-Inn, Sir William Sidley, a learned Mecœnas, and pious patron of the church, proffered him a fair benefice; and when Mr Gataker declined the burden of a pastoral charge, and pleaded an unwillingness to be removed from those worthy gentlemen, of whose favour he had such good experience; he endeavoured to persuade him that by taking an assistant, all those inconveniencies would be salved, and so he needed not to desert that society, which in term-time only required his labours and attendance: but Mr Gataker, who paised the burden into the balance of the sanctuary, always judged one cure of souls to be sufficient for one man, and therefore ventured the unkind resentment of the noble gentleman upon his refusal, rather than the multiplying of preferments to himself.

After ten years labours, profitably employed at Lincoln's Inn, (not only to the great benefit of the then living servants of God, but also for the behoof of posterity, especially by that his learned tractate of lots, there and then conceived and formed, wherein what satisfaction is given to conscience in many cases, let the judicious acknowlege.) Mr Gataker thence removed to undertake the rectory of Rotherhithe in Surry, of the grounds, motives, and manner whereof he himself hath largely given account to the world in his Apologetic against Lilly, p. 44. 48. of which this is the sum;

The rectory of Redrith in Surry, as it is commonly called, being void, and one of an infamous life labouring hard to succeed in it; in order to which, before the former incumbent's death, he had set on foot a transaction with the mother of certain orphans, in whose hands the patronage was supposed to rest; some of the religious inhabitants valuing the means of grace above all their other outward enjoyments, casts their eyes and thoughts upon Mr Gataker, to gain whom, to their own entreaties they added the mediation of his good friend Mr Richard Stock, who, when he had by many reasons remonstrated unto him, that God did give him a clear call to that place, whose honour and ordinances might suffer prejudice by the intrusion of an unworthy man, if he should refuse the call, he at last suffered himself to be persuaded and prevailed with to undertake the charge; which being represented to Sir Henry Hobart, the king's attorney general, by Mr Randolph Crew, afterwards lord chief justice, Sir Henry, that before favoured other pretensions, to gratify some tenants of his in that parish, yet now did readily embrace the motion concerning the settling of Mr Gataker there, according to his own contentment; and withal wrote a letter to the bishop, for the removal of all obstructions that lay in the way, or that might hinder his acceptance of the presentation of Mr Gataker, which, being signed with all the hands of the three brethren, who had right to that advocation, was tendered on his behalf.

The report of this his removal was no welcome news to many of that honourable society, who would fain have retained him, and some of them offered an enlargement of his maintenance, for an argument to keep him, and others of them represented the consistence of both employments by the help of an assistant; but he that made not his ministry a mere trade of living here, as Gregory Nazianzene complained that some did in his time, and too many do in our times, would not multiply his burdens, when he deemed himself unfit for the least, and would not suffer himself to be wrought to any other resolution.

Therefore in the year 1611, commending his former charge to the grace of God, he betook himself to the sole attendance of that flock, of which now the Holy Ghost had made him the overseer; and his industry in the discharge of his duty there was both constant and great, notwithstanding that he was almost perpetually troubled with the head ach, wherewith God had exercised him from his very youth, and for which he had only this poor comfort from his physician, Dr Goulston, his singular good friend, with whom he continued his studies upon Galen, and to whom he contributed his assistance for the edition of some parts of Galen, who often told him, that the incurable disease of age would be the only remedy of his distemper, because together with the abatement of natural heat, his indisposition would grow less vigorous and violent.

To the work of his ministry in public upon the Sabbaths, he added a catechetical weekly lecture on Fridays, in the evening, which was designed by him to lay the foundation of saving knowlege in the hearts of children, of whom a certain number, every lecture day, did give an account of their knowlege, by set answers, to questions delivered out to them aforehand for their instruction. This course of holding a form of sound words, agreeable to the doctrine of the gospel consigned in holy writ, of what importance it is, we may gather from that ignorance, and those errors which have invaded the church in these our times; which mischiefs can hardly be imputed to any thing so much as to the neglect of that useful duty of catechising. But this exercise was performed by him with such an accurate and methodical explication of the whole body of divinity, that Christians of riper years, and of long standing in Christ's school, did resort to be partakers of those discourses, wherein their well-exercised senses did find not only milk fit for babes, but also solid meat, suitable to grown men in Christ.

This course he continued till he had compleated a perfect summary of divinity, and gave it over when he saw that the least part of his auditory consisted of those for whose sakes he principally intended this work; his parishioners being grown at last to a neglect of his free labours in that kind.

Mr Gataker's constant retirement in his study caused him to make choice of an help meet for him, that might oversee his family, which was a necessary act of prudence; and therefore not long before he left Lincoln's-Inn, he married the widow of Mr William Cupp, to whose two daughters he was so providentially kind in their education, that he disposed of them in marriage to two divines of note in the church, and continued such a fatherly love to them and theirs, that the world mistook them for his own children. That wife died of child-bed of a son that did bear the father's name, who after that he had seen the most remote parts of the world wherewith we keep commerce, returned home to his father, and died in peace.

The same motive still being in force, he, after a decent interval of widowhood, chose for himself the daughter of a rev. minister, Mr Charles Pinner, who was brought up in the worthy and religious family of Mr Ellis Crisp, brother to Mrs Pinner; and it pleased God to give him a son by her, whom in process of time he dedicated unto God in the work of the ministry, but immediately to take away the mother, so that the mother's funeral and the child's baptism were celebrated together. Thus our wise and gracious Father tempers the cup for his children, lest they should surfeit upon earthly enjoyments, as they might easily do, if they were unmixed with occasions of sorrow.

Then did Mr Gataker remain for many years in a disconsolate condition, till at last he adventured and married a gentlewoman of a very considerable family, being sister to Sir George and Sir John Farwells, and of a good esteem for knowlege and piety. By her he had three children, whereof a son and a daughter were carried to the ground before their mother, but the third yet lives to walk by the light of her father's life and doctrine. This his third wife being of a contemplative mind, fell into a consumption, which so wasted her body, that her soul took its flight from thence to heaven.

Last of all, he took to wife a citizen's widow, whose comfortable conversation he enjoyed for the space of twenty-four years, but without any issue by her. His love to her was one motive that induced him to remove out of his parsonage house into another habitation of his own revenue: for ſuppoſing that ſhe might ſurvive him, he would make a convenient proviſion for her, that ſhe might not be ſubject to the courteſy of another for her removal; and that affection extended itſelf in his great liberality to many of her kindred, that were in need of help and ſupport from him, and that both in her lifetime, and ſince her deceaſe.

He ſurvived her within a few days of two years; and becauſe he numbered his days with wiſdom, and thereupon preſumed that the time was approaching wherein his ſoul ſhould be married to the Lamb, he would not endure to liſten to the motion of ſome, who would have adviſed him to a new entanglement in the world.

Having thus related his ſeveral marriages in a continued narrative, let us now ſtep back to take notice of ſome paſſages in time that went before the laſt of them.

In the year 1620, having a juſtifiable curioſity to ſee our neighbour churches in the United Provinces, and ſomething of the Spaniſh provinces in the Netherlands, he took advantage of the truce between the king of Spain and the Hollanders for a free paſſage between both countries. Thereupon, with his entire friend captain Joſhua Downing, and an old acquaintance, Mr Roger Hughs, (his Mnaſon) whoſe houſe he frequented at London, he took his voyage; taking alſo along with him a nephew of his, who was a young ſtudent, to be a partner with him in his travels.

His mother being then alive, had ſome fears, leſt he, being a known and noted adverſary to the popiſh cauſe, (which he had mortally wounded with many and ſharp weapons) ſhould ſuffer inconvenience from that generation of vipers, whoſe violent and virulent malice often prompts them to baſe courſes of ſecret revenge; but God was his guide, his ſun, and his ſhield, and ſo proſpered his voyage, that within a month's ſpace, (for they took boat July 13. and returned ſafe Auguſt 14.) he had viewed the moſt conſiderable places in the low countries.

In this his travel he gave better ſatisfaction to the Engliſh church in Middleburgh, where he gave way to the importunity of friends, who were deſirous to hear him, as well as glad to ſee him, than he did to the Engliſh papiſts in Flanders, with whom he had divers debates, wherein he drove ſome to a confuſion whom he could not draw to a converſion.

In the year 1642, a violent fit of the cholic aſſaulted him, and brought him to the very brink of the grave; but it pleaſed God to bring him back again, that he might do him further ſervice. For the year enſuing, before he had well recovered his ſtrength, he was called by the parliament to ſit as one of the aſſembly which was ſummoned to be conſulted with about religion; where his endeavours for promoting truth, and ſuppreſſing error, were ſincere and ſerious. And his ſtudy of peace with modeſty was in this remarkable, that when his reaſons delivered concerning Chriſt's obedience in order to our juſtification (wherein he differed from his brethren) could not obtain aſſent from the major part, which determined the queſtion contrary to his ſenſe, his great love of unity impoſed upon him ſilence, and wrought likewiſe upon him reſolutions not to publiſh his diſcourſes upon that ſubject, (from Rom. iii. 28) that ſo he might not publicly diſcover diſſent from the votes of that Rev. Aſſembly. I wiſh there had been the like prudence and modeſty in ſome others, who profeſs themſelves to differ but in circumſtantials.

During his attendance upon the work of that convention, the earl of Manchester being acquainted with his great worth and fitneſs, in regard of his learning of all kinds for academical tranſactions, offered him the maſterſhip of Trinity college in Cambridge, which is the greateſt preferment in that univerſity; for that noble lord being intruſted by the parliament with the reformation of that academy, was not paſſionately tranſported with a blind partiality of mens perſons, upon any ſiniſter reſpects, but deſired to prefer them whom he judged moſt worthy, and moſt hopeful to do Chriſt ſervice in that place; and therefore being perſuaded that Mr Gataker might (both in regard of his gravity and moſt ſcholaſtical abilities) be a choice ornament to that univerſity, and a fair copy for others to write by, he was very deſirous to place him there. But this good man, though often importuned by many friends to accept of the motion, according to his accuſtomed modeſty, with many thanks to the noble earl, refuſed to undertake that place, though of much honour, ſervice, and outward advantage; pleading, together with his unworthineſs, the weakneſs of his body by reaſon of age, and thereupon his inability to take journeys. And becauſe he looked upon himſelf as having one foot in the grave, he humbly deſired, that a younger man might be thought upon, more likely to be longer ſerviceable than himſelf, in a place of ſo great eminency and truſt.

And indeed the ſenſe of his own weakneſs was not a vain preſage of his decays; for not long after he was again ſuprized by the cholic, which before had ſhaken him, and made his crazy body leſs able to endure new conflicts, and theſe were ſo ſharp, that his recovery appeared deſperate, not only to his other friends, but even to the phyſicians alſo. Yet it pleaſed God, though he chaſtened him ſore, not to give him over unto death; for his ſtudies, which ſeemed to be his meat and drink in his health, were his phyſic alſo when he was ſick: for whilſt he was confined to his chamber, he prepared for the preſs his diſſertation De tetragrammato, and a grammatical diſcourſe De hinc olibus; and though this for the ſubject be not comparable to the other, yet it may be averred, that what he did by the by, and for the refreſhment of his languiſhing body and mind, was of more worth than the main work of many ſtudents.

After a long time that he had been priſoner in his own houſe, he, by God's aſſiſtance, recovered ſo much ſtrength as that he was able to go to God's houſe; and now he believed himſelf bound to employ his miniſterial gifts in God's ſervice, and therefore he again adventured into the pulpit, where he ſpent himſelf ſo far that he ſtrained a vein in his lungs, for which, being then about ſeventy three years old, he was let blood, by which, and other good means, God was pleaſed to carry him through that danger.

When he had recruited his veins and ſinews with freſh abilities, he being unwilling to fall under that woe, 1 Cor. ix. 16. for not preaching the goſpel, acted more according to the willingneſs of his ſpirit, than was proportionable to the weakneſs of his fleſh, whereupon he fell into a relapſe of ſpitting blood, for which he again permitted a vein to be opened, which laid on him a neceſſity of forbearing the pulpit; yet would he never forego the adminiſtration of the Sacraments, nor his uſual ſhort diſcourſe at funerals, ſuitable to the preſent occaſion, whenſoever he was ſolicited thereunto; though even theſe ſhort exerciſes of his lungs were painful to him, and waſted that oil, which, like a burning light, he ſpent for the enlightening of others.

The main part of his time was now ſpent in his ſtudy, and that was not deſigned as a meer entertainment of himſelf in quiet privacy, but for the public benefit of the church for the preſent, and for poſterity, as appears amongſt other works, by thoſe exquiſite annotations upon the propheſies of Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and the Lamentations; and we ſhould have gained more by his latter induſtry, if the malicious ſlanders of the enemies of the truth had not diverted his time and ſtudies to ſome neceſſary apologies.

Neither did he, when he was by the hand of God diſabled to preach, betray his flock into the hands of wolves, that would make a prey of precious ſouls, nor deſert it: for being troubled, leſt the foundation that he had laid (after the example of the wiſe maſter builder St Paul) ſhould either not be built upon, or deſtroyed, he retained the title of rector, with a charge beyond the revenue, (as it was ſometimes proved) till proviſion might be made of a faithful and orthodox miniſter, to whom he might comfortably devolve both the burden and the benefit.

To his care of feeding his flock in public, very agreeable was his diligence in inſtructing his family in private; for on Friday nights, (weekly) after ſupper, he uſed to expound that ſhort catechiſm which he had publiſhed for the uſe of his pariſhioners; in which courſe he ſo laid forth the nature and attributes of God; the ſtate of man, both entire and corrupt; the means of his fall and recovery; the nature of faith and repentance, with the doctrine of the ſacraments, that his parlour was one of the beſt ſchools for for a young ſtudent to learn divinity in; and indeed his houſe was a private ſeminary for divers young gentlemen of this nation, and far more for foreigners, who did reſort to and ſojourn with him, to receive from him direction, and advancement in their ſtudies; and many who afterwards were eminent in the churches, both here and abroad, were brought up under his eye, at leaſt, as Paul was at the feet of Gamaliel.

Perſons of note that had been his aſſiſtants, were Mr Young, Mr Goodal, Mr Symonds, of whom yet in theſe latter times of diviſion, Mr Gataker hath been heard to ſay, 'It was pity that our church had loſt him,' (intimating his turning aſide to ways of ſeparation.) Mr Grayle, and others who are yet living labourers in God's vineyard.

Of foreigners that ſojourned with him, and were as ambitious of being entertained by him, as if they had been admitted unto a univerſity, theſe were ſome, Mr Thylein who was afterwards a reverend paſtor of the Dutch church in London (whoſe ſon was brought by his mother but a fortnight before Mr Gataker's deceaſe, entreating the ſame good office in the behalf of him, which the father had with much comfort enjoyed.) Mr Peters, Mr Andrew Demetrius, Mr Hornbeck, Mr Rich, Mr Sword, Mr Wittefrangle, Mr Severinus Benzon, Mr George de Mey, Dr Treſchovious, &c.

The ſtrength of Mr Gataker's memory was extraordinary as may appear by this, that tho' he uſed no common place book, yet had he in readineſs whatſoever he had read, as is manifeſted by his manifold quotations in all his works.

His gifts for edification may be conjectured by his works which are extant, in which he hath ſhewed himſelf like the ingenious and induſtrious bee for his rare extraction of all manner of knowledge from almoſt all authors, and the ſolid digeſtion of it firſt, and then ſtoring it up for the public good. His polite literature was admired by the great lights of learning abroad, as the excellent Salmaſius, and others with whom he held correſpondence. And the exerciſe of it, with condeſcenſion to children, hath been enjoyed with wonder and pleaſure at his viſitation at Tunbridge ſchool with the right worſhipful company of Skinners, the worthy patrons thereof; and that which made all his knowlege both uſeful and grateful, was, that he was neither vain in oſtentation, nor moroſe, or illiberal in reſervation of it. But beyond all, he ſacrificed his talents to God, while he made Hagar ſerve Sarah, and contributed the Egyptian ſpoils, all his foreign learning towards the building of the tabernacle: for with a ſtrange felicity, he made his human literature (both his moral and critical ſtudies) to become ſubſervient to religion, and inſtrumental to the explication of heavenly truths.

His graces of ſanctification were very eminent in every condition, to all purpoſes, and towards all his relations. In the private courſe of his life, his piety, humility, and charity were very remarkable.

His piety appeared not only by his diligence in preaching but alſo by his own frequenting God's ordinances diſpenſed by others; in order whereunto he did once a week at leaſt repair to ſome lecture in London, ſo long as he had liberty to look beyond the bounds of his own pariſh: he manifeſted his piety by his ſtrict, careful, and conſcientious obſervation of the Lord's days, which he wholly conſecrated (except the ſeaſons of the repaſt) unto holy duties and employments; and beſide, he was free in his contributions upon divers occaſions to the maintaining of the Lord's houſe of prayer: and becauſe there is a connection between ſacred perſons and things, his love to godly and and faithful miniſters may be looked upon as an act of piety, as well as of charity.

Another evident inſtance of his zeal for God's glory, was his conſtant conſideration of the ſtate of God's churches abroad, with a diligent enquiry how it fared with them, and a tender ſenſe of their affliction, which begat his meditation on Amos vi. 9. entituled, Sorrow for Zion. As alſo his earneſt deſire of a reformation of things amiſs amongſt ourſelves, was doubtleſs acceptable unto God, tho' this ſinful nation is yet unworthy to have it accompliſhed. One ſpecial effect and property in his piety was that holineſs of life expreſſed in a conſtant tenor of good duties, with the abridgment of his liberty in things indifferent eſpecially of recreations (for he underſtood no recreations beſides ſtudy, and made the pleaſanter part of his ſtudy, the ſauce to the more ſevere) that he might give no ſcandal to the good, nor encouragement to the bad: alledging often thoſe two golden rules of St. Paul, 'All things are lawful, but all things are not convenient or expedient; and all things are lawful, but all things edify not, 1 Cor. ix. 6. and x. 23.

His humility appeared,

1. In that low eſteem he had of his own gifts, which yet all others that knew him admired: he was a true Moſes, that took not any notice of that ſhining luſtre of his own countenance. Like a fair ear of corn loaden with grain, he bended his head downwards: for he had nothing of the phariſaical temper, either to advance himſelf, or to vilify his brethren of meaner gifts.

2. In his freedom from ambition of outward advantages. For he declined not only large means in the country, but alſo both eccleſiaſtical dignity and courtly preferments. For he ſtudiouſly waved the counſel of ſome who had given notice of him to that hopeful prince Henry (whom God only ſhewed to this land, and then ſnatched him away to himſelf) and had it in their deſign to make way for his being admitted chaplain to his highneſs; and for the ſame reaſon he conſtantly declined public appearances, inſomuch as he could not, without much reluctancy, be drawn by thoſe who had moſt intereſt in him unto more ſolemn aſſemblies.

3. In his meek converſation with, and condeſenſion to the meaneſt Chriſtians: for he refuſed not familiarity to converſe with the pooreſt Chriſtian that repaired to him for counſel or ſatisfaction in their doubts.

His charity was large, tho' for the moſt part ſecret, both in giving and forgiving to poor perſons: for he would not permit it to blaze, only allowed it to ſhine when his example was requiſite to lighten and lead others to glorify God, and gratify men. In redemption of captives, relief of poor proteſtants, eſpecially of the miniſtry; to the repairs of public and common loſſes, and general calamities, and to the ſetting forward of any good work he was ſtrangely liberal, the fruit whereof the Lord returned into his own boſom, according to that promiſe, 'The liberal ſoul ſhall be made fat.' Yet did he not ſo exhauſt himſelf in his life, but that in his laſt will and teſtament he did alſo bequeath unto the poor of the pariſh of Redrith 50 l. To ten of his brethren in the miniſtry, whoſe wants and neceſſities, eſpecially if occaſioned by the iniquity of the times, he gave 50 l. i. e. to each of them 5. l. and to eight miniſter's widows 5 l. apiece, in all forty pound to them. Thus his good works both went before him, and followed him alſo unto heaven, whereby alſo he hath left behind him the perfume of a good name, for the imitation of them that ſurvive.

Juſtice is preſuppoſed unto charity: for God hates robbery for ſacrifice, Iſa. lxi. 8. And Mr Gataker was exactly juſt in giving every man his due, tho' very frequently he remitted his own right, ſo that he was according to the Hebrew phraſe, a juſt man, that is, a kind, equitable perſon, of a mild diſpoſition, no ſevere exacter of his own, and a free diſpenſer of God's gifts, ſo that his 'righteouſneſs endures for ever,' both to his honour upon earth, and to his happineſs in heaven.

In, and about his death, to which the courſe of his declining days led us, his patience and faith were very eminent; the latter attended with a deep ſenſe of his own ſins, which he acknowleged unto God, and to him only was that confeſſion needful: for as to men, his converſation was, as a biſhop's ought to be, irreproveable, 1 Tim. iii. 2.

The firſt ſtep to his deceaſe (for morbus eſt via ad mortem, ſickneſs is the rod way to death) was a fainting fit that ſurprized him on Friday night, July the 7th, or rather on Saturday morning, July the 8th. yet of this he made no great account (for he diſturbed not the reſt of a ſervant by calling for aſſiſtance) becauſe he had at ſundry times ſuch faintings, wherein he gave nature leave to work out her victory over thoſe vapours, or viſcous humours that oppreſſed him. Yet thus far he made uſe of it, that he compared his infirmity to that of Seneca, which according to his relation, the phyſicians of that age called meditati- tationem mortis, and wiſhed that it might prove to him a preparation to his diſſolution. The indiſpoſition, not ceaſing with the fit, diſcovered itſelf in a ſhort time to be a Tertian ague, which how gentle ſoever, yet falling upon a perſon of his age, and crazy temper, who had long ſupported a weak frame with a very regular courſe of diet) made his condition doubtful to his phyſician, who was one of learning and worth, that employed his beſt care and skill about the patient, whom he looked upon as a conſiderable perſon to the whole church.

July the 17. having publiſhed his will, and taken ſuch order as he thought fit for the ſettlement of his outward eſtate, he compoſed himſelf to God; his Tertian growing too ſtrong both for nature and art, reſolved itſelf into an almoſt continued fever, the extream heat whereof was very painful unto him; yet during theſe conflicts he ſhewed a ſweet calmneſs of mind, a heart weaned from the world, to which he had no affection, tho' his memory exactly ſerved him for ordering his charity even to the laſt; and in one word, he repreſented a ſoul wholly ſubmitting to God's good pleaſure.

He profeſſed more than once, that no outward thing troubled him ſo much, as the condition of that reverend miniſter, Mr Sainthill, who had but lately undertaken that charge at Redrith upon the uncertain title of Mr Gataker's life, which now failing ſo ſoon, beſides the expectation of his friends, that miniſter he foreſaw was like to be unſettled, and thereby to ſuffer ſome inconvenience.

Tho' friends and phyſicians gave him encouraging words at their viſits, yet he, being ſenſible of his inward decays, could not be flattered into vain hopes of long continuance here, earneſtly contending that he was not to expect miracles. His expectation of God's diſmiſſing of him hence, was ſo fixed, that being conſulted whether he would appoint any one perſon to perform the laſt office for him? He not ſtartled at the queſtion, appointed that Mr Aſh ſhould be entreated to do that work, becauſe he had done the ſame at his laſt wife's funeral; and one opportunity caſually offered itſelf to ſet forward that deſign. For July 18. Mr Aſh, out of his kind reſpect to Mr Gataker ſent him two funeral ſermons preached by him, one at Mr Whitaker's, the other at the interment of Dr Spurſtow's only child. This gave occaſion to Mr Gataker, in the return for that favour, to requeſt the laſt that he could be capable of.

Upon the receipt of a letter to that purpoſe, Mr Aſh on the Saturday following, viſited his dear and dying friend, who then told him, that he found him conflicting with his laſt adverſary; and that tho' he knew the ſting was pulled out, yet nature would ſtruggle. Theſe, and other of his expreſſions, Mr Aſh preſently wrote down, and related them at the end of his ſermon.

That day in the afternoon being July 22. he called for ſome papers of Mr Baxters which were ſent to him by the author, with a deſire of his judgment concerning them. He wiſhed ſome ſhort notes (for the peruſal of them had been his laſt work) to be read over to him, in which he altered ſomething: and having dictated a letter to that his learned and reverend friend, he appointed that that, with the animadverſions incloſed, ſhould be ſent to him. So vigorous was his mind in a body drooping, and dropping into the duſt.

He had now given over the uſe of phyſic, as to any prolongation of his life: for he ſaid that he would ſtruggle no more, becauſe he found that what was preſcribed for the refreſhing of nature did rather oppreſs it, and therefore he reſolved to wait the Lord's pleaſure.

An antient ſervant that waited on him, deſiring leave to rectify the bed-cloathes, and ſaying withal, Sir, your head doth not ly right; he anſwered, 'It will ly right in my coffin.'

July 62. at one o'clock in the morning, death began to ſeize on his left foot, from which the ſpirits retiring, he felt the deadneſs of that part, and a very ſharp pain in the part of the leg adjoining to it; hereupon he called for his ſon, and told him, He feared he ſhould have a difficult death. He then commanded two ſurgeons to be ſent for, to look upon his leg, whom he required to tell him, whether or no his foot were any way diſcoloured. It ſeems he had conceived ſome fear of a gangrene, but being ſatisfied by them that there could not be any ground for ſuch an apprehenſion, he reſted with patience.

In the evening of that day, being viſited by Mr Sainthill, and lying in great anguiſh, by reaſon of the violence of his heat, he prayed for pity and patience; ſupport here, and a comfortable iſſue.

July 26. Early in the morning, being full of pain, gaſping and panting, he cried out, 'How long, Lord? how long? come ſpeedily.'

But though death had made an encroachment on his outward periſhing part, yet his inward man felt no decay; for, with a full uſe of reaſon, he that morning ordered the continuance of a weekly relief to certain poor perſons, as alſo of ſome ſmall monthly penſions to ſome widows for a ſeaſon: he alſo cauſed his phyſician to be conſulted with, about taking ſomething that might procure reſt, and was erected to a more cheerful diſpoſition: he alſo enquired after news, and diſcourſed freely, yet confeſſed himſelf to be in pain.

About three o'clock that afternoon, feeling ſome great change, after the putting forth of nature, he called his ſiſter, ſon, and daughter, to receive his laſt charge; and when they were come, he thus ſpake unto them, 'My heart fails, and my ſtrength fails; but God is my fortreſs, and the ſtrong rock of my ſalvation. Into thy hands there ore I commend my ſoul, for thou haſt redeemed me, O God of truth.' Then turning his diſcourſe to his ſon, he ſaid, 'Son, you have a great charge, look to it: inſtruct your wife and family in the fear of God, and diſcharge your miniſtry conſcientiouſly.' To his ſiſter, (a gentlewoman two years older than himſelf) he ſaid, 'Siſter, I thought you might have gone before me, but God calls for me firſt; I hope we ſhall meet in heaven; I pray God bleſs you.'

His daughter he admoniſhed 'to mind the world leſs, and God more; for that all things without piety, and the true fear of God, are nothing worth.'

He adviſed alſo that his ſon Draper (being a man of means) ſhould entertain ſome godly miniſter into his houſe, to teach his children, and inſtruct his family. He exhorted them all to love and concord, which, he ſaid, he hoped the rather, becauſe he had clearly ſettled his eſtate, ſo as to prevent differences.

He enlarged himſelf on each of theſe a little, wiſhing them all to lay to heart the words of a dying man. After this, he deſired that all ſhould withdraw, and leave him to his reſt, which he hoped was at hand; but all his conflicts were not yet accompliſhed.

July the 27th, His voice began to be leſs intelligible, the putrid preternatural heat having furred up his mouth, as is uſual in fevers; yet both his underſtanding and ſenſes were very quick and active: about ſix of the clock in the evening, he called for his ſon to recommend his ſoul unto God by prayer, and endeavoured to expreſs what he deſired, but could not do it ſo clearly as to be well underſtood; yet by his geſtures he gave aſſurance that he underſtood perfectly, and concurred fervently with the devotions uſed on his behalf. Within an hour after, nature being quite ſpent, he gave up the Ghoſt, and was tranſlated into that reſt which he ſo often and earneſtly had deſired to find in another world, becauſe he could obtain none in this.

Thus, after forty years inſpection of this pious and diligent paſtor of Redrith, he left his flock, returning to the 'great and chief ſhepherd of our ſouls,' from his gracious hands to receive an 'incorruptible crown of glory,' having almoſt completed fourſcore years.

For his perſon, the expreſt whereof, though he was often importuned by his dear friends, he would never allow to be taken either by pencil or ſculpture. He was of a middle ſtature, of a thin body, and of a lively countenance, of a freſh complexion, and looked young when he came to preach at Lincoln's-Inn, and yet was grey headed, which made him to be thought elder than he was, becauſe he had long appeared ancient in the eyes of the world; of a choicely temperate diet; of a free and cheerful converſation, addicted much to ſtudy, yet not ſecluding himſelf from fit company. He was of a quick apprehenſion, ſharp reaſon, ſolid judgment, vaſt memory, which which, through God's mercy, continued fresh to the last of his days. He was Helluo librorum, one that did not vainly encrease his Library for ostentation, but those books for use, which also he made of them so happily, that he had conquered a strong portion of learning, which he made to serve him upon all occasions. He was not so great a treasurer, as a free dispenser of those riches of the mind, which he did communicate readily, expeditely and clearly. He was an ornament to the university, and of that society designed for the study of the law; a light of the church, the salt of the place where he abode; a loving husband; a discreet parent; a faithful friend; a kind neighbour; a stout champion for the truth, yet a lover of peace, preserving the unity of charity even where there was a difference of judgment; an adversary to novel fancies, as well as to antiquated superstitions in religion; of a Christian magnanimity in despising the world, and therefore resolute, through bad report as well as good, to maintain a clear conscience. In brief he was a faithful shepherd, and a fit mirrour for pastors, as well as an exact pattern for people; who having almost completed eighty years departed full of days; but being dead, yet speaks in his living monuments of sound learning.

A pious EPIGRAM of Mr GATAKER, being a just Expression of the intimate Frame of the Soul: which was made by him not long before his Death.

I thirst for thirstiness, I weep for tears;
Well pleas'd I am, to be displeased thus:
The only thing I fear is want of fears;
Suspecting I am not suspicious.
I cannot chuse but live, because I die;
And, when I am not dead, how glad am I!

Yet, when I am thus glad for sense of pain,
And careful am lest I should careless be;
Then do I grieve for being glad again,
And fear lest carelessness take care from me.
Amidst these restless thoughts this rest I find,
For those that rest not here, there's rest behind.

Many EPITAPHS were made for him after his Death: amongst which I shall make choice only of one or two.

On the Death of that reverend and eminently learned Divine, Mr THOMAS GATAKER.

Who's this that lyes thus breathless? Doleful sight!
The worthy Gataker; that beauteous light
Hath left our Hemisphere. Ah! he is gone,
Who was the glory deem'd of Helicon.
The muses joy is fled; a magazine
Of learning's here blown up. The sisters nine,
Could they but rate their loss (such hath it been)
With tears, they'd make an other Hippocrene.
Poor house of clay? Oh, how it empty lyes!
The furniture's remov'd to Paradise.
Angels have hence conveigh'd the jewel-mind;
Nought but the cabinet is left behind.
Adieu young Nestor; seldom have we seen
A head so gray, and parts so fresh and green.
His speech to deck, such flowers he could bring,
In age's Winter, one would swear 'twere Spring:
But now for Florid language, we may find
Dumb Rhetoric with silence cries her mind.
Oh! mind your latter ends; death's sometimes late;
But, who could ere his life perpetuate?
We thought his Preaching done, but here we have One Sermon more, and for his text, The grave.
Be faithful, you, who Sion's walls do keep,
Watch-men themselves must once be laid to sleep

The Life of Mr JEREMY WHITAKER, who died Anno Chriſti 1654.

JEREMY WHITAKER was born at Wakefield in Yorkſhire, in the year 1599, in which place alſo he was trained up in the grammar ſchool; and it ſeems that the Lord betimes did draw forth his love towards himſelf; for even whilſt he was a ſchool boy, his affections did flow out towards thoſe who were moſt religiouſly diſpoſed, in whoſe company he uſed frequently to go eight or ten miles to hear a wakening ſoul ſermon; he uſed alſo to join with them in prayers, and other holy exerciſes and duties; and being able to take ſermon notes, both underſtandingly and largely, he was very helpful to thoſe private Chriſtians, in repeating what they publicly heard, being from his child-hood full of affections, in whatſoever buſineſs he undertook. Thus this plant of God's own ſetting, did both bloſſom, and put forth quickly, which Providence did afterwards make a very fruitful tree.

Whilſt he was at the grammar-ſchool, though his father endeavoured often, and earneſtly, to divert his thoughts from the office of the miniſtry, yet was he unmoveable in his deſires to be a miniſter, and he never afterwards repented of this his choice; but would all his life long, upon all occaſions, magnify that his office, inſomuch as he hath often been heard to utter this ſpeech, 'I had much rather be a preacher of the goſpel than an emperor.' And when a motion was once made to him to be the head of a college in the univerſity, he readily returned this anſwer, 'My heart doth more deſire to be a conſtant preacher, than to be the maſter of any college in the world.'

When he was ſixteen years old, being well grounded at the grammar ſchool, he was ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, and admitted a ſizar in Sidney-Suſſex college, where he ſoon diſcovered, and was taken notice of, and much valued for his pregnant parts and ſcholarſhip.

At twenty years of age, he commenced batchelor of arts, and a while after he was ſent to Okeham, the chiefeſt town in Rutlandſhire, there to teach the free ſchool.

At that time there was one Mr William Peachy, the miniſter at Okeham, a godly man, and a painful preacher of the goſpel, and eminent for his ſkill in the ſacred languages, who dearly loved, and highly valued our Mr Whitaker from his firſt acquaintance with him; which he manifeſted by proffering to him his daughter in marriage, as Mr Whitaker hath ſince told ſome of his friends; he was the rather inclined to accept of the motion, becauſe ſhe was the daughter of a pious, painful, and learned miniſter of the goſpel; and occaſionally hath told his friends, that he was the better pleaſed with his choice, becauſe of that relation.

About four years after his coming to Okeham he married Chephzibah, the daughter of the ſaid Mr Peachy, by whom God gave him four ſons, and three daughters. All his ſons he deſigned for the miniſtry, but it pleaſed God in his life time, to take one of them away whilſt he was a ſtudent in Cambridge; the other three ſurvived, and he lived to ſee two of them ordained, and ſet apart for the work of the miniſtry; the third he appointed to be educate for the ſame work.

Having ſtayed about ſeven years at Okeham, he was removed to a paſtoral charge at Stretton in the ſame county, where he continued about the ſpace of thirteen years.

Whilſt he continued ſchool maſter at Okeham, he undertook and preached a weekly lecture there, beſides many ſermons which he preached occaſionally in neighbouring congregations: and during his abode in Stretton, beſides his paſtoral employment, wherein he preached twice every Lord's day, he alſo conſtantly preached his weekly lecture at Okeham, and was a principal prop to hold up ſome other lectures in the neighbourhood. His manner alſo was to ſet apart every holy-day (if there were but one in the week) as a day faſting God in reference to the neceſſities of the times, and no man was more ſtrict, and frequent in aſſiſting in days of humiliation in private, both in Rutlandſhire, and in the adjacent counties whenſoever he was called and invited thereunto.

Such was his love to Chriſt, that his public employments (though many and great) did not take him off from attending his family duties, nor from more private exerciſes of communion with God: his ordinary courſe in his family was together with prayers, to expound ſome part of the holy Scriptures, and that twice every day, beſides other parts of Scripture which he daily read in ſecret, ſo that uſually he read all the epiſtles in the Greek Teſtament twice every fortnight; yea, when by reaſon of extremity of pain, and weakneſs, he could not read himſelf, he herein employed others for his help. Hence it came to paſs that he was a man mighty in the Scriptures, like unto Apollos. Acts xviii. 24. as was obſerved by all that converſed with him, or that heard him preach or pray, and this courſe he earneſtly commended to the practice of his dearly beloved eldeſt ſon, as an excellent means to make him both a ready and a profitable preacher.

Whilſt he lived in Rutlandſhire, came forth the book allowing ſports on the Sabbath, which he refuſed to read tho' it was with commands and threatning preſſed upon him. And afterwards when he was called to give in his anſwer about a contribution among miniſters to maintain the war againſt the Scots, he openly told the biſhop of his chancellor, that his conſcience would not permit him to do it. This his anſwer expoſed him to the hazard of loſing both his living and miniſtry, as the times then were; whereupon one of his neighbours, through miſguided love, (compaſſionating him and his family) payed the money required, and ſubſcribed Mr Whitaker's name without his knowledge. This was long concealed from him; but when he came to the knowledge of it, he expreſſed his diſlike with many complaints, and much grief of heart.

As he had early, ſo he had conſtant vigorous workings of heart towards the calling and work of the miniſtry, and that upon this ground, becauſe he always conceived, that therein a chriſtian might enjoy moſt fellowſhip with Chriſt, and have opportunities of doing him the beſt ſervice, and he often conſidered Chriſt's ſpeech to Peter, 'If thou loveſt me, feed my ſheep; feed my lambs, John xxi. 15, 17.

He was never ſo well pleaſed with any employments when he was about the works of the miniſtry: in the pulpit he was (as it were) in his own eſteem, like a fiſh in the water, or a bird in the air. Tho' many times he went thither halting and full of pain, yet did he not manifeſt any ſenſe of diſtemper whilſt he was in the pulpit.

When an aſſembly of divines was to be choſen to conſult and adviſe the parliament about eccleſiaſtical affairs, he was, for his eminent piety and learning, nominated for one, and how uſeful and advantageous he was to their affairs, is well known to all that were members of that aſſembly; and when providence had thus brought him to London, he was (as Paul 2 Cor. xi. 23.) 'in labours more abundant,' than many, yea, than moſt others.

Not long after his coming to London, he was called and choſen to the paſtoral charge of Mary Magdalen Bermondſey in Southwark, about which he conſulted with many godly and judicious miniſters, and with their conſent and approbation accepted of it, after which, for the moſt part, his taſk was to preach conſtantly four ſermons every week, two in his own charge, one at Weſtminſter, and one at Chriſt's Church London; and after he had laid down his Chriſt-Church lecture, at the importunity of the inhabitants, he took up one at Stepney, beſides his preaching two lectures quarterly at Michael's Cornhill. Add to theſe his preaching monthly at the morning exerciſes, or elſe he aſſiſted on the faſt days in the concluſion of thoſe exerciſes; beſides his many occaſional ſermons, as for preparation to the ſacrament in his own church, and at funerals both at home and abroad; yea, it is truly reported of him, that he would never deny any request for preaching and praying, if God gave him bodily ability or other unavoidable occaſions did not neceſſarily hinder him.

Many week days he preached twice, even then when he attended the work of the aſſembly of divines, to wit, the morning exerciſe, either at Weſtminſter, or elſe where, and upon ſome other occaſion in the afternoon of the ſame day. This may mind us of the commendation which St. Paul

Paul gave of Epaphroditus, Phil ii. 30. 'For the work of the Lord he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life. So it is well known to multitudes, that this might fitly be applied to painful Mr Whitaker; yea many conceived that his painful diſeaſes, which haſtened his removal from us, were occaſioned, and encreaſed by his many conſtant and indefatigable labours in this kind.

And tho' he preached ſo often, yet were not his ſermons jejune, wordy, empty ſermons: but always full of ſcripture ſtrength, ſavoury, and affectionate, as his auditors can well teſtify.

Neither is this to be wondered at, if we conſider that he was an univerſal ſcholar, both in the arts and original languages: by much ſtudy he had digeſted the whole body of divinity; he was well acquainted both with the fathers and ſchool men: an acute and ſolid diſputant, exactly verſed in caſes of conſcience, and ſecond unto none in his acquaintance with the ſacred Scriptures.

Since our times of woful deſertion and apoſtacy, both from goſpel truths and practices, he would undauntedly both in private conferences, and in his public miniſtry expreſs his diſlike, yea his deteſtation thereof, to the ſins of them, how great ſoever, who too much favoured herſies, errors, and ranting courſes, tho' he knew that thereby he did run the hazard of procuring many frowns to himſelf.

He refuſed to ſign and ſubſcribe the late engagement tho' thereby he was in danger of loſing his lecture at Weſtminſter; and if his ſermons preached there upon Eph. ii. 1, 2. concerning mens 'walking according to the courſe of this world, &c. Fulfilling the luſts of the fleſh,' &c. could be collected, and publiſhed, it would thereby appear that Mr Whitaker, out of his zeal for God's glory, and love to his Lord Chriſt, was of an undaunted courage, full of Chriſtian magnanimity. One further teſtimony whereof we have in the following ſtory.

Since theſe ſtormy times began, wherein the liberty and livelihood of miniſters hath been ſo much maligned and ſtruck at, as he was riding with one of his intimate friends by Tiburn (which he had not ſeen nor obſerved before) he aſked what that was? and being anſwered, that it was Tiburn, where ſo many malefactors had loſt their lives; he ſtopped his horſe, and uttered theſe words with much affection, 'Oh what a ſhame is it that ſo many thouſands ſhould die for the ſatisfaction of their luſts, and ſo few be found willing to lay down their lives for Chriſt! why ſhould not we in a good cauſe, and upon a good call, be ready to be hanged for Jeſus Chriſt? It would be an everlaſting honour, and it is a thouſand times better to die for Chriſt, to be hanged or to be burnt for Chriſt, than to die in our beds'.

He did often, and zealouſly defend the office of a goſpel-miniſtry both in public and in private, and that eſpecially amongſt thoſe perſons, and in thoſe places, where, as he conceived, there was moſt need. In one of his morning lectures at Weſtminſter, this paſſage came from him with much affection, 'Though, ſaid he, I have read, and heard of of ſome good men, who unadviſedly in their paſſion, have perſecuted the perſons of ſome godly miniſters, as Aſa was angry with the prophet, and caſt him into priſon, yet I never knew, I never read, nor heard of any godly perſon who durſt oppoſe the office and calling of the miniſtry' And, whereas at the end of his ſermon, a ſoldier expreſſing himſelf to be diſſatisfied with what he had ſpoken, came to him in private, and aſked him, whether he meant this of the miniſtry of England as now conſtituted? he returned him this anſwer, 'Altho' I will not juſtify the calling of every individual miniſter in the Church of England, as you dare not juſtify the ſainting of every member in your Independent congregation, yet I will be ready, when, and where you pleaſe, to maintain the office and calling of England's miniſtry at this day.'

And that he continued unmoved and unchanged in his judgment, and eſteem of the miniſterial calling to the laſt, may be manifeſted by this paſſage in his laſt will and teſtament, which is here ſet down in his own words, and written with his own hand, 'For my ſon Jeremiah, my deſire is, that he be bred a ſcholar, and that the Lord will ſpiritually incline his heart, freely to give up himſelf to the Lord, to ſerve him in the work of the miniſtry, which calling and employment, though now deſpiſed, I do eſteem above all others in the world, and do commend it to all mine, that if the Lord bleſs them with ſons, they would commend this calling to their poſterity.'

And truly this deſerves ſeriouſly to be conſidered, whether there be not herein much to credit and encourage the miniſtry of the goſpel, that a learned man, and ſo eminent for piety, who alſo had thoroughly ſtudied the controverſy of the times, and had heard and read what could be ſaid againſt the miniſtry, ſhould yet upon his death-bed give ſuch a teſtimony unto it, when he daily expected to make up his account before God, and alſo give ſuch great encouragement to his poſterity, to addict themſelves to this calling now, even now, when ſuch diſgrace is caſt upon it, and when the miniſters ſettled maintainance is threatened to be taken from them: and may not thoſe men, who knew Mr Whitaker's worth, be hereby awed and moved to take heed how they oppoſe or ſlight that calling of men, whom he, living and dying, judged to be ſo highly honoured of God himſelf?

To this alſo add, that it was an ordained miniſtry which he thus valued; which appears by theſe two lively teſtimonies: 1. In that he joined with the Claſſis, whereof he was a member in ordaining of miniſters. 2. In that he had an hand in the book not long ſince publiſhed by the province of London, in the defence of ſuch a miniſtry, not only by his aſſent to it, but alſo by his aſſiſtance in drawing it up.

As Mr Whitaker loved God dearly ſo God loved him, which he manifeſted by thoſe graces wherewithal he enriched him; and truly love-tokens are real meſſengers of his love that ſendeth them: and what ſurer ſigns can we have of God's love, than when he beſtows upon us the graces of his Holy Spirit? Now of theſe the Lord had given him a more than ordinary meaſure. And beſides what hath been ſaid before, there were five graces more, which were very orient and ſhining in his crown.

1. His tenderneſs of heart: Who ever knew a man of a more melting frame of heart before God, whether in confeſſions, petitions, or thankſgivings? Is there any one living that can ſay, that I have at ſometimes joined with him in prayer, and ſhed no tears? How did his own ſinfulneſs (though it was no more than the ordinary imperfections of the faireſt ſaint upon earth), the evils of the times, and the teſtimonies of God's diſpleaſure breaking out upon us, break his heart into pieces? We may truly believe, that for the ſpace of many years, he did never come off from the ſerious conſideration of theſe things with dry eyes; and how many thouſands be there of God's children, that would account it a ſign of much love from Chriſt, if they could find ſuch thawings in their frozen breaſts?

2. His meekneſs of ſpirit, with which precious jewel he was richly adorned: Who ever ſaw him tranſported by paſſion, on a fire through fooliſh anger, or diſguiſed by content? Though his zeal would wax hot, and burn in him, for God and his glory; yet he was a man of a cool ſpirit, and meek like Moſes, in all his own concernments; and this he hath often manifeſted in remarkable manner, when diſputing with men of diſſenting principles and opinions; yet his ſpirit was ſo even, that their unhandſome provocations could not diſcompoſe him, and drive him into paſſion.

3. For his patience, he may well be called a ſecond Job. Many who ſaw him under thoſe racking pains in his laſt ſickneſs, ſo frequently reiterated, and ſo long continued, were confident that God did put him, and keep him in his furnace, to be a pattern of patience unto poſterity. It is confeſſed, that he did roar many times till his throat was dry; but whoever heard him ſpeak one word of murmuring or diſcontent, becauſe of God's afflicting providence? He himſelf would indeed, ſometimes, through tenderneſs of conſcience, charge himſelf of impatiency, becauſe he made a noiſe in his extremity; but that expreſſed only nature's ſenſibleneſs, not ſinful forwardneſs; and when (accuſing himſelf cauſelеſſly) he was minded of Chriſt's roarings, yet free from all ſin, he would be ſilent.

I confeſs indeed, that in his deſires to be diſſolved, he would take up Job's complaint, 'Wherefore is light given to him that is in miſery, and life unto the bitter in ſoul? which long for death, and it cometh not, and dig for it more than for hid treaſure,' &c. 'For my ſighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like waters,' Job iii. 20—24. But he always concluded with ſubmiſſion to the good pleaſure of God.

When he had been aſked how he did? this was frequently his anſwer, 'The buſh always burning, but not conſumed; and though my pains be above the ſtrength of nature, yet they are not above the ſupport of grace.'

4. The Lord was pleaſed to vouchſafe him ſuch a meaſure of the Spirit of grace and ſupplications, that his ſoul was never out of tune for that ſervice. Moſt of his words when he was under torment, were holy complaints and prayers to God. It will not be impertinent or unprofitable if I here ſet down ſome of them.

'O my God, help! Father of mercies, pity! Do not contend for ever! conſider my frame, that I am but duſt! My God, that hath made heaven and earth, help me! Oh, give me patience, and inflict what thou wilt! If my patience was more, my pain would be leſs. Dear Saviour, where are thy bowels? why doſt thou make me an aſtoniſhment to myſelf and others? why doſt thou cover thyſelf with a thick cloud, that our prayers cannot paſs? Bleſſed is the man that endureth temptation. Lord this is a ſad temptation; ſtand by me, and ſay, It is enough. Am I not thy ſervant? conſider, Lord, that I am thy ſervant. O theſe bitter waters of Marah! Lord, drop ſweet comfort into theſe bitter waters of Marah. O the blood of ſprinkling: Lord, the blood of ſprinkling! Lord! that blood, which extinguiſheth the fire of thine anger, O that it might allay my burning pains! I am in a fiery furnace; Lord, be with me as thou waſt with the three children, and bring me out refined from ſin. When I have ſailed through the ocean of theſe pains, and look back, I ſee that none of them can be wanting. I fly unto thee, O God, hide me under the ſhadow of thy wings till theſe terrible ſtorms be overpaſt.

5. God added humility as a crown to all his other graces, which yet ſhone bright in the eyes of all that were acquainted with him. Indeed he was cloathed with humility: and hence it was that he could converſe ſo familiarly with the pooreſt Chriſtians, and with them who were of the loweſt parts for knowlege, even with babes in Chriſt. This his ordinary expreſſion of himſelf before God, did clearly demonſtrate his great humility, 'Poor worm! ſinful wretch! O pardon my tranſgreſſions, for they are very great.'

Hereupon he would weep much, when he was told how much he was prayed for, wondering at God's goodneſs, that ſo ſinful a wretch, and worthleſs a creature, ſhould have ſo much intereſt in the hearts and prayers of the people of God. And his language in his will ſpeaks how little he was in his own eyes; the words are theſe, 'I deſire that at my funeral there may be no pomp; but that ſo poor a worthleſs wretch may be privately laid in the ground.'

And as his graces were many, ſo were his comforts many and great, which God vouchſafed as ſingular manifeſtations of his love to this his dear ſervant and child. O what kiſſes of Chriſt's mouth, and what embraces from the arms of his love, were beſtowed upon this ſaint of the Moſt High.

He enjoyed all along, in his afflicted condition, an uninterrupted aſſurance of God's fatherly love in Chriſt. In his addreſſes unto God he conſtantly claimed propriety in God, calling him, My God, and My Father.

His inward peace and joy were the ſupport of his heart under all his grievous and grinding pains. He was confident of mercy's mixtures with all his greateſt diſtempers, not at all doubting of the ſanctification of them to him, through grace.

Thus he ſpake many times in his applications unto God, 'Conſider, and ſave me, for I am thine. How long, how long, Lord, ſhall I not be remembered; yea, I am remembered, bleſſed be thy name. This is a fiery chariot, but it will carry me to heaven. Bleſſed be God that hath ſupported me hitherto; and he that hath delivered, will yet deliver. Thou, Lord, never forgeteſt them that put their truſt in thee.'

Always, when the extremity of pain was over, he would with ſmiles ſpeak of God's mercies. Though trembling took hold upon him when his violent pains began, yet would he with confidence ſay, 'Now, in the ſtrength of the mighty God, I will undergo theſe pains. O my God, put under thine everlaſting arms, and ſtrengthen me.'

Many times he told a boſom friend of his, that notwithſtanding all his rentings and roarings, from which he expected no deliverance but by death, he would not for a thouſand worlds change eſtates with the greateſt man on earth, whom he looked upon as in a way of ſin, and enthralled thereto. And this much beſpeaks God's fatherly indulgence towards him, that Satan could never ſhake his confidence, nor aſſault his hopes, all the time of his ſore diſtemper. And this was further very remarkable, that he counted all theſe inward cheerings, the fruits of prayers that was made for him, though God ſaw cauſe to deny that eaſe and recovery to his body which was ſo much begged; and withal, he valued thoſe ſpiritual cordials and refreſhings, far beyond deliverance from the gout, and the ſtone, yea, and death itſelf.

Theſe things are the rather mentioned, to prevent that diſcouragement or offence which ſome may be too apt to take at the violence and continuance of his waſting and tormenting pains, notwithſtanding his own godlineſs, and the inceſſant prayers, both ordinary and extraordinary, which were made unto God in his behalf; for he found the ſweet fruits of them in his own boſom, even when he felt the continuance and increaſe of his bodily grief.

Another thing very remarkable in holy Mr Whitaker, was his love to his fellow Chriſtians; he was a man made up (as it were) of love. His delight was in the ſaints upon earth, whom he eſteemed moſt excellent, and their ſociety was a conſtant cordial to his ſpirit. His frequent viſits of them that were in trouble, and his ſtirring up of others to the like practice, were teſtimonies of this his cordial love; which indeed was not verbal but real. He was alſo abundant in works of charity, few men of his eſtate did equalize him therein. He would often ſay, 'It is a brave thing when a man, together with a full eſtate, hath a charitable heart. Sometimes, upon ſpecial occaſions, he hath given away all the money that he had in the houſe. It was not unuſual with him to give 20s. to a poor ſaint; and he had many experiences of God's gracious returns in ſuch caſes. By his laſt will he gave 20l. to the poor of his own pariſh.

There were two caſes wherein his love was moſt enlarged to the people of God, whereof you may take theſe two inſtances; The one when the ſufferings were public. He often told an intimate friend of his, that England's late breach with Scotland, and the blood that was ſhed, together with other ſad conſequences thereof, had taken ſuch impreſſions upon his heart, that the ſorrow would never be removed till his death; and the ſufferings both in Holland and in England, in our late ſea fights, were a heavy burden upon his ſpirit.

The other caſe was in reſpect to the inward perplexity of ſuch as were afflicted in mind; having moved a ſpecial friend of his, the week before his death, to beſtow a viſit upon one in that condition, the very morning before his death (when ſpeech was grievous to him, in reſpect of his great weakneſs, he aſked him, whether he had remembered the party that was troubled in ſpirit? which was a remarkable evidence of his ſtrong love to ſuch.

And beſides what hath been already mentioned, I might here ſet down his many wreſtlings with God to prevent the flood of troubles which he apprehended the proteſtant churches were now in danger to be overflowed with; as alſo his compaſſionate reſpect to congregations in the country, which were like ſheep wandering upon the barren mountains without a ſhepherd.

And as his love flowed forth to the ſaints, ſo was theirs no leſs towards him; not to ſpeak of the many frequent and friendly viſits of godly men and women in the neighbourhood round about him; there was ſcarce ever heard of any man that was ſo much prayed for, both in public and

and in private; both upon ordinary and extraordinary occaſions, as he was. There was no particular caſe ſo frequently, ſo affectionately ſpread before God, in moſt of the congregations about London, as his. Three days were ſet apart by miniſters, and many other praying friends, to ſeek God in his behalf, one in private, and two in public, which alſo were obſerved much better than ſuch days uſually have been of late; yea, in remote countries, beſides the ordinary prayers made for him, there were ſome faſts kept alſo, with ſpecial reference to his afflictions.

The multitude of people that came to his funeral, with the many weeping eyes, did clearly ſhew how much he was beloved.

Here might alſo be remembered the readineſs of the London miniſters to ſupply his place at home, and his lectures elſewhere; as alſo the willingneſs of his fellow-lecturers at Weſtminſter to preach for him there, when he himſelf, by reaſon of weakneſs, could not poſſibly do his own work, but it is needleſs; for ſtill, every where, upon the naming of Mr Whitaker, love is ſome way diſcovered by ſuch as had any knowlege of him.

Whilſt he was able, he never neglected his miniſterial ſervice; he hath often gone upon crutches unto the congregation of his own people, to fulfil his miniſtry; yea, once at leaſt he adventured to preach at Michael's Cornhill, when he was ſcarce able to get into the pulpit, and his friends, with much difficulty helped him out of the church homewards; and at other times, when his legs would not ſerve him, he uſed to ride to church. And when he was, by extremity of pains, taken off from his miniſtry, he would ſometimes profeſs to ſome ſpecial friends, that the pain felt was not ſo grievous to his ſpirit as his inability, by reaſon thereof, to manage his wonted work. Indeed it was his meat and drink to be doing the will of his heavenly Father. Many times theſe were his words, 'If I could but preach, I ſhould be much better.' And he would rejoice, with cheerfulneſs and thankfulneſs, when, in the times of his weakneſs, he found not himſelf more diſtempered by his preaching, and would mention ſuch experiences, as arguments to move and induce his friends to yield to his preaching, when they diſſuaded him from it, as a prejudice to his health.

In the year 1654. about the beginning of November, the violent pain of the ſtone did in ſuch a manner and meaſure arreſt him, that from that time he continued God's priſoner, confined to his bed chamber, till he was ſet free by a long expected and much deſired death. Moſt phyſicians in the city were conſulted with, and were from time to time very ready to ſerve him with their advice, who did unanimouſly conclude, that his ſharp pains proceeded originally from an ulcer in the kidney, but immediately from an ulcer in the neck of the bladder, cauſed by a continual flux of ulcerous matter dropping down upon that part; and by reaſon of the acuteneſs and quickneſs of the ſenſe there, his pains were almoſt continually in that place, though the fountain of them was from the kidneys.

About two months before his death, his pains grew more extreme, yet divine indulgence vouchſafed at ſome times ſome mitigation of them, and intermiſſion both in the night and day; but notwithſtanding the long continuance and extremity of them neither his faith nor patience did abate; yea, they much encreaſed, and grew higher; and as he grew nearer his end, ſo his longings for death were much encreaſed, yet accompanied with holy ſubmiſſion to the good pleaſure of his gracious Father.

Theſe were ſome of his expreſſions:

O my God, break open the priſon door, and ſet my poor captive ſoul free; but enable me willingly to wait thy time. I deſire to be diſſolved: never did any man deſire life more than I do death.

When will that time come, that I ſhall neither ſin more, nor ſorrow more?

When ſhall mortality put on immortality? When ſhall this earthly tabernacle be diſſolved, that I may be cloathed upon with that houſe which is from heaven?

'Bleſſed are the dead which die in the Lord, for they reſt from their labours, and follow the Lamb whitherſoever he goeth.'

So great was his love to his God and Saviour, that he maintained and expreſſed high eſtimation and honourable thoughts of his Majeſty, when he was under the moſt tormenting providences. He feared nothing more than leſt he ſhould do or ſpeak any thing that might redound to the diſhonour of his name

Theſe were ſome breathings of his large love, when through pain he was as in the fire, or upon the rack:

'Good Lord, keep me from diſhonouring of thy name by impatience! Oh! who would not even in burnings have honourable thoughts of God? who that knows thee would not fear thee, O Lord, love thee, and honour thee?

'Lord, thou gaveſt me no occaſion to have any hard thoughts of thee! Bleſſed be God, there is nothing of hell in all this! Bleſſed be his name for Jeſus Chriſt, and the revelation of the everlaſting goſpel!

'Who knows the power of thy wrath? if it be ſo heavy upon thy ſervant here, how heavy ſhall it be to all thoſe who ſhall endure it without mixture?

'Bleſſed be God for the peace of mine inward man, when my outward man is full of trouble?

'This is a bitter cup, but it is of my Father's mixture, and ſhall I not drink it? Yea, Lord, through thy ſtrength I will: this is my burden, and I will bear it.'

Upon any abatements of his excruciating pains, he was conſtantly much in bleſſing God, uſing theſe, and ſuch like expreſſions; 'O! what a mercy is it that there is any mitigation, any intermiſſion! Lord make me thankful. And turning himſelf towards thoſe that ſtood by, he would beſpeak them thus; 'O help me to be thankful! O lift up a prayer for me, that I may be thankful! O what a mercy is this! How much worſe might this affliction have been? I might have been diſtracted, or laid roaring under diſquietneſs of ſpirit.'

By theſe, and many ſuch like expreſſions and workings of his ſpirit, who perceiveth not the ſparklings of his love to God? And to a dear friend he often ſaid, 'Brother, through mercy, I have not one repining thought againſt God.'

The Sabbath ſe'night, before God releaſed him, though his pains were very ſharp, yet he beſtowed moſt part of the time of public ordinances in prayer, together with thoſe that were about him, and his petitions were moſt in the behalf of miniſters, that God would cloath his ordinances with his own power, and enable his miniſters to ſpeak to the ſouls of his people. Then did he alſo, with many tears, bewail his detainment from the ſanctuary, and Sabbath opportunities of doing and receiving good, which had been his delight: Profeſſing alſo, that his being taken off from ſervice was a greater affliction to him than all his bodily pains. And becauſe this apprehenſion, viz. Of his preſent unſerviceableneſs, did much afflict him; this therefore was often ſuggeſted to him, (which the Lord pleaſed to make a relief to his ſpirit) viz that now by the practice of faith, patience, contentment, and ſpiritualneſs, which he had formerly preached to, and preſſed upon others, he was very profitable unto them who viſited him, and might alſo prove very advantageous unto others who might be acquainted therewith, through God's grace, by Chriſt.

So great was his tender reſpect to his friends, that when his pains were coming with violence, he would entreat them to withdraw from him, that they might not be grieved with his roarings; and he uſed often to bleſs God, that his compaſſionate friends were not neceſſitated to abide within the reach of his doleful lamentation.

As his death drew nigh, ſo his fits of pain were more frequent, either every half hour, or many times every quarter, yea, two or three in a quarter of an hour, which did exceedingly abate his ſtrength.

The night before God took him out of this vale of tears, Mr Aſh hearing that he was not likely to live another day, went early in the morning to take his leave of him whom his ſoul loved, at which time he found his bodily ſtrength much decayed; and perceiving that he could not ſpeak without much difficulty, Mr Aſh ſpake the more unto him in reference to the approach of his happy hoped for change: and his discourse, through God's mercy, was very refreshing to his spirit. He told him also, that many of his friends intended to set apart that day in seeking the Lord for him, and asked him, in what things especially he desired to be remembered before the throne of Grace? his answer was, 'Do not complain, but bless God for me, and intreat him to open the prison door.' Then Mr Ash, laying his hand upon his cold hand, covered with a clammy sweat, took his farewel of him with an aking heart; and upon his departure from him, the last words which Mr Whitaker spake to him were these; 'Brother, I thank you, I pray God bless you, and I bless God for you.'

That day was spent in addresses to God for him at Peter's Cornhill, where Mr Newcomen quickened and guided our prayers in his sermon upon John xi. 4. 'Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick:' and Mr Jenkin endeavoured to moderate and regulate our sorrows from Luke xxiii. 38. 'Weep not for me.'

Thus his friends having, by prayers and praises on his behalf, given him to God, and having prepared their hearts for the loss of him, the Lord was pleased that evening to take him to himself, June 1654, being above 55 years old.

After his death, Mr Hollard opened his body in the presence of Dr Cox, Dr Micklethwaite, and Dr Bevoir; (some other more antient doctors would have been there, if, either their being out of town, or present urgent occasions had not hindred) being opened, they found both his kidneys full of ulcers, and one of them was swelled to an extraordinary bigness through the abundance of purulent matter in it. Upon the neck of his bladder, they found a stone, (which was about an inch and an half long, and one inch broad, weighing about two ounces when it was first taken out) and withal, they found an ulcer which was gangrenized, and this was judged to be the cause of his death. All other parts of his body were found firm and sound.

He was so humble, that he feared lest God's people praying for him, should speak too well of him before the Lord.

He was a self denying man, never daring to look after great matters in this world; whereby he condemned many whole self seeking in earthly advantages renders them very offensive and unsavoury in the church of Christ.

Mr Calamy speaking of him, saith, 'If I should enter upon his commendations, I might truly say what Nazianzen doth of his sister Gorgonia, that I have more cause to fear, lest I should speak below than above the truth, for he was a burning and a shining light in this our Israel; a messenger and an interpreter, one amongst a thousand; a Bezaleel in God's tabernacle; a true Nathaniel, that by his integrity, humility, constancy, charity, publickness, and peaceableness of spirit, and by his diligence and faithfulness in preaching the gospel, made his life both amiable and desirable. I will say of him as it was said of Athanasius, that he was adamus kai magnetes, an adamant and a loadstone. To all that conversed with him he was as a loadstone to draw their hearts to love him; but in the cause of God, and in reference to the truths of Christ, he was as an unconquerable adamant. He was a Jeremiah, both in mourning for, and in witnessing against the sins of the times. He was a second Whitaker, tho' not so eminent in learning, as to be what is said of him. Mundi miraculum, academiæ oraculum, The miracle of the world, and the oracle of the university; yet he was (which is also said of him) sound in the faith; one that had no private opinion, that did not in veteri via novam semitam quærere, seek out new paths of his own, but kept the old way, and the old path. That had a great wit, without any mixture of madness.

He preached no less by the heavenliness of his doctrine, than by the holiness of his life; yea, he preached as effectually by his death, as by his life or doctrine: for so great was the patience which God measured out to him, that though in his extremity of torments he groaned, yet he never grumbled. Though he often mourned, yet he never murmured; nay, though he often roared, by reason of the greatness of his pain, yet he always justified and magnified God therein; and this he did so constantly, and in such a measure, that, as it is said of Job, so it will be said by the saints that succeed us for their mutual consolation and encouragment, 'Ye have heard of the patience of Whitaker. He had indeed an ulcerated flesh, but a sound and whole spirit, and that enabled him to bear his infirmity. He had a stone in the bladder, but a very soft and tender heart: he had a gangrene in his body, but a sound soul, unstained by sin. I heard him often say, with thankfulness, that under all his bodily sufferings he had a blessed calmness and quietness in his spirit, that God spake peace unto him; that though he roared for pain, yet the devil was chained up from roaring upon him.'

On the Death of my dear Friend Mr Jeremiah Whitaker.

If death be but a servant, sent to call
The souls of saints to their original;
Dear saint, thine was a noble soul, to whom
Three messengers were sent to call thee home;
A stone, an ulcer, and a gangrene too,
Three deaths to hasten that which one should do!
'Twas not because thy soul was deeper set
Than ours, within its house of clay; nor yet
Because thou wert unwilling to depart
Thither, where long before had been thine heart.
They were not sent to hale, by violence,
A soul that ling'red when 'twas called hence.
God shew'd how welcome one death was to thee,
Who didst so meekly entertain all three.
Thus many deaths God's Israel did inclose,
The sea before, behind a sea of foes;
On either side the jaws of mountains high:
No way from death, but unto death to fly:
Not to destroy them, but to let them see
The pow'r of love, which then would set them free.
Thus Job's four messengers, which did relate
The doleful story of his ruin'd state;
And his three friends, which acted Satan's part,
(He on his flesh, and these upon his heart)
Who by disputing him into a curse,
Would make his spirit's torment far the worse,
Were, by God's wise disposal, sent to show
The strength he on his champion would bestow.
Thus painters put dark grounds where they intend
To overlay with finest gold, and lend,
By deeper shadows, lustre to that face
On which they mean their choicest skill to place.
Thus workmen season much with sun and wind
Those greatest beams which must the building bind, While smaller pieces, happ'ly, are put in
When they come bleeding from the wood, and green.
Oft where is greatest grace God's pleas'd to send Great conflicts, those great graces to commend.
As the six finger'd giant's sword did bring
The more renown to little David's sling.
The vanquish'd lion, and the conquer'd bear,
Prepar'd that holy head a crown to wear.
The angel wrestled first, and then did bless,
And made the greater servant to the less.
Pain was too great for thee, God's grace for pain,
And made the greater serve the less again:
Thy pains serv'd thee for glory, and did fit
The head, on which a crown of life must sit.
This is God's method to fetch joy from grief,
To turn our sorrows unto our relief:
To save by killing, and to bring to shore
By the ship's planks, which was quite broke before.
And thus a barren womb first took the seed,
Which did six-hundred-thousand people breed;
That seed too must from knife and altar rise,
And be before a fire a sacrifice.
Great preacher of thy heav'nly Father's will,
Thy tongue did many years with manna fill:
Thy life out preach'd thy tongue, O blessed strife!
Thy sickness the best sermon of thy life.

Before

Before each doctrine must be prov'd anew,
Thine end was one great proof that all was true.
Before thou preach'd by weeks, but now by hours,
Each minute taught the morning auditors;
Each patient groan, and each believing eye,
Was a new sermon in brachygraphy.
When nature roars, without repining words;
Grace in the mouth, when in the bowels swords;
In midst of torments to triumph o'er hell;
To feel God's arrows, yet his praises tell;
Through thickest clouds to see the brightest light;
In blackest darkness to have clearest sight;
And with our Lord to cry, 'My God, my God,'
Upon a cross, under the sharpest rod;
This is indeed to preach: this is to show
Faith triumph's over nature's greatest woe.
Then welcome fiery serpent's scorching sting,
Which did thee thus to th' brazen serpent bring:
Then welcome whale, which, though it first devour,
Renders at last the prophet to the shore.
Well might thou bear the stone which death did throw,
Who had the white stone, the new name to show:
Well might thou be with such an ulcer calm,
Whose soul was heal'd before with heaven's balm.
When spirits wounds are cur'd, though nature groan,
An heart of flesh can heal a back of stone:
Let conscience have her feast, and let flesh roar,
This pain shall make the other's joy the more;
As many times those flowers most fragrant smell,
Which nearest to some noisome weeds do dwell.
Thus have you seen the forge most clearly glow,
On which the smith doth drops of water throw;
Keen frosts make fire the hotter, and deep night
Causeth celestial lamps to shine more bright:
And by a dear antiperistasis,
The child's distress sweetens the father's kiss:
A wounded body yields to a sound soul;
The joys of this do th' other pains controul.
As in the day that the sun beams appear,
All other lesser stars do disappear.
When heaven shines, and divine love doth reign,
The soul is not at leisure to complain;
Internal joys his heart so well composes,
That they have judg'd their flames a bed of roses.

On Mr Gataker and Mr Whitaker.

But what shall England do, from whence are lopt
Two of her richest acres, to heav'n dropt?
By loss of these two acres she's more poor,
Than if she'd lost an hundred lordships more.
'Twere a good purchase to gain these again,
By giving to the sea all Lincoln fen.
Two little mines of gold do far surpass
Huge manors, where th' whole vesture is but grass.
Learn we by them, what all men once will say,
One perch of heav'n's worth the whole globe of clay.

ED. REYNOLDS, D. D.

The Life of JAMES USHER, Doctor of divinity, Arch bishop of Armagh, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, who died Anno Christi 1655.

ALEXANDER the Great, commanded that no man should draw his picture but Apelles, the most exquisite painter in the world; and that his statue should not be made in brass by any one but Lysippus, the most excellent workman in that kind: so truly, the life and death of this great and good man is fit to be written only by the ablest pen that be can found.

Reverend and learned Dr Bernard, who was of my acquaintance above forty years ago in Emanuel college in Cambridge, hath written his life and death excellent well. Yet as there can never too much be spoken or written of him, whom all the Christian world did admire for his religion and learning, so give me leave out of him, with some other helps to set him forth, though not to the life in his native colours as he deserveth, yet according to my ability, that his name may be enrolled amongst those many other worthies both ancient and modern, men famous in their generations, burning and shining lights in the church, and very instrumental to God's glory, which I have formerly, and now also collected and published.

James Usher was born in Dublin, the metropolis of Ireland, in the parish of St. Nicholas, January the 4th. Anno Christi 1580. His father Mr Arnald Usher, was a student in the law, one of the clerks of the chancery in that nation, and a person of excellent parts and endowments. His mother was Mrs Margaret Stanihurst, who in her later time was seduced by some of the popish priests to the Roman religion, they taking the opportunity, whilst this her son was upon occasion in England; and they, by their subtilty, had engaged her in such vows, that when her son came back he could not possibly reclaim her, which they have often boasted of in print; yet her son's hope was, at least upon her death-bed, to have prevailed for the reducing of her to the truth: but it pleased God, that she died suddenly at Drogheda, when he was absent at Dublin, whereby, to his no small grief, those his hopes were frustrated and disappointed.

His grandfather by his mother's side was James Stanihirst, whose Christian name he bore, who was chosen three times Speaker of the House of Commons in the Irish parliaments; in the last whereof, he made the first motion for the founding and erecting of a college and university in the city of Dublin. He was also Recorder of that city, one of the masters of the chancery, and a man of great wisdom and integrity.

His uncle was Richard Stanihirst, a man famous in France, and other nations for his great learning, which he manifested in several books published by him, one of them, when he was eighteen years old, between whom and this reverend person there passed many learned letters.

His uncle, by his father's side, was Henry Usher, who was trained up at Cambridge, and proved a learned and prudent man: he was afterwards arch bishop of Dublin, at which time he was first sent over into England to Queen Elizabeth, and the council, with a petition for preserving the Cathedral of St. Patrick's, Dublin, from being dissolved, wherein he prevailed, the fruits whereof this his nephew reaped afterwards, being Chancellor of it, and receiving his subsistence from it for many years. The second time he was sent over by the council of Ireland to Queen Elizabeth, to procure the patent for founding of a College and University in Dublin, wherein he prevailed also: so that the College, of which this worthy person was the first fruits, had its being from his grandfather's motion, and his uncle's industry.

He had a brother named Ambrose Usher who, tho' he died young, yet was a man of excellent parts, very skilful in the oriental languages, who had translated the Old Testament from the beginning to the Book of Job, out of the Hebrew into English, which is still preserved under his own hand, but upon the coming forth of the new translation in King James his time, he desisted from making any further progress therein.

Our James was taught first to read by two of his aunts, who were blind from their cradles, and so never saw letters, yet were they admirably versed in the sacred Scriptures, being able suddenly to have given a good account of any part of the Bible. At eight years old, he was sent to the Grammar-school, where he had the happiness to meet with two excellent school masters, Sir James Fullerton, afterwards Leger Embassador in France, and Sir James Hamilton, afterwards Lord Viscount Clandeboise, who was usher of the school. These two learned men were sent over by King James out of Scotland upon another design, though they were disguised in this employment: and, indeed, they came very opportunely by the good hand of God's providence for this youth's founding in learning, at such a time when there was a great defect of learned school masters which he often acknowleged as a special mercy of God to him therein.

At ten years old was the first time that he could remember to have found in himself any evidences of his saving conversion unto God, which was instrumentally wrought by a sermon which he had heard preached, upon

Rom.

Rom. xii. 1. 'I beſeech you, brethren, by the mercies of God,' &c. About the ſame time alſo meeting with ſome notes taken from famous Mr Perkins' works, (being not then printed) concerning the ſanctification of the Lord's day, proved, through God's bleſſing, ſo effectual with him, that ever after he was the more ſtrict in the obſerving of it.

About the ſame time alſo he read over St Auguſtine's Meditations, which ſo affected him, that he often wept in the reading of them.

This young, yet hopeful plant, thus inuring and accuſtoming himſelf to ſecret duties in his tender years, the devil, that grand enemy of our ſalvation, thinking to nip him in the bud, aſſaulted him with divers terrors and affrightments, both ſleeping and waking, hoping thereby to diſcourage and take him off from the ſame; but he, with St Paul, betook himſelf to prayer, with earneſtneſs, to be delivered from theſe Satanical deluſions and aſſaults, and at laſt was heard in that which he feared, by being freed from them, and ſtrengthened againſt them with more than ordinary courage and comfort; which made ſuch an impreſſion in him, as that he could not forget it to his old age.

The devil now finding that he could not be affrighted out of his courſe of godlineſs, made uſe of another engine, which was to allure him with the bait of pleaſure; ſome of his friends teaching him to play at cards, wherewith he was ſo much delighted, that it began to prevail over his love to his book; yea, it came in competition with his love to God, and care to ſerve him, which being ſeaſonably, by God's ſpirit, diſcovered to him, he preſently gave it over, and never played afterwards.

At twelve years old he was ſo affected with the ſtudy of chronology and antiquity, that reading over Sleidan's book of the four empires, and ſome other authors, he drew forth an exact ſeries of the times wherein each eminent perſon lived; and during the time of his abode at ſchool, which was five years, he was thoroughly inſtructed in grammar, rhetoric, and poetry, wherein he ſo excelled, and with which he was ſo much delighted, that he was fain to take himſelf off, leſt it ſhould have hindered him from more ſerious ſtudies.

At thirteen years of age he was admitted into the college of Dublin, being the firſt ſtudent that was initiated into it: and, as it ſeems, it was ſo ordered upon deſign by the governors thereof upon their obſervation of his pregnancy and rare parts, that it might be a future honour to the college to have his name recorded in the frontiſpiece of their admiſſion book, and ſo accordingly he was the firſt graduate, the firſt fellow, the firſt proctor, &c.

At the ſame time Sir James Hamilton, hitherto uſher of the ſchool, was choſen fellow of the college, and thereby became his tutor, who oftentimes admired his acuteneſs and proficiency, whereby in a ſhort time he equalized his inſtructers.

Here he firſt began to ſtudy the Greek and Hebrew languages, in both which he afterwards excelled, and made himſelf in a little time maſter of the arts, moſt of which he modelled in a method of his own, eſpecially that of muſic.

At this time the education and helps which that college afforded were very eminent; for though at firſt there were but four fellows, yet the tongues and arts were very exactly taught to all the ſtudents, who were divided into ſeveral claſſes: each tutor read Ariſtotle in Greek to his pupils; yea, each fellow read three lectures a day, at each of which there was a diſputation maintained either upon the preſent, or the precedent lecture, and ſometimes they were ordered to diſpute More Socratico.

On Saturdays, in the afternoon, each tutor read a divinity lecture in Latin to his pupils, dictating it (as they did all their other lectures, ſo deliberately, that they might eaſily write after them, to their great benefit and advantage.

At fourteen years old he was judged fit, and admitted to the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper; and his uſual cuſtom was, the afternoon before, to retire himſelf in private and to ſpend it in a ſtrict ſelf-examination, and deep humiliation for all his ſins; wherein he had ſuch enlargements of heart, that a ſtream of tears flowed from his eyes, which afterwards he oft recalled to mind, both as a provocation, and cenſure of himſelf: when he was of elder years, there was a certain place, by a water ſide whither he oft reſorted, ſorrowfully to ſurvey his ſins, and with floods of tears to confeſs, and bewail them: wherein he found ſo much ſweetneſs and communion with God, that he thirſted for ſuch comfortable opportunities, and it was his uſual cuſtom to ſpend Saturdays in the afternoon in human learning, which made him as glad when Monday came, that he might renew his ſtudies, as he was when Sabbath day came, wherein he was to apply himſelf to the ſervice of God; and it coſt him many tears, that he could not be more heavenly-minded at that age.

At fifteen years old, he made ſuch a progreſs in the ſtudy of chronology, that he drew up in Latin, an exact chronicle of the Bible as far as to the books of the King's, which did not much differ from that of his late annals, excepting his enlargements by ſome exquiſite obſervations, and the Syncreniſms of heathen ſtory. About this time alſo he was much afflicted with a ſtrong temptation, which moved him to queſtion God's love to him, becauſe he was ſo free from afflictions, which was occaſioned by ſome inconſiderate paſſages, which he met with in ſome authors, and long was he under ſome trouble before he could get rid of it.

Before he was batchellor of arts, he read Stapleton's Fortreſs of the Faith, and therein finding how confidently he aſſerted antiquity for the popiſh tenets, withal, branding our church and religion, with novelty, in what we diſſented from them, he was much troubled at it, not knowing but that his quotations might be right; and he was convinced that the antienteſt muſt needs be beſt, as the nearer the fountain the ſweeter and clearer are the ſtreams; yet withal, he ſuſpected that Stapleton might miſreport the Fathers, or wreſt them to his own ſenſe; and therefore he took up a ſettled reſolution, that in due time, if God prolonged his life and health, he would truſt only his own eyes, by reading over all the fathers, for his ſatisfaction herein; which work he afterward began at twenty years old, and finiſhed that vaſt labour at thirty eight, ſtrictly tying himſelf to a certain portion every day, what occaſions ſoever interveened.

Whilſt he was batchellor of arts, he read divers of the works of the fathers, and moſt authors which had written the body of divinity both poſitively and polemically in confuting the popiſh errors, and had read many of their authors alſo, by which means he was ſo well acquainted with the ſtate of theſe controverſies, that he was able to diſpute with any of the popiſh prieſts, as he often did with the principal of them.

Anno Chriſti 1568. The earl of Eſſex newly coming over lord lieutenant of Ireland, and being choſen chancellor of the univerſity of Dublin, there was a ſolemn act appointed for his entertainment, and Mr Uſher being then batchellor of arts, anſwered the philoſophy act with great applauſe and approbation.

About this time, his father's intention was to ſend him over into England to the inns of court, for the ſtudy of the common law, which was a great trouble to him, yet in obedience to his father's will he aſſented, and reſolved upon it; but it pleaſed God that his father ſhortly after died, viz. Auguſt the 12th. anno Chriſti 1608, ſo that then he being at liberty to make choice of his ſtudies, devoted and applied himſelf wholly to divinity, and thereupon was choſen fellow of the college, being before incapable of taking the oath which was required of all fellows at their admiſſion, viz. that the preſent intent of their ſtudies ſhould be for the profeſſion of divinity, unleſs God ſhould afterwards otherwiſe diſpoſe their minds.

And here again, was another occaſion of diſturbance to his mind, miniſtred to him. For his father left him a good eſtate in land; but finding that he muſt have involved himſelf in many ſuits of law, before he could attain to the quiet enjoyment of it, to the interruption of his other ſtudies, he gave up the benefit of it to his brothers and ſiſters, ſuffering his uncles to take up letters of adminiſtration for that end, reſolving to caſt himſelf upon the good providence of God, to whoſe ſervice in the work of the miniſtry, he had wholly devoted himſelf, not doubting but he would provide for him; yet that he might not be judged weak, or inconſiderate in that act, he drew up a note under his hand, of the ſtate of all things that concerned it, and directions what to do about it.

When he was nineteen years old, he diſputed with Henry Fitz-Simonds, a Jeſuite in the caſtle of Dublin, as himſelf acknowlegeth in his preface to his book called Britannomachia miniſtrorum; the occaſion of which diſpute was this; the jeſuite by way of challenge, as it was interpreted, gave forth theſe words, 'That he being a priſoner was like to a bear tied to a ſtake, but wanted bone to bait him: whereupon this eminent man (for ſo he was, tho' very young) was thought fit, and able to encounter him, tho' at their firſt meeting he deſpiſed his youth, as Goliah did David's. Mr Uſher proffered to diſpute with him about all Bellarmine's controverſies, for which a meeting was appointed once every week, and it fell out that the firſt ſubject propoſed was De Antichriſto, about which they had two or three ſolemn diſputations, and Mr Uſher was ready to have proceeded further; but the Jeſuite was weary of it, yet gives him a tolerable commendation, and much admired his abilities in ſuch young years: concerning which he ſaith, 'There came once to me a youth of about eighteen years of age, one of a too ſoon ripe wit, ſcarce you would think that he could have gone through his courſe of philoſophy, or that he was got out of his childhood, yet was he ready to diſpute upon the moſt abſtruſe points of divinity.

And afterwards the ſame Jeſuite living to underſtand more of him, ſaith, that he was A catholicorum doctiſſimus, the moſt learned of ſuch as were not Catholics; being (as it ſeems) unwilling, or aſhamed to call him heretick.

Anno Chriſti 1600. when he was about twenty years old he commenced maſter of arts, and anſwered the philoſophy act, and was choſen catechiſt of the college; in which office, he went through a great part of the body of divinity in the chappel by way of common place; and miniſters being ſcarce at that time, there were three young men of the college choſen out, and appointed to preach in Chriſt-church before the ſtate: one was Mr Richardſon, afterwards biſhop of Ardah, who was appointed to preach an expoſitory lecture upon the prophecy of Iſaiah, every Friday. Another was Mr Welch, afterwards doctor of divinity, who was deſigned to handle the body of divinity on Sabbaths, in the forenoon; the third was our learned Uſher, who was to handle the controverſies, for the ſatisfaction of the papiſts, on the Lord's days, in the afternoons; which he did fully and clearly, always concluding with ſome emphatical exhortation, that it tended much to the edification and confirmation of the proteſtants in their principles, as many of them in their elder years have acknowleged.

Having thus preached for a while as a probationer, he refuſed to continue it any longer, having not as yet received ordination: he alſo ſcrupled to be as yet ordained by reaſon of his defect of years, the canons requiring twenty four, and he being but yet twenty one: but by ſome grave and learned men he was told, that the Lord had need of his labours; and ſo upon their perſuaſions and importunity, his age being diſpenſed with, according to ſome former preſidents, he was ordained at the uſual time, the Sabbath before Chriſtmaſs day, anno, 1601. by his uncle Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh, with the aſſiſtance of ſome other miniſters.

The firſt text, that he preached publicly upon before the ſtate, after his ordination, was Rev. iii. 1. 'Thou haſt a name that thou liveſt, and art dead,' which fell out to be the ſame day, upon which was fought the battle of Kinſale, which being a day eſpecially ſet apart, by prayer to ſeek unto God for his bleſſing and aſſiſtance in that engagement, and being his firſt fruits after his entrance into the office of the miniſtry, God might in a more than ordinary manner make his labours efficacious and prevailing; the reſt of that epiſtle to the church of Sardis he finiſhed afterwards.

It was well known that if the Spaniards had gotten the better that day, the Iriſh papiſts had deſigned to murder the Engliſh proteſtants both in Dublin and other places, but eſpecially the miniſters. Hence (ſaid he) 'aroſe a motion in me to have deferred my ordination till the event of the battle had been known, that ſo I might the better have eſcaped their fury; but I repelled that ſuggeſtion, and reſolved the rather upon it, that dying a miniſter, and in that quarrel, I might at leaſt be the next door to a martyr.

The Spaniards being (as was ſaid before) overthrown at Kinſale, and the hopes of the Iriſh, as to that deſign, being fruſtrated, they began generally to ſubject themſelves to the ſtatute, which was now put in execution, in their coming to Church; and that it might tend the more to their profit, the lord lieutenant, and his council, deſired the miniſters at Dublin, ſo to divide themſelves, (that in imitation of what he had already begun at Chriſt Church) there might be a ſermon on the Lord's days in the afternoon at every church upon thoſe controverſies. St. Katharines (a convenient church) was aſſigned for Mr Uſher, who removed accordingly, and duly obſerved it; and his cuſtom was, that what he had delivered in one ſermon, he drew it up into queſtions and anſwers, and the next Lord's day, ſeveral perſons of note voluntarily offered themſelves to repeat thoſe anſwers, before the whole congregation, which made them more clear and perſpicuous to the popiſh party.

It pleaſed God by his, and the labours of others of his brethren in the miniſtry, not only in Dublin, but in other parts of the kingdom, that the papiſts came ſo diligently to church, that if they had any occaſion to abſent themſelves, they uſed to ſend in their excuſes to the church wardens, and there were great hopes in a ſhort time to have reduced the whole nation to proteſtantiſm: but on a ſudden, the execution of the ſtatute was ſuſpended, and the power of the high commiſſion court (then erected, and uſed only againſt the papiſts) was taken away; whereupon the papiſts preſently withdrew themſelves from the public aſſemblies, the miniſtry was diſcouraged, all good mens hearts were grieved, and popery from that time forward encreaſed, till like a great deluge, it had overflown the whole nation.

Upon this, the ſpirit of this holy man (like Paul's at Athens) was exceedingly ſtirred in him, inſomuch as preaching before the ſtate, at Chriſt Church upon a ſpecial ſolemnity, he did with as much prudence, courage and boldneſs, as became his young years, give them his opinion of that abominable toleration of idolatry; making a full and clear application of that paſſage in Ezekiel's viſion, Chap. iv. 6. where the prophet, by lying on his ſide, was to bear the iniquity of Judah for forty days, 'I have appointed thee (ſaith the Lord) each day for a year.' This (ſaid he) by the conſent of interpreters, ſignifies the time of forty years to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and of that nation for their idolatry; and ſo, (ſaid he) will I reckon from this year the ſin of Ireland, and at the end of the time, thoſe whom ye now embrace, ſhall be your ruin, and you ſhall bear this iniquity; wherein he proved a prophet: for this was delivered by him, Anno Chriſti 1601. and anno 1641, was the Iriſh rebellion, and maſſacre; and what a continued expectation he had of a great judgment upon that his native country, I, ſaith Dr Bernard, can witneſs from the year 1624. at which time I had the happineſs firſt to be known to him; and the nearer the time approached, the more confident he was of the event, tho' as yet nothing that tended towards it was viſible to other men.

The body of divinity which is printed in his name, is highly commended by Mr Downam, who ſet it forth, and ſo it is by a ſtranger, Ludovicus Crocius, who much deſired that ſome Engliſhman would turn it into Latin for the benefit of foreign churches, but it was not intended by him for the preſs. It was begun by him in public, but finiſhed ſome years after in private in his family, conſtantly inſtructing them twice a week, into which perſons of quality and learning reſorted, and divers of them took notes, whereby ſeveral copies were diſperſed abroad, ſome imperfect and miſtaken, and many paſſages are in it which were not his, neither is the whole ſo poliſhed as his other pieces, which were publiſhed by himſelf; and indeed, he was diſpleaſed that it came forth without his knowlege, yet underſtanding how much good it had done, he connived at it.

Shortly after the forementioned defeat given to the Spaniards at Kinſale, the officers of our Engliſh army, gave 1800 pounds to buy books for the college library at Dublin (then ſoldiers were advancers of learning) their ordering of which, was committed to Dr Challoner, and this lord primate, who made a journey into England on purpoſe to buy books with it. He then met with Sir Thomas Bodly, who was buying books for his library in Oxford, and they were very helpful each to other, in procuring the rareſt pieces. In his journey he viſited Mr Chriſtopher Goodman, who had been profeſſor of divinity in Oxford, in king Edward the ſixths days, then lying on his death bed at Cheſter, and he would often repeat ſome grave and wiſe ſpeeches that he heard from him.

After this he conſtantly came over into England once in three years, ſpending one month at Oxford, another at Cambridge, in ſearching the books, eſpecially the manuſcripts, in each univerſity (among which, thoſe of Corpus Chriſti's college in Cambridge, he moſt eſteemed) the third month he ſpent at London, intending chiefly Sir Robert Cotton's library, and converſing with learned men, among whom, even in thoſe his younger years, he was in great eſteem. In his after years he was acquainted with the rarities in other nations: there was ſcarce a choice book in any eminent perſon's library in France, Italy, Germany or Rome itſelf, but he had his way to procure it, or what he deſired tranſcribed out of it; ſo that he was better acquainted with the pope's vatican than ſome that daily viſited it. The Puteani fratres, two learned men in Paris, holp him much with many tranſcripts out of Thuthanus, and others, between whom and him, many letters paſſed.

Now, tho' the reading of the fathers all over was a vaſt work, yet the pains he took out of the common road of learning in ſearching of records, and all the manuſcripts he could get throughout Chriſtendom, together with the knotty ſtudy of chronology and antiquity, was equal with if it did not exceed the other. Many volumes he alſo read only to attain to the knowlege of the uſe of words in ſeveral ages, as Galen, Hipocrates, &c. and moſt of the records in the tower of London; beſides, there was ſcarce the meaneſt book in his own library, but he remembred it even to admiration, and had in his head readily whatſoever he had read.

The firſt church preferment which he had, was given him by archbiſhop Loftus, a little before his death, which was the chancellorſhip of St. Patricks Dublin, unto which he took no other benefice. In that place Mr Camden found him when he was writing his Britannia, anno Chriſti 1607. and in his obſervations concerning Dublin, ſaith of him, 'Moſt of theſe I acknowlege to owe to the diligence, and labours of James Uſher, chancellor of the church of St. Patricks, who in various learning, and judgment, far exceeds his years.' In this preferment, tho' the law required not his preaching, but only in his courſe before the ſtate, yet would he not omit it in the place from whence he received his profits, and tho' he endowed it with a vicarage, yet went he thither in perſon, viz. to Finglas a mile from Dublin, and preached there every Lord's day, unleſs he were detained upon ſome extraordinary occaſions; and the remembrance that he had been a conſtant preacher, was a greater comfort to him in his old age, than all his other labours and writings.

His experiments in prayer were many, and very obſervable, God often anſwering his deſires in kind, and that immediately, when he was in ſome diſtreſſes; and God's providence in taking care, and providing for him in his younger years, as he often ſpake of it, ſo it wrought in him a firm reſolution to depend upon God in his latter days, whatever extremity he might be brought into.

Anno Chriſti 1607. when he was twenty ſeven years old he commenced batchellor of divinity, and immediately after he was choſen profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Dublin: at firſt he read twice a week, and afterwards once a week without intermiſſion throughout the year going through a great part of Belarmine's controverſies. In this employment he continued thirteen or fourteen years and was a great ornament to his place. Three volumes of thoſe his lectures written with his own hand he hath left behind him, and it would be a great honour to that univerſity where they were read, and benefit to many others, if they were publiſhed.

When he performed his acts for his degree, Latin ſermon, lectures, poſition, and anſwered the divinity act, he wrote nothing but only the heads of the ſeveral ſubjects, putting all upon the ſtrength of his memory, and preſent expreſſions, as alſo he did his Engliſh ſermons. His readineſs in the Latin tongue was inferior to none in theſe latter times, which after ſeventeen years diſuſe, from the time that he left his profeſſor's place, appeared when he moderated the divinity act, and created doctors to all mens admiration.

The proveſtſhip of the college of Dublin falling void he was unanimouſly elected thereto by all the fellows, he being then about thirty years of age, but foreſeeing, that upon the ſettlement of lands belonging to it, and the eſtabliſhing of other matters, he ſhould be much impeded and diſtracted in his ſtudies, he refuſed it, and ſo another was ſent out of England to fill it. The revenues of it were very conſiderable, whereby we may ſee how mean and little the things of the world ſeemed in his eyes, even in thoſe his younger years.

About this time the Iriſh prelates, eſpecially Dr Hampton, his predeceſſor in the ſee of Armagh, had obtained of king James his grant for reducing Ireland to the ſame eccleſiaſtical government of the church of England; the principal occaſion whereof was this, the Engliſh prelates a little before had uſed a great deal of ſeverity againſt the non conformiſts, their high commiſſion, and other courts, and canons, had driven many worthy and learned men into other countries, and ſome of them into Ireland; the Iriſh biſhops being weary of this reſort, as deſirous to advance their power to the ſame height with the Engliſh hierarchy, combined together, and obtained king James his commiſſion to Sir Arthur Chicheſter, earl of Belfaſt, a famous ſoldier and prudent governor, who was at this time lord deputy, and bore the ſword there eleven years together with very much honour, and eſteem in that nation. For the effecting of this, a great aſſembly of the Scots nation was convened.

In the commiſſion the king required them to conſult with Mr Uſher, whoſe learning, judgment, and eſteem would much conduce to the promoting of that work: but if he approved it not, the king required that they ſhould proceed no further, for that he would not be the author of any innovation among them.

This reſerve troubled the Prelates exceedingly, and therefore they reſolved to carry it cloſly; the king's letter to them, they tranſmitted from one to another, but acquainted not Mr Uſher, with them, intending to ſurprize him when the aſſembly was met; they ſhould come prepared and fortified, he would be taken on the ſudden. Howbeit God, that intended him for ſo great a good at that time in croſſing their deſign, that many faithful labourers in his vineyard might not by this their power be diſplaced, by a ſpecial providence gave him ſome light (though but very little) into the matter; and the manner was thus.

Mr Uſher going to viſit one of them, found him peruſing the king's letter; but upon his coming, he laid it down in his window, cloſed at both ends, only there was an open place in the middle, and as they were diſcourſing together, Mr Uſher glancing his eye upon it, eſpied his own name, and ſome other words about himſelf, of which he could not pick out the meaning; but yet he judged them to be of importance, as diſcipline, Ireland, England, &c. Mr Uſher thought it not prudence for him to take notice of thoſe hints, neither could he handſomely fiſh out the buſineſs from the biſhops, wherefore he went another way to work: and indeed the ſureſt way, by ſeeking counſel from God, communicating the matter to dear and a very godly man, whom he requeſted, that with ſome others, they would ſeek unto God for his aſſiſtance: for he believed that ſomething was in brewing that he might not know of. Herein imitating the practice of wiſe Daniel chap. ii. 17, 18.

This done, he ſtudied the rights of the Iriſh church, ſome fruits whereof we have in that learned piece of his called, "The religion profeſſed by the ancient Iriſh and Britiſh."

Britains." Yet he heard nothing till the assembly was summoned, and himself the next day was to be present at it; then went he to the lord deputy, to know the occasion of their meeting. The lord deputy would not believe at first that he could be a stranger to it; but afterwards, when Mr Usher had assured him that he had no information from the bishops about it, he was much displeased, and told him, that without him all the rest were but cyphers, for that the king had referred the whole business to his judgment, whether the power of the hierarchy should be established there as it was in England.

The next day the king's commission and letters were read in the assembly, and speeches were made concerning the excellency of the king's intention, to reduce that kingdom to one uniformity with England in ecclesiastical government; they also told him what honour the king had put upon him, whose esteem, learning, and judgement, the king so much depended upon for the promoting so great and good a work. Mr Usher replied, that he believed, that in a business of so great concernment, wherein he was so far interested, the king's intentions were, that he should have convenient time to consider of it before he delivered his opinion, which he also humbly desired.

The bishops answered, that his judgment was sufficiently known by his practice, and that they expected no more from him but his consent and concurrence with them. He replied, that the matter concerned more than himself, 'For (said he) if I had all mens consciences in my keeping, I could in these disputable cases give laws unto them, as well as unto myself; but it is one thing that I can do, and another thing what all other men must do.'

Then they asked of him, if he had any thing to say why they should not satisfy the king's desire? He, after a short pause, wherein he lifted up his heart unto God for direction, told them, that if they would grant him no longer time, he would, as well as he was able, give them his judgment, if that honourable assembly would grant him three requests; 1. A free hearing without interruption. 2. Liberty for him to answer any man that should be unsatisfied. 3. That there might be a final determination of the business at that meeting. These being all granted, Mr Usher undertook to prove, that such a jurisdiction could not be introduced into that kingdom, neither by the laws of God, nor by the civil or ecclesiastical constitutions of that kingdom, nor yet without the violation of the king's prerogative in that nation. All which he performed to admiration: but before he descended to particulars, he shewed the difference between conformity, as it was set up in England, and as it would be, if it were set up in Ireland.

'The kings (saith he) and queen of England, imposed their ceremonies, that thereby they might decline the charge of schismatics, wherewith the church of Rome labored to brand them, seeing it did appear hereby, that they left them only in such doctrinal points wherein they left the truth. Again, Hereby they would testify how far they would willingly stoop to win and gain them, by yielding to meet them, as far as they might, in their own way. But (saith he) the experience of many years hath found, that this condescension hath rather hardened them in their errors, than brought them to a liking of our religion. This being our usual saying, 'If our flesh be not good, why do you drink of our broth.'

'As for Ireland, wherein the English canons were never yet received, and the generality of the inhabitants were popish recusants; and even in popish kings times, there was no reception of the pope's ecclesiastical constitutions, because he encroached upon their temporals, if such laws now should be set up under so religious a protestant king, this would be to set the pope on horseback amongst them, which needed not.

The lord deputy, when he had finished his speech, and observed what was objected against it, told him, that he was much affected with every part of his learned speech; but that he was more especially concerned in that which touched upon the king's prerogative part, wherein he had discovered such hidden flowers of the crown, as he thought the king himself knew not; and therefore he said, as he would endeavour to preserve his majesty's right therein whilst he was his deputy, so he would present them to the king, and take care, that it should be very hard for any that came after him to rob him of them.

By this we may easily see that he was far from a prelatical spirit, that, on the contrary, he was an advocate for, and patron of godly and conscientious non conformists.

In the year 1612, he proceeded doctor of divinity, being created by archbishop Hampton, his predecessor: one of his lectures for his degrees was upon the seventy weeks to the slaying of the Messias, mentioned Dan. ix. 24. the other out of Rev. xx. 4. concerning the meaning of the prophesy, 'that the saints should reign with Christ a thousand years,' which in these times would be very seasonable, but it is lost.

Dr Hoyle, who died professor of divinity in Oxford, after he had many years been the like in Dublin, said, that when he went out doctor of divinity, he thought Tully himself could not have excelled him in eloquence, had he been alive, not only in his composed speeches, but in those which occasionally fell from him.

In the year 1613, he published his book, "De ecclesiarum Christianarum successione, et statu," magnified so much by Casaubon and Scultetus, in their Greek and Latin verses before it. It was solemnly presented by archbishop Abbot to king James, as the eminent first fruits of that college at Dublin. Indeed it is imperfect, for about three hundred years, from Gregory XI. to Leo X. viz. from the year 1371 to 1513, and from thence to this last century, which he intended (after the finishing of a book which he was now about) to have compleated, but the Lord prevented him.

In the year 1615, there was a parliament in Dublin, and consequently a convocation of the clergy, at which time those learned articles of Ireland were composed and published; and Dr Usher being a member of that synod, was appointed to draw them up: they were highly approved of by the most orthodox divines. They determine, according to St Austin, against the doctrine of the Pelagians; prove the man of sin, spoken of 1 Thess. ii. to be the bishop of Rome; and for the morality of the Sabbath; of both which this most learned doctor was very confident, and oft wished that some of our learned men of late had spared their pains, when they went about to prove the contrary. In defence of the last of these he wrote a most excellent and learned letter to Dr Twiss, who had desired his judgment about it.

He wanted not enemies, who sought to scandalize him to king James, under the title of a puritan, which was very odious to the king in those days, seeking hereby to prevent his further promotion; but God so ordered it that it proved an occasion of his advancement; for king James being jealous of him upon that score, by reason of the eminency of his learning, fell into serious discourse with him, and therein received such abundance of satisfaction, both of the soundness of his judgment and piety, that notwithstanding the opposition made by some great ones, without his seeking, he made him bishop of Meath in Ireland, which just then fell void whilst he was in England, and the king often boasted that he was a bishop of his own making.

Whilst he was thus bishop elect, he was chosen to preach before the house of commons, February 18. 1620. in Margaret's Westminster. The sermon, by order of the house, was printed, and is a most learned one.

Upon his return into Ireland, he was consecrated bishop of Meath, at Drogheda, by archbishop Hampton, with the assistance of two suffragan bishops, according to the custom; at which time there was given him an anagram of his name, as he was then to write himself, which was this, JAMES MEATH, 'I am the same;' and he made it good ever afterwards.

His preferment did not cause him to grow slack in his constancy of preaching, as it did too many, who having caught the fish, laid aside the net: but as Possidonius saith of St Austin, he was still the same; which he bound himself the rather unto by the motto of his episcopal seal, Væ mihi si non evangelizavero, 'Woe is me if I preach not not the gospel,' which he continued in the seal of his primacy also.

He had many papists in his diocess, whom he endeavoured to reclaim by private conferences, and at length they were willing to hear him preach, so it were not in a church, which he condescended to, and preached in the sessions house, and his sermon wrought so much upon some of them, that their priests forbad them hearing him in any place ever after.

In the year 1622 there were some papists censured in the star chamber for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, at which time he was called thither to inform them of it, before the sentence passed, which occasioned that learned speech of his upon that subject, since printed with his English works.

Whilst he was bishop of Meath, he answered a challenge sent him by the Jesuit Malone; and his going over into England to print it, occasioned another learned tractate of the universality of the church of Christ, and the unity of the catholic faith, in a sermon preached before king James, on Eph. iv. 13. 'Till we all come in the unity of the faith,' &c. And God's providence so ordered it, that whilst he was thus busied in England, archbishop Hampton dying, he was made his successor primate of Ireland in the year 1624; and he was the hundredth bishop of that see.

Being thus promoted to the highest preferment his profession was capable of in his native country, he was so far from being puffed up with pride, that he was more humble and frequent in preaching; and it so fell out, that for some weeks together, over-toiling himself in the work of the ministry, to the overwailing of his spirits which he did at the request of some Essex ministers, who importuned him to preach on the week days, because they could not come to hear him on the Sabbaths, he fell into a quartane ague, which held him three quarters of a year.

After his recovery, lord Mordant afterwards earl of Peterborough, being a papist, and desirous to draw his lady to the same religion, he was willing that there should be a meeting of two eminent persons of each party to dispute what might be in controversy between them. The lady made choice of our lord Primate, and prevailed with him, though newly recovered from the aforesaid long sickness, and scarce able to take such a journey. The Jesuite chosen by the earl, went under the name of Beamond, but his true name was Rookwood, brother to Ambrose Rookwood, one of the gun powder traitors. The place of meeting was at Drayton in Northamptonshire, where there was a great library, so that no books of the antient fathers were wanting, upon occasion, for their view. The points to be disputed on, were concerning transubstantiation, invocation of saints, worshipping of images, and the visibility of the church. Three days they were in this disputation, three hours in the forenoon, and two hours in the afternoon, each day; and the conclusion was this, After the third day of meeting, the lord primate having been hitherto opponent, now the tables were to be turned and the Jesuit, according to his desire, was to oppose and the lord primate to answer; but when the time came, and the Jesuit was expected, instead of coming, he sent his excuse to the lord Mordant, which was, that all the arguments which he had framed in his head, and pre meditated, so that he thought he had them as perfect as his Pater Noster, were now slipt from him, and he could not possibly recover them again; and that he believed it was a just judgment of God upon him, for undertaking of himself to dispute with a man of that eminency and learning, without a licence from his superior. The lord Mordant seeing his tergiversation, upon some further discourse with the lord primate, was converted and became a protestant, and so continued to his death.

One Challoner, a secular priest, afterwards writing a book against this Beamond, by way of scorn, bids him beware of coming any more to Drayton, lest he meet with another Usher to foil him again, to the dishonour of his profession, and himself.

The Lord having made his labours so successful, the countess of Peterborough had him always in great respect, and upon his losses in Ireland, and other distresses here, she took him home to her own house, with whom he lived about nine or ten years, and then died there.

In the year 1626, in August, he went back into Ireland, where he was entertained with all the expressions of love and joy that could be.

The discourses which daily fell from him at his table in clearing difficulties in the scripture and other subjects, (especially when learned men came to visit him) tended exceedingly to the edification of the hearers, so that it might well be said of him, as the queen of Sheba said to Solomon, 'Happy are these thy servants that stand continually about thee, and hear thy wisdom' And such was his humility withal, as that he would in practical subjects, apply himself to the capacity of the poorest and weakest Christian that came to him for information and satisfaction of their doubts. Nay, sometimes, he was more propense to communicate himself to such, than to others that were more learned; which strangers have wondered at, as the disciples marvelled at our Saviour's talking with the poor woman of Samaria, John iv. 27 and answering her questions, rather than taking notice of them. Indeed he was a mirror of humility: for though he was higher than any other from the shoulders upward, yet might many of his inferiors learn humility of him, as may appear in these few amongst many other examples.

1. In his public preaching no man more denied himself to preach Christ, insomuch as some that affected that fashion way of preaching by strong lines, as they call them, were much ashamed after they had heard him preach in Oxford, wherein he reproved and decried the Corinthian vanity in this kind. Also in one passage of his at the court before the king, he taught the bishops and doctors that then heard him thus; 'Great scholars said he, possibly may think that it stands not with all their credit and reputation to stoop so low, &c. But let the learnedest of us all try it when we will, and we shall find, that to lay this ground work right, that is, to apply ourselves to the capacities of a common auditory, and to make an ignorant man to understand these mysteries in some good measure, will put us to the trial of our skill, and will trouble us a great deal more, than if we were to discuss a controversy, or handle a subtile point of learning in the schools.' He was indeed another Paul, who determined 'to know nothing but Christ, and him crucified.' Nether was his speech or preaching 'with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but in the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power,' 2 Cor. ii. 2. 4.

2. In his private conversation he framed himself to the capacity of the meanest that conversed with him. He had an excellent gift of expressing himself both in Latin and English; and as he could soar with the eagle in polemic discourses, when he met with giants, so he would stoop to the lowest pigmies in practical subjects, and would apply himself to the poorest and weakest Christians. He was no dictator, nor would impose upon other men's judgments or consciences, but was as ready to receive from others, as to impart to them; and would much incline to vulgar Christians, rather than unto others that were more learned.

3. In his demeanour and behaviour he had high thoughts of others, and as low of himself; and that in every condition of his life, both in prosperity and adversity. Godly persons, of what rank soever, had great power with him; he would put them in his bosom, visit them in their sickness, supply their wants, beg their prayers, and countenance their cause and persons.

In his passage for Ireland, he sometimes lay at Neston for wind, where sundry times he preached to a plain country auditory: and whereas there were in that part of the country (where I lived about five years, when I first began my ministry) divers plain Christians, which were never called but by their Christian names; yet indeed were such as had not a bare form, but the life and power of godliness in them, so that I was never acquainted with more knowing Christians, for men and women of their rank; these he grew into familiar acquaintance with, would entertain them in his chamber, discourse with them, answer their questions, and satisfy their doubts. And when he was made archbishop, some of them told him, him, that now they muſt know their diſtance, and durſt not be ſo familiar with him as formerly: to whom he anſwered, That he was the ſame man ſtill, and they ſhould be as welcome to him as formerly, and accordingly uſed the ſame familiarity with them as he had wont to do. And when he lay at Cheſter, he would as ſoon preach at the requeſt of Mr Aſhbrook and Mrs Kirkman, (a godly woman of the meaner rank, whom I well know) as at the intreaties of the mayor and aldermen of that city, whereby he demonſtrated, 'that his delight was in the ſaints,' and that he was a 'companion of all them that feared God;' and this indeed was one reaſon that he roſe ſo high, he honoured God, and therefore God honoured him, 1 Sam. ii. 30.

Whilſt I lived in Warwickſhire, not much before the long-parliament begun, myſelf with two neighbour miniſters, made a journey to Oxford, where he then was, on purpoſe to deſire his judgment in ſome caſes, wherein we could not ſo well ſatisfy ourſelves; we found him at his lodgings in Chriſt church, where, before he would admit any ſpeech with us, he cauſed us to put on our hats, to ſit down by him, and then to ſpeak our minds; when I told him that we were come to requeſt his judgment in ſome difficulties, he preſently ſtopped me, ſaying, 'Mr Clarke, I ſhall freely tell you my judgment in any thing but about the Et cætera oath, concerning which I did ſpeak occaſionally, declaring my mind about it, and I have newly received a letter from two doctors, (whoſe names I forbear to inſert out of reſpect to them) who take me up as if I was a ſchool boy, (and withal he pulled the letter out of his pocket) adding, that in that regard he would ſay no more about that matter, &c. I replied, that we were ſufficiently ſatisfied about that oath, but the queſtions we had to propound were of another nature, wherein he gave us very full and clear ſatisfaction.

His cuſtom was to pray four times a day in and with his family; in the morning at ſix o'clock, in the evening at eight, and before dinner and ſupper in his chappel, at each of which he was always preſent.

On Friday, in the afternoon, there was conſtantly an hour ſpent in his chappel, in catechiſing upon the principles of religion, for the inſtructing of his family; and on Sabbaths, in the evening, the ſermon which he had preached in the forenoon, was repeated in his chappel by one of his chaplains.

In winter evenings, his conſtant manner was to ſpend two hours in comparing of old manuſcripts of the Bible, in Greek and Latin; in which work five or ſix aſſiſted him, and the variæ lectiones of each were taken by himſelf with his own hand.

In the year 1626, in Michaelmas term, there were ſome propoſals made, and offered to be aſſented to by the Iriſh papiſts, upon condition of a more full toleration of their religion, for the raiſing and maintaining of five hundred horſe, and five thouſand foot; wherein the proteſtants alſo muſt have born ſome ſhare. To conſider hereof, a great aſſembly of papiſts and proteſtants, of the whole nation, was appointed in lord deputy Faulkland's time: the place of their meeting was in the hall of the caſtle in Dublin; at which time the biſhops, by our lord primate's invitation, met at his houſe, where he and they drew up, and unanimouſly ſubſcribed a proteſtation againſt the toleration of popery: a copy whereof, becauſe it deſerves perpetual remembrance, is here inſerted.

The Judgment of the Archbiſhops, and Biſhops of Ireland, concerning the Toleration of Popery, which is applicable alſo againſt the Toleration of other Hereſies.

"The religion of the papiſts is ſuperſtitious and idolatrous; their faith and doctrine erroneous and heretical; their church, in reſpect of both, apoſtatical. To give them therefore a toleration, or to conſent that they may freely exerciſe their religion, and profeſs their faith and doctrine, is a grievous ſin, and that in two reſpects: For,

"1. It is to make ourſelves acceſſary, not only to their ſuperſtitions, idolatries, hereſies, and in a word, to all the abominations of popery, but alſo (which is a conſequent of the former) to the perdition of the ſeduced people, which periſh in the deluge of the catholic apoſtacy.

"2. To grant them a toleration, in reſpect of any money to be given or contribution to be made by them, is to ſet religion to ſale, and, with it, the ſouls of the people, whom Chriſt our Saviour hath redeemed with his moſt precious blood. And as it is a great ſin, ſo alſo a matter of moſt dangerous conſequence, the conſideration whereof we commend to the wiſe and judicious; beſeeching the zealous God of truth, to make them who are in authority zealous of God's glory, and of the advancement of true religion; zealous, reſolute, and courageous, againſt all popery, ſuperſtition, and idolatry." Amen.

This judgment of the biſhops, Dr George Downham, biſhop of Derry, at the next meeting of the aſſembly, which was April 23. 1627, publiſhed at Chriſt church, before the lord deputy and council, in the midſt of his ſermon, with this preamble, viz.

"Are not many amongſt us, for gain and outward reſpects, willing and ready to conſent to a toleration of falſe religions, thereby making themſelves guilty of a great offence, in putting to ſale (not only their own ſouls, but alſo) the ſouls of others? But what is to be thought of toleration of religion, I will not deliver my own private opinion, but the judgments of the archbiſhops and biſhops of this kingdom, which I think good to publiſh unto you, that, whatſoever ſhall happen, the world may know that we were far from conſenting to thoſe favours which the papiſts expect."

After he had publiſhed it, the people gave their votes with a general acclamation, crying, Amen.

The judgments of the biſhops prevailed ſo much with the proteſtants, that now the propoſals drove on very heavily; and after much debate of things, the lord deputy finding the diſcontents of both parties encreaſing, deſired our lord primate, as the fitteſt perſon, both in regard of his eſteem in the aſſembly, and being a member of the council, and therefore concerned in promoting of the king's buſineſs, to ſum up the ſtate of things, and to move them to an abſolute grant of ſome competency that might comply with the king's neceſſities, without any ſuch conditions; with which, upon their anſwer, he would ceaſe moving any further; which, upon very little warning, he did, with much prudence, according to his double capacity of a privy councellor and a biſhop: a copy of which ſpeech deſired of him by the lord deputy, was immediately tranſmitted into England; but it not being prevalent with the aſſembly to induce them to ſupply the king's wants, it was diſſolved.

Not long after, the lord deputy Falkland being called back into England, when he was to take boat at the water ſide, he reſerved our lord primate as the laſt perſon to take his leave of, and fell upon his knees on the ſands, and begged his bleſſing; which reverend reſpect ſhewed to him, gained a greater reputation to himſelf both in England and Ireland; and indeed from his younger years, the ſeveral lord deputies had always a great eſteem of him.

It was no ſmall labour to him to anſwer thoſe many letters which came to him from foreign parts, and our own nations, upon ſeveral occaſions; ſome for reſolution of difficulties in divinity, others about caſes of conſcience, and practical ſubjects.

Twelve of the moſt eminent divines in London, (who at his being here, were wont to apply themſelves to him as to a father, as Dr Sibs, Dr Preſton, &c. between whom and him there were moſt entire affections) wrote to him for his directions about a body of practical divinity, which he returned them accordingly.

He much endeavoured the augmentation of the maintenance of the ministry in Ireland, and for that end he had obtained a patent for impropriations to be passed in his name, for their use as they should fall, but it was too much neglected by themselves, whereby his desires were frustrated.

He preached every Lord's day in the forenoon, never failing unless he was disabled by sickness, in which he spent himself very much: In the afternoons, his directions to Dr Bernard his assistant were, that before public prayers he should catechise the youth, and that after the first and second lesson he should spend half an hour in a brief and plain opening the principles of religion in the public catechism; and therein he directed him to go, first through the creed at once, giving but the sum of each article, the next time to go through it at thrice, and afterwards to take each time one article, as they might be more able to bear it; and to observe the like proportionably in the ten commandments, the Lord's prayer, and the doctrine of the sacraments. The good fruit of which was apparent in the common people upon their coming to the communion, at which time, by order, the receivers were to send in their names, and some account was constantly taken of their fitness for it.

His order throughout his diocess to the ministers was, that they should go through the body of divinity once a-year, which he had accordingly drawn out into fifty heads.

When any public fast was enjoined, he kept it very strictly, preaching always first himself, and therein continuing at least two hours, in a more than ordinary manner enlarging himself in prayer. The like was done by those that assisted him in the duty.

His expences for books was very great, especially whilst he enjoyed the revenues of his archbishopric, a certain part whereof he laid aside yearly for that end, but especially for the purchasing of manuscripts and other rarities, as well from remote parts of the world, as near at hand. He was the first that procured the Samaritan Bible (which is only the pentateuch) to the view of these western parts of the world. It was sent him from Syria, by the way of Aleppo, in the year 1625. He had four of them sent him by a factor, whom he employed to search for things of that nature; and these were thought to be all that could there be had. One of these he gave to the library of Oxford; a second to Leyden, (for which Ludovicus de Dieu returns him public thanks, in a book that he dedicated to him); a third he gave to Sir Robert Cotton's library; and the fourth, after he had compared it with the other, he kept himself. The Old Testament in Syriac, another rarity also, was sent him from those parts not long after.

It might happily seem incredible unto some, to relate how many years ago he confidently foretold the changes which since are come to pass in Ireland and England, both in church and state, and of the poverty which himself should fall into, which he oft spake of in his greatest plenty.

In his book, called, "Ecclesiarum Britannicarum antiquitates, p. 556. he hath this remarkable passage, after he had largely related the manner of the utter destruction of the British church and state by the Saxons, about the year 550, as he found it in Gildas, he gives two reasons why he was so prolix in setting it down, 1. That the divine justice might the rather from thence appear to us, the sins of persons of all sorts and degrees being then come to the height, which occasioned not only shaking of the foundations of the British church and state; but the very destruction, and almost utterly overturning of them. 2. That even we now might be in the greater fear that our turn also is coming, and may be minded of that of the apostle, Rom. xi. 22. 'Behold the goodness and severity of God: On them which fell severity, but towards thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: other wise thou shalt be cut off.

He often acknowleged that sometimes in his sermons he hath resolved to forbear speaking of some things, but it proved like Jeremiah's fire shut up in his bones, that when he came to it, he could not forbear unless he would have stood mute, and proceeded no further.

He was very bold and free in the exercise of his ministry, sparing sin in none, yea, 'even before kings he was not ashamed to do it.'

He often, to his utmost, stood in the gap to oppose errors and false doctrines; he withstood to the face any toleration of popery and superstition, by whomsoever attempted. He was so fervent in his preaching, that that of the Psalmist might be applied to him, 'the zeal of thy house hath eaten me up.'

In the year 1624, he spake before many witnesses, and often repeated it afterwards, that he was persuaded that the greatest stroke to the reformed churches was yet to come; and that the time of the utter ruin of the Roman Antichrist should be when he thought himself most secure, according to that text, Rev. xviii. 7. 'When he shall say, I sit as a queen, and shall see no sorrow,' &c. His farewel sermon, in, or very near the place where he had lived in England, was then much observed, upon Jam. i. 25. 'Sin when it is finished brings forth death;' wherein he spake of the fulness of the sins of this nation, which certainly would bring great destruction; adding, that the 'harvest of the earth was ripe,' and the 'angel was putting in his sickle,' Rev. xiv. 18. applying also that of the Epha in the vision, Zech. v. when it was filled with wickedness, and that of the Amorites, who when their iniquities were come to the full were destroyed. He often also hinted the same in his private discourses, and many that heard them, laid these his sayings up in their hearts, and by what hath already fallen out, do measure their expectations for the future.

At the last time of his being in London, he much lamented, with great thoughts of heart, the woful divisions, and the deadly hatred which he saw kindled in the hearts of Christians one against another, by reason of their several opinions in maters of religion; and observing how some opposed the ministry, both to office and maintenance: Others raised and spread abroad damnable doctrines, heresies and blasphemies: upon which considerations he was confident, that the enemies which had sown up and down the nation, were Priests, Friars and Jesuits, and such like popish agents, sent out of their seminaries from beyond the seas in sundry disguises, who encreasing here in number in London and elsewhere, do expect a great harvest of their labours; and he was persuaded, that if they were not timely prevented by a severe suppressing of them, the issue would be either an inundation of popery, or a massacre, or both; adding withal, how willing he was, if the Lord so pleased, to be taken away from that evil to come, which he confidently expected, unless there were some speedy reformation of these things.

Anno Christi 1634. A little before the parliament began in Ireland, there was a letter sent over from the late King to the Lord-deputy and council; for determining the question of the precedency between the Primate and Archbishop of Dublin; the question was nothing as to their persons, but in relation to their sees. This good man out of his great humility, was hardly drawn to speak to that argument; but being commanded, he shewed in it a great deal of learning, and rare observations in matters of antiquity, so that the business was determined on his side, who afterwards by another letter, procured without his seeking, had the precedency given him of the Lord Chancellor. These things took little with him, but were rather burdens to him who was not in the least elated, or puffed up thereby. At that parliament, he preached the first day of it before the Lord-deputy, and the Lords and Commons, in St. Patrick's, Dublin. His text was, Gen. xlix. 10. 'The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet till Shiloh come, and to him shall the gathering of the people be.'

At the beginning also of the parliament Anno Christi 1639. he preached before the same auditory on Deut. xxxiii. 4. 5. 'And Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob, and he was a king in Jesurun, when the heads of the people, and the tribes of Israel were gathered together.' Both which texts, as they were pertinent, so were they handled with rare judgment and eminent learning.

The Lord was pleased to make his labours very successful, some few instances whereof I shall here set down some ſome of which I had from my reverend friend Mr Stanly Gower, the laſt from my own knowlege.

A Lord's eldeſt ſon, who from his cradle had been trained up in popery, but was of excellent parts and learning, was at laſt prevailed with by his father, to ſojourn for a while with this learned prelate in Drogheda; the prudent prelate ſtudied nothing more than how he might take him by craft, as the apoſtle did the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xii. 16. and therefore did not preſently fall into diſcourſe with him about his religion, but recreated himſelf for a time in diſcourſing with him about ſome philoſophical queſtions and ſchool-points, in which ſtudies he perceived the gentleman was well verſed, and took much delight in them: this, he continued, till at laſt he gained ſo far upon his affections, that of his own accord he moved ſome diſcourſe about matters of religion; and then finding him ſtudious, he did not preſently go about to inſtruct him in the truth, but fought to puzzle him with doubts about his own religion; by this means the gentleman's conſcience began to be awakened; nor were his ſcruples removed, though he had recourſe to a monaſtery hard by, where they were debated; ſo that at laſt, he came with tears to the learned primate for ſatisfaction, and he promiſed to deal faithfully with him; 'But, ſaith he, thoſe whom you truſt do not ſo, for they will not ſuffer you to ſee with your eyes, nor to underſtand the Scripture, but according to their churches commentaries.' Then did he adviſe him to go amongſt them, and to aſk them, whether he that underſtood the originals might examine their interpretations, and to bring him word what they ſaid. And, accordingly he did ſo, and brought him word, that they were divided in their judgments.

Then did the learned prelate wiſh him no longer to continue in implicit faith, and he would demonſtrate to him how much they perverted the ſenſe of the Scriptures, and abuſed the writings of the ancient fathers, whilſt they ſought to make the world believe, that the fathers and councils were wholly for them and againſt us: 'And if, ſaith he, you diſtruſt your own learning and reading, and will make choice of any other, who you think can ſay more, I will make this good which I have ſaid before the beſt of them all.'

This was an introduction to much confidence which the gentleman had in him; and it pleaſed God after much temptation which he had to the contrary, as he confeſſed, to direct him to betake himſelf to prayer; after which time he acknowleged, that he underſtood more of the way of truth, both when he conferred with the primate, and when he meditated apart, than ever he could attain to before; and the iſſue was, that he came into the church unlooked for of the primate, and after ſermon, made a confeſſion of his faith, offering to ſeal the truth of it, if they pleaſed to admit him, by receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's ſupper, which was then to be adminiſtred.

The papiſts, eſpecially the prieſts were ſo enraged thereat, for loſing ſuch an one of whom they conceived ſo great hopes, that they made ſuch diſturbance, inſomuch as the gentleman for ſafety was ſent over into England to Oxford, that he might decline their fury; and the lords of the city were raiſed to prevent the preſent danger: and the Lord deputy hearing of it, ſent a troop of horſe, and, as it was ſaid, thereupon diſſolved one of their monaſteries. Another was this,

The Lady Falkland, about the time of the late Queen's coming out of France to be married to King Charles, turned recuſant, and on a time was gotten into the company of Father Fiſher, Father Sweet, and Father Sweetman in Drury-lane, and by ſome means or other, Dr Featly, and Mr Gataker, were procured to meet them there; the Lord Savil, brother to this Lady, as he alſo was going that way, accidentally met with Dr Uſher, and entreated him to go along with him to this meeting; the biſhop conſented, and by the way requeſted the Lord Savil at their firſt entrance privately to give notice to his ſiſter the Lady Falkland, that ſhe ſhould take no notice of him, and ſaith he, 'I will do the like to the miniſters, and as for the Jeſuits, I believe, they know me not at all.

At their firſt entrance, they found them engaged about image worſhip; the Jeſuits denied that they gave them divine worſhip; the miniſters were proving, that they were no fit mediums to worſhip God by. After they had tugged at it, and were wearied, and ready to give over that queſtion, Biſhop Uſher ſaid, 'But, gentlemen, pray you tell me, do not you give them divine worſhip? they anſwered, no: How then, ſaith he, will you be tried? They anſwered, by the council of Trent. Indeed, ſaid the biſhop, that council doth require the giving of worſhip to them, but who ſhall expound what that honour and worſhip is, and aſſure us that it is not divine? Will you be determined by Thomas Aquinas? They ſaid, yes. Then was the book ſent for, and he turned preſently to the place where he concludes, that the ſame reverence is to be given to the image of Chriſt, as to Chriſt himſelf, and by conſequence, ſeeing Chriſt is adored with the worſhip of Latria, his image alſo is to be adored with the ſame worſhip. Now, ſaid the biſhop, have you any higher worſhip than the Latria that you give to God? Upon this one of the Jeſuits whiſpered to the Lady Falkland, to know his name that thus diſputed? She anſwered, that he was a country miniſter. No, quoth the Jeſuit, there is more in him than in both the other. Try him, ſaid ſhe, further.

That queſtion being laid aſide, that of free-will was taken up; the biſhop ſat ſilent as before, whilſt the ſtate of the queſtion was canvaſſed between the Miniſters and Jeſuits, and much ado there was about it, ſo that they had like to have broken off without coming to any iſſue; the biſhop ſeeing that, ſaid, 'Gentlemen, if you will give me leave, I will bring you to the point in difference preſently by this ſimilitude. If you make free will to be the horſe, I will make grace to be his rider. Now, true it is, my horſe can go of himſelf, but he knows not whither I intend to go: beſides, he is dull and tired, and I ſpur him on; my ſpur doth not properly go, but it makes my horſe to go.' You may eaſily apply it; but the Jeſuits had enough, and liſted not to encounter him any farther, pretending a neceſſity to be gone, and ſo left the place: ſo mightily it pleaſed God by him to convince them.

Another was this: A proteſtant Knight in Ireland, had prevailed ſo far with his Lady, who was then a papiſt, as to admit of a parley about their religion, and ſhe made choice of one for her, that was called amongſt them, The rock of learning. The Knight made choice of this our Primate to encounter him, and upon the day appointed many perſons of note were there aſſembled: the learned and prudent Primate before the diſputation began, ſpake thus to the Lady, 'Madam, ſaid he, let us know the end of our meeting. Is it that this Gentleman and I ſhould try our ſtrength before you? If ſo, then it is like we can ſpeak languages, and quote authors which you do not underſtand, how then will you know who gets the better? Therefore this is not our end: If this Gentleman deſires to ſhew his learning and reading that way, if he pleaſe to come to the College of Dublin, where there are men that will underſtand us both, and can judge between us, I ſhall willingly deal with him at thoſe weapons, but now our buſineſs is ſomething elſe: it is ſuppoſed, that we two, whom your huſband and you have choſen, can ſpeak more for the defence of our religion, and your deſire is to know by hearing our diſcourſe in your own language, how to rectify your judgments. Now therefore I will give you a rule, which if you pleaſe to remember, you ſhall be able to diſcern which of us two have the truth on our ſide, and it is this:

The points we will diſcourſe of ſhall be ſuch, without ſome knowlege whereof no man can in an ordinary way attain to the end of his faith, the ſalvation of his ſoul. In theſe you may eaſily loſe yourſelves, not only by hereſy, which is a flat denying of them, but by ignorance alſo, by a bare not knowing of them. The word of truth contained in the Scriptures, is the rule of faith and life, common to ſmall and great concerning theſe things: Now, whilſt we keep to the true ſenſe of the ſcriptures in theſe points, you may underſtand both; but when we ſhall fly to ſubtle diſtinctions to evade plain texts, or fly from the ſcriptures to take ſanctuary in authors which you know not, aſſure yourſelves that we are at a loſs, and ſeek victory rather than truth. Keep this rule, Madam in your mind, for this Gentleman dares not deny it to be a true one, and then you will be the better for our meeting. 'And now, Sir, ſaid he to the Jeſuit, her champion, I am ready to engage with you in any ſuch points.'

The

The diſpute was begun, and after a ſhort encounter, the Jeſuit was driven to thoſe ſhifts; whereupon the Primate ſaid, 'Madam, do you underſtand my argument that I propounded to this Gentleman? She anſwered, Yes. and do you, ſaid he, underſtand this Gentleman's anſwer? No indeed, it is too high for me: But, ſaid the Primate, I do, and can anſwer him in his own way. but then you would not underſtand me neither: Therefore, Sir, ſaid he to the Jeſuit, I pray you help the Lady to underſtand your anſwer as ſhe doth my argument, then I will further reply.' But it pleaſed God within a while, ſo to diſable the Jeſuit from proceeding, that he left the place with ſhame; and the Lady by this and ſome further endeavours, became not only a good Proteſtant, but a very gracious woman.

The laſt inſtance I ſhall give of the ſucceſsfulneſs of his labours, is this, about twelve or thirteen years ago, we had an ordination of miniſters in our ſeventh claſſis: at which time, according to our cuſtom, we called in the young men that were to be ordained one after another, and examining them about the work of God's grace in their hearts, three of them acknowleged that they were converted upon the labours of this our Lord Primate, whilſt he preached at Oxford, where they then were ſtudents about the beginning of the parliament.

Anno Chriſti 1640. He came out of Ireland into England, being invited thereto by ſome eminent perſons, wherein the ſpecial providence of God, did manifeſt itſelf for his preſervation, it being the year before the rebellion brake out in Ireland; as if, according to the Angel's ſpeech to Lot, nothing could be don there till he was come hither, and eſcaped to this his Zoar.

His library, which was very great, in the firſt year of the rebellion, viz. 1641. was in Drogheda, which place was beſieged four months by the Iriſh rebels, and they made no queſtion of taking it, and ſome of their prieſts and friars talked much what a prize they ſhould gain by that library; but the barbarous multitude ſpoke of burning it. But it pleaſed God to hear the faſtings and prayers of his people within and in a wonderful manner to deliver them, and ſo all the books and manuſcripts were ſent him that Summer to Cheſter, and from thence were brought very ſafe to London.

The ſufferings he lay under were many and great. All his perſonal eſtate was loſt, and that which belonged to his primacy in Ireland was deſtroyed, only for the preſent he was preacher in Covent Garden.

Anno Chriſti 1641. The great buſineſs of the Earl of Stafford came in agitation, upon which a ſcandal was raiſed upon him, by a raſh if not a malicious in his vocal forreſt, as if he had made uſe of a pretended diſtinction of a perſonal and political conſcience, to ſatisfy our gracious King, that he might conſent to the beheading of the ſaid Earl, telling him, that though he firſt reſiſted, yet he might do it by the ſecond; but to clear him of this, a perſon of quality affirmed under his hand, that ſome years ago a rumour being ſpread of the death of this reverend Prelate, whoſe loſs was much lamented at Oxford; when this concerning the Earl was then by one objected againſt him, the King anſwered that perſon in a very great paſſion, and with an oath proteſted his innocency therein. Beſides, he left under his own hand a relation of that whole buſineſs, a true copy whereof followeth.

"That Sunday morning wherein the King conſulted with the four Biſhops, viz. London, Durham, Lincoln and Carliſle, the Arch biſhop of Armagh was not preſent, but then preaching, as he then accuſtomed to do every Sabbath in the church of Covent Garden, where a meſſage coming to him from his Majeſty, he deſcended from the pulpit, and told the meſſenger, that he was then, as he ſaw, employed in God's buſineſs, which as ſoon as he had done, he would attend upon the King to underſtand his pleaſure: but the King ſpending the whole afternoon in the ſerious debate of the Lord Stafford's caſe with the Lords of his council, and the Judges of the land, he could not before evening be admitted to the King's preſence."

"There the queſtion was again agitated, 'Whether the King in juſtice might paſs the bill of Attainder againſt the Earl of Stafford?' For that he might ſhew mercy to him was no queſtion at all no man doubting but that the king without any ſcruple of conſcience might have granted him a pardon, if other reaſons of ſtate, (in which the biſhops were made neither judges nor advifers) did not hinder him. The whole reſult therefore of the Biſhops determination, was to this effect; That herein the matter of fact, and the matter of law were to be diſtinguiſhed; that of the matter of fact, he himſelf might make a judgment, having been preſent at all the proceedings againſt the ſaid lord; where, if upon hearing all the allegations, on either ſide, he did not conceive him guilty of the crimes wherewith he was charged, he could not in juſtice condemn him. But for the matter in law, what was treaſon, and what was not, he was to reſt in the opinion of the judges, whoſe office it was to declare the law, and who were ſworn therein to carry themſelves indifferently betwixt him and his ſubjects, &c.

Upon his loſſes in Ireland, and the ſtraits he was brought into here, two offers were made unto him from foreign nations; the one from Cardinal Richlieu, only in relation to his eminent learning, with a promiſe of large maintenance, and liberty to live where he pleaſed in France among the proteſtants. The other from the eſtates of Holland, who proffered him the place of being Honorarius profeſſor at Leiden, which had an ample ſtipend belonging to it; but he refuſed both.

And now by reaſon of the diſturbance of the time, he was perpetually removed, having with St. Paul, no certain dwelling place, and ſome of thoſe evidences mentioned by that great doctor of the Gentiles to prove himſelf to be the miniſter of Chriſt, were applicable to him. 2 Cor. vi. 3 &c. In much patience, in afflictions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes, in tumults, or toſſings to and fro; in labours, in watchings and faſtings. By honour and diſhonour: by evil report, and good report: as deceivers, and yet true: as unknown, and yet well known: as dying, and behold we live: as chaſtned and not killed: as ſorrowful, and yet always rejoicing: as poor, yet making many rich: as having nothing, and yet poſſeſſing all things, &c."

Anno Chriſti 1642. he obtained leave of both houſes of parliament, to go to Oxford for his ſtudy in that library. Anno Chriſti 1644. the late king coming thither, he preached before him on the fifth of November. His text was Neh. iii, 11. 'And our adverſaries ſaid, they ſhall not know, neither ſee, till we come in the midſt among them, and ſlay them, and cauſe their work to ceaſe.' In his ſermon he adviſed his hearers to put no repoſe in the papiſts, who (ſaith he) upon the firſt opportunity will ſerve us here, as they have done the poor proteſtants in Ireland, which much offended ſome that were then preſent.

In March following he went from thence into Wales to Cardiff in Glamorganſhire, where for a time he bode with his daughter: but September. 16. Anno Chriſti 1645, he removed from thence to St. Donnets, (the lady Stradlings,) and by the way meeting with ſome ſoldiers, they uſed him barbarouſly, plucked him off his horſe, and broke open two of his trunks full of books, taking them all away: among thoſe he loſt two manuſcripts of the hiſtory of the Waldenſes, moſt of his books he recovered again; but theſe manuſcripts, tho' the meaneſt clad, he could never hear of, which gave ſuſpicion that ſome prieſt or jeſuite had lighted upon them. The loſs of them grieved him much, they being of uſe to him for the finiſhing of that book, De Eccleſiarum Chriſtianarum ſucceſſione, & ſtatu.

Not long after he fell into a painful ſickneſs, wherein he bled four days together, ſo that he ſwooned, and all hope of life was paſt, and a rumour was ſpread abroad that he was dead, which occaſioned grief to many; and it was ſo far believed at court, that a letter came over for a ſucceſſor in his primacy in Ireland: but it pleaſed God that he recovered, and June 11. anno Chriſti 1646 he came to London, where the counteſs of Peterborough gladly received him.

After a while, he was choſen to be preacher to the honourable ſociety of Lincolns Inn, where he continued divers years with great honour, and reſpect from them, till at the laſt, loſing his ſight, ſo that he could not read read his text, and his ſtrength decaying, he was adviſed by his friends to forbear, and to reſerve himſelf, and the remainder of his ſtrength for the writing of books, which were yet expected from him. No ſpectacles could help his ſight, only when the ſun ſhone he could ſee at a window, which he hourly followed from room to room in the houſe of his abode: in winter the caſement was often ſet open for him to write at. This ſummer he conceived would be the laſt, wherein he ſhould make uſe of his eyes; the winter following he intended to have an Amanuenſis to write for him, and a competent ſalary was intended for him whom he ſhould chooſe to that work: but the Lord was pleaſed to prevent it by taking him to the ſight of himſelf.

After he had left Lincolns Inn, he was prevailed with to preach in ſeveral places, as in Grays Inn, Nov. 5. anno 1654. which he then thought might have been his laſt ſermon, and it was taken as an honour by that honourable ſociety, whereof he had been admitted a member at a reading above thirty years before: he preached alſo at the temple at Mr Selden's funeral, and at two other places in the city, both which the Lord was pleaſed to make very effectual in the converſion of divers that were his hearers: and indeed ſeldom did the ſword drawn by him, return empty. The laſt ſermon which he preached was about Michaelmas, anno 1655. at Hammerſmith.

He complained that he was much troubled, finding himſelf unable to continue his miniſtry; his thoughts were on it in the day, and his dreams in the night; and tho' he had been a preacher about fifty and five years, and ſo like the Levites might well be excuſed from this ſervice of the ſanctuary, and have employed himſelf (as his manner was) in directing of others, yet he reſolved, if God continued his life the ſummer following, to return to it again in ſome ſmall church or chappel.

He ſought no great things for himſelf: in the time of his diſtreſs by reaſon of his loſſes in Ireland, the parliament for ſome years was bountiful to him; but the two laſt years of their ſitting, it fell out to be ſuſpended. But after they were diſſolved, the care of him was renewed by the lord protector, by whoſe order a conſtant competent allowance was given him, which was continued till his death, beſides very conſiderable ſums extraordinary.

All that knew him, found him very communicative, not only of his ſtudies for the advantage of their minds, but of part of his ſtipend, for the relief of their bodies; and indeed in works of charity he more needed a bridle, than a ſpur.

He was not ſo ſevere in his judgment about Epiſcopacy, as to diſown other reformed churches, but declared that he loved and honoured them, as true members of the church univerſal, and was ready for the miniſters of Heſſen, France, &c. to teſtifie his communion with them.

He was a man of moſt examplary moderation, meekneſs, humility, and ingenuity. Anno 1641, he drew up an expedient to accomodate ſome of our differences in eccleſiaſtical affairs, which ſome moderate men of both parties were ready to ſubſcribe. But in matters of doctrine for the ſubſtantials, it was often his charge, that miniſters ſhould not preach any thing, as to pleaſe men, but God, who hath put them in truſt, 1 Theſ. ii. 4. For ſuch as ſeek to 'pleaſe men, are not the ſervants of Chriſt,' Gal. i. 10. And in defence of thoſe truths, no man was more reſolute and conſtant than he, 'not giving place by way of ſubjection, no, not for an hour,' Gal. ii. 5. but in circumſtantials, he thought it to be our duty with St. Paul, 'to pleaſe all men, and not ourſelves,' in all things, 1 Cor. x. 31. to edification and concord,' he was in thoſe things always the ſame; 'holding faſt the form of ſound words in doctrine' and practice to the laſt.

The night before he left London, oh! the humble expreſſions he uſed of his own unworthineſs, demeaning himſelf as if he had been the leaſt of ſaints, which he uttered with many tears: he wiſhed thoſe about him to prepare for afflictions and trials, which he was perſuaded, were not far from them. Having abode at London one and fifty days, for ſo it was punctually noted by himſelf in a book, it being his cuſtom, with David ſo to number his days, both for the place where, and the manner how he ſpent them, he returned to Rygate Feb. 13. 1655. to the counteſs of Peterſboroughs.

March the 20 following, was the firſt day of his ſickneſs, upon which day (as every day) he had been well buſied. Moſt part of it, as long as he had light, he had ſpent at his ſtudy, proceeding in his Chronologia ſacra, clearing all the doubts in his annals of the Bible, in which he had gone ſo far as to the book of Judges, where the laſt words he wrote were theſe, Hic præterea notandum, but returned not to make any further progreſs. From his ſtudy, he went to viſit a ſick gentlewoman in that family, and preſcribed to her moſt excellent preparatives for death, with other moſt holy advice in practical matters, in which he ſpent three quarters of an hour, but in ſuch an heavenly manner, as if, like Moſes upon mount Nebo, his eyes had been ſtrengthned to take a propect of the heavenly Canaan.

That night about eight o'Clock, he firſt complained of his hip, judging it to be a ſpice of the Sciatica, which he had been troubled with about five and thirty years before, contracted by ſitting up late in the college library at Dublin; but by the application of an ointment, he was preſently eaſed of that pain, ſo that he took ſome reſt that night. In the morning he complained of a great pain in his ſide, whereupon a phyſician was ſent for, who uſed ſuch means as he judged fit for him; but the pain continuing, and his ſpirits decaying, he wholly addicted himſelf to prayer, only upon the abating of the torment, he adviſed thoſe about him in health to prepare for ſickneſs, and death, that then they might have nothing elſe to do but to die; and after a ſhort ſettlement of the things of this world, he took great content in his approaching death.

A miniſter there preſent aſſiſted him with his prayers, but afterwards he deſired to be left to his own private prayers. The laſt words he was heard to utter (which was about one o'Clock in the afternoon, and a little before his death) were theſe; praying for the forgiveneſs of his ſins, he added, 'But Lord in ſpecial forgive my ſins of omiſſion: herein he had his wiſh, which he often uſed, that he might die as holy Mr Perkins did, who expired with crying for mercy and forgiveneſs.

But tho' he did pray for pardon of his ſins of omiſſion; yet he was a perſon that was never known to omit an hour, but was always employed in his maſter's buſineſs, either in preaching, reading, writing, or hearing others (as of late) to read to him; either reſolving doubts, or exhorting, inſtructing and counſelling ſuch as came to viſit him; yet did he die with this humble expreſſion, 'Lord forgive my ſins of omiſſion.' A ſpeech that may give us all matter of ſolemn meditation, and imitation.

March 21. anno Chriſti 1655. this glorious ſun ſet and from earth was tranſlated to heaven, having been primate of Ireland juſt one and thirty years, and a preacher five and fifty years, and having lived about ſeventy five years. What he had to leave was only his library, and diverſe imperfect copies of his intended works, which death prevented his finiſhing of.

The lord protector (as he was then called) gave him an honourable burial at the publick charge, in the chappel of Henry the ſeventh at Weſtminſter, and extended to his, what was before intended for himſelf in the grant of ſome of the lands belonging to the primacy of Armagh for the term of one and twenty years.

He was highly admired, and much honoured by all the famous lights of his time through the chriſtian world, Spanhemius, divinity profeſſor at Geneva, anno Chriſti 1639. in his epiſtle dedicatory to him, before his third part Dubiorum Evangelicorum, ſpends above two leaves in extolling him: ſome of the expreſſions are; 'Your very great parts, moſt excellent Uſher, are known, not only within your own country, but in ours, and wherſoever elſe there is honour given to piety, or price ſet upon learning, &c.' He ſpeaks much of his charity to ſtrangers, his humility, piety, works, his library, of which he made ſuch uſe for the public good, that it was not ſo much his own as the library of all learned men: in a word, ſaith he, the name of Uſher with us is a name of piety and vertue, it is of great renown at our Geneva.

Gerard Vossius frequently admires him as a man of vast learning, worthy of an everlasting monument. 'The high merit, saith he, of this most excellent and throughout most learned man, both of the church and of the whole common-wealth of learning, deserve an everlasting grateful memory: a man so excellent in the knowlege both of human and divine things, that I cannot speak any thing so high of him, but his worth doth surpass it.'

Bochartus and Simplicius, calls him frequently, Magnum Usherium: Usher the great.

Morus in his oration at Geneva dedicated to him, stiles him, 'The most excellent servant of God; the most reverend man of God; the Athanasius of our age. Thy breast, saith he, is a breathing library: thou art to Britain as Austin was to Hippo: Farewel Britain's great honour.'

Ludovicus de Dieu in his animadversions on the Acts dedicated to him, entitles him, 'To the excellent prelate worthy of an eternal memory,' &c.

Paulus Testardus Blesensis stiles him, Seculi, & Ecclesiæ decus eximium, the greatest honour of the church and age.

Arnoldus Boetius, saith of him, That he did excel with a most singular judgment in the Oriental languages, and in all other abstruse, and deep learning: venerable to all Europe, whose authority prevails much with all men, &c.

Mr Selden saith of him, 'The most reverend prelate James Usher, a man of great piety, singular judgment, learned to a miracle, and born to promote the more severe studies, &c.

Dr Prideaux calls him, 'The most rich magazine of solid learning, and of all antiquity.

Dr Davenant speaks thus of him, 'A man of singular piety, abounding with all manner of learning.

Sir Roger Twisden acknowledging the assistance he had from him in his history, saith thus, 'This we owe to the most worthy archbishop of Armagh, in whom with incredible learning, and rare knowlege of antiquity, his most courteous conversation, and wonderful sweetness, in instructing the unskilful, mixed with a certain serious episcopal gravity, were seen to strive one with the other, &c.

There was an eminent character given of him by the whole university of Oxford, in the year 1644. by solemn order in the convocation, which was given in charge to sixteen eminent persons, of whom seven were doctors chosen with the vice chancellor and proctors, to see his effigies cut, and an elogium worthy of him, to be prefixed to his annotations on Ignatius his epistles (there then in the press) and at the charges of the university, and in the public name of it. Indeed it was omitted to that book, but was afterwards affixed to his book De Symbolis; the elogium is this, 'James Usher Arch-bishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland, the most skilful of primitive antiquity, the unanswerable defender of the orthodox religion, the maul of errors, in preaching frequent, eloquent, very powerful, a rare example of an unblameable life.'

Yea for his learning, his very adversaries being judges, those of the church of Rome have acknowleged. A certain Jesuite in a book called Hybernia Vindicia, writing against Dempster, a Scots man, who had undervalued the Irish for learning, after he had reckoned up many learned men of his own, and other orders of that nation, at length he adds this of our Primate, 'And if I should put in men of a different religion, I might truly say, Scotland never saw another Usher, whose sublime wit, and most courteous behaviour, I wish that unlucky education amongst sectaries had not been his step-mother. Divers others of his popish adversaries might be mentioned, but I forbear, and shall add only the testimony of Dr William Chappel, sometime fellow of Christ's college, in Cambridge, and afterwards provost of Trinity-College, Dublin, who was very judicious, and a great learned man: he gave three reasons why he thought our primate to be the greatest scholar in the Christian world.

1. Because of his rare natural parts, having a quick invention, a prompt wit, a strong memory, a clear understanding, piercing judgment, and a ready utterance. Seldom, said he, do all these meet in an eminent degree in the same person; but in him they so concurred, that it is hard to say in which of them he most excelled.

2. Because few men had made so rich an improvement of these parts; nor indeed had such means, by reason of the choice libraries which he had the use of, viz. his own, Dr Chaloner's, the university library at Dublin, which he had frequent access unto, besides the university libraries, and Sir Robert Cotton's in England. He had also taken indefatigable pains in studying, and that for many years together, which few other men's bodies and brains could bear.

3. Because in these, and in the university beyond the seas, he was so esteemed; and whosoever conversed with him, found him a skilful linguist, a subtile disputant, a fluent orator, a profound divine, a great antiquary, an exact chronologer; and in brief, a living, and walking library; insomuch that the greatest professors admired the concatenation of so much learning in one person.

The Life and death of Mr RICHARD CAPEL, who died ANNO Christi, 1656.

MR RICHARD CAPEL was born in the city of Glocester, anno Christi 1586. of good parentage descended from an ancient family of the gentry of his own name, in Herefordshire, and of alliance to the lord Capel, (but he had learned with brave Philpot, to tread that under his feet) his father was a stout man, and an alderman of that city: a fast friend, first to Mr Thomas Prior, and afterwards to Mr John Workman, (having had a principal hand in drawing of him thither) both of them men of great sufficiency for the preaching of the gospel, and instruments that the Lord made much use of, for the advancement of the true saving knowlege of himself, and for the setting up of the real, and substantial power of godliness in that city, during the time that they exercised their ministry there. His elder brother yet lives, and is an alderman in that place.

After

After he had been trained up at ſchool, and well fitted for it, he was ſent to the univerſity of Oxford, where his diligence and proficiency was ſuch, that he was choſen fellow of Magdalen-College, and had the breeding up of ſome there, who afterwards proved excellent and eminent ſcholars: as Dr Frewen (who was always a thankful man to him for his education) and famous Mr Premble, who ended his days at his houſe, &c. His attendance at court upon the chiefeſt favourite (in the days of that learned king James) gave him opportunity of advancement, if his thoughts had been bent that way: but he ſought not great things for himſelf; yet continued at court till the death of Sir Thomas Overbury, that learned knight and his very good friend, and then he bad adieu to that courſe of life.

As for his inward ſtorms they were very many, and exceeding bitter, (which alſo were accompanied with many bodily infirmities, which attended him in his younger years) but it was well for him that he bore the yoke in his youth: and there were none that knew ſo much of his temptations and deſertions, as that eminent and learned divine, Dr Harris, by reaſon of that intimate acquaintance he had with him in thoſe days (being his kinſman) which alſo was occaſioned the more, by the often recourſe he had then into thoſe parts, for the fetching of ſome ſpiritual refreſhing from that man of God, Mr John Dod, who was both able and willing, 'to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to a broken and contrite heart.

For the eminency of his parts, there were very few that could match him. The moſt, even of our moſt high-flown eagles, have commonly ſome peculiar gift wherein they moſt excel, and by it do very good ſervice to Chriſt, and his church; but this man has graſped all good learning, and made every thing his own ſo evenly to ſee to, that he was very expert in the ſame, and would (with Cato the elder) be up in the height, in all that ever he was to act in.

Melanchthon uſed to ſay, that Pomeranus was the grammarian: that himſelf was the logician: that Juſtus Jonas was the orator: but that Luther was all in all: here was one that was not inferior to Luther. If he pleaſed to turn to the ſchool, or to caſe-divinity: to Auguſtine, or Chryſoſtome: to Galen, or Hippocrates: to Ariſtotle, or Tully: to hiſtory, or philoſophy, to arts or tongues, who could tell but himſelf, which of them he was beſt verſed in? he was a very living library, a full ſtore-houſe of all kind of good literature, no leſs than a little univerſity, the mirror of thoſe parts, and above the envy of the moſt.

The leaſt draught of his pencil, would have told any Protogenes, he had been the Apelles. He excelled in all that ever he would ſet his hand to, unleſs it were in his utterance in the public congregation, and therein indeed he had a great defectiveneſs.

God gave him great underſtanding of the times, to know what Iſrael ought to do. He ſtood upon the watch-tower, and ſaw what was hid from moſt men's eyes; and being quick of ſcent, in the fear of the Lord, he gave timely notice to ſome that ſtood in place, which had it been heeded, we had never been ſo fearfully peſtered with thoſe hydras heads that are now ſtarting up afreſh daily, to the great diſturbance of our people.

Sleider ſaid of Melanchthon, at his going from the univerſity of Tubing, that none of the learned men there, how many ſoever they were, had ſo much learning as to know the great learning that was in that man. Too, too many amongſt us were even ſick of the ſame diſeaſe, that knew not the depth that was in this man's breaſt. There were many men in this one man, even all ſcholarſhip epitomized in this profound Clerk: and yet for all this, he had that great bleſſing, which he himſelf obſerved as a ſingular favour vouchſafed to Dr John Reynolds, that great oracle of Oxford, that he never ſet on foot any manner of new opinion.

The like is obſerved of learned Dr Whitaker, ſtiled the oracle of Cambridge, and the miracle of the world. A mercy that moſt men of ſuperlative parts uſe not to be too rich in.

There is ſcarce any ſtrong brain without ſome ſtrong fancy. If the great wits of our times had kept themſelves cloſe to the ſteps of theſe rare divines, we had never ſeen the ſorrows that we now ſigh and groan under, and would be glad to be rid of if we knew how.

For the excellency of his preaching he excelled moſt men: he was 'an interpreter, one of a thouſand:' his underſtanding was ſtrangely opened, for the underſtanding and opening the ſcriptures: he would bolt out that out of the holy book of God, that would not come into any other man's conſideration; yet it ſhould be genuine, and evidently appearing to the drift and meaning of the Holy Ghoſt.

An intelligent man could never ſit at his feet, or be in his company, but he ſhould meet with that there, that would never fall from any other man's mouth, nor ever drop from any other man's pen. His words were 'as goads, and as nails faſtened by the maſter of the aſſemblies. They were edged with ſo much reaſon, re-enforced from the lively oracles, that they could not fall to the ground in vain. It is no marvel therefore that the cream of the whole country where they lived, as they could have opportunity, would hang upon his miniſtry.

Yet he uſed to be very plain in all his expreſſions. He would not deliver what he had from God in an unknown tongue, nor yet in words and phraſes which were too ſpruce and trim. He had learned his leſſon well of that great apoſtle and doctor of the Gentiles, who 'came not with enticing words:' nor with any other, but ſuch as the very catechumeni, the youngeſt beginners, might underſtand.

He kept cloſe to the footſteps of our choiceſt worthies; as famous Mr Dod (who uſed to ſay, that ſo much Latin was ſo much fleſh in a ſermon) Mr Cleaver, Mr Hilderſam, and ſuch other holy men of God, led by the ſelf-ſame ſpirit. He would deliver the whole and wholeſome truths of God in ſuch an holy and wholeſome way, that it bred very good blood in the hearts of his hearers. He would ſtoop ſo low as to ſpeak to the poor country people in their own proper dialect, ſo as they could not but even ſee and feel, and find out God, and be occaſioned to ſpeak of him all the week after.

If he met with a deep myſtery, he would make it plain to the ſhalloweſt capacity. Whatever ſubject he fell upon, he would handle it ſo divine like, that the hearts of his auditors would be wrapt into heaven, whilſt they heard him winding and turning a point of divinity, like a 'workman that needed not to be aſhamed.'

Whereas now a-days, whilſt ſome of our great divines ſeem to be too much taken up with quaint and hiſtorical flouriſhes, there is a ſenſible decay of the power of God amongſt us. An exotic, or ſtrange tongue, in the public congregation, what ever men think of it, is ſet out as a ſign of God's diſpleaſure, 1 Cor. xiv. 21. 22. It feeds ſuch humours as ſhould rather be purged out. It had no good effect in the church of Corinth. Mens wits will wax wanton, when they be not overawed by the plain power of God's word. When preachers keep not cloſe to the very words of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, 1 Tim. vi. 3. and to the 'doctrine that is according to godlineſs,' but love to be tampering with another doctrine, though not with another in the main; but even in the manner of delivery only, as when it ſavours too much of the pomp of human eloquence, ſaith Calvin; when it differs from the ſtile of the Holy Ghoſt, ſaith Danæus; the people be in danger of turning aſide to vain janglings, to perverſe diſputings, deſiring to be teachers, and ſuch like matters. The gold upon the pill may pleaſe the eye, but it profits not the patient; the paint upon the glaſs may feed the fancy, but the room is the darker for it. The ſword of God's ſpirit can never wound ſo deep, as when it is plucked out of theſe gaudy ſcabbards. Nakedneſs deforms too many in theſe days; but it is the beſt garniſhing and ornament the truth can have. A ſober dreſs beſt becomes a grave matron. There be words as well as things which the Holy Ghoſt teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13. The arrows fetched out of God's own quiver will pierce the deepeſt, and make the people fall the ſooneſt under Chriſt. 'The weakneſs of God is ſtronger than men.' Paul's weapons were mighty. The 'ſincere milk of God's word' will make Chriſt's babes to grow beſt.

This

This curious age is too much given to the affectation of words, phraſes, and cadencies: and holy Dr Sibs was wont to ſay, That great affectation and good affections ſeldom go together. The ſwelling words of vanity may tickle the ear, tip the tongue, and pleaſe in matters of diſcourſe; but when it comes to puſh of pike, they afford but little comfort.

Mr Capel had another manner of wiſdom than that of words, 'He was an able miniſter of the New Teſtament, not of the letter, but of the ſpirit,' that hath given, doth give, and will give life, 2 Cor. iii. 6. Having this hope then, he uſed great plainneſs of ſpeech; and by the manifeſtation of the truth, 'he commended himſelf to every man's conſcience in the ſight of God,' and thereby hath ſo well ſeaſoned the country where he lived, that the fruit of it, without doubt, will remain, and be ſeen many years after.

His prayers were lively and fervent: he was a man that had a very large meaſure of the ſpirit of grace, which is a ſpirit of ſupplication. He was ſo well fitted with abilities to open his mind to God, as if (with bleſſed Bradford) he had been almoſt ever upon his knées. He could tell his own errand, or any other man's, at the throne of grace, with as good freedom, and to as good purpoſe as any man living. He would not be raſh with his mouth when he came before God, nor ſet out what he had to ſay there with painted eloquence, or court like compliment, but his mouth uſed to be filled with ſuch ſavoury arguments, as very well became an humble ſupplicant. He was far from thoſe tautologies and miſerable extravagancies that too many prayers are ſtuffed with. He would pour out his ſoul to God at all manner of times, upon all manner of occaſions, with all manner of prayer and ſupplication, and with that variety of all ſorts of quickening and feeling meditations, that it would even ravith the hearts of thoſe who had the happineſs to be partakers with him therein.

Yet, for all this, he was clear in his opinion for the lawfulneſs of the uſe of ſet forms of prayer, according to the tenet of all our beſt and moſt judicious divines, and according to the practice of all churches, even the beſt reformed, ſaith Mr Rogers, now, and in all former ages: ſo ſaith Mr Hilderſam; yea, and Mr Smith himſelf ſaith upon the Lord's prayer (though as then he was warping, and afterwards wandered far in the ways of ſeparation) that it was the practice of the antient church, and of all the reformed churches in Chriſtendom; of the churches immediately after the apoſtles: nay, ſaith he, of the church in the time of the apoſtles, as may probably be gathered out of 1 Cor. xiv 26. This hath alſo been the practice of the beſt lights that ever were ſet up in the churches of Chriſt. It is very well known that the flower of our own divines went on in this way, when they might have done otherwiſe, if they had pleaſed, in their prayers before their ſermons. Nay, Mr Dod himſelf would ſeldom end his devotions in his own family but with the uſe of the Lord's prayer. Nay, yet more, Mr Cartwright (hiſt. Chriſt, p. 3. 535.) thinks it very probable that Chriſt his own ſelf made uſe of a ſet form at meals.

It is not good to caſt ſtones of offence in the way of our weak brethren, who being of meaner parts, want ability, memory, and audacity to conceive prayer, eſpecially before others, that they be not taken off from, nor diſheartened in this ſo comfortable and neceſſary a ſervice of God; nor may we lay a trap or ſnare for our own feet. Who knoweth what times may paſs over him? If God ſhould plunge us into the ditch, and leave us labouring in the nooſe, the loftieſt of us all may be fain to take relief from, and to make uſe of theſe poor contemptible props and crutches; (as ſome deem and call them). When the ſoul is ſo troubled that it cannot ſpeak, but chatter only like a crane and ſwallow, Pſal. lxxvii. 4.; when it is ſo full of grief that it can do no more than ſigh and groan, and make a confuſed noiſe, as Pſal. lv. 2. it will then be glad to catch at any thing to give itſelf vent by. Dr Harris tells us of a ſecond Bradford, that, in time of his diſtreſs, was fain to adopt Mr Bradford's words, and to ſpread them before God as his own, becauſe he had ſaid more for him, as he thought, than he could ſay for himſelf.

I knew, ſaith mine author, a rare and eminent divine indeed, that would be as often upon his knees as any man that ever I converſed with, that would ſometimes be in ſuch damps, that he had no more to ſet before God to give his heart eaſe by, than the words of David in the fifty-firſt Pſalm. Well might then this knowing divine of ours, that had been ſo toſſed with tempeſts, be tender of that that might be ſo uſeful for poor trembling hearts in a ſtormy day.

Get to God therefore as thou canſt. Sad judgments be upon our people. Spiritual judgments are the ſoreſt judgments. What if thou haſt but the ſame words as Chriſt, Mat. xxvi. 44. thou mayeſt be heard as he was, Heb. x. 11. The ſong of Moſes was a new ſong, becauſe tendered to God with new affections, Rev. xiv. 3. and xv. 3. What if thy petitions be broken and confuſed, as Exod. xiv. 10. 11. 12. 'This poor man cried,' ſaith David, Pſal. xxxiv. 6. when he was in a poor caſe indeed, like a Bedlam, 1 Sam. xxi. 13. and yet he was heard.

The little liſping children have ſometimes a grant of their requeſts, when thoſe that are of greater maturity ſeem to be ſet aſide. Whilſt Moſes held up his hands, though in a poor way, Iſrael prevailed. Who can tell what God may do? Abraham left aſking, 'ere God left granting, even for a filthy Sodom. Remember Mr Latimer's, 'once again, once again.' Tugg and wreſtle; we may come to ſee, and our people be made to know that their hearts is turned back again to the God of their fathers, 1 Kings xviii. 37. But to return to Mr Capel:

He was of a ſound and ſettled judgment: he pitched at firſt upon a good foundation, and being 'nouriſhed up in the words of faith,' he continued in the things he had learned; and being well aſſured of, 'knowing from whom he had received them, as 1 Tim. iv. 6. He was well grounded in his opinion; one that ſtood like a brazen wall, as firm as a very rock, in the midſt of all the diſhings and claſhings of tempeſtuous times. He ſaw, with a clear eye, through all the painted gloſſes of thoſe that were given to change, and therefore was not moved at all with any thing that was ſaid or done in that kind; he was true to his religion, and clave cloſe all along to his firſt principles, 'holding faſt the faith that was once,' and (as he himſelf would often expreſs it) but once 'delivered to the ſaints.'

He lived and died a true orthodox divine, according to the known doctrine of the church of England. He knew full well, for all the great talk of the goſpel, as though it were but newly dropt out of the clouds, that there is not any other goſpel but the 'everlaſting goſpel,' Rev. xiv. 8. that was preached before unto Abraham, Gal. iii. 8. and hath been entertained all along ſtill by God's faithful people, and ſhall be ſo continually to the end of the world. Yet ſome there be that are no mean pretenders to the goſpel, and, notwithſtanding the ſame, are in great danger of perverting the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, Gal. i. 7.

This conſtant and ſtable man was ſet up as a ſure landmark: let us ſtand to his ſteps, though we ſtand alone. God and a good conſcience are always good company. Elijah was but one, and yet he did very good ſervice. One Athanaſius in the eaſt, and one Hilary in the weſt, was of mighty great uſe in a ſtaggering time. What if we meet with ſtorms? it is a poor religion that is not worth ſuffering for. It will turn to a teſtimony, Luke xxi. 13. When the wild humour is ſpent, men will return home again. A ſtatue of Mercury will be looked upon then.

Thoſe poor ſilly ſouls that be toſſed to and fro, and whirled about, and about again, 'with every wind of doctrine,' Eph. iv. 14. will be glad of ſuch a ſight in the day of their viſitation; whereas they which know, or ſhould know more of God, be not ſteddy in their ſteering, but vary in their courſe, poor bewildered hearts will be at their wits end, not knowing which way to turn, nor to whom to go, nor whom to walk after.

As there is but one God, ſo there is but one faith and one baptiſm, and one way to eternal life, and one rule for us all to walk by, why be we not then all of one heart; why walk we not all in one tract?

So

So many men as we ſee,
So many minds there be.

Every month almoſt produceth a new faith. It is eaſy to ſwim with the tide; to perſuade the heart of the rectitude of that which is favoured by the times, and yet to pretend ſtill that it is from more light.

We may talk of the Spirit, but it is certain that 'ſchiſm is a fruit of the fleſh. The old way is the good way, Jer. xviii. 15.: he ſhall ſtumble and enſnare his feet that ſwerves from the antient paths. What is got by gadding? Men itch for change ſtill, and there is no reſt but with our firſt huſband, Hoſ. ii. 7. It is good to be all of one mind in God. Where there is not unity in judgment, there is ſcarce unity in affections.

We are too fierce againſt ſuch as cloſe not with our notions. It was bell, book, and candle once; it is not much better now. Wild fire flies amain: we cannot all cut to a thread; there will be ſome variation in the compaſs; but whilſt we aim at the white, the odds is to be paſſed by without bitterneſs.

Why ſhould there be ſuch huge rents and diviſions in the church? where is our mutual forbearance? We have not yet learned our leſſon well, to wait one for another till God ſhall reveal it, Phil. iii. 15. Whilſt we be ſo ſharp in our conteſts, Saran makes his markets; religion goes to wrack; our differences are widened. Some are ready to give up all, ſeeing there is no better harmony: others could well wiſh themſelves out of the world, that they might be delivered, as Melanchthon ſaid, from the implacable difference even amongſt ſome divines. Oh! that we could hearken unto God, who would have the truth followed but in love, Eph. iv. 15. If the word will not prevail, the croſs will come, and make a Hooper and a Ridley embrace one another.

Let us fall upon that one, and only ſolid way for God, it will ever be our glory. Get to God, he can ſtabliſh our unreſolved hearts, 2 Cor. i. 11. See that the judgment be ſo rightly ſet, Iſ. xxxiii. 6. and the heart ſo firmly knit to God and his truth, and then we ſhall not waver. Tamper not with opinions, 2 Pet. iii. 17. nor with opinionative men, 1 Tim. v. 6. Rom. xvi. 17. 18. nor yet with books that ſcatter tares.

This grave and prudent divine gives a very good caution to this purpoſe in his Treatiſe of Temptations, from famous Mr Dod, a man of vaſt experience; 'An honeſt heart may be ſorely puzzled with a forked argument.' The martyr could die for Chriſt, that could not diſpute for him.

Some pretend that they muſt try all things; but they ſpeak beſides the book. Who will try rats-bane, or a ſharp ſword, whether it will pierce into his bowels. Some think that they can withdraw when they ſee danger; but ſin is ſubtile: venom will get in before we be aware, and error will ſtick, and eat like a gangrene. What gets the fly that plays with the candle? They that nibble at the bait ſhall hardly eſcape the hook.

Again, Gingle not with terms that be improper in matters of religion; they favour of ſingularity, breed rents and diviſions between preachers and people, and take off the mind from things more eſſential.

Learned men have obſerved, that heretics gat great advantage by the unwary ſpeeches of the fathers. Some of Calvin's expreſſions, that were not ſo well pondered, have done no great good to ſome in our times. Neſtorius fell into his hereſy by defending an improper ſpeech of his; and Eutyches, thinking to mend it, fell into the other extreme.

Dr Thomas Taylor ſpeaks much to this point to very good purpoſe, in his Progreſs to Holineſs, p. 134. 135. 154. and concludes, that if we will keep the faith of our fathers, we muſt keep the words of our fathers.

Our Mr Capel was a man of a ſingle heart; he was, with Jacob, Gen. xxv. 27. a plain man, i. e. A down right honeſt man, as the original ſignifies; a very Nathaniel; 'an Iſraelite indeed,' John i. 47. 'in whom,' (tho' there was ſome infirmity) yet 'there was no guile.' He had much of the 'wiſdom that is from above,' and was as far from hypocriſy as moſt men living. If all others were of his temper, Momus had no need to complain of the want of a window into any man's breaſt. He was what he was, indeed, and in truth, without diſſimulation: he was very high in his conformity to thoſe primitive Chriſtians, Acts ii. 46 and left a brave preſident to all what they ſhould be in this particular.

We of this doubting and deceitful generation had need to look about us, and ſee what was here ſet before us in very legible characters, that we may learn to be more above board in our dealings. We are fallen into an age, like that of the prophets, wherein every one hath too much of the hypocrite; we may well cry, 'Help, Lord, for the faithful fail: with a double heart and double tongue do they ſpeak.' The moſt be for all tides and times, as mutable as the weather cock; for any manner of mode, ſo as they can ſerve their own turns by it. Some can be any thing but what they ſhould be. We have need to beware of men where every brother will ſupplant. 'The hypocrite with his mouth deſtroys his neighbour,' Prov. xi. 9. It is indeed good to be 'wiſe as ſerpents,' but withal, we ſhould be 'innocent as doves.' Though it be juſt with God that the deceiver ſhall be deceived, and ſome like it well, yet it is not juſt in thoſe that do it. They that 'turn aſide to crooked ways,' ſhall be 'led forth with the workers of iniquity,' Pſal. cxxv. 5.

Plain dealing is a jewel; yea, though it be in ſin. as this acute man tells us in his Tentat. part. 3. It is a dainty fine thing in our confeſſions, repentance, and in all wherein we act: he that uſeth it (whatever men ſay or think) ſhall neither live nor die a beggar. Downright honeſty is the beſt policy. It is delightful to God, Prov. xii. 22. and it will be a comfort to us, 2 Cor. i. 12. 'This is our rejoicing;' and we never eat our meat with more gladneſs, than when we do all with ſingleneſs of heart, Acts ii. 46.

Mr Capel was a very uſeful man in his life; he was, with Melanchthon, born for the common good, and lived for the public benefit of the whole country.

Whilſt he was at his paſtoral charge, he gave himſelf fully and wholly to reading, to exhortation, and doctrine; and his profiting appeared unto all men; ſo that he was generally, and that juſtly, reputed a man approved of God, rightly dividing the word of truth. It is well known what pains he took, and to how good purpoſe, during the whole time of his abode there, which was about twenty one years.

He preached conſtantly twice every Lord's day, and beſides, preached a lecture conſtantly every week, though he had but an infirm body, till by reaſon of ſickneſs he was taken off: and then beſides his Sabbath days work, he preached only upon the feſtival days: his lips were 'touched with a coal from the altar.'

It may truly be ſaid of him, as it was of Muſculus, that his words pierced like a two edged ſword. he could, when he pleaſed, be a Boanerges, a ſon of thunder; but his bent was moſt to be a Barnabbas, a ſon of conſolation: he was a true evangelical preacher, and comforted many a drooping heart by his labours in public, and gave abundance of ſatisfaction in private to many troubled ſpirits that uſed to reſort to him out of all countries, both far and near.

He alſo ſhewed himſelf to be a tree of God's own planting, by bringing forth more fruit ſtill in his age. When the times were ſuch (ſome flying ſo extremely high, the ceremonies being preſſed with rigour, and grievous penalties inflicted) that he, being tender in matters of conformity, muſt needs quit his paſtoral charge, which was Nov. 27. 1634. He betook himſelf then to his little cell, as Samuel did to his Ramah, that had never been looked upon if he had not come thither, (no more than Iſlebium and Bretta, if not for Luther and Melanchthon); and there he had more health and cheerfulneſs of ſpirit than formerly, which he improved well for the public advantage: For,

There he fell upon the practice of phyſic: he had indeed beat his ſtudies that way before hand, foreſeeing what would follow, yet would he do nothing in that kind, it not being his calling, ſo long as that great work of the miniſtry lay upon him; but when he had quit the more ſpecial tye of the care of mens ſouls, he then betook himſelf to be at more freedom; and having a licence ſent him by the biſhop of Glouceſter to authorize him, he fell upon the cure of mens bodies; and being of great ſufficiency, his fame was quickly ſpread abroad.

He was looked upon as a very Triſmegiſtus, or a ſecond Aeſculapius: he could do much at the diving into a diſeaſe, and in applying ſuch medicines as were proper and fit. Not like ſome that will be tampering with that profeſſion, and give their doſes at a venture. He was quick, yet in caſes of difficulty and danger he would weigh things well.

In deſperate diſeaſes, he would adventure far, according to the rules of reaſon, what he gave ſhould be ſafe: he mixed all with his own hands, he would ſtoop to the meaneſt, and ſerve all at an eaſy rate: his receipts amounted not to the half, nay, not to one quarter of a common apothecary's bill.

He was bleſſed by God with great and good ſucceſs, and had reſort, eſpecially towards his latter end, out of his own and other countries, ſo that he had not leiſure to ſit at his own meals in quiet. Yea, many times he was tired out, till God called him to reſt.

His words were ſeaſonable and ſavoury; his tongue was a tree of life; his lips fed many. Whoſoever came near him ſhould have ſomething dropping, if he did but heed it, that was worth carrying away with him. It is true, he would be pleaſant, and jeſt more freely than many did, or could well like. Some of his beſt friends wiſhed that it had been otherwiſe, but there will be ſome thing of human infirmity cleaving to us all in this world. Yet the times are to be conſidered, and the nature of many with whom he had to deal, that could no more away with a downright blow, than ſome can away with ſound doctrine: yet there was never a prudent heart but it might have picked ſweet out of that which ſome did moſt of all diſtaſte.

It is ſaid, that Eraſmus did more hurt to the pope by his jeſting, than Luther did by his ruffling: ſo this man gave a deadlier blow to the iniquity of the times, in his jocular way, than moſt others can do in their moſt ſerious undertakings; yet would he be as ſerious as any man living, upon a juſt and fit occaſion, and would be as tender to trouble the ſpirits of the meaneſt as heart could deſire. Urbanus Regius having one day's diſcourſe with Luther, ſaid, That it was one of the ſweeteſt days that ever he had in his life. Some can ſay as much of this rare man, when they had him, as all might have had him, in the right vein.

He was ſingular in that faithful advice and counſel which he uſed to give to all ſorts, upon every emergent occaſion. It was ſaid in old time, 'They ſhall aſk counſel of Abel,' 2 Sam. xx. 18. 'and ſo they ended their matters. The common conflux of almoſt all in thoſe parts was ſtill to his houſe. 'Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart,' Prov. xxvii. 9 ſo did the ſweetneſs of this man by his hearty counſel.

To ſome he was as another Neſtor: others found him ever a moſt faithful Achates, and ſuch made him (as Tully did his Atticus) their conſtant aſylum; and his dexterous counſel, like Ariadne's thread, led them out of many a perplexed labyrinth.

He was, as that famous Augur in Homer, one that could ſee things paſt and preſent, and gueſs ſhrewdly alſo at thoſe that were to come. 'Old mens counſels,' they ſay, 'are young mens lances. Mr Calvin's were very profitable, ſo were Mr Capel's. Many a young begionner, and tired conflicter, did fetch all their beſt weapons out of this man's armoury.

He preached the goſpel freely, for the moſt part of his laſt twenty years. 'Freely he had received, and freely he would give.' Not that he thought it unlawful for a miniſter to take maintainance, or to take that maintenance by tithes, which hath been publicly ſet aſide in this land; for his tithes he paid himſelf, and that freely and duly too, all the whole time of his preaching thus freely, and that to one who did not much in the work of the miniſtry; and he did it upon this ground, becauſe he knew it to be his due.

I will not diſpute this point at this time, with thoſe that be hampered in their opinions, but heartily wiſh them, with all thoſe that in theſe times are ſuch enemies to tithes, and are ſo extremely defective in making conſcience to pay them, to conſider what hath fallen from the pens of holy men, that have been far enough off from being this way intereſted. Mr Cartwright ſaith plainly, that they that take away the tithes of the miniſters, and turn them to their own uſe, would doubtleſs crucify Chriſt again, if he were here upon earth. Beza ſpeaks of ſome, that leave Chriſt as the ſoldiers did which crucified him, either ſtark naked, or but ſorily clad; and ſo to do, ſaith he, is not to love God, but the goods of God more than God. Dr John Reynolds ſaith, Our anceſtors provided houſes, glebe lands, tithes, and other profits for the maintenance of paſtors. And a little after he ſaith, The churches goods allotted to the maintenance of paſtors and teachers, are not profane, but ſacred, and therefore the ſin of them that purloin them is ſacrilege, not theft, wherein God is ſpoiled, Prov. xx. 25. 'It is a ſnare to devour that which is holy, and after the vows to enquire.' Ananias and Sapphira were made a dreadful ſpectacle, for filching of a little of that which was ſet apart for God. The eagle firſt her whole neſt by one poor piece of fleſh plucked from the altar. The people of this land are curſed with a curſe, and they will not ſee the cauſe of it, viz. 'their robbing of God,' Mal. iii. 8. 9. 'in tithes and offerings.' When ſhall we prove God, and ſee if he will not pour us out a bleſſing, as he hath promiſed, Mal. iii. 10.

It would be a great joy to ſome that will get nothing by it, to hear God's Iſrael once again turning it out before the Lord, as Deut. xxvi. 13. 14. 'I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine own houſe, I have not taken away ought thereof, for any unclean or common uſe,' as Junius reads it: for then they might ſay, with heart and hope, 'Lord, look down from thy holy habitation, and bleſs thy people, and the land that thou gaveſt us, Deut. xxvi. 15.

The practice of this judicious man will ſway with ſome who was ſuch a burning and ſhining light, the more to be admired that it blazed ſo long, and ſo clearly too, without any of this ſublunary oil. His mind was ſo fully ſatisfied with his ſmall gain in the practice of phyſic, together with what he had of his own temporal eſtate, that he would accept of nothing for his preaching of any man living, tho' tendred, and never ſo much preſſed upon him. He took not himſelf bound (as the caſe ſtood) to labour in the work of the miniſtry, there being another incumbent in that place. What he did was merely in love to God and mens ſouls. Indeed he meet with many diverſions, as the tempeſts of the times, his own domeſtic troubles, age creeping on, ſtore of ſick and ſad people, and recourſe of all ſorts, ſo that he had ſcarce an hour freely for ſtudy; yet nothing would take him off from this employment, till God took him off from all his labours.

As he preached, ſo he lived down the iniquities of the times. He did not only cry them down by his public miniſtry, but gave them a more deadly blow by his conſtant walking. Noah condemned the world more by what he did, than by what he ſaid, Heb. xi. 7. The way which Mr Capel took, put ſome to a ſtand, cauſed others to relent and repent, and encouraged others in the good and right way, whilſt they had his pattern that could not be contradicted: now ſince he is gone, ſuch have a harder taſk; but God will carry on his own work.

He was eminent for ſelf-denial: Indeed ſelf-denial is in every man's mouth, but hardly to be found in any man's practice. Self hath ever been, is, and will be, the great Diana, notwithſtanding all mens fair pretences. We read of him that could give ſmooth and golden words, Ruth iv. 4.—6. but when it came to the point, he would not mar his inheritance. Self hath too great a ſtroke in the beſt of us all, both preachers and profeſſors, both in church and common-wealth. It began to work betimes. St Paul tells us in his days, that 'all ſought their own things,' Phil. ii. 21, and it is now grown to a greater head in our age, when we neither eat nor drink, nor ſell, nor pray, nor do any thing to ſpeak of, but too apparently we ſeek ourſelves therein. How much then was this brave man to be admired, ſeeing all that knew him can bear witneſs, how far he excelled in this rare grace; he could could deny himſelf in his own underſtanding, and go after God in a way that he knew not, as Abraham, Heb. xi. 8. he could deny himſelf in his own will, when he that is above would lead him in a way that he would not, as John xxi. 18. He could deny himſelf in his own affections alſo, when he came to be croſſed in what he could have moſt deſired, ever ruling them by reaſon and religion, as a wiſe man ſhould do, ſubjecting himſelf to bear with quietneſs what could not be helped, without raiſing too much duſt. It is ſtrange to ſee how far he could deny himſelf in apparel, diet, attendance, and what not.

He was very exemplary for his contempt of the world; he had gotten the ſtart of moſt men in that particular: he uſed to be beating upon this point mainly, both in his public preaching, and in his private conference, and ſhewed the reality of what he preſſed when he came to act himſelf. Indeed he could not ſay as Luther did, that he never had been tempted unto covetouſneſs, but he kept himſelf from any noted taint in that kind; nay, from the leaſt ſuſpicion of that foul crime, with famous Dr Whitaker. When he had things under his hand, he ſtill charged his ſervants to do what few men practiſe, that they ſhould never ſet up corn, nor bring home cattle, but take as the market would afford. All that knew him, knew that he was far enough from encreaſing his eſtate by any indirect means; and never was there any man more willing to part with money upon a juſt and fit occaſion.

It is well known that he gave over a living of good value, one of the beſt in thoſe parts, above twenty years before his death, and betook himſelf to a poor little corner, from which he would never be withdrawn, no more than Muſculus from his Berne. And even there he might have picked mens purſes, if he had been that way given; but many, and many a time he put back money, and took but a ſmall matter from thoſe that were able, and would have been willing to have given more; they ſought to force him to take it, but he would utterly refuſe it.

He was no leſs exemplary for his great humility. This was the grace that graced all the good that was in him: he would be often ſpeaking of what he had heard concerning Dr John Rainolds, that he was as learned a man as any was in the world, as godly as learned, and as humble as godly. Mr Capel loved and reverenced this doctor, and trode in his ſteps.

He could ſpeak with tongues more than moſt men, yet would he never make uſe of them in the public congregation.

He uſed to honour all men; to acknowlege the gifts and parts of thoſe that were far below him, and to rejoice in them, as Hooper did in the blind boy.

He would not meddle in things that were too high for him, nor intrench upon that that was beyond his ſphere: he would not ſtand in the place of great men; he could refuſe honours as Muſculus did, and contented himſelf with plain and mean things.

It is obſerved by Cajetan, the flower of the cardinals, that he would never be in his ſilks and braveries, but kept his old faſhions to his life's end. Melanchthon would not diſdain to do that which his meaneſt ſervant would ſcarcely have put his hand to.

So it was with Mr Capel; and he would bear things that went awry, without diſtempering himſelf about them. Moderation he profeſſed, and moderation he practiſed.

Sanpicius told Luther concerning his behaviour, that in the firſt three years, he did all things according to the utmoſt rigour, and that would not do. In the next three years he did all according to the laws and counſels of the ſtatutes, and that would not hit: And in the laſt three years, he did all according to the will of God, and yet neither would that ſucceed; and then he was fain to be content with what he could have.

Thus you have a taſte, and but a little taſte, in this that hath been ſaid, of the precious liquour that was poured into this earthen veſſel. To which might be added the quickneſs of his apprehenſion, the ſtrength of his memory, his ſenſe of the public evils, his paſſing by of wrongs and offences; his ſpecial regard to ſuch as loved their wives and miniſters, and the like. But where ſhould I make an end? Theſe, and his other eminent parts, virtues, and graces, deſerve to be laid in oil-colours by the moſt ſkilful pencil.

Towards his latter end he met with ſome pinching griefs, which he did bear with invincible patience and fortitude: he willingly ſubmitted, becauſe it was God's will to have him ſo exerciſed. All of us muſt expect to drink of the ſelf ſame cup; our laſt days uſually are our worſt days, as Mollerus obſerves; the clouds will then be returning after the rain.

We muſt be taught to know, and ſpeak it out, that we are but pilgrims; we muſt be more truly and thoroughly taken off from the world; more ripened, and mellowed, and ſeaſoned for God, and be made more ſerious in all our undertakings. Melanchthon uſed to ſay, That if he had no cares, he ſhould have no prayers. Our comfort is, our time is but ſhort; the moſt and beſt of our treaſure is gone before: our hope is laid up in heaven.

Get we more communion with God, more faith, more patience; and let us put on the whole armour of God, and then we ſhall be able to ſtand, and to withſtand in the evil day; and in the end, ſhall be 'more than conquerors through him that loved us.'

This clear-ſighted and underſtanding man foreſaw ſtorms approaching, and rejoiced that he ſhould be in his grave before they fell, whither alſo he came as a ſhock of corn gathered into the barn in due ſeaſon.

The Sabbath day was the laſt day of his life, the ſtrict obſervation whereof he often preſſed: he would ſay that we ſhould go to ſleep that night, as it were, with meat in our mouths.

That Sabbath day, being September 21. 1656, he preached twice, taking his leave of the world by preſſing faith in God. That evening he repeated both his ſermons in his family, ſomewhat more largely than ordinary. He read his chapter alſo, went to prayer, and ſo to bed, and died immediately, by that the words were well out of his mouth, being threeſcore and ten years old.

Who can deſire to die better than Stephen did, calling upon God: he would often ſay, That if God ſaw it fit, one had better to die of a quick, than of a lingering death; and God anſwered his deſires.

The Life of Dr Robert Harris, who died Anno Chriſti 1658.

Robert Harris, was born in a dark time and place at Broad-Cambden in Gloceſterſhire, Anno Chriſti 1578: his father had the repute of a very wiſe and underſtanding man; his mother a very devout and charitable woman, under whoſe wings he ſpent his childhood; but he acknowleged it as a matter of grief to him all his life, that he preferred his play before reading the Scriptures to his parents at their call. So ſoon as he was fit for it, he was ſet to a free-ſchool at Chipping-Cambden, where he met with a double diſcouragement; the firſt was from the often change of his ſchool-maſters, by reaſon of the ſmall ſalary that came to them. The ſecond proceeded from the fierce and cruel carriage of others, which, as he uſed often to ſay, was the bane of many young ſcholars; and though for his own part, he remembered not that he had ſmarted under a rod in any ſchool, yet the ſight of the ſeverity uſed to others, brought ſuch a trembling and ſadneſs upon his ſpirit, that he could not ſhake it off to his dying day.

From thence he was removed to the ſchool at Worceſter, under the care of Mr Bright, and on the Sabbaths, he heard that reverend and learned Dr Robert Abbots; and being furniſhed with ſchool-learning, he went from thence to Magdalen-Hall in Oxford, being allied to the principal Mr Lyſter.

There he ſhewed a more than ordinary deſire of learning, and having but little help from the principal or his tutor, he followed his private ſtudies with the more earneſtneſs; yet all this while he enquired little into the truths and ways of God.

His tutor not long after leaving the hall, he earneſtly ſolicited the principal, that he might be committed to the care of one Mr Goſſe of Magdalen-college, who was noted for a very good logician and diſputant, but withal he was accounted accounted a puritan, which made the principal, who was popishly affected, to dissuade his choice; but he, not out of love to religion but learning, persisted in his desires, and prevailed.

Mr Goffe having thus received him into his charge, required him, that with the rest of his fellow pupils, he should join in reading the Scriptures, repetition of Sermons and Prayer; which new course, he being unaccustomed to, was somewhat troubled at it, observing, that none of the Seniors embraced that way, and yet it was such as he knew not how to contradict. This caused him oft to betake himself to his private prayers, wherein he begged of God, either to discover to him the falshood, if his tutor had any design upon him to corrupt him, or if this course were pleasing to God, that then he would confirm him in it: and it pleased God after a while so to resolve him, that he bought a Bible, and with indefatigable pains he applied himself to the reading of that and other good authors in divinity.

Shortly after Mr Goffe refuseth to continue his tutor, only agrees, that they would conjoin their studies together, Mr Goffe reading Philology to Mr Harris, and Mr Harris reading Greek to him, and from Greek they proceeded to Hebrew, in which study some other of the fellows joined with them, whereof one afterwards was president; and, besides these studies, his tutor and he agreed to read Calvin's Institutions by turns, which course they continued as long as their other occasions and exercises would permit.

Having for a while been batchelor of arts, he was willing to try his fitness for the ministry, because otherwise his father would have him to the study of the law; and having prepared a sermon, he proffered his pains at Chipping-Camden; but such was the woful ignorance of those times, that in the greater town he knew not where to procure a Bible to carry with him into the pulpit; yet at last being directed to the vicar there, he indeed had a Bible, but it could not be found, having not been seen of some months before; yet search being made, he was furnished with a Bible, and after prayer made, he took for his text those words. Rom. x. 1. 'Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.' And his sermon was highly commended, and yet himself would say, that he was a loser by the bargain. 1. Because his heart swelled upon it. 2. Because his carnal friends hereupon called on him to give over university studies, and to come amongst them, as having learning enough.

His father also having many other children to provide for, was willing to ease his charge, and therefore applied himself to some persons of eminency both in church and state, to get some preferment for him; but he, being willing to decline public employment for the present, humbly entreated his father, that what he would hereafter bestow upon him for a patrimony, he would be pleased for the present to allow it him for his maintenance in Oxford, that he might perfect his studies there, which his father at last condescending to, he returned with joy to Oxford. But indeed by God's providence! he had not been long at Oxford before a fearful plague brake out in that place, which so scattered the university, that few were left remaining, in which case he was again put to his shifts; loath he was to return home, and whither else to betake himself he knew not; till at last, by a special providence, he was invited to the house of one Mr Doyly, five miles from Oxford, a Gentleman of a very ancient family in that county, and a great friend to the gospel, whose wife was also eminent for knowlege and piety, to them therefore Mr Harris goes for the present.

Coming to Mr Doyly's, he met with one Mr Prior, a prudent godly man, and of an excellent spirit, who being much weakened by two racking diseases of the stone and gout, and overburdened with preaching both on the Sabbaths and Fasts, enjoined upon the occasion of the plague, in meer pity, Mr Harris help'd him a turn or two, which he performed with so good approbation, that presently he was set upon both by Mr Doyly, Mr Prior, and some others, that he could not withstand their importunity, but was necessitated to preach with them, at least during the continuance of those extraordinary Fasts. Mr Harris pleaded, that he was not an ordained minister, and therefore durst not meddle with any thing but preaching; neither with that but till he could be ordained. This they assented to, and during his abode amongst them, he met with ample requitals from the good Gentleman and his wife, and great encouragement from the people.

About this time there was a fearful eclipse upon the church; many eminent ministers were suspended from their office and benefices, and amongst them those three bright shining stars, Mr Dod, Mr Cleaver, Mr Lancaster. Upon this occasion Sir Anthony Cope, who had formerly placed, and now lost Mr Dod at Hanwell, and Mr Cleaver at Drayton, became a suitor to his brother Doyly, for so he was by marriage, for the enjoyment of Mr Harris. Mr Doyly entertained this unwelcome motion with great regret, as being wholly unwilling to part with one whom he so much prized; yet, after a long debate, it was judged most beneficial for the public, and therefore could not be resisted.

Mr Harris went to Hanwell with much grief and fear, where he found the temper of the country to be this: Preach he might, and welcome, but they would own no man for their pastors but those who were ejected: at last it was concluded, that Mr Harris should preach to both congregations, whilst authority would permit; and so long as there was any hope of recovering their former pastor, this gave some satisfaction, yet it was not sufficient, because Mr Harris was not fully of their former pastor's mind.

Just at the same time it fell out, that Mr Whately came to Banburry, and met with no less a share of the people's displeasure, who though they could not except against his ministry, he being endowed with excellent parts, yet they quarrelled, because his judgment about ceremonies was not the same with that of their former teachers; and the truth is, they both had a sad time of it for a great while, notwithstanding all the prudence and moderation which Sir Anthony Cope and Mr Dod shewed to the quieting of them.

After a while, archbishop Bancroft finding that the silenced ministers would not yield, presented two chaplains to Hanwell and Drayton, upon pretence of a lapse; but Sir Anthony Cope sitting then in parliament, took one or two of the house with him, and presented his two clerks to the arch bishop, who after a long contest, was content to admit his presentation; but Sir Anthony having spoken in that parliament against insufficient ministers, not without reflection upon the archbishops, and bishops, archbishop Bancroft could not but resent this, and therefore referred his clerks to be strictly examined by his skild chaplain. The chaplain, having as it seems, his lesson beforehand, brings in the clerk designed for Hanwel, which Mr Harris had declined as altogether insufficient, though a grave and discreet divine. Mr Harris was returned, mediocriter doctus, moderately learned. The archbishop being not satisfied with this last account, desires Bishop Barlow, who was present with him to make farther proof of Mr Harris, and the bishop being an active and witty man, was glad of the opportunity, and deals with Mr Harris, first in divinity, but most in other learning and Greek, wherein the bishop's excellency lay; and both of them so long greeked it, till they were both gravelled for want of words, whereupon they both laughed, and so gave over. The bishop going into the archbishop in his report, as Mr Harris expressed it, set him up as much too high, as the chaplain had set his fellow too low. The archbishop hearing the bishop's testimony, was content to admit Mr Harris, but upon condition, that he might have Hanwell, which was easily assented to by Sir Anthony, having before designed it for him, and Mr Dod also was present to testify his concurrent desire; the only stick with Mr Harris was, that he was fearful to succeed so famous a divine; which answer was not pleasing to the archbishop, though at present he courted Mr Dod.

A new pastor being thus placed at Hanwel, and withal, Drayton being furnished with a godly prudent man, Mr Scudder, there were now three neighbours, who were linked together, not only in judgment and affection, but also in affinity; for Mr Harris married Mr Whately's sister, and Mr Scudder his wife's sister, and these three met for a while weekly together, and by turns translated and Analysed, each his chapter, till multitudes of public employments caused them to desist.

Not

Not long after, there befel Mr Harris his wife, upon the birth of her first child, a long and sore affliction, (as Mr Dod told him) but to season, and fit him for his work; and Mr Harris himself would oft say, that he had been quite spoiled, had he not been thus taken down; for young ministers know not what ground they tread on, till God lays them flat.

This and some other clouds being blown over the weather seemed now to clear up, and his people began to relish his ministry, and much comfort he found in the neighbourhood of many godly ministers; on one side he had Mr Cleaver, a very solid text-man; and the other, Mr Lancaster, a very humble, and self denying man, who tho' by birth he was a good gentleman, and had sometime been fellow in King's college in Cambridge, where he read sundry public lectures, and made many speeches, and (as Dr Collins that master of language used to say) delivered himself in as pure Latin as ever Tully spake, having no other notes to help him, but he wrote upon his own nails; yet this good man, thus accomplished with all learning contented himself with a living that was not worth 40 l. per annum, and in his preaching made no noise of any learning at all. When I was young I knew this Mr Lancaster, he was a very little man of stature, but eminent, as for other things, so especially for his living by faith. His charge being great, and his means so small, his wife would many times come to him when she was to send her maid to Banbury market to buy provision, and tell him that he had no money; his usual answer was, 'Yet send your maid, and God will provide; and tho' she had no money, yet she never returned empty, for one or other that knew her to be Mr Lancaster's maid, either by the way or in Banbury town meeting her, would give her money, which still supplied their present wants.

But above all his neighbours, Mr Harris still much respected Mr Dod, and concerning him was fully of Mr Cartwright's mind, that he was the fittest man in England for a pastoral office; he was able to speak to any man's capacity; he was never out of the pulpit; for all his discourses were sermons, which he intermixed with such variety of delightful expressions and similitudes, as would suit with any man. The truth is, he was a very eloquent man both in English and Latin, and so facetious and pithy, that Mr Harris used to say often, 'That if all his apothegms were gathered together, they would exceed all that Plutarch had written in Greek, and others since his time in Latin had published. For some years Mr Harris had the happiness to live with, and near this man of God, and that in such a conjunction as greater could not be.

During the time of their converse, they studied together, and daily read a chapter in the original together, and after Mr Dod was restored to the liberty of his ministry in another diocese, he would not expound a text, preach a sermon, answer a case of conscience (whereof many were daily brought to him) without the concurrence of Mr Harris with him; so highly did that eminent divine prize him, and would often blame him for his reservedness and unwillingness to put forth himself.

Mr Dod being (as was said before) removed into Northamptonshire to Frosley, God was pleased to supply his want by the resort of sundry young students from Oxford to Hanwell, so that Mr Harris his house was a little academy; and among others, he took much comfort in Mr Pemble (who would do nothing, especially in divinity, without his advice) as also Mr Capel, who oft resorted to him in his grievous conflicts and temptations for advice and succour, and also, in his well known treatise of Temptations.

Whilst he was at Hanwell he had frequent calls to London, sometimes to Paul's cross, sometimes to preach before parliaments, and other sometimes at country feasts, which occasioned many invitations to places there: but of all the auditories that of Saviour's in Southwark was most grateful to him, and there he could have spent the remainder of his days if his voice would have reached so great an assembly. From thence he was invited to some lesser churches, but God had not yet finished his work by him at Hanwell, and therefore something or other still interposed. Probably he had closed with Aldermanbury, had not the then bishop of London complimented him out of it, commending his Concio ad Clerum at Oxford, and promising him better preferment than he thought he should merit. Some other offers were made to him, but still he met with some cross providence, which made him come to a resolution to end where he began.

At Hanwell he went over many Scriptures, but his people found least good from that which cost him most pains, viz. his sermons upon the Collosians, which epistle he preached throughout. Indeed at that time he thought he could not speak too highly to a people who had been so taught, but upon further trial, he found that he could not go too low, so that, (as some of his hearers after told him) his pains upon that epistle was wholly lost as to them. His sermons upon historical Scriptures, best pleased most of his auditors; but with himself, and the more spiritual sort, his labours upon the book of the canticles prevailed most, the notes whereof he was often pressed to make public, which he refused upon a double account.

1. Because a great part of them were lost, and died with Dr Preston, to whom he had lent them, and whom he used to call, 'A needless engrosser of other men's notes.'

2. He less satisfied himself in his elder years, in divers passages of that mysterious book. Yet if the world were at leisure to hear old men speak, it might be very useful to collect those dispersed papers, and it is hoped that some of his near relations (who best know his hand, and method in writing) may take some pains therein for the public good.

At Hanwell Mr Harris continued preaching for about forty years, a constant, painful, and faithful preacher, both upon the Sabbaths, and other occasions which fell out often; for when he came thither, he found that there had been an accustomed course of preaching upon such festival days (then so called) which might not interfere with the lecture or market at Banbury, which he also kept up, especially on Easter and Whitsun Mondays, unto which multitudes of Christians resorted far and near, 'as the doves to the windows, without any superstition. And on the morrow, they were entertained with the like feasts at Banbury by Mr Wheatly. O what a fair of souls was then held at Hanswel and Banbury by these two brothers? how did religion then flourish, and professors thrive, like the calves in their stalls? the truth is, these preachers carved out sound and wholesome food, and their hearers came with good stomachs, expecting what they found, viz. 'milk for babes, and strong meat for strong men, and accordingly did grow thereby.

In those days godly preachers stuffed not their sermons with airy notions, and curious speculations, but sought out profitable matter, which they delivered in sound words, and in a plain method of doctrine, reason and use, accomodating themselves to every man's capacity, and God gave them a plentiful harvest in that country.

These his employments at home (together with his natural bookishness) made him less foward to engage in lectures abroad onely, he was one in a combination at Deddington Oxfordshire; and for sometime he kept a lecture alone at Stratford upon Avon in Warwickshire every other week, unto which there was a great resort both of the chief gentry, and choicest preachers and professors in those parts, and amongst them, that noble and learned knight, Sir Thomas Lucy of Charcolt had always a great respect for him.

About this time a great living in the country was offered him, about which he was very indifferent, and indeed was but very indifferently dealt with in it, which occasioned him to say, 'That he never bore any thing more impatiently than the abuse of religion to base and private ends; and, that carnal policy, would render profession despicable at least, whilst some men took such a liberty to themselves in equivocating and daubing; and the reason of such mens success was, not because they had more wit than others, but more boldness to say and do what others durst not.

All this while he continued at Hanwel in much prosperity, and the neighbours thereabouts frequented his sermons, amongst whom he received the greatest seals of his mini-ſtry: but tho' he found ſo much encouragement from abroad, yet we muſt not forget his people at home, who were ſo far brought into a conformity, that at ſometimes there was not a family in the town where God's name was not in ſome meaſure called upon, nor a perſon that refuſed to be prepared by him for the Lord's ſupper.

And as the Lord was pleaſed to bleſs and ſucceed his labours, ſo he cauſed him to thrive in his outward eſtate likewiſe, which himſelf could not but take notice of; for tho' his means was not great, and his children many (for whoſe ſakes he kept a ſchoolmaſter) and the reſort of friends to his houſe not ſmall, both on Sabbath days, and lecture days, yet was he in a thriving condition; which occaſioned him to ſay, 'That there was a ſecret bleſſing attending on houſe-keeping'. For, ſaid he, 'I am not able to give an account of my expences and of God's ſupplies.

But now began thoſe cloudy times, and his ſadder days, when troops and armies marched into thoſe quarters, about Edge Hill, where was fought a bloody battle, Octob. 23 1642. upon the Lord's day, in the vale of the red horſe, being diſtant about four miles from him; yet it pleaſed God ſo to order it which he took for a great mercy) that he heard not the leaſt noiſe of it, (the wind ſitting contrary) till the public work of the day was over; nor could he believe the report of a battle, till a ſoldier beſmeared with blood and powder came to witneſs it. From this very time his troubles encreaſed: now was he threatned by this, then by the other gariſon; one while he was a round-head, and then a malignant; frequently oppreſſed with ſoldiers that were quartered upon him, yet ſtill he kept his ſtation, and ſome of his gueſts would join with him in family duties, which he intermitted not when others would ſcoff at them, becauſe not mingled with book prayers.

Every Sabbath he held on the courſe of his miniſtry, and moſt of thoſe which quartered with him, being commanders and officers, they ſhewed themſelves civil to him, and his, only at one time there was a company who were ſo outragious in ſwearing and blaſphemy, that he could not forbear preaching upon that text, James v. 12. Above all things my brethren, ſwear not, &c. which ſo nettled ſome of them, that they damned themſelves to hell if they did not ſhoot him in caſe he preached again upon that text which they judged to be purpoſely choſen againſt them; the next Sabbath he proceeded purpoſely upon the ſame text, wherein he backed what he had ſaid before, and as he was preaching, he ſaw a ſoldier take his carabine, and fumble about the cock as if he was preparing to ſhoot; but Mr Harris, apprehending that he did it only to diſturb him, went through his work, and heard no more news of his ſoldier.

Thus he continued his labours in thoſe ſad times, and tho' he was choſen a member of the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter, yet becauſe upon ſerious thoughts, he judged his preſence leſs needful there than in the country, he continued his ſtation there, till he ſaw his tenements in the neighbourhood fired, wood, and nurſeries of wood deſtroyed, himſelf threatned, at laſt enforced by a Scotiſh commander, to ſhift for himſelf; yea ſome of his own neighbours were now ready to betray him, whereupon he went to London, and by God's good providence came thither in ſafety, tho, a ſad man.

When he came to London he went to the aſſembly, where he found much more undone than done: indeed he meet there with many excellent and learned men; but his thoughts were ſolicitous for his people, his wife and children, whom he had left behind: and indeed he found little reſt in his ſpirit, till the ſame good hand of providence had ſafely brought them unto him. Then went he with more comfort to the aſſembly, where he did Antiquum obtinere, hear all, and ſay little.

Upon his remove from his houſe, both his books and his notes (ſome few only accepted which he had carried away before hand) together with all his remaining goods, were ſeized upon, and his living given to another; but that might ſoon have been ſupplied, many offers being made to him, from ſeveral places, and country committees.

The firſt motion that he hearkened to was the temple; but upon trial, he found that church too large for his voice, and thereupon refuſed, and at laſt he was fixt to Buttolphs Biſhopſgate, where, though the congregation was too large for him, yet being neceſſitated to do ſomething for the maintenance of his family, he remained there, during his attendance upon the aſſembly.

After his continuance there for ſome time, himſelf with four more divines were commanded down to Oxford, which was then under ſuſpenſion by the parliament; which employment, he often profeſſed, that he did earneſtly decline, and that principally for two reaſons.

1. Becauſe the committee for Hampſhire, had given him a free call to Petersfield, and thither he would willingly have gone.

2. Having long diſcontinued from the univerſity, he looked upon himſelf as very unfit for ſuch a ſervice; but in concluſion he was plainly told, that ſuch as would not be entreated, muſt be commanded, and ſo he was ordered to prepare for his journey. This much troubled him, and therefore he firſt goes to Petersfield, and acquaints them how the caſe ſtood with him; and becauſe he could not come ſuddenly to them, he deſires them, either to pitch upon ſome other miniſter, or elſe to take the care upon themſelves, to provide ſupplies for both the churches (for two they were) and to pay the preachers out of the revenues of the place. The people liked neither of the offers, yet were content to wait a while in hopes, that he might come to ſettle with them, requeſting him in the mean while to provide them ſuch ſupply as himſelf ſhould approve of. This proved a troubleſome work to him, tho' for a time he ſent them help from Oxford, and thereabout; for preachers were now hard to be gotten, their being more want of miniſters, than of places; yet at laſt two were procured, the one of whom gave no good content. At laſt he was put upon it, either to relinquiſh Oxon, or Petersfield; the former he could not decline, and therefore he left the latter, tho' with great regret, becauſe he could not ſeal up ſuch reſpect and thanks, as he conceived was due from him to that country. Neither had he leſs trouble in providing for Buttolphs Biſhopſgate (it being no eaſy matter to pleaſe citizens) yet at the laſt they were ſupplied to their content.

About this time many libels were caſt abroad in Oxford againſt other preachers, and one among the reſt reflected upon Mr Harris, reckoning up his ſeveral livings, and great revenues, wherein they mentioned what was paſt, preſent, and to come, and happily if they had heard of the reſt, which at ſeveral times were offered him, they would have put them alſo into that catalogue: Mr Harris being informed hereof, he wrote to ſome friends (which letters are yet extant) wherein he vindicated himſelf in the main; yet withal he profeſſed unto others, that it would, and ſhould be to him matter of humbling, and caution to him whilſt he lived, that he had given the leaſt advantage to ſuch as ſought it; for tho' he ſtood clear in his own and others conſciences, who beſt knew him, that he was far from allowing non reſidency, and plurality of livings, yet for ſuch as were ignorant of all circumſtances, there was ſome appearances of evil; which alſo he took the more to heart, becauſe from that time forward he found the afflicting hand of God both upon him, and his.

The preachers that were ſent to Oxford found but ill entertainment; on the one hand they were aſperſed, and libelled againſt by their own mother's ſons; and on the other hand, they were challenged to a public diſputation by one Mr Erbery, a ſectary, and his aſſociates. Mr Harris was unwilling that his challenge ſhould be entertained, having obſerved that diſputes of that kind, ſend away each party more ſtrengthened in their opinions, than when they came thither; yet gave his concurrence, at leaſt ſo far with them, as to begin the work with prayer. This he condeſcended unto, and the diſputation proceeded; and the iſſue was, that all were cenſured, ſome for ſpeaking others for their ſilence, in which latter rank he was willingly placed.

Not long after, came the chancellor of Oxon (the earl of of Pembroke) to visit the university, who, according to the custom, bestowed degrees upon some of the scholars, and amongst others, Mr Harris was admitted doctor of divinity, who yet, neither thought himself the better scholar, nor the better preacher for this new honour; and had it not been, that he was loth to slight the favour from his betters, he had refused it: having learned, 'that an empty hand from a prince, and a naked title from his chancellor, must be counted an honour.

At this time many headships of colleges (before made void) were now to be supplied, and Dr Harris professed, that seeing it was noised abroad, that the reforming preachers, came thither to play their own game, viz. to thrust out others, and to invest themselves with their places, he therefore resolved to keep to his old course; namely, to stand silent without opening his mouth for any headship at all, and presently the best places were all disposed of; neither was any thing spoken of for Dr Harris, till a nobleman, of the other university made mention of him, as not fit to be forgotten; whereupon Trinity college was assigned to him. This some of his friends much wondered at, considering that tho' he was the meanest in his own eyes, yet was he the oldest man, and one that had suffered more by the times than any, if not than all the rest; yet he himself said little to it, only he enquired who was the head that was ejected, and what was the nature of the place: for he was unwilling to entertain the profer, if the former head could find favour to hold it, and thereupon he forebore as long as he could be permitted; and as for the place, the smallness of the college, and the situation of it, gave him great content, who desired no more than what would keep him from distractions in his studies; and the only thing that he stuck at was, because there was a personage annexed to the college.

But when he understood that its distance from Oxford was not great, and the conditions easy, viz. that he was required to preach but eight sermons per annum at it, he the more willingly inclined to it, tho' after acceptance he could not satisfie himself under two sermons a week; and so at last there he sat down, and took much content in the fellows of that college, betwixt whom and him, there was ever a very fair correspondence.

At the personage, he found most of the people, (tho' they had been long taught) very ignorant, and much addicted to their old customs, (and which he looked upon as a sad prognostic to the place) no sooner did any there look heaven-ward in any special manner, but the Lord presently took him away, some few, and those very few excepted.

About this time a motion was made by the committee at Oxford of removing him to New college, which was now void; but as the motion began without him, so it was stifled by him, the rather, when he heard that some exception was taken above against him as being uncapable of that place, because he was not a Winchester scholar. The truth is, as he professed to some of his friends) he rather desired a little, than a great college, being one who was very much addicted to privacy and his book, which made him often say, 'That if Trinity college were a competency without the personage, he would not leave it for any place, except it were an hospital:' so much had he seen into the vanity and troublesomeness of the world.

In his latter days journies began to be tedious to him, which occasioned some well affected citizens in Oxford, who were moved thereunto by a sermon which Dr Cheynell preached unto them, to make some overtures to him of reading a catechism lecture, or of preaching upon the principles of religion, (which liked him best) in one of their churches; in consideration whereof, they would maintain him an assistant at his personage. The motion was good, the exercise needful: the only question was, how such a work would be accepted in such a place amongst the wits and scholars of the university; yet because he had bemoaned himself to God in private, bewailing that his comfort was little in the place where he preached, and made it his humble suit that God would not lay him aside, but find some employment for him, whilst he had ability to perform it; because, I say, he had prayed thus, and this motion presently ensued, he durst not reject it, but set upon the work, wherein the Lord assisted, giving him strength, even beyond what could be expected from a man of his age, and caused his labours to find great acceptance with his auditors: and thus he continued preaching once every Sabbath at his personage, and once in the week this lecture; besides which, he preached, when his turn came, in the university, and that both in English and in Latin also.

Yet we are not come to the end of his labours; for having now freed himself from worldly affairs, disposed of all his children, and having left himself nothing else to do, but to prepare himself and his wife for their graves, who had lived about fifty years together, it pleased God to exercise him in this strange manner.

His wife, who was born of parents eminently pious, had been religiously educated, and herself a constant worshipper of God all her time, who seldom rose from her prayers with dry eyes, was delivered up by God to Satan's buffetings, and to such hellish temptations and horrors of mind, as struck a grief and terror unto all the spectators, which occasioned him often to say, That God made it appear to all beholders, that the best man is no more than the Lord makes him hourly. For as the receiving of grace, so the keeping, using, the comfort and enjoyment of it, is all from him, which is not only true in supernatural graces, but in the gifts of nature also; our wits, senses, fancies, all are in God's hand; nor are the wisest men any thing longer than he pleases to continue them so.

This good woman was a sad instance of all this, whose temptations were so violent, so horrid, and withal so subtile, that they put the ablest and most experienced men to their wits end to answer them, and her poor self even beyond herself.

Whilst she was in this perplexed condition, sundry eminent preachers and professors visited her and her husband, who had been a happy instrument of satisfying many others, could give her no satisfaction.

One day as she was complaining that she could find no comfort, O! saith he, What an idol do some make of comfort, as if their comfort were their Christ?

In the midst of these trials, he yet took notice of these comforts and mercies; 1. That she was kept from blaspheming the Highest, (for so she called God) and from hurting herself and others. 2. That this affliction awakened him and his children; for they esteemed her the most conscientious and innocent amongst them all. 3. It put him upon more work than his age could well bear, that so he might call out his thoughts upon business, and not eat up his own heart with grief and care. And lastly, It wrought in him an holy despair of all creature comforts; for now he could neither enjoy child, nor friend, nor food, nor sleep, having her continually before him in his eye, ear, and heart; and all friends fearing to come in sight, lest they should wound themselves, or trouble her; only continual prayers were offered up for her upon all occasions, which gave hopes that the Lord might yet make her end comfortable, and conquest glorious.

However, her husband would often say, That the difference was not great, whether comfort came at death, or an hour after, since comfort would come assuredly. But leaving her under a general expectation of a blessed issue in the best time, we return once more to her husband now ready to enter into his haven of rest.

After a long and laborious life, which could not but be painful to him that underwent it, we come at length to his last, long, and painful sickness, which is the usual harbinger of death.

In the summer he began to droop, and finding his decay, he sent for two physicians, Dr Bathurst and Dr Willis, who were well known to him and his, by former experiences, and eminently known in the university; to whom he professed, that he used means merely in obedience to God, but for his own part he could live and durst die.

His physicians, as himself confessed, had proceeded so far as art and learning could carry them, but herein they would lose of their worth, that they had to deal with complicated diseases, which were seldom removed; but most of all with old age, a disease which was never cured. His first encounter was with a vehement pleuritical pain in his left side, which was attended with a fever, as also with a great a great defluxion of rheum, and oppreſſion of his lungs with phlegm: and when, after divers weeks, all theſe aſſailants ſeemed well nigh vanquiſhed, through the tender care of his ſkillful phyſicians, yet then that enemy which had ſo long lodged in his boſom, brake forth into an empyema, which he expectorated daily in ſo great a meaſure, for the ſpace of two months, or more, that hereby (together with ſome fits of his old diſeaſes, the ſtone and ſtrangury, he was not able to ſpeak much to thoſe that viſited him.

And herein, indeed, it fell out according to what he had often foretold in his beſt ſtrength, viz. That little was to be expected from him on his death bed; which occaſioned him to write, fearing that his tongue might not then be able to utter it, his advice and counſel to his family many years before his death. The truth is, he the rather forbore to ſpeak, becauſe he perceived that ſome had a deſign to make his ſpeeches public, which he was utterly averſe to, neither would he conſent that any thing of his life or death ſhould be written: nay, he could never be perſuaded, at any time, to ſit that his picture might be drawn; ſo deſirous was he that all of him might be buried with him.

And albeit he ſpit up thoſe lungs which he had waſted in the pulpit, yet could not that light of grace be ſo ſmothered under a buſhel, but that oft times the beams thereof would ſhine forth, and himſelf would breathe forth himſelf in pithy ſpeeches and ſavoury diſcourſes.

In the beginning of his ſickneſs, being deſired to admit of company, he anſwered, 'I am alone in company; it is all one to me to be left alone, or to have friends with me; my work is now to arm myſelf for death which aſſaults me, and I apply myſelf, as I am able, for that great encounter.' And accordingly he ſpent his whole time in meditation, prayer, and reading the holy ſcriptures, eſpecially the book of Pſalms, the prophecy of Iſaiah, and St John's goſpel, taking exceeding delight in the 10. 14. 15. 16. and 17 chapters of that evangeliſt.

After which time his nights were long, and ſleeps ſhort; and when he could neither ſleep, nor ſit up in his bed to read, his manner was to command others to read to him, and then himſelf would collect the moſt uſeful things that were contained in the chapter, explaining ſuch things as were difficult, and ſweetly feeding upon the reſt.

His conſtant practice was, to exhort ſuch as either viſited, or attended upon him, above all things to get faith: 'It is (ſaith he) your victory, your peace, your life, your crown, and your chief piece of ſpiritual armour: how beit, get on all the other pieces, and then go forth in the Lord's might: ſtand to the fight, and the iſſue ſhall be glorious; only forget not to call in the help of your General, do all from him, and under him.

On the Lord's days, he would not hinder any from the public ordinances, for any thing that was to be done about him, till ſermons were ended, and then he would ſay, Come, what have you for me? (meaning ſomething of repetition) unto which he would attend with ſuch diligence, as that he would ſum up the heads of every ſermon, and ſay, 'O what excellent truths are theſe! lay them up carefully, you will have need of them.'

When friends came to viſit him, he uſed to ſay, I cannot ſpeak, but I can hear. And when he was aſked, Where his comfort lay? his anſwer was, 'In Chriſt, and in the free grace of God.'

One telling him, Sir, you may take much comfort in your labours, you have done much good, &c. his anſwer was, 'All is nothing without a Saviour; without him my beſt works would condemn me. Oh! I am aſhamed of them, being mixed with ſo much ſin! Oh! I am an unprofitable ſervant, I have not done any thing for God as I ought; loſs of time ſits heavy upon my ſpirit. Work, work apace; aſſure yourſelves nothing will more trouble you when you come to die, than that you have done no more for God who hath done ſo much for you.'

Sometimes he uſed thus to breathe out himſelf, 'I never in all my life ſaw the worth of a Chriſt, nor taſted the ſweetneſs of God's love in that meaſure as now I do.

When he was aſked, What ſhould be done for him? his anſwer was, 'Do not only pray for me, but praiſe God for his unſpeakable mercy unto me, and in particular, that he hath kept Satan from me in this my weakneſs. Oh! how good is God? entertain good thoughts of him, how ever it be with us, we cannot think too well of him, or too bad of ourſelves.

And this ſenſe of God's goodneſs was very deeply imprinted upon his heart to his very laſt; and therefore in all his wills, this legacy was always renewed, Item, I bequeath to all my children, and to their childrens children, to each of them a Bible, with this inſcription, 'None but Chriſt.'

Being upon a time viſited by two reverend doctors, his choice friends, who before they prayed with him, deſired him to tell them what he chiefly requeſted? he anſwered, 'I praiſe God he ſupports me, and keeps off Satan. Pray that I may hold out: I am now in a good way home, even quite ſpent. I am now at the ſhore, I leave you toſſing on the ſea. Oh! it is a good time to die in.'

Yet when his end approached nearer, being often aſked how he did? he anſwered, 'In no great pain. I praiſe God, only weary of my unuſeful life. If God hath no more ſervice for me to do here, I could gladly be in heaven, where I ſhall ſerve him better, freed from ſin and diſtractions. I paſs from one death to another, yet I fear none; I praiſe God I can live, and I dare die. If God hath more work for me to do here, I am willing to do it, though my infirm body be very weak.'

Deſiring one to pray with him, and for him, that God would haſten the work, it was aſked, Whether pain, &c. put him upon that deſire? he anſwered, 'No: but I now do no good; and I hinder others, which might be better employed, if I were not: Why ſhould any deſire to live but to do God ſervice? Now I ceaſe from that, I do not live.

By this time the violence of his diſtemper diſabled him, and the advice of his phyſicians was, that he ſhould forbear ſpeech, yet he called upon thoſe which attended him, to read ſome part of the ſcriptures to him conſtantly; eſpecially he put one of his ſons that was with him to pray frequently; and whilſt his life and ſpeech laſted, he uſed to conclude all the prayers with a loud, Amen.

The nearer he approached to his end, the more he ſlumbered. Once when he awoke he found himſelf very ill; whereupon calling for his ſon, he took him by the hand, and ſaid, Pray with me; it is the laſt time in likelihood that I ſhall ever join with you. And complaining to him of his wearineſs, his ſon anſwered, There remains a reſt: to whom he replied, My Sabbath is not far off, and your's is at hand, 'ere that I ſhall be rid of all my trouble, and you will be eaſed of ſome.

At length his ruinous houſe, which only in obedience to the will of God had held out beyond his own deſires, and all mens expectations, from the heighth of ſummer till the depth of winter, comes to be diſſolved. About Saturday in the evening he began to ſet himſelf to die, forbidding all cordials to be adminiſtered, upon what extremity ſoever; and gave his dying bleſſing to his ſon, who only of all his children was preſent with him, and, upon his requeſt, enjoined him to ſignify, when he had opportunity, to that county where he had lived longeſt, That he had lived and died in that faith which he had preached and printed; the comfort whereof he now found. Something elſe he began to ſpeak, but his diſtempers interrupted his purpoſe, and from that time he never entertained any diſcourſe with man, only he commanded the eighth chapter of the epiſtle to the Romans to be read to him; and herein God was exceeding good to him, in the return of thoſe petitions which had been put up for him that afternoon by thoſe two eminent divines, and his deareſt brethren before mentioned: for whereas his great diſtempers gave occaſion to fear his death would be exceeding painful, yet did it prove ſo eaſy, that his ſon and other attendants could but gueſs at the particular time of his departure: his breathings were eaſy, and even his eyes open and full of water; till at the laſt, having lifted them up towards heaven, they cloſed of themſelves, and his ſoul, without the leaſt motion of reſiſtance from the body, entered into everlaſting reſt, whilſt thoſe whom he left behind were entering upon the day of their reſt. For then he began a perpetual Sabbath in heaven, when they began theirs on earth, betwixt twelve and one on Saturday night, Dec. 1658.

He died in a good old age, and full of days, having near lived fourſcore years: his loſs was much bewailed by the college, by the city, and whole univerſity of Oxford. He was, as all that knew him confeſſed, a man of admirable prudence, profound judgment, eminent gifts and graces, and furniſhed with all qualifications that might render him a compleat man, a wiſe governor, a profitable preacher, and a good Chriſtian.

Firſt, Look upon him as a Chriſtian, for that was his, and is every man's greateſt ornament: he was a man that had much acquaintance with God, much communion with him in private meditation and prayer, accounting thoſe his beſt days wherein he enjoyed moſt converſe with him.

In the time of his ſickneſs, one aſking him how he did? 'Oh! ſaith he, this hath been a ſweet day; I have had ſweet communion with God in Jeſus Chriſt.'

He was not like them who are all for promiſes and privileges, though in the mean time they neglect duties: he made them his exerciſe, but not his Chriſt: he was much in thoſe ſeverer parts of religion, as private humiliation, mortification, and ſelf denial, whereby he gained the conqueſt over himſelf. The truth is, he was (as far as is conſiſtent with human frailty) maſter of his corruptions, paſſions, reaſon, appetite, language, and all.

The Lord was pleaſed to work upon him in the primroſe of his life, though he certainly knew not either the preacher or ſermon whereby he was converted. His courſe was, in the days of his ſtricteſt examination, to ſet down in writing his evidences for heaven, ſometimes in propoſitions from ſcripture, other ſometimes in ſylogiſms, and theſe he often ſubſcribed to, in a book that he kept for that purpoſe.

But theſe evidence were beſt read by others in the courſe of his life, by his exact walking with God in piety, charity, humility, patience, and dependance upon him. He was far unlike to thoſe who ſit in Moſes's chair, and teach what themſelves practiſe not. He had well digeſted that father's precept to preachers, 'Either preach not at all, or live as you preach.

His life was a commentary upon his doctrine, and his practice the counterpan of his ſermons. What was ſaid of that precious biſhop Jewel was true of him, That he adorned a heavenly doctrine with a heavenly life. In a word, he did vertere verba in opera, he lived in religion, whilſt many only make it the ſubject of their diſcourſe. He was much more than he ſeemed to be, not loving to make a noiſe in the world, but accounting it better to do than to ſpeak.

In his works of charity to the poor, he was no leſs diſcreet than private. When he met with fit objects, his hand was more ready to give, than his tongue to proclaim it. Indeed he was no friend to idle, lazy, canting perſons, who live on the ſweat of other mens brows. Theſe he looked upon as the peſts of the common wealth, nor could he think it charity to relieve ſuch to the prejudice of the public, and to their own deſtruction. But God's poor, and the 'houſhold of faith' lay near his heart. Whoſoever ſhall ſurvey his large bills of weekly and quarterly allowances, beſides conſiderable ſums given to the poor miniſters, and eſpecially to their widows and orphans, who never knew whence it came, and ſhall add thereunto his legacies bequeathed in his will to charitable uſes, cannot (whatever others thought of him) but judge that his charity exceeded the ordinary proportion of his revenues.

Naturally he was of a ſtout and maſculine temper, yet through grace he attained a great meaſure of humility: he was mean and low in his own eyes, and had more undervaluing thoughts of himſelf than all the world beſides had of him.

He was very ſenſible of that enemy which he often complained of, viz. diſcouragement, which he uſed to ſay, The child of pride and unbelief. It muſt needs be acknowledged a great meaſure of humility that could keep a man lowly under ſuch abilities, attainments, and ſuch general applauſes as he met with in every place.

His uſual ſaying was, That he valued no man for his gifts, but for his humility under them: neither ſhould he expect much from any man, were his parts never ſo great, till he was broken with afflictions and temptations.

It was his obſervation, That the humbleſt preachers converted moſt ſouls, not the choiceſt ſcholars, whilſt unbroken.

He would ſometimes uſe this ſpeech, which though a ſeeming contradiction, yet hath it much truth in it, 'It is better to be an humble devil than a proud angel.'

He never affected popular applauſe, variety of pulpits, printing, &c. as one conſcious to himſelf of I know not what unworthineſs; neither ever came he thus abroad, but when by importunity he was called to it.

II. Conſider him as a man in his morals, whether in the government of himſelf in particular, or of his family, or his greateſt truſts; and in all you ſhall find him like himſelf, excellent, and almoſt without a parallel.

In regard of himſelf he was exactly temperate, confining himſelf to hours for diet, ſleep, &c. He would often ſay, That he would rather pour liquor into his boots, than into his mouth between meals.

He was a ſtrict obſerver of thoſe laws of ſobriety which St Paul had preſſed upon miniſters, and which himſelf, in his Drunkard's Cup had taught others. He uſed to eat ſeaſonably and ſparingly, which, without queſtion, was one great means of preſerving ſuch vigorous ſpirits to ſo great an age.

His only play time was Saturdays in the afternoon; then he uſed to unbend and diſburden himſelf by ſome innocent recreations, but only ad ruborem. He was a man of an excellent deportment and ſweet behaviour, whereby he won much upon all with whom he converſed. Grave he was without affectation, pleaſant without levity. Indeed he never loved to hear himſelf talk, and therefore by ſome was judged too reſerved; but when he knew with whom he had to do, he was communicative enough. No man was more candid, or fuller of civility; none more open or free to entertain or return diſcourſes. He was very cautious before he ſtruck a league of intimate friendſhip with any man; but when he had once choſen, he was cordial, firm, and conſtant; his head, hand, tongue, pen, feet, purſe, all were now no longer his own, but his friends.

It is ſaid of the French, that whatſoever cloaths they wear, whatſoever garb they accoſt you in, becomes them ſo well as if nothing elſe did; and a great critic in men, as well as in books, uſed to ſay of our doctor, that whatſoever he did or ſpake became him.

It was a rare thing to ſee him angry. If at any time the folly of others had diſcompoſed him, or their ſin had provoked, yet could he quickly command himſelf, and convert his paſſion into wholeſome inſtruction.

Tho' himſelf had great parts, both natural and acquired, yet would he never ſlight or undervalue, much leſs contemn, or diſcourage any whom he judged to be right in the main. He was very ſparing in his cenſures of others, gentle to all, and ſevere only to himſelf.

He had a ſpecial gift of forgetting injuries, but would offer none. His memory was never more faithful than in retaining civilities received, to which he would induſtriouſly make what proportionable returns lay in his power. He much feared leſt he ſhould give any occaſion of ſuſpicion that he either forgot, or neglected any, becauſe he could not readily recal mens names, which occaſioned him to ſay, 'That if he lived long he ſhould forget his own name, with him in Valerius.'

At meals his manner was to be ſociable and facetious; yet ſtill he took occaſion to enquire of the public, and how it fared with particular towns and families, whence he would always extract ſomething for matter of prayer or praiſe in his thankſgiving after meat.

In his family he had that qualification of a good biſhop mentioned by the apoſtle, 'That ruled well his own houſe.' He had an excellent method in the education of his children, which was this:

In general, his care was to maintain his authority over them; yet even that authority was equally tempered with lenity and gravity. He loved them without fondneſs, and ruled them without rigour. In particular, ſo ſoon as they could uſe their tongues, they were made acquainted with the hiſtorical part of the ſcriptures. As ſoon as they could uſe their legs they were ſet to ſchool, and when they could remember any thing of a chapter read, or bring home any part of a ſermon, his care was to inſtruct them in the fundamentals of religion.

Their childhood being paſt, he would call upon them for the practice of religion, and was a diligent obſerver of their private performance of religious exerciſes, wherein their mother was no ſmall help to him.

When they grew up to more maturity, he diligently obſerved their capacities, inclinations, but eſpecially their conſtitutions, when he could gueſs at that ſin which was like to prove their dilectum delictum, their darling corruption: he accordingly ſuited their callings, ſo as that ſin might be leaſt nouriſhed, and moſt beaten down. The rule which he gave them was this, 'When you are youths chuſe your callings; when men chuſe your wives; only take me along with you: it may be old men may ſee further than you.' Thus, whilſt he condeſcended to them, and they ſubmitted to him, both parties were gratified.

Though he had a numerous iſſue, yet (through God's bleſſing upon his eſtate) he diſpoſed of them to no mean employments. Many he ſent to the univerſity; ſome to merchandize, &c.

To his ſons whom he bred in the univerſity, his rule was, 'Study work more than wages.' To thoſe whom he bred in the city, he would ſay, 'Do not waſte a halfpenny, and you will not want a penny.' And truly ſo well did they all improve, both his advice, and their own time and parts, that they became maſters of their particular callings, which miniſtered unto him no ſmall comfort.

He acknowleged it a great mercy to his dying day, that none of his children were blemiſhed, either in their bodies, or in their reputations. He was one of them in whoſe children that popiſh ſlander concerning the ungraciouſneſs of the children of the married clergy received a real confutation.

Many of his ſons he buried in their prime, ſome at home, others in foreign parts, and ſome died ſhortly after himſelf; yet all of them gave comfortable hopes to conclude, upon a rational charity, both by the pious letters of thoſe which died abroad, and from that particular account which they gave of themſelves who died at home, that they all meet in heaven; they which ſurvive need not this atteſtation.

Amongſt the dead there was Mr Thomas Harris of Magdalen college in Oxford, who was eminently learned beyond his age, an ornament to that noble foundation whereof he was a member; once the joy of his friends, and ſtill their ſorrow; and probably this arrow from God's hand ſtuck deep in the father's heart to his dying day.

For his ſervants; there are ſome yet living that ſerved him in his younger days, who ſtill bleſs God that ever they came under his roof, where they received the beginnings of grace, and ſuch a meaſure of knowlege, as kept them from warping in the late giddy times.

Whilſt he remained with his antient flock, his conſtant manner was, to keep a religious faſt before his adminiſtration of the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper. And after he came to his ſmall college, he ſo prudently managed all his affairs, that he was both feared and loved. Indeed his government there was ſuch as cauſed a wonder; for whereas that college before was famous for factions, during his time there was never any complaint made to any viſitors; and no marvel, for the foundation there honoured him as a father, and he looked upon, and loved them, as his children, and accordingly he ſealed up his love to them in his laſt will and teſtament.

He called gifts, bribery, and hated the very ſhadow of it. Examples are known in the college of gratuities, refuſed long after fair and free elections.

But look upon him as a ſcholar, and there we have him in his proper element. Though he left the univerſity early, and preached conſtantly, yet being of a retired diſpoſition, a conſtant ſtudent, and endowed with great parts, he became maſter of all manner of learning to qualify a diviне in the ſacred languages, eſpecially in the Hebrew, he was very exact.

His 'Conciones ad Clerum,' declare him to have been a pure and polite Latiniſt: his firſt, which was preached and printed long ſince, hath undergone the teſt, and gained the approbation of all knowing men in that language; the younger, by full forty years, is of as good a complexion, and of as vigorous a conſtitution as its elder brother; and it is hoped that in due time it may be made as public.

What his abilities in diſputations were, hath upon ſeveral occaſions been made to appear in the college exerciſes in the chappel, where oft-times, in the unexpected abſence of the opponents, himſelf would, ex tempore, take up the cudgels, and make good their ground: in which exerciſes he approved himſelf a ſubtile, clear, and ready diſputant, without any grains of allowance either for his age or diſcontinuance.

Indeed his chiefeſt learning lay where he made leaſt ſhew of it in public, viz. in chronology, church hiſtory, councils, caſe divinity, and his inſight into the fathers: but his parts were beſt ſeen in the pulpit.

His gifts in prayer were much more than ordinary, wherein his affections were warm and fervent, his petitions pithy and ſubſtantial, his language pertinent, unaffected, and without tautologies. Oh! how would he raiſe up a dull and ſinking ſpirit! how would he warm a cold and frozen heart! how would he carry a man out of himſelf, and by degrees mount the ſoul heaven ward.

His ſermons in print are well known to the world, and 'his works praiſe him in the gates.' The particular excellencies of Nazianzen, Baſil, Chryſoſtom, Auſtin, Ambroſe, Bernard, ſeemed all to concenter in him. He taught rhetoric, to ſpeak in our mother tongue, and without falſehood or flattery, he may be ſtiled the Engliſh orator. His doctrines carried light with them, and his uſes heat; his reproofs were weighty, and his exhortations powerful. But enough of this, leſt we hear as he did, who ſpake much in commendation of Herculus, Quis unquam vituperavit? whoever diſpraiſed him? Yea, what either Chriſtian or ſcholar, but approved and commended him? If you would know the worth of his ſermons read them, though read, they come ſhort of what they were when preached; yea, read them again and again, endeavour to read them with the ſame ſpirit they were preached, and you cannot but acknowlege an excellency in them.

Amongſt his other excellencies in preaching, which were many, theſe were not the leaſt, that he could ſo cook his meat that he would make it reliſh to every palate: he could dreſs a plain diſcourſe, ſo as that all ſorts ſhould be delighted with it. He could preach with a learned plainneſs, and had learned to conceal his art. He had clear notions of high myſteries, and proper language to make them ſtoop to the meaneſt capacity.

His way in contriving and penning his ſermons was this.

1. He ſo contrived the parts of his text, and points of doctrine, as might afford him moſt ſcope in his application, wherein his, and indeed a ſermon's excellency, doth conſiſt; and therefore he uſed to ſay, 'That in a ſermon he contrived the uſes firſt: he did often handle the ſame texts, and the ſame points, and yet ſtill would pen new applications, which might be moſt ſuitable to the quality and condition of the auditory.

2. In penning: When he once began he would never take pen from paper, nor turn to any book, till he had written all. All his younger days, for about twenty years together he wrote all, and could without much difficulty preach the ſame verbatim. He was wont to ſay, that he had a fluid and wateriſh memory. 'I can, ſaid he, quickly remember any thing of my own, and as quickly forget it again.' Yet queſtionleſs his memory was vaſt and tenacious; for though ſometimes he had but ſhort notes in his Bible, and that but ſeldom, yet did he never uſe them, except when he preached a Clerum of late years, in which he ſometimes glanced upon his papers. His cuſtom was, preſently after he had heard a ſermon to write down the heads thereof, and he ſcarce either forgot or miſplaced any of them.

Upon

Upon faſt nights he would, by the ſtrength of his memory, repeat two, ſometimes three ſermons, that he had heard that day, in the ſame order as they were delivered.

Speaking with a friend about memories, he ſaid, that his memory never failed him; 'For, ſaid he, I durſt never truſt it.'

He uſed to ſay that a preacher had three books to ſtudy, 1. the Bible; 2. himſelf; 3. the people.

He looked much to the ordinance, and relation between paſtor and people, and would ſay, 'That preaching to them was but one part of the paſtor's duty: he was to live and die in them, as well as for and with them.

He complained much of ſome mens too large inſiſting upon the doctrinal parts of their point, whereby they left little or no room for application; and found that few, either in the cities or univerſities, bended themſelves to enlarge upon their uſes, which made their ſermons to differ little from divinity lectures; and though all preachers could not enlarge themſelves therein, yet he would often call upon them to accuſtom themſelves to it, as being moſt profitable.

He would often relate a paſſage of Mr Dod's concerning Mr Cartwright, who often in his days preached occaſionally at Hanwell, 'Me thought, ſaid Mr Dod, when I heard the doctrinal part of his ſermon, I was in heaven; but when he came to apply it, I ſometimes thought, that if I had been in his place, I could preſently have applied his point more cloſely. Non omnia poſſumus omnes.

Many young preachers reſorted to Dr Harris for counſel, both for direction in their private ſtudies, and in their ſermons; and he uſed to perſuade them, for many reaſons, to pen largely, and to keep their notes for all emergent occaſions, often commending Mr Dod's words to them, who profeſſed, That he would rather preach an old ſermon ten times, than ſpeak any thing new without preparation.

He would ſay, That he would have a preacher to exceed himſelf upon juſt occaſion, and not always to keep the ſame pace: yet did not that always hold in his own practice; for generally his hearers commended thoſe ſermons moſt, which coſt him leaſt; and himſelf would ſay, That he never came off with leſs comfort, and worſe content to himſelf, than when he was in appearance beſt provided for it: And he gave this reaſon, Not becauſe he had uſed ſuch diligence in preparing, for that was his duty; but becauſe he was then apteſt to depend upon himſelf, and to neglect his dependance upon God.

Many ſought to him for advice in chuſing divinity books, to whom he would open himſelf freely. Some he perſuaded to read Ames his Medulla, Tileni Syntagma, Bucanus, and ſuch like. To ſome others he would commend Aquinas his Sums, which Dr John Reynolds uſed to call, That abſolute body of divinity; Melchior Canus, and of late, Mr Bowles his Paſtor Evangelicus. But above all, he would call upon every one to read the text in the originals, and to analyſe chapters. This he perſuaded Mr Pemble to, and ſet him to practiſe it in the book of the preacher, or Eccleſiaſtes, which he accounted a very hard book, till he met with that brief, but pithy expoſition of that incomparable divine, Dr Edward Reynolds, and after that upon Zachary.

When any conſulted with him about writers, he would aſk what they aimed at in a writer, for ſeveral men had their ſeveral excellencies. For acuteneſs he uſed to commend Dr Bains, and his ſecond Dr Ames, Mr John Ball, Mr Capel, &c. If they aimed at the ſpiritual part of divinity, he would leave them to Dr Sibs; if the rational, to Dr Preſton; if the hiſtorical, to biſhop Uſher. For ſolid preachers, he much prized Dr Sanderſon's firſt works, to his latter he was a meer ſtranger. Mr Randal, Mr Hildersham, Dr Reynolds, &c. And for all the requiſites for a preacher, both for method, matter, elocution, pronunciation, he would often ſay, that he ſeldom met with an abler man than his brother Whatley of Banbury.

When his judgment was aſked about commentators, he uſed to anſwer, that he was now more of Dr John Reynolds his mind, than ever concerning Mr Calvin; for upon experience, ſaith he, 'I find, that the moſt of the late writers do but deſcant upon his plain ſong; and the Jeſuits are very plagiaries, who firſt rob him, and then rail upon him.

Next to Calvin, he uſed to commend ſundry late writers, as Pareus, Rivet, Mr Cartwright eſpecially, together with ſome popiſh writers, as Maldonate, whoſe wit and learning he preferred before his ſpirit, learned Maſius, modeſt Ribera, and for ought he found by him honeſt Eſtius. And being aſked about the beſt editions, his anſwer was, that what was ſaid of Homer, was true of the fathers, and the firſt popiſh writers, viz. 'That was ever the beſt editions which was leaſt corrected.' Of the ancient fathers he would ſay, 'That unleſs it were for their polemical and hiſtorical parts, their writings were more for devotion and affection, than for their judgment and underſtanding.'

About modern authors this was his opinion generally, That what Engliſh men did ex profeſſo undertake, they did beſt perform it. No men excel them in expounding ſcriptures, in anſwering Papiſts, Armenians, &c. And he held Cambridge very happy in her Whitakers, Downams, Davenant, Perkins, beſides many others. And for Oxford, he would lay one John Reynolds, to paſs in ſilence, younger Reynolds, and his ſon in law born a ſchoolman in the ballance with hundreds, as a man never ſufficiently admired for his humility as well as for his learning.

For the ſchoolmen, he liked many things in them, but not their aukward and ignorant quoting of ſcripture, nor their multiplying of uſeleſs queſtions with needleſs obſcurities.

For Lutherans, he commended divers of them for their learning and induſtry, but diſliked their tartneſs.

For Arminius, though he were none of the beſt, yet he liked him better than his diſciples and ſucceſſors, who were more deſperate and dangerous in the five controverted points, than many of the Papiſts.

As for Socinianiſm, he accounted it to be but a kind of blancht Mahometiſm. And this he obſerved in general, that thoſe Papiſts, who were moſt converſant in the Scriptures, come neareſt to us; the like he ſaid of the Lutherans, as Chemnitius, Gerard, Hemingius, &c.

He was ſparing to deliver his judgment about our condition at home, yet ſome things lay ſadly upon his ſpirit; as,

1. He complained, that the power of godlineſs, and exerciſe of love and ſelf denial, were much abated in thoſe latter days; and he much bewailed the vaſt difference, both in garb and practice, betwixt new and old profeſſors.

2. That the indulgence that was ſhewed to tender conſciences, was much abuſed to prophaneneſs, whilſt men of no conſcience moſt pleaded that liberty of chuſing their own churches and teachers; and, indeed on the matter abandoned all.

3. That the liberty of prophefying which ſome pretended to, was abuſed to meer licentiouſneſs and confuſion, whilſt ſome would have none, and others all prophets and preachers.

4. That, in the univerſity, few could be called conſtant ſtudents, but the moſt made a ſhort work of it, and poſted into the pulpit before they underſtood their grounds, ſo that few were able to encounter our growing errors.

5. That the church men were in their extreams, ſome preaching nothing but law, others preaching but the goſpel and Chriſt.

6. He complained of the want of catechiſing, and inſtructing youth in the principles, the want of which, he ſaw by experience was a great occaſion of the peoples giddineſs.

7. But moſt of all, he bewailed the readineſs of many to ſide and make diviſions. He loved not either to uſe or to hear uſed, dividing names and titles; upon which occaſion, he often related Mr Greenham's anſwer to the Lord treaſurer Cecil, who being aſked on which ſide the blame lay in that great rent between the biſhops and their antagoniſts, anſwered, 'That the fault was on both ſides, and in neither ſide: for, ſaid he, the godly wiſe on both ſides bear with each other, and concenter in the main; but then there be ſelfiſh, peeviſh ſpirits, on both ſides ſome, and theſe be they that make the quarrel. This

This he applied to our times, by reaſon of the diſtinction of Preſbyterians and Independents, ſaying, 'Men of humble and ſincere hearts, though differing in opinion, can, and do walk together, pray together, and love one another; but men who wholly look at their own intereſts, blow the coals, and make a ſtir, as if the opinions were irreconcileable, and as every one was diſaffected to Chriſt's cauſe that goes not their pace and path.'

He profeſſed freely, that for his part he was not convinced of ſome things that were earneſtly preſſed about Church-government; he did not conceive any one external form to be ſo eſſential to a church, but that it might ſtill deſerve that name, though under a Preſbyterian, or Independent, or Epiſcopal form, ſo long as it was kept within the bounds of thoſe general rules laid down in Scriptures. It is true, ſome of theſe had been abuſed to tyranny, and the reſt of them might be abuſed alſo; but the uſe and abuſe of things are far different, and he would not commend either the one or the other, in their rigid exactions in ſome caſes.

For Preſbytery, though he thought that Biſhop Bilſon could never (with all his learning) diſprove the being of Lay Elders in the apoſtles times, yet he thought withal, that it was not ſo eaſy a thing to prove the perpetuity of ſuch an ordinance to the world's end, eſpecially ſo clothed and attended with all thoſe perquiſites which ſome heretofore call'd for. He thought, that there was ſome reaſon in the diſtinction of Jure Humano, and Juris Humani, whatever his application was who firſt uſed it: but for the thing itſelf, ſith it is not altogether diſproved but allowed, yea, once commanded, and not ſince retracted (for ought he knew), he ſaw no reaſon why any man ſhould eo nomine, be aſperſed, becauſe a Preſbyterian, by any diſſenting brethren.

For the other of Independency, he confeſſed that it was a politic way, and free from much trouble and oppoſition: For who ſhall oppoſe the miniſter, when all are of the mind before they are admitted? Yet could he never ſatisfy himſelf, though upon occaſion he often deſired it in ſome particulars; as,

1. What warrant men have to take out of another's flock, his beſt ſheep, and to entertain them without their conſent or teſtimony. He aſks, whether any man would willingly be ſo ſerved? Whether this would not open a gap, that ſo ſoon as a member is offended with his own paſtor (happily upon deſerved reproof) preſently to fly to another congregation.

2. To leave the cullen ſheep in a hard condition: For how ſhall they be looked upon? The anſwer muſt needs be little better than heathens: For the miniſter may preach to ſuch, and what more may he do to theſe, when the chief are gone?

3. This way ſeemed to him, to be very deſtructive to that relation between paſtor and people.

4. He conceived this way of gathering of churches into private places and companies, to be prejudicial to the public worſhip of God: Experience declaring, that in many places of late the public ordinances are grown into diſuſe, preaching only excepted, which might be afforded to Canibals, if they would hear.

5. Laſtly, For congregations, to conſiſt of members at ſuch a diſtance, as that one ſhould live in the North, and another in the South, &c. many miles aſunder, whereby inſpection cannot be performed on the paſtors part; and on the peoples part, they can enjoy little communion and edification one from another; this, he uſed to ſay, that he did not underſtand, nor could he find any precept for it in the word, nor any preſident or practice of it in antiquity, if we ſpeak of churches conſtituted, and out of perſecution, baniſhment, &c. Theſe things he neither wrote, nor ſpake, but with much fear and grief.

Amongſt other things, he did very much bewail the great ſlighting of ſolemn ordination of Miniſters, the office being ſo ſacred, the work of the miniſtry ſo important, and the Miniſter of ſo public concernment. He wondered that when, as in all other offices, there is ſuch ſolemnities at the officers inſtalments, that a Miniſter, and embaſſador of Jeſus Chriſt, ſhould be ſilently admitted without faſting, prayer, and ſome public ſolemnity.

As to private paſſages, it were endleſs to write all his obſervations: only take theſe few.

He obſerved, that ſuch as often changed their principles and faith profeſſedly, uſually fell from Scepticiſm to Atheiſm.

That ſo much humility as any man had, ſo much grace and worth he had, and no more.

That nothing was to be accounted good in, or to any man, but that which was his proper fruit, and done by vertue of his calling, from a principle of God, and for God.

That the beſt man hath no ſecurity from any one ſin, or fall, or temptation, any further, or longer, than he was held up by God's hand, and Chriſt's mediation.

That God doth oftentimes leave us to own Satan's ſuggeſtions for our own, becauſe we do not own God in his holy motions and breathings.

That it is juſt with God, to deny us the comfort of our graces, when we deny him the glory of them.

In himſelf he obſerved, that what he forgat in the week would unſeaſonably preſs in on the ſabbath; ſo that he could, if he durſt, contrive more wordly buſineſs on the Sabbath, than he could diſpatch all the week.

That he found no greater enemy than diſcouragement, which he called, 'The child of pride and unbelief.'

He uſed to ſay, that ſome duties which were oft in mens mouths, he found very difficult to him: As,

1. To deny himſelf in all his ſelfs, was a work to be learning whilſt he lived.

2. To live only by faith, and a bare promiſe without a pawn, is a great work.

3. To give all to free grace, and to Chriſt alone, is a mighty work.

4. To love where we meet with unlovingneſs, and contempt, is no eaſy matter.

5. To do ones proper work without ſome preſent pay, and countenance from God and man is a hard task.

6. That it's far harder to adopt others comforts, than their ſorrows, and to hold one's ſelf exalted in another's exaltation.

7. That to die in cold blood, and to be active in it, as an act of obedience, is the work of a Chriſtian.

In his ſickneſs he would occaſionally vent himſelf thus:

It's a hard thing to think ill of ourſelves, and well of God at the ſame time.

It's a hard thing for a ſaint to forgive himſelf ſome faults when God hath forgiven them.

It's hard to think holy thoughts long, and to confine them to another's prayers.

We know but little of Chriſt's love, till all be perfected, and ſpread before us in heaven.

For his children he referred them to an old will which he had made, Anno Chriſti 1636, when they were many and ſmall, which becauſe it may be of uſe to many others it's here inſerted.

The advice and counſel of DR HARRIS to his Family annexed to a Will made by him, Anno Chriſti 1636.

To my dear Wife and Children.

My dear ſelfs, I know not what kiſure I ſhall have to ſpeak unto you at my death, and I am not, you know, very free in ſpeech, eſpecially in ſickneſs and ſadneſs, and therefore now I will ſpeak my heart to you, and I would have you to hear me ſpeaking whilſt you live, in this my writing which I divide among you all.

Firſt for you, my dear wife, you ſhall find the ſubſtance of that I would ſay to you, printed to your hand in the book of martyrs, vol. 2. p. 1744. to wit, in John Careleſs his letter to his wife; keep the book, and often read the letter; only one thing I add, if you marry again, remember your own obſervation, viz, that ſecond husbands are very uxorious, ſecond wives very prevalent, and therefore take heed that you do no ill office in eſtranging your huſband from his natural children or kindred; you ſhall thereby draw upon him a great ſin and judgment, if you kill in him natural affections: I have ſaid, and do withal the ſtrength and power that is in me, thank you for your faithfulneſs, and reſign you to the huſband of huſbands, the Lord Chriſt.

Now

Now my poor children, let me pour out my heart to you, and ſpeak to your ſouls firſt.

For your Souls.

Triffle not in the main point; the ſoul is immortal, you have to deal with an infinite majeſty, you go upon life and death, therefore here be ſerious; do all to God in a ſerious manner. When you think of him, ſpeak of him, pray to him, any way make your addreſſes to his great Majeſty, be in good earneſt, 'and have God, and have all.'

1. More particularly, get your pardon in Chriſt: It is not impoſſible to get it aſſured to you, if you will learn, 1. To deny yourſelves. 2. To live by faith. 3. To underſtand the nature of the new covenant. Settle your judgment in theſe points, and the thing is feaſible.

2. Having gotten it, be ſtill adding to your evidences, and enjoy your preſent aſſurance; do all to God as to your Father.

Next to this, think how you and I ſhall endure the light, the thought one of another at the laſt day, if you appear in the old Adam: much leſs ſhall you ſtand before Chriſt, unleſs you ſhew the image of Chriſt, in you, and therefore never ceaſe till you be made new creatures, and ſtudy well what that is.

In the laſt place ſtrive for thoſe graces moſt, which concern your places and conditions, and make head againſt thoſe ſins which moſt threaten you: as firſt hereditary ſins. I was naturally melancholly, that is a humour that admits of any temptation, and is capable of any impreſſion and diſtemper. Shun as death this humour, which will work you to all unthankfulneſs againſt God, unlovingneſs to man, and unnaturalneſs to yourſelves. 2. Of your times and habitations. 3. Of your tempers and age. 4. Of your callings.

I have made my own peace, my ſins ſhall not hurt you, if you make them not yours; you need not fear the ſucceſs if you will oppoſe to ſin; Chriſt is made ſanctification to you, he came to diſſolve the works of Satan; he hath overcome for you, and hath made as many promiſes for your ſanctification, as your juſtification: gather thoſe promiſes as they be ſet down eſpecially in the covenant with an oath, Luke 1. Preſs theſe to God, 2 Cor. vii. 1.

In ſhort, do not talk and make a noiſe to get a name of forward men, but do the thing; be conſtant in ſecret duties, and act religion in your callings; for it is not a name, or notion; it is a frame of nature and habit of living by divine rule. What it is, you will then know, when you have it in truth firſt, and in power next, and not before. Only this for the preſent; it is that you muſt live and die by, that you muſt riſe and reign by; therefore, my children, I give you that advice, which I gave your brother, now with God; be more than you ſeem: do more than you talk of in point of religion: ſatisfie your own conſciences in what you do; all men you ſhall never ſatisfie; nay, ſome will not be ſatisfied, though they be convinced.

For your Bodies.

I was troubled with ſtraitneſs of breath and breaſt, which was alſo hereditary, and therefore you muſt fear it the more.

The remedies are, 1. Diſclaim hereditary ſins. 2. Keep hands clean, feet warm, and hearts cheerful. 3. Be more frequent than I and your brother, in exerciſe 4. Shun late drinking and ſtudying. 5. Uſe lighter ſuppers.

For your Callings.

1. Chooſe well, 1. A profitable calling for the public, 2. A full employment. 3. A calling fit for your parts and means. It is better to be a rich cobler, than a poor merchant.

2. Uſe a calling well. 1. Make it an help, not a ſnare to your ſouls. 2. Be 1. Diligent. 2. Skilful. Any honeſt calling will honour you, if thus you honour it; and therefore you may be hopeful, becauſe my ſelf (who had not your parts and helps) never found any thing too hard for me in my calling, but diſcouragement and unbelief.

For your Company.

Abandon all infectious, flattering, ſelf-ſerving companions; when once you have found them falſe, truſt them no more. Sort with ſuch as are able to do, or receive good. Solomon gives you the beſt counſel for this in many places. Read the Proverbs, and remember him in this; 1. Forſake not an old friend. 2 Be friendly, and faithful to your friends. 3. Never trouble or truſt friends unleſs there be a neceſſity. 4. and laſtly, Be long in cloſing with friends, and loath to loſe them upon experience of them.

For your Marriages.

In marriage you lay the foundation of your preſent woe, or weal; therefore here be not raſh, go not alone, yet remember Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 2. Firſt ſtudy whether you have a calling to marry yea or no, and adviſe well of that. If none, forbear; if ſo, adviſe with friends, before your affections be engaged, In your choice, 1. Aim at grace. 2. Good nature and education; The beſt woman is not ever the beſt wife. 3. Good parts of underſtanding, houſewifery, &c. As for portion, be it more or leſs, be upon certainties, and truſt not to words; and for parentage, let not the diſtance be too great, leſt you deſpiſe, or be deſpiſed: however be ſure that the perſon likes not your fancy, but your judgment.

For your Children.

Make it your chiefeſt work to make them, 1. Godly. 2. Uſeful. Beſtow moſt of their portions in good education; and if grace make no difference, do you make none in your affections, countenances, portions; partiality, this way ends in nothing elſe but envy, ſtrangeneſs, &c.

For your ſelves within your ſelves.

My deſire hath been to carry an even hand over you all, and have laboured to reduce you, as near as I could (all circumſtances conſidered) to an equality, and therefore my laſt requeſt and charge is, that you will live together in an undivided bond of love; you are many of you, and if you join together as one man, you need not want any thing: what counſel, what comfort, what money, what friends may you not help your ſelves unto, if you will contribute your aids? wherefore, my dear children, I pray, beſeech, command, adjure you, by all the relations and dearneſs that hath ever been betwixt us, that you know one another, viſit (as you may) each other, comfort, counſel, relieve, ſuccour, help, admoniſh one another. Whilſt your mother lives, meet there (if poſſible) yearly. When ſhe is dead, pitch upon ſome other place; if it may be, your eldeſt brother's houſe; or if you cannot meet, yet ſend to, and hear from one another yearly. And when you have neither father nor mother, be ſo many fathers and mothers each to other, ſo you ſhall underſtand the bleſſing mentioned, Pſal. cxxxiii.

For your Eſtates,

Be not troubled that you are below your kindred; get more wiſdom, humility, goodneſs, and you are above them; only this do. 1. Study work more than wages. 2. Deal with your hearts to make them leſs. 3. Begin below. 4. Join together to help one another. 5. Reſt upon the promiſes, which are many, and precious this way. 6. Sow mercy. Take of your mother (to this end,)---a piece: give that in works of mercy, and if all other means fail you, that ſhall maintain you; I know I know, I ſay, and I am confident in it, that if ye will be humbled for my barrenneſs, and will truſt God in his own way, he will make comfortable proviſion for you. Object no more, but truſt him.

For the Public.

Bleſs God that ye are born Engliſh men, and bear your ſelves dutifully, and conſcionably towards authority, See God in the magiſtrate, and hold order a precious thing: and for the church, neither ſet her above her husband Chriſt, nor below her children; give her that honour, obedience and reſpect that is her due; and if you will be my children, and heirs of my comfort in my dying age, be neither authors, nor factious of any, either faction, or novelty. It's true, this is not a riſing way, but it is a free, fair, comfortable way for a man to follow his own judgment without warping to either hand. Perhaps you may hear variety of judgments touching my walk, when I ſleep in ſilence; ſome taxing me with too much, ſome for too little conformity; but be not ye troubled: I did what in my circumſtances ſeemed beſt to me, for the preſent; howſoever the event hath not in ſome points anſwered expectation, yet I have learned to meaſure things by another rule than events, and ſatisfy my ſelf in this, that I did all for the beſt, as I thought. Sure I am, my Saviour Chriſt is perfect, and never failed ſo much as in circumſtance. To him I commit your ſouls, bodies, eſtates, names, lives, deaths, all; and my ſelf waiting when he ſhall 'change my vile body, and make it glorious' like unto his own, 'Amen even ſo come Lord Jeſus, Amen.'

On the Memory of that famous and godly Miniſter Dr ROBERT HARRIS, my late worthy Friend.

'AS once Elias in John Baptiſt came Back to the Jews, in that triumphant flame
Of light and zeal, wherein he did before
Without death's help up into glory ſoar;
And by this tranſmigration of his grace,
Prepared paths before his maſter's face:
Even ſo in thee (bleſt ſoul) did breathe anew
Great Chryſoſtom, yea great Apollos too;
To thee thoſe mighty orators did give
Their tongues to ſpeak, to thee their life to live:
Nay, thou thy ſelf didſt in thy ſelf renew,
Thy forty's vigour in fourſcore we knew
When all thy ſtrength decay'd, thy gifts did thrive;
The man is dead, the preacher ſtill alive;
Alive in his own ſermons, in our love,
His name alive below, his ſoul above.
And may the younger prophets ſtill inherit
A double portion of the father's ſpirit;
That by a ſacred Metempſychoſis,
The gifts may now be theirs, which once were his;
That every ſermon which we hear, may be (Rare preacher) a true portraiture or thee;
Yea, may it of each following age be true,
The former are exceeded by the new;
Viſions of young ſurpaſs old prophets dreams,
The Father's lights, outſhin'd by childrens beams,
That in their meaſures we may more, and more,
Th' unmeaſur'd fulneſs of our Lord adore.

E. REYNER.

The Life and Death of Mrs JANE RATCLIFFE, who died Anno Chriſti 1638.

MRS JANE RATCLIFFE was born of good parents, who were morally civil, and moderately religious, according to the temper of the times wherein they lived: her uncle was Mr Edward Brerewood, a learned profeſſor in Greſham college London. In her younger years ſhe was rather civil than religious, and ſometimes rather merry than civil; yet lightſome without lightneſs, or immodeſty: though too much delighted with dancing, ſtage-plays, and other public vanities, according to the cuſtom of young folks, eſpecially in thoſe times when theſe things were ſo thought of, that they were admitted to be acted in the churches. But it pleaſed God, according to the election of grace, in due time to call her by the miniſtry of Mr Nicolas Byfield, who was a powerful, and a profitable preacher of God's word at that time in the city of Cheſter; which alſo was ſeconded by the afflicting hand of God, who took away her firſt child (which ſhe much took to heart) but God made it an occaſion to make her his own child by adoption and grace. For from that time the means of grace had a more kindly operation upon her, which made her ever after more to mind her Father in heaven, than any child ſhe had upon earth.

Yet at firſt, ſhe rather feared God than loved him, whence were engendred many perplexing ſcruples in her ſoul, which for the preſent were very grievous unto her: for her ſpirit was ſore wounded, and 'a wounded ſpirit who can bear?' Prov. xviii. 14. The truth is, the pangs of her new birth were ſo painful, and bitter, and ſometimes ſo terrible, that it was a difficult thing to faſten any comfort upon her. But after the Lord had chaſtned her ſoul with his ſevere diſcipline, and thereby had prepared her for a cure, he ſhewed himſelf her moſt favourable and effectual phyſician, according to that, Job. v. 18. 'He maketh ſore, and bindeth up; he wounds, and his hands make whole. For he quieted her troubled ſpirit, and ſettled it in the aſſurance of his love.

Being thus, through God's goodneſs, converted, and comforted, it pleaſed him to beſtow many excellent endowments upon her, both intellectual and moral. For by her frequent, and attentive hearing of ſermons, and reading good books, the Bible eſpecially (unto which ſhe was addicted with an incredible deſire and delight) and by moving queſtions to ſuch as ſhe thought beſt able to anſwer them, ſhe became an excellent proficient in the moſt ſound, and uſeful points of religion: yet took ſhe not upon her to teach any but her own children and ſervants, though an Apollos might not have diſdained to learn of ſuch a Priſcilla, Acts xviii. 22.

She meddled but little in worldly matters, and when ſhe did, ſhe little minded them: yet, (ſhadowing her ſelf from acquaintance with the world) ſhe ſhined gloriouſly in her knowlege of God, and heavenly matters.

As ſhe had occaſion to converſe with others, ſhe ſhewed her ſelf a very prudent Abigail: 'The word of God as St. Paul preſcribeth) dwelt richly in her in all wiſdom, which appeared in her ſpeech, in her ſilence, in her carriage, and in her actions.

In her ſpeech, for as the ſame apoſtle requireth, 'being enriched both in knowlege and utterance, 1 Cor. i. 5. 'She opened her mouth with wiſdom, as that rare woman,' Prov. xxxi. 26. having, (as St. Jerome dictated to Celantia) thought beforehand what ſhe ſhould ſpeak: and while ſhe was yet ſilent, forecaſting that ſhe might ſay nothing which afterwards ſhe would wiſh to be unſaid again; and ſo ſhe was fitted, and well prepared either to counſel or to comfort: to reprove, or to plead for, as there was occaſion.

Yet ſhe was not (as ſome women would have been, with her abilities, and ſome without them have been) obſtreperouſly talkative, nor affected by her words to make any oſtentation of her wit, or other good parts: but very ſparing of her ſpeech, ſo that ſhe was as much obſerved for her ſilence, as for her diſcreet diſcourſe when there was juſt occaſion, and opportunity. For ſhe had learned, That 'in multitude of words there wants not ſin, Prov. x. 19. That 'whoſoever keeps his mouth and his tongue, keeps his ſoul, Prov.' xxii. 23. That 'death and life are in the power of the tongue,' Prov. xviii. 21. That 'tatling women' are condemned by the apoſtle, 1 Tim. v. 13. That 'of every idle word, account muſt be given at the day of judgment,' Mat. xii. 36. And that they who profeſs religion, and 'refrain not their tongues, their religion is vain,' James i. 26. This moved her with David, to reſolve, that her 'mouth ſhould not offend,' Pſalm xvii. 3.

Certainly ſuch ſilence as ſhe uſed, (in thoſe that know how to ſpeak) is an argument of wiſdom: For 'a wiſe man, ſaith Solomon, and it is as true of a woman, holdeth his peace, Prov. xi. 12. And 'he that refrains his lips is wiſe,' Prov. x. 19. And ſo far was ſhe from ſpeaking ill, eſpecially of the abſent, or of her betters, that St. Jerom's precepts to Celantia, was ſet forth in her practice, which was rather to look to her own life, than to carp at anothers. And ſhe well knew, that where corrupt communication is reſtrained, there that which is good to the uſe of edifying is required: yet was ſhe ſo wiſe, and wary even in the uſe of good words, as to obſerve when and where, and before whom to uſe them, and the ſeaſon when to give over, as well as when to begin her diſcourſe.

She gave further proof of her prudence in her carriage and behaviour, and biſhop Hall in his contemplations makes this a very good proof of wiſdom. 'There are ſome, ſaith he, whoſe ſpeeches are witty, while their carriage is weak; whoſe deeds are incongruities, whilſt their words are apothegms. It is not worth the name of wiſdom that may be heard only, and not ſeen. Good diſcourſe is but the froth of wiſdom: the pure, and ſolid ſubſtance of it is, well framed actions. And according to this we may commend her converſation for prudence in practice practice, above that which she shewed either in the use, or restraint of her tongue; for, as St Jerom saith, 'She taught others more by her example than by her speech,' much more then by her silence. She was a woman of a well composed spirit, discreetly advised, framing her affairs by good direction of grace and reason, without any direction of humour and passion, which bare no sway over her at all, and very seldom had any shew or appearance in her; but when discretion told her it was fit to make use of them for due advertisement to others, then she would order it with such moderation, as that neither her words, nor her looks, nor her gestures, carried any colour of contradiction to her prudence and piety: so that her wisdom was a protection to the reputation of her piety against all scornful reproaches; yea, it was a promotion of the Christian profession to more estimation in her person, and for her sake.

And though she was singularly gifted, yet was she far from their disposition, who think they do nothing well unless they be singular: and though she had less to do with worldly matters than most would have had in her condition, yet therein also she gave that proof of prudence which Solomon observeth, Prov. xiv. 1. 'A wise woman, saith he, builds her house:' for she was very provident in managing her family affairs, both whilst she was married, and when she was a widow also.

Now from her intellectual parts, let us pass to her moral, and we shall find, that though she had a very good head, richly stored with ingenious and religious notions, yet she had a far better heart more abundantly furnished with excellent graces, whereof we will single out some.

1. For her faith, which is the hand that turneth the key to un lock the store house of divine beneficence: this appeared by a paper written with her own hand, wherein she did set down the articles of her own faith, in full, plain, and perspicuous terms, with pertinent proofs of scripture to every point, and then she maketh particular application thereof to herself, as thus:

I Do believe the scriptures to be the very word of God, 2 Tim. iii 16. 2 Pet. i. 21 and I have found them true me by the witness of God's Spirit, which I have felt testifying of them, and by the unutterable comfort which I have received by them, wonderfully refreshing my heart when it was in the deepest distress, whereby God hath made them so good unto me, that I account them 'better than thousands of gold and silver,' Psal. cxix. 72.

I do believe that God made man at first 'after his own image,' Gen. i. 26. which image did chiefly consist in 'knowlege and holiness,' Eccles. vii. 29. Eph. iv. 24. and out of admiration of this image, I do long for that time when I shall be satisfied with it, Psal. xvii. 15.

I do believe that all mankind hath sinned, 1 Kings viii. 46. and that the nature of man is stained with sin from the birth, Psal. li. 5. I know, and must acknowlege, that the cause of all the afflictions which do befal me in this life, is in myself, and I know no cause to murmur at my crosses when I look upon my sin.

I do believe that Jesus Christ is God, and my God, Psal. lxviii. 20. for he is full of grace to supply my wants; a counsellor to direct me in my doubts; almighty to defend me; and an everlasting Father, to love, pity, and bear with mine infirmities, and to spare me; a Prince of Peace, to perform reconciliation with his Father for me, and to fill me with the 'peace which passeth all understanding,' and that he will establish and order me henceforth and for ever.

I do believe that the passion of Christ was by the eternal decree and appointment of God, Acts ii. 23. and that his sorrows were sustained for our sins, and for our sakes, so as he bore all our iniquities, 1 Pet. ii. 24. and that in his own person he fulfilled and finished all sufferings needful for our salvation, 1 Pet. iii. 18. and that his passion, so grievous as cannot be imagined, is a sufficient price for the sins of the world, John ii. 29. Therefore why should not I be willing to suffer any thing for his sake, that hath suffered so great things for me: and say, with St Paul, 'God forbid that I should rejoice in any thing but in the cross of Christ.' I will for ever trust in him; and rely upon him as the life of my life, and as to me both in life and death, advantage. And having such a proof of the infinite love of God to me, in not sparing his own son, but giving him up to death for me, shall I ever doubt of my freedom from condemnation, such a price being paid for the discharge of my debts by such a surety?

I do believe that Christ overcame sin, death, the grave, and hell, and rose again from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God in majesty, Rom. i. 4. and that he hath purchased his church by his blood, and that he is a lawgiver to his church, Jam. iv. 12. which is gathered by his voice, John xvii. 9. separaten from sinful society with the world; for she is an holy church, Eph. v. 25. yet dispersed over the world, for she is catholic, Eph. i. 10. And though catholic and dispersed, yet but one, Eph. iv. 4. knit unto Christ by an undissolvable union, Col. i. 18. And I am sure that I am a member of this church, for I am called out of sinful communion with the world by the voice of the ministers of Christ, who are in his stead, and separated from it by the power of the word; and I do rely upon Christ's merits for righteousness and salvation. I do not delight in the society of the wicked, but in theirs who fear him, whom I love with sincere affections, as the most worthy people of the world. And whatsoever I want of an holy life, yet I do not live after my old evil conversation, but I constantly endeavour to be more and more holy. What thanks shall I give unto God, who hath 'called me out of darkness into his marvellous light,' and saved me from the common condemnation of the world? O the depth of the love of Christ unto me!

I do believe that there shall be a general judgment, Psal. ix. 8. that Christ shall be Judge, a visible Judge in his human nature, Acts xvii. 13. That it shall be at the last day; but the precise day and hour is not known to any man, or angel, Matth. xxiv. 36. That then every man shall be judged, Jude 15. and every secret thing shall be brought to light, Rom. ii. 16. and that the judgment will be most just, and so confessed by all, Rom. ii. 5. 6. Why then should I fear the last judgment, seeing he shall be my Judge, who is my Brother, Advocate, and Redeemer? He that was willingly judged for me, will give no hard sentence against me; yea, he hath already absolved me from my sins, and given me the earnest of his Spirit, and the seal of the sacraments; and I have judged myself that 'I may not be condemned with the world,' 1 Cor. ix. 32.

I do believe that the glory of heaven is unspeakable and incomprehensible by us on earth, 1 Cor. ii. 9. That it is eternal, Matth. xxv. 45. and that it is the gift of God, proceeding only from his free grace, not our merit, Luke xii. 32. his free gift, bestowed only upon the elect, Rev. xxi. 27. O! that I could, by the effectualness of contemplation, behold the greatness of this felicity which is provided for me! Yet, as I can conceive it, I cannot chuse but long to be absent from hence, that I may be 'present with the Lord,' 2 Cor. v. 8. whose admirable beauty I shall clearly see, and 'know as I am known,' and that with a perfection both of holiness and happiness; such holiness as will not only free me from all sin, but from all possibility of sinning; such happiness, as that ceasing from all labour and sorrow, I shall enjoy an eternal Sabbath, and shall be free to all the treasures of heaven; and, with the fruition of God's glorious presence, shall enjoy the sweet society of all the glorified saints and angels. And all this, as it is unutterable, so it is unalterable; for, as I cannot be disappointed of it, because it is certain, so I cannot be deprived of it, because it is eternal. How then should the hope of the future life, but swallow up the afflictions of the life present? and why should I fear death, when being dead I shall be so blessed?

Yet was not her faith elevated so high, but that she could readily apply it to promises of an inferior degree; for as she trusted 'in God at all times,' as David teacheth, Psal. lxii. 8. so did she in all things, whether temporal or eternal.

In

In ſtraits and difficulties for the affairs of this life, ſhe had this ready at hand, 'Commit thy way unto the Lord; truſt alſo in him, and he ſhall bring it to paſs,' Pſal. xxxvii. 5.

If at any time ſhe was ſiniſterly cenſured by any one, her faith applied that promiſe to her heart, 'He ſhall bring forth thy righteouſneſs as the light, and thy judgement as the noon day,' Pſal. xxxv. 6. And whatſoever it were that came upon her as a croſs, her faith was either as a wreath betwixt her ſhoulders and it, that it did not pinch her, or a remover of it from herſelf, to him who was beſt able to bear it, by virtue of that warrant, Pſal. lv. 22. 'Caſt thy burden upon the Lord, and he ſhall ſuſtain thee:' and that done, her faith, which teacheth to keep an even pace with the promiſes, not making haſte, Iſ. xxviii. 16. by anticipating the time of accompliſhment, taught her ſoul to wait upon God, as David's did, Pſal. lxii. 1. to effect his own work at his own time, in his own way and manner, wherein ſhe would not preſcribe any thing at all.

By this daily exerciſe of her faith ſhe gained a great deal of freedom and lightſomeneſs of ſpirit, which admirably appeared in her deportment upon great diſappointments of that which was her own due, and unexpected payments unto others. When ſhe hath ſeen no way of ſupply for the preſent occaſions, ſhe hath believed that God's providence would effect what her forecaſt could not, when ſhe was not wanting in the uſe of means, and that he could furniſh her with that which ſhould be ſufficient, albeit for the preſent ſhe ſaw not how, nor by what means it would come to paſs; and therefore, when ſhe had done what belonged to her duty, in the affiance of her faith, ſhe reſted quiet, and remained cheerful, and ſlept neither the leſs, nor the worſe for it. And that which confirmed her confidence the more, was, that ſhe ſtill found, by experience, that God was moſt worthy to be truſted.

That her faith was good as it was great, appeared by the effect of it in her devotion and piety, which was ſuitable to her knowlege of God, and her faith in him; by both which, as ſhe had a clear apprehenſion of him, ſo none had more dear and devout affections to him, or more aſſured ſigns of ſuch than ſhe, as appeared in theſe particulars:

She was frequently and fervently converſant with God, (beſides the public) in her private ſupplications, and therein was he moſt favourably familiar with her; for he ſent forth his Spirit into her heart, whereby ſhe cried, 'Abba Father,' Gal. iv. 6. 'The Spirit of grace and ſupplication, Zech. xii. 10. which enabled her in an extraordinary manner and meaſure to pour out her ſoul into his boſom. And though ſhe duly eſteemed of the ſolemn prayers of the ſacred aſſemblies, (whereof a learned and pious divine ſaid, that never any one prayed well privately, who condemned or neglected the public prayers of the church) and never ſlighted or cenſured ſet forms of prayer; yet could ſhe, and that excellently well, conceive prayer, and vary her petitions as the preſent occaſion did require.

Yea, in this devotion ſhe was ſo abundant in apt and pertinent expreſſions, that indeed it was admirable, that one ſo ſilent in her common converſation with the world, ſhould be ſo fluent and eloquent in her intercourſe with God.

Nor was ſhe more copious in ſpeech than fervent in ſpirit; for ſuch was her holy violence in prayer, as that ſhe ſeemed not to knock at heaven's gate for another to open it, but to make a battery upon it herſelf, and to break in by the powerful importunity of her ſupplications.

Her ſervice alſo of God in this kind was not dry devotion, but ſteeped and drenched in ſhowers of tears; and though her prudence uſed as much privacy as might be herein, yet ſuch a ſingular gift could not be hid from her ſervants, and ſome ſecret friends, who ſometimes, when they were ſick, or poſſeſſed with fears, or pains of child-birth, they would move her with importunity to pray with them, and when ſhe yielded to them, and God to her, by anſwering her requeſt, they were apt, as there was cauſe, to impute the good effect to her fervent ſupplications. A female friend of hers, who was her bed-fellow in London for many weeks together, and thereby was a partaker of her daily devotions, profeſſed, that ſhe was ſo plentifully furniſhed for utterance of her requeſts to God, that ſhe never wanted variety of meet words to be preſented unto him, but when a ſurcharge of ſighs and tears put her prayers to a pauſe.

When the heart is full of love, the mouth is filled with praiſe of a perſon moſt deſervedly, and moſt dearly beloved, whereof we have an example in this virtuous gentlewoman, who, when time, company, and occaſion did invite her, to communicate to others the good matter which her heart endited of God, ſhe uſed her 'tongue as the pen of a ready writer,' Pſal. xlv. 1. And when ſhe had that great king for the ſubject of her ſpeech, ſhe ſpake of him with ſuch hearty and ſavoury reliſhes of ſacred delight and reverence, and with ſuch an affectionate force, as if her ſoul were ready to leap out at her lips into the ears of others, to kindle the ſame holy fire in their hearts who heard her, which burned in her own boſom; longing, as David did, that others might 'taſte and ſee the goodneſs of the Lord,' Pſal. xxxiv. 8. that they might be rivals with her in religious love; and glad ſhe was when any ſinner was converted, or any already called, better enabled to promote the glory of God, and that was the end which ſhe principally aimed at in all her godly diſcourſe of him.

In giving vent to her heart in this duty, ſhe could ſpend her ſpirits with great delight, both to herſelf, and to thoſe choice friends who had opportunity to hear her, when juſt occaſion was miniſtered unto her: and yet when ſhe had ſpoken beſt, ſhe found matter of complaint in her own expreſſions, as being too faint and too flat, and ſo far below that which was meet for the majeſty of the great God, inſomuch as all the acceptation which ſhe deſired of him, was but to pardon her preſumption, as the error of her love, for taking upon her to ſpeak of his excellency, and the weakneſs of her ſpirit and ſpeech, which made her fall infinitely ſhort of doing him right in the publication of his praiſe.

Another evidence of her dear affection unto God, was the great love which, for his ſake, ſhe bore to whom, or whatſoever had any near relation to him, according to that, 1 John iv. 21. 'He that loves God muſt love his brother alſo;' and he muſt love him rather in a direct than in a collateral line, as God's child, rather than as his brother, more for God's ſake than for his own: the neareſt degree of love belongs to thoſe perſons and things which are neareſt to him, and to ſuch ſhe bore a ſincere and ſingular good will. As to his ſaints, with David, Pſal. xvi. 3. and to his true religion and worſhip, both at home and abroad, the happy progreſs and proſperity whereof was with her, as Jeruſalem with David, 'preferred above her chiefeſt joy, Pſal. cxxxvii. 6. And it was a great affliction to her heart, to hear any ill tidings of any good man, or any good cauſe.

She highly prized God's word, and in the bleſſed ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper ſhe felt ſuch a ſweet refreſhing as might make amends for the ſeverity of her frequent faſting, ſo that for her part and portion of it, in reſpect of the common ſort of communicants, ſhe might ſay, 'I have meat that ye know not of,' John iv. 32. Dainties, which infinitely exceed whatſoever delighteth or pleaſeth a ſenſual pallate.

For the houſe of God, ſhe ſhewed herſelf juſt of David's mind, when he ſaid, 'I have loved the habitation of thy houſe, the place where thine honour dwelleth,' Pſal. xxix. 8. And, 'How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hoſts; my ſoul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord,' Pſal. lxxxiv. 1. 2.

If by any imperious judgment ſhe were kept from the church, as by ſickneſs in her body, &c. her ſoul was love-ſick, by her longings, to be there; and whereas many women take a little occaſion to abſent themſelves from it, ſhe would many times force her feeble body to carry her ſoul to the ſanctuary, though the day before ſhe were confined, not only to her chamber, but to her bed; whereby, though ſhe hazarded her health, yet it pleaſed God ſo graciouſly to accept of her zeal to his houſe, that ſhe was never the worſe for thoſe pious adventures.

She

She kept a great distance from doting on the world, which St James condemns as 'enmity to God,' Jam. iv. 4. though, while she lived, she could not chuse but be in the world, yet did she so love her dear Lord Jesus Christ, that for his sake she was exceedingly estranged from the world, which appeared,

1. By her estrangement from sensual delights, which she shewed by her frequent fasting from meats and drinks; by her abstinence from such sports and pastimes, as before her conversion she had been too immoderately addicted unto; and by her firm resolution to forbear marriage after her widowhood, and to rest in that condition wherein she might best attend upon the service of God.

Indeed, her love and delight in communion with God, made her mindless of meat, and careless of provision for the flesh. Well she knew, that though fasting makes the body weak, as David saith. 'My knees are weak through fasting, and my flesh faileth of fatness, Psal. cix. 20. yet it strengtheneth the spirit, and maketh it vigorous in conflict, and victorious in the event; yea, fasting and prayer make a potent combination, which is able to drive the strongest devil out of his usurped possession, as Matth. xvii. 21. These two she used, not only as weapons against the devil, but as wings to elevate her soul God-ward and heaven-ward; yet herein was she observant of our Saviour's rule, Matth. xvii. 18. that she fasted without an appearance of fasting, only the next day it might be discerned by her faintness, she having spent her spirits in spiritual exercises the day before.

For those sports and pastimes wherein formerly she had taken too much contentment, she not only abstained from them, but much complained of her vanity in them; her eyes, which before were used to behold them with delight, now shed tears of shame and sorrow, that formerly she had set her mind so much upon them, and now she employed them in the more frequent and affectionate reading of the holy Scriptures, wherein she took more delight than she had done before in the most pompous spectacles, set out to take the eyes with gazing, and the mind with wonder.

And as for marriage, her heart was so devoted to her Lord Christ, that though she had divers fair invitations to it, by such, as both for profit and credit, and other considerable respects, were worthy rather to be desired than denied, yet she resolved not to change her condition in that kind, and that not only in love and loyalty to her former husband, but that she might be more free to serve God according to that of St Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 34. 'The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and spirit; but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

2. She had so chosen God for her portion, and set up her rest in the riches of his love, that she had but little mind of the world's riches. She knew that riches may be had, and well used of the religious; and that poverty alone commends no man unto God, as St Jerom speaks; yet did she not dote upon them. But though she was competently careful and frugal, as Christ prescribeth, John vi. 12. 'Gather up the broken meat, that nothing be lost;' and though she was provident, as the apostle requires, 1 Tim. v. 8. 'If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel;' yet withal, believing that of the prophet David, Psal. xxxvii. 16. 'A little that the righteous hath is better than the riches of many wicked;' and as conforming herself to that of St John, 'Love not the world, nor the things of the world,' 1 John ii. 15.

She often besought of almighty God rather to make and keep her poor, than to suffer her heart in any sort to sink down from her Maker to dote upon mammon.

She was one that could very well find in her heart to 'honour God with her substance,' as Prov. iii. 9. She was as cheerful in her layings out for him, as any miser could be in his layings up for himself; and when she heard of the irreligious parsimony of some towards the maintenance of the public ministry in that city of Chester, she hath professed, that she had rather bear all the charge of all the common contributions herself, if her estate would bear it, than that God should be grumbled at, or his service poorly prized, or the wages of his work unwillingly paid,

Another undoubted testimony of her true love to God was, in that she much desired to die out of a fervent affection to him, insomuch, that she feared a long life would keep her too long from the enjoyment of him, being therein like unto David in those ardent aspirations of his. 'As the Hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God: my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God, when shall I come, and appear before him,' Psal. xlii. 1, 2.

That which worldlings are most afraid of, that she so much wished for, that her friends were fain to plead with her to be pleased with life, though she not being contented with their arguments, contended against them by contrary reason, shewing first why she did desire to die. Secondly, why she was not afraid of death, and hoping that it would not tarry long, she had in readiness more special matters to be remembred at her death, which she left in writing under her own hand, and are as followeth:

First, 'Why I desire to die:'

"I desire to die, because I want while I live here the glorious presence of God, which I love and long for, and that sweet fellowship of Angels and Saints, who would be glad of me as I am of them, and would entertain me with unwearied delight."

"I desire to die, because while I live, I shall want the perfection of my nature, and be as an estranged and banished person from my father's house."

"I desire to die, because I would not live to offend so good a God, nor to grieve his holy Spirit: 'For his loving kindness is better than life itself:' And he is abundant in mercy to me, and it doth lie as an heavy load upon my heart many times to think of displeasing him."

"I desire to die, because this world is generally infected with the plague of sin, and some have this plague-sore running upon them, and I myself am tainted with the same disease, so as whilst I live here, I can be in no place, nor in any company, but I am still in danger of being infected, or to infect others, and if this world doth hate me because I endeavour to follow goodness, how will it rejoice if my foot do but slip? Therefore how woful would my life be unto me, if I should give occasion to the world to triumph or blaspheme in respect of me? I cannot chuse but desire to die, when I consider that sin, like a leprosy hath so corrupted me, that there is no soundness in me, my mind, my memory, my will and affections, yea, my very conscience is still impure; in every faculty of my soul, there is a miserable mixture of vile infection, which makes me aweary of my life; and all this is the worse, because it is incurable, and an inseparable companion of my life, so that I can go no whither to avoid it; there is no business that I can dispatch that concerns my happiness without a mutiny in mine heart; though God's works be all fair, yet there are in my nature many defects, insufficiencies, mistakings and transgressions; so I may say with David, 'Innumerable evils have compassed me about; mine iniquities have taken hold on me, so that I am not able to look up,' Psal. xl. 12. I therefore desire Heaven for holiness rather than for happiness, that I might sin no more. I desire that condition wherein I might glorify God."

"I desire to die, because of the devil's malignant and incessant assaults: I can stand no where before the Lord on earth, but one devil or other is at my right hand, and must of necessity enter into conflict with them, and their temptations, and be buffetted and gored by them, which is a thousand fold worse than Death; more easy it is to wrestle with flesh and blood, than with those principalities and powers, and spiritual wickednesses, and great rulers of the world; for they are subtle and cruel; and like 'roaring lions they go about seeking whom they may devour,' 1 Pet. v. 8.

"I desire to die, because by death I shall rest from the hard labours of this life."

"I desire to die, because nothing in this world can give me solid and durable contentment: I am less in liking of life, and have more desire of death when I consider the misery that may come both on my body and estate, and fearful alterations may come, and wars may come, and all the desolations and terrors which accompany them, and I may be left in the hands of the sons of violence: besides, I daily suffer the loss of my friends, who were the companions of my life, and means of much contentment unto me; and those whom I lose by my life I shall find by my death, and shall enjoy in another world unto all eternity: And for my children it doth not trouble me; for that God which hath given life and breath, and all they have, while I am living, can, without me, provide for them whe I am dead; my God will be their God, if they be his; if they be not, what comfort would it be for me to live? My life would be exceeding bitter unto me if I should see them dishonour God whom I so much love."

When she enjoyed the greatest portion of temporal or spiritual comfort, yet would she never say. 'Master it is good to be here,' as Matth. xvii. 4. but making that but a step for an higher ascent, she rather inferred, it is good going hence: For if on earth there be so much good, how pleasant and desirable is Heaven: the joys on earth to those that are there, are but as the earth is to Heaven, little and low, dark and heavy.

'Why I do not fear Death.'

"I fear not death, because it is but the separation of the body from the soul, and that it is but a shadow of the body of death, Rom. vii. 24. whereas the separation of the soul from God by sin, Isa. lix. 2. and of soul and body for sin, is death indeed."

"I fear not death, because death is such an enemy as hath been often vanquished, and because I am armed for it, and the 'weapons of my warfare are mighty through God,' and I am assured of victory."

"I do not fear death for the pain of it; for I am persuaded I have endured as great pains in life, as I shall find in death, and death will cure me of all sorts of pains; and because Christ died a terrible and cursed death, that any kind of death might be blessed to me; and that God, who hath greatly loved me in life, will not neglect me in death; but his Spirit will succour and strengthen me all the time of the combat."

"I do not fear death for any loss: For I shall but lose my body by it, and that is but a prison to my soul, an old rotten house, or rotten garment; nay, I shall not lose that neither: For, I shall have it restored again at my Saviour's second coming, made much better than now it is: For this vile body shall be like the body of Christ, and by death I shall obtain a far better life."

And as an incentive of divine love, she prepared a breviate of God's principal benefits to herself for meditation on her death-bed, and for thanksgiving to God, which was this:

"How shall I praise God, 1. For my conversion. 2. For his word, both in respect of my affections to it, and the wonderful comforts I have had of it. 3. For hearing of my prayers. 4. For godly sorrow. 5. For fellowship with the godly. 6. For joy in the Holy Ghost. 7. For desire of death. 8. For contempt of the world. 9. For private helps and comforts. 10. For giving me some strength against my sin. 11. For preserving me from gross evils both before and after my calling, &c."

She shewed her holy love to God, by conforming her practice to his precepts, according to that, John xiv. 15. 'If you love me, keep my commandments.' She thought nothing too much that she should stick at, if God commended or forbad it, nothing so small, but his word was able to give it weight enough to bow down her neck to the obedience of it. If it was a greater matter that he required of her, she considered, that he was a God infinitely both great and good, and that unto her, who had and would do for her ten thousand times more and greater things than she could do for him: If it were a little thing, she conceived that the contempt or neglect of it would aggravate her guilt, as Naaman's servants said to their master, "If the Prophet had bidden thee do some great matter, wouldst thou not have done it? How much rather when he saith unto thee, wash, and be clean?" 2 Kings v. 18. The less the duty is, the more is the disobedience if we do it not; for thereby we extenuate the authority of the Almighty, and such as slight it in a little thing, will not regard it in a greater: She was therefore very precise in every point which God required the performance of.

By this means she still encreased in holiness and sanctification, and kept a greater distance from greater offences, according to that of St Jerom, Non cito ad majora progreditur, qui parva formidat, whoso is afraid of a small sin, will not easily grow bold on those that are greater. Her love to God was 'strong as death,' Cant. viii. 4. yea, and much stronger, so that death could not affright her; for she desired daily to look death in the face, nor could it hurt her more than she was content to endure; for though it was not likely that she could go through the narrow wicket of death, and not be pinched in her passage, yet was she well contented with it, seeing it was the ready way to come to God, whom she so much longed to behold.

Her charity was very chary of the credit of the absent, towards them she would not suffer either her tongue, or her ears to be guilty of any wrong or robbery of their reputations. She never imposed false crimes, or feigned faults upon others; she never discovered their secret sins, or aggravated those that were known; she never denied, dissembled, nor diminished the virtue or good parts of any. Though her hatred of sin was much as became a sincere Christian, yet knew she how to distinguish betwixt sin and the sinner, and setting a severe dislike on the one, she reserved, as charity required love, or compassion for the other.

Her charity was regular according to the rules of scripture, which she set down in a paper with quotations of texts for her direction in some particulars, 1st. 'I must give readily, Job xxxi. 16. Prov. iii. 28. 1 Tim. vi. 18. 2dly, 'I must give secretly,' Matth. vi. 3. 3dly, 'I must give liberally,' 2 Cor. viii. 12. and ix. 6. 4thly, 'I must give cheerfuly. 2 Cor. viii. 12. It was answerable also according to her own ability, and others necessities: she had rather give a little to many (since the number of the needy is very great) than a great deal to a few; and she so ordered her charity, that she might still be able to exercise her hand that way; and not as some, who give so much, that after a while they can give no more. And upon extraordinary occasions if she were not magnificent, the let was not in her mind, but in her means.

Her charity was vigorous, and so cordial, that what she gave was always without grudging, knowing that God loves 'a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. ix. 7. yea she was so cheerful herein, that she bestowed nothing upon her self with more readiness, than she did upon others, whether it were towards the maintaining of the ministry, or in giving alms to the poor: and yet herein did she follow the rule of our Saviour, Mat. vi. 3. 'Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doth;' for she was many times as close in giving her own, as a thief would be in taking away of some others; so that none did more good deeds with less shew, or sound of words than she.

For the object of her charity, she took her direction from the apostle's precept, Gal. vi. 16. 'Do good unto all, but especially to the houshold of faith.' She indeed shut up her charity from none that had need of it, but she enlarged it chiefly to such as were of the faithful.

Her love and charity was very entire and great to her friends, yet not so confined to them, but that she reserved a competent measure for them that dealt unfriendly with her, or that were enemies to her. If there was any unkind difference between her and any one, though she enjoyed the freedom of her judgment to think as there was cause, yet would she not suffer her affections to be estranged from them, but was ready to do them good, if power and opportunity did furnish her for it. She requited love for hatred, pity for spight, friendly offices for offensive usages. She bare ill will to none. She hated nothing but that which is worse than nothing, Sin, and that she hated in all, and most of all in her own soul.

As her charity was evidenced by doing, so also by suffering: if any tribulation were upon others, or imminent over them, she was like minded with her Lord and Master, according to that of the prophet, Isaiah lxiii. 9. 'In all their afflictions he was afflicted.' She did passionately sympathize in the sufferings of her fellow members: if it was ill with the church, or any particular saints, it was no better with her. Charity made her suffer as much by inward ward affection, as they did of their enemies, by outward affliction.

Her patience alſo was very remarkable. for though her apprehenſions were quick enough to conceive any thing tending to the diſturbance of peace and patience: yet ſhe enjoyed ſuch a calmneſs of ſpirit as could hardly be turned to a ſtorm. If any were injurious towards her, her tongue could more readily pray, and her eyes weep for them, than with looks, or words of indignation, or diſdain ſet upon them. If ſhe were angry at others, which was very ſeldom, it was ſin that was the cauſe of it. If news came to her of any loſſes in her eſtate, as ſometimes there did of great ones, yet was ſhe never put out of temper with thoſe ill tidings, having theſe conſiderations ready at hand to quiet her heart: It is that God that gave all, that now taketh away ſome, why ſhould I take it ill? he would not have me to be in love with him, nor rely upon uncertain riches, which were never true to any that truſted them, but upon him ſelf, and I willingly renounce them to reſt upon him. He can, if he ſee it good, recompence the loſs in the like, or ſome better kind. If he take more, there will yet be many poorer than my ſelf: and if he take away all my goods, he can give me content without them, for he is All-ſufficient; and though I have nothing, I may be as poſſeſſing all things, 2 Cor. vi. 10. The world and I muſt part, and whether we be unſtitched by parcels, or torn aſunder by taking all at once, all is one to me; that which he chooſeth is beſt for us both, for his own glory, and my good, if I grudge not againſt him, but willingly (as I pray) give way to his will.

By bodily ſufferings her patience was exceedingly tried both for the truth and ſtrength of it, for of ſome of her children ſhe had long, painful, and very perilous labour; but that which exceeded all, was a long and ſore ſickneſs, to which were applied very rough and irkſome remedies; ſo that ſhe ſuffered not only the anguiſh of her diſeaſe, but many things alſo of the phyſicians, as that woman in the goſpel, Mark v. 28. And had it only been pain and torment, it had been more tolerable; but it was accompanied with a ſtrange infirmity and deformity. Her jaw being fallen, ſhe could not bring it up towards her upper jaw; her mouth was drawn awry towards her ears, ſo that with much difficulty both to her ſelf and others, her food was conveyed through ſo crooked a paſſage to her throat, which might have cauſed the greater diſcontent to her mind, becauſe it was the ſhipwreck of much beauty and comelineſs, which until then was ſeated in her countenance, and whereof ſhe kept remarkable impreſſions to her dying day: yet ſhewed ſhe remarkable patience under this great affliction, to which her heart was brought readily to ſubmit; and concerning which, ſhe ſaid, that if it pleaſe the Lord ſtill to continue her a ſpectacle of deformed miſery, ſhe would not repine at his doing, or her own ſuffering, but would willingly, abide it until he ſhall her body from the diſeaſe by health, or her ſoul from her body by death.

Her modeſty alſo manifeſted it ſelf by her ſhamefaced eſtrangement from ſin and vanity, concerning which vertue in her it may be ſaid, that it was rather ſometimes too much, than any time too little, and it ſhewed it ſelf divers ways.

1. In her looks, which was habitually compoſed to a modeſt and gracious gravity, ſo that againſt any thing that was unſeemly to be ſaid, or done, ſhe carried a ſevere rebuke in her very countenance; or if any were ſo immodeſt as to ſpeak, or do any thing before her, not becoming Chriſtianity, her modeſty made ſome ſupply to their want of it, ſhe would bluſh for them.

In her ſpeech, whereas ſome would have vaunted themſelves or made ſome vain-glorious ſhew of ſuch ſufficiency as was in her, ſhe rather ſhadowed her own light with a dark lanthorn: and therefore in that wherein ſhe was a teacher, ſhe carried her ſelf as in the perſon of a learner, rather aſking queſtions, than making reſolutions, or giving rule, and directions unto others.

3. By her ſilence, for as St. Ambroſe ſaith, 'Though ſilence be a reſt to other vertues, yet it is a chief act, and exerciſe of modeſty;' yea, her pace, her habit, and her whole behaviour was a leſſon of modeſty which, together with her other virtues, wrought a kind of awfulneſs in her perſon, ſo that thoſe that had not grace to do well in private, were more afraid and aſhamed of an appearance of evil in her preſence, than in the ſight of many a magiſtrate.

As for humility, ſhe made great account of it; ſhe ſtudied it ſeriouſly, and got it by heart, that there was no need of art to make profeſſion or oſtentation of it. Solomon makes contention the proper effect of pride, Prov. xiii. 10. So peaceableneſs is a ſure ſign of humility; and this ſhe ſhewed in that ſhe could endure contradiction, reproaches, and other trials of humility without a quarrel, or breach of peace with any, being ſtill ready to deny her ſelf, and to yield to others ſo far as with a ſafe conſcience ſhe could.

Once a new gown being brought her to put on, and preſented as a gift from her husband, wherein his kindneſs had put him to more coſt than ſhe wiſhed, to make her more fine than ſhe deſired to be, ſhe humbly beſought him with tears that it might not come upon her back, ſhe ſaid indeed little with her tongue, but her eyes ſpoke much, becauſe ſhe was loath, to contradict him whom ſhe was bound to obey; and at laſt ſhe ſubmitted to his will, though againſt her own, not only becauſe that habit was no better than others of her rank did wear, but becauſe it was a teſtimony of her huſband's love, and of her own loyal ſubjection to his will; wherein ſhe followed the advice of biſhop Hall in his contemplations, 'It is not, ſaith he, for a good wife to judge of her husband's will, but to execute it; neither wit, nor ſtomach, may carry her into a curious inquiſition into the reaſons of an enjoined charge, much leſs to a reſiſtance, but in an hood winkt ſimplicity ſhe muſt follow whitherſoever ſhe is led, as one that holds her chief praiſe to conſiſt in ſubjection, following her husband, as the Iſraelites did the cloudy pillar, which when it ſtood, they ſtood; when it went, they followed. And indeed it was no marvel that ſhe was ſo obſequious to her husband, for amongſt her papers were found ſpecial directions, which ſhe had drawn out of the Scripture, for her conjugal affection, and behaviour towards her husband, which were theſe which follow, under this title.

Duties which concern me in particular.

"I muſt ſubmit my ſelf to my husband, 'as to the Lord,' Eph. v. 22.

"I muſt account him my head, Eph. v, 23.

"I muſt be in ſubjection to him in all things, 'as the church unto Chriſt,' Eph. v. 24.

"I muſt get his conſent even for thoſe things that I ſet apart for religious duties," 1 Cor. vii. 5, 10.

"I muſt walk pleaſingly towards him," 1 Cor. vii. 5, 10,

When by his death ſhe was looſed from the law of her husband, ſhe would have returned to a meaner habit; but becauſe it was ſuitable to the place which ſhe held in the city (as having been wife to him who had been twice mayor of Cheſter, and divers times a burgeſs of parliament) and for that God made ſuch good things neither only, nor principally for the uſe, and wearing of the wicked, but for his children. And that it might not be imputed either to ſingularity or niggardize, ſhe made no remarkable change in her attire; and indeed to keep down pride, ſhe would not eat the 'bread of idleneſs,' Prov. xxxi. 27. but willingly wrought with her hands, as that vertuous woman did, ver. 13. and readily deſcended to ſuch homely offices as were meet for the meaneſt of her ſervants.

Notwithſtanding ſuch excellent gifts and graces, wherewith God had enriched her ſoul, her mind was not lifted up to vaunting or vanity, nor to the undervaluing or envying God's gifts in others, but in lowlineſs of mind, ſhe 'eſteemed others better than herſelf, Phil. ii. 3. diſavowing her own praiſe, though thoſe that gave it, thought it much leſs than her due, and advancing others far before her ſelf, though in gifts they were far below her; and no marvel, for ſhe was not as thoſe who are far more curious to know the faults of others than to correct their own, but an exact enquirer into her own life, a ſevere cenſurer of her own imperfections and failings; and as for others, ſhe obſerved them moſt for that which was beſt in them to make her ſelf more holy by imitating them therein, and more humble for that wherein ſhe fell ſhort of them.

She often preſented and arraigned her ſelf before God's tribunal, to bring her ſelf down in ſubmiſſion as guilty before him, begging pardon on her knees at his hands; and ſhe came the lower by comparing her own faultineſs, infirmity and miſery, with his infinite purity, power and Majeſty, in compariſon of whom, 'All nations are but as the drop of the bucket, or the ſmall duſt in the balance, Iſa. xl 15. which made her to think of him with admiration and love, and of her ſelf with deteſtation and loathing, and when ſhe took notice of any good thing in her ſelf, ſhe boaſted not of it, even becauſe ſhe had received it, and that of God's free gift, making it a memento of thankfulneſs to him that gave it her, knowing that he might have paſſed by her, and given it to another, and that he might be provoked to take it away from her, if ſhe ſhould take any of that glory to her ſelf which was due unto him alone.

She always held this for a maxim, that if it be good to be eſteemed virtuous, and moſt deſire to be ſo eſteemed, then to be ſo indeed is much better; for the ſubſtance of a good thing is much better than the reſemblance of it; therefore ſhe was ſo ſincere in her whole courſe, that ſhe hated the leaſt appearance of hypocriſy. She was one of thoſe whom David bleſſeth for their integrity, Pſal. cxix. 2. Her love was without diſſimulation, Rom. xii. 9. She loved not in word, or in tongue only, but in deed and in truth, 1 John iii. 18. And this appeared in that, ſhe made her deeds of charity and good will always better than her words, whereof ſhe was ſo chary, that ſome blamed her for want of affability, which being objected to her, ſhe ſaid, 'I like not the laviſh language of ſome, who have their mouths full of complimental courteſy to every one, though their hearts be ſhut and contracted, when their mouths are ſo enlarged; and if they have love enough within to maintain ſuch liberality of words without, I like my own heart the worſe, that it is not ſo ready to attend upon my tongue, as on the ſudden to miniſter cordial affections meet for ſuch frank and friendly expreſſions.' She uſed rather to let her friends ſee her love by her works, than to hear it by her words.

Her conſtancy alſo was very remarkable, by which her ſpirit was ſtedfaſt with God, and her heart ſtedfaſt in his covenant, as the Iſraelites ſhould have been, but were not, Pſal. lxxviii. 8. 37.

Her faith was grounded and ſettled, Col. i. 23. ſo that ſhe was not carried away with divers and ſtrange doctrines, Heb. xiii. 9. much leſs with every wind of doctrine, Eph. iv. 14. But what ſhe was for faith and godlineſs from her firſt converſion, the ſame ſhe was in all places, at all times, and in all companies. But for the meaſure or degree of grace, ſhe was not as a ſtake in an hedge, which grows not, but as a plant in the garden that ſpringeth up; no dwarf in God's houſe, but one, that by ſpiritual nouriſhment, and daily exerciſe of her graces, grew up apace towards the ſtature of Chriſt, and as it is ſaid of the juſt, Prov. iv. 18. ſhe 'ſhined more and more unto the perfect day;' ſo that ſhe was beſt at laſt, and moſt heavenly minded when ſhe had the leaſt time to tarry on the earth.

She was a loyal and obedient wife; a careful and kind, though not a fond mother; a gentle and beneficent miſtreſs; a good and charitable neighbour; and a true and conſtant friend.

Towards her latter end ſhe fell into ſome bodily diſtempers, wherein ſhe had fits or trances, like the embrios of death, which, by a gradual failing of her ſpirits, left her at laſt unable to ſpeak or move, yet without any great alteration in her countenance, which, by ſome, was conceived to be a ſpice of the mother; it was ſhort, and not ſharp, for ſhe felt no pain; yet when ſhe returned to herſelf, ſhe found that ſhe was commonly more feeble than before.

Upon the Monday ſe'night before ſhe died, was the firſt aſſault given, which ſet death's pale colour upon her face and fingers, from the middle joints towards the ends; her nails turned to a blewiſh black, which being rubbed a while, returned again to their former complexion, and ſhe remained that night indifferent well: The next day her diſeaſe appeared in the form and quality of a kindly ague, and ſo continued moſtly till within three or four days before her end, and then it turned from an intermitting ague to a continual fever, that afflicted her with extreme burning, and other pains which commonly accompany ſuch a diſeaſe, eſpecially when it rageth moſt, as it doth towards the latter end.

During her ſickneſs, having the free uſe of all her faculties, her ſoul, no doubt, was exerciſed in holy meditations; for which ſhe had kept in ſtore many particulars of importance, to be remembered at her departure out of this world.

Her deſires were ſtrong for a ſpeedy diſſolution, ſo that ſhe implored God with the requeſt of David, Pſal. xxxviii. 22. 'Make haſte to help me, O Lord my ſalvation:' and Pſal. xl. 13. 'Be pleaſed, O Lord, to deliver me; O Lord, make haſte to help:' And this ſhe deſired, that ſhe might have a joyful meeting with him, and fruition of him, after whom her ſoul longed, even then when her life was moſt lightſome, and her condition moſt comfortable. And now the time drew near that her deſire was to be granted, in that kind which ſhe moſt deſired, by the power of death to paſs to the Author of Life, which ſhe did in ſuch a calm manner, that when ſhe was thought to be but aſleep ſhe was found to be dead, on Friday, Auguſt 17. 1638.

The Life of Mrs ELIZABETH WILKINSON, who died Anno Chriſti 1654.

MRs ELIZABETH WILKINSON was born of godly parents, of an antient and well reputed family of the gentry in Devonſhire. Her father was Mr Anthony Gifford, her mother Mrs Elizabeth Cottle; and by them ſhe was religiouſly educated during her minority: after which ſhe lived with an aunt, an old diſciple, above twenty years together, where ſhe had many prizes put into her hands to get wiſdom, even many ſpiritual advantages for her eternal good. But conſidering that no helps of education, nor any means could prove effectual without divine influence, it pleaſed the Lord, out of the riches of his mercy, in a ſignal manner, to vouchſafe a bleſſing to all thoſe helps, for the good of her ſoul, and to crown all endeavours in order thereunto with good ſucceſs.

She was obſerved from her childhood to be very docile, very willing to learn, induſtrious in reading of, and ſwift to hear the word of God preached. She was very careful to remember what ſhe heard, and took much pains in writing ſermons, and collecting ſpecial notes out of practical divines.

She had the ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit; with that ſhe was eminently adorned: ſhe looked not, as too many do, upon gaudy and vain dreſſes as any ornament; ſhe neither liked them, nor conformed to them, but went in a grave, decent, and ſober attire. She was humble, gentle, tender hearted, and full of bowels of compaſſion, remembering 'ſuch as were in bonds, as if ſhe had been bound with them,' Heb. xiii. 3. She was of ſo affable, ſweet, and courteous a diſpoſition, that ſhe gained abundance of love and reſpect from all thoſe that converſed with her; and by this means ſhe was the greater gainer by all good conferences. It was her uſual cuſtom to move good diſcourſe, and oft-times ſhe turned the ſtream of other impertinent talk into ſomething which was ſolid, and tended unto edification, and that miniſtered grace to the hearers.

She kept a diary of God's dealings with her ſoul, and of other various diſpenſations that ſhe met with. She was much buſied in prayer, meditation, and ſelf-examination.

She would often deſire her huſband, and others of her acquaintance, to deal plainly and impartially with her. 'For, ſaid ſhe, I would not be deceived with a formal profeſſion, nor with a temporary faith. Perhaps, thro' affection, you may judge far better of me than I deſerve, wherefore I deſire you to ſift and ſearch me thoroughly; for I like ſuch plain dealing beſt of all, and thoſe are my beſt friends which deal moſt plainly with me.'

In

In proceſs of time, after a careful watching over her heart, and frequent addreſſes made unto the throne of grace, ſhe found returns anſwerable to her prayers and deſires; God gave her a large meaſure both of parts and graces; ſhe was able not only to aſſert the truths of God, but to convince gain ſayers.

She abounded in love, faith, meekneſs, humility, and the reſt of the graces of the Spirit, inſomuch as ſhe became a Chriſtian of the higher form, a tall cedar of Libanus, a grown, ſolid, and excellent Chriſtian.

It pleaſed God, for the trial of her graces, to exerciſe her very much in the ſchool of affliction; inſomuch as, ten years before her death, ſhe was, one time reckoned with another, at leaſt half the time ſick: but God ordered this ſickneſs of her body to be a medicine for her ſoul, for the ſpirit of prayer was much ſet on work hereby, and her faith, love, and patience, did appear, and ſhine the more eminently. Out of the furnace ſhe came forth as gold ſeven times purified; ſo that the rod and ſtaff, correction and inſtruction, went together; and by theſe fatherly chaſtiſements her ſoul did thrive more abundantly.

When ſhe was able ſhe neglected not the frequenting of the public aſſemblies; they were her delight; and ſhe was a profeſſed adverſary to the withdrawing from the public congregation of the ſaints; both them, and the godly and reverend miniſters of the goſpel ſhe had in high eſteem, and reverenced them all her days. And when ſhe was not able to go to the public congregations, ſhe uſed to ſpend her time in reading, praying, and meditating at home, and employed her friends to read to her, and pray with her. Such as were ſtable and ſincere Chriſtians were her delight; thoſe ſhe accounted more excellent than her neighbours. She would often ſay, that ſhe valued no friends like to thoſe who were friends to her ſoul.

Concerning her deportment, and carriage to her relations, (for ſuch as are real ſaints ſhew it in their ſeveral capacities) never was a wife more full of ſincere love and reſpect to an huſband, whom ſhe loved entirely, and was entirely beloved by him. Her affection to her children was very tender; ſhe was careful to catechize, inſtruct, and to train them up in the fear of God. And upon her death-bed, amongſt many other excellent counſels and inſtructions, ſhe added this charge, as from a dying mother, that they ſhould remember that they had a mother who would not allow them in any ſin. She was careful alſo to inſtruct her ſervants, and to teach them the fear of the Lord. Indeed ſhe was ready and willing, as opportunity was offered, 'to do good unto all:' and, as need required, gave unto them both corporal and ſpiritual food. She had a large heart, and improved it to a great deal of good in a ſhort time, inſomuch as the poor, the ſick, the afflicted, and the unexperienced, to whom ſhe was very merciful and uſeful whilſt ſhe lived, had a very great miſs of her when ſhe was dead.

In brief, ſhe was one of thoſe worthies 'of whom the world was not worthy:' and yet to give a further character of her, I will here ſet down a narrative, copied exactly out of her own hand writing, of God's gracious dealing with her ſoul, as it follows, word for word.

IT pleaſed the Lord, out of the riches of his grace, to remove me from an ignorant place where I was born, and to bring me very young into a religious family: And when I was about twelve years of age, upon the reading in the Practice of Piety, concerning the happy eſtate of the godly, and the miſerable condition of the wicked in their death, and ſo for ever unto all eternity. It pleaſed the Lord much to affect my heart with it, as from that time my heart was wrought over to a deſire to walk in the ways of God. But at that time, I fear, I did not go upon a right principle; for I then did not eye the glory of God in it, but only my own ſafety, that it might be well with me for ever. But quickly after that I had begun to ſet my face towards Sion, I was ſet upon with many temptations and perplexities in my thoughts, which were very troubleſome to me at all times, but eſpecially when I was alone; the conſideration whereof brought a horror upon my conſcience, inſomuch as I did not know what to do. That little I had, whether from education, or the light of nature, cauſed a ſtriving in me continually againſt thoſe thoughts of Atheiſm, which were moſt terrible unto me. I was ſenſible that it was a fearful ſin to have any ſuch thoughts to lodge within my breaſt; but I deſired from my ſoul to be freed of them, and had continual reaſonings within me againſt them; and yet ſtill for a long time I was troubled, but could not acquaint any with my condition. I did not think that it was ſo with any other as it was with me.

In this ſtrait, when I knew not which way to turn me, even there did the Lord extend his compaſſion towards me in my greateſt extremity, in directing me to read Calvin's Inſtitutions, and eſpecially that part that treats of the creation; whereupon the Lord was pleaſed to give in ſuch ſatisfaction to my ſoul, concerning thoſe things about which I was troubled, as from that time forwards I was not violently aſſaulted in that kind.

But no ſooner was I freed from that trouble, but new ones ſprang up; for the very remembrance of that horrid ſin of Atheiſm left ſuch a terror upon my ſpirit, as made me fear that I had committed that ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt; and ſo my condition ſeemed to be, not only for the preſent, but, in my apprehenſion then, for ever moſt miſerable. All other ſins, though never ſo great, I knew upon true repentance were pardonable; but this ſin that I then lay under the fear of, I knew, out of the word of God, ſhould never be pardoned, which cauſed many ſad fears upon my ſpirit, known to God alone.

For the removal of theſe fears, the Lord, in mercy, directed me to the reading of Mr Scudder's works, where are laid down the marks of that ſin; upon peruſal whereof the Lord was pleaſed to ſatisfy my miſgiving heart, by a clear manifeſtation to my ſoul that I had not committed that ſin: and ſo aſſured me, that though my ſins were great, yet were they pardonable, which put me more cheerfully upon the uſe of ſuch means as the Lord had directed me unto.

And having ſatisfaction given in, concerning this particular, there was a great burden taken off my ſpirit. Although I found no grace in my heart, nor diſcovery of the love of God unto my ſoul, yet in that there was a poſſibility, there was a ground of comfort adminiſtered to my heart, which I formerly feared that I ſhould be ſhut out from. But ſtill my fears remained, that I was not one of thoſe in particular for whom Chriſt died; the more I looked into mine own heart, the more I ſaw of ſin and Satan diſcouraging me, from having any hope that the Lord ſhould accept of ſuch a vile and ſinful wretch as I was, who had entertained ſuch ſinful thoughts.

I likewiſe thought how ſmall the number was of thoſe that ſhould be ſaved, in compariſon of others; and my repentance, I feared, came ſhort of that which was required in the goſpel.

As for faith, I could not find the leaſt meaſure of it in my ſoul, with many other ſad diſcouraging thoughts, but when I was moſt perplexed with fears and doubts, even then did the Lord graciouſly dart in ſome beams of his reconciled countenance, as I was reading ſomething in Mr Scudder's Chriſtian daily Walk, &c. which the Lord ſet home upon my ſoul, and brought into my ſoul ſo much joy and comfort at the preſent, as neither my tongue nor pen can expreſs: but this joy remained not long, for I quickly loſt the ſenſe of it; yet the remembrance of it was ſweet unto me at all times.

But after this, all my former fears returned afreſh again upon my heart, only I had a door of hope opened, that when God ſaw it beſt for me, he would return, and renew his reconciled countenance unto my ſoul, in the clear light and apprehenſion thereof: and this was when I was about ſixteen years of age. After which time the Lord did exerciſe me with various diſpenſations: for, for two years ſpace, I was by Providence caſt upon a place where I heard very little powerful preaching, ſmall helps for the good of my ſoul, but what the Lord was pleaſed to give in by the uſe of private means. But his power and abundant mercy was much ſeen in that time, that, though I had not much comfort, yet the Lord was pleaſed to keep up my ſpirit in a way of depending upon him; and my fears were leſs at that time than formerly, when I had more helps: ſo gracious was the Lord unto me, in keeping me alive in a time of famine.

After this, through God's goodneſs, I was ſometimes under the preaching of a powerful miniſter, (Mr Bateman of Ockingham) who was crowned with the converſion, ſtrengthening, and building up of many ſouls; unto whoſe preaching the Lord gave ſuch a bleſſing, as I ſeldom, if ever, went away from hearing without comfort. Though I came to hear him with many doubts upon my ſpirit, yet the Lord ſo ruled and directed him, as if his ſermons had been only concerning my particular, and he fully acquainted with the whole condition of my ſoul. Sometimes the Lord directed me to ſome ſupporting promiſes, upon which I relied; but thoſe promiſes which were made to believers, though I highly prized them, yet I durſt not apply them to myſelf, fearing that I had no intereſt in them. But that promiſe, Prov. xxviii. 13. 'He that confeſſeth, and forſaketh his ſins, ſhall find mercy.' And that, 1 John i. 9. 'If we confeſs our ſins, he is faithful, and juſt to forgive us our ſins, and to cleanſe us from all unrighteouſneſs.' And the promiſe is, 1 John ii. 1. 2. 'If any man ſin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jeſus Chriſt the Righteous, and he is the propitiation for our ſins; and not for ours only, but for the ſins of the whole world.' And the invitation, Iſ. lv. 1. 'Ho! every one that thirſteth, come ye to the waters: and he that hath no money, come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.' Together with the reſt of the chapter.

All thoſe places the Lord made a ſtay unto my ſoul: and afterwards the Lord ſo bleſſed one means or other unto me, inſomuch as I was kept from ſinking and falling into ſuch horror as many of the people of God ſometimes fell into.

But yet my fears and doubts were ſo many, as that my comfort never laſted long, if the Lord did but hide his face I was troubled. No longer could I believe, than I found new ſtrength given in, that the Lord would ever have mercy upon my ſoul.

The ſenſe of original ſin and actual tranſgreſſions, in their filthineſs and guiltineſs, cauſed my fears yet to remain upon my ſpirit; my faith then ſeemed very ſmall, if I had any, which I much queſtioned: I durſt not then ſay, 'Lord, encreaſe my faith!' but I could cry earneſtly, 'Lord, work faith in me!'

I found much dullneſs and deadneſs, manifold diſtractions in duties, ſo that God might juſtly have withdrawn himſelf from me for ever; yet notwithſtanding all my uneven walking with God, he was graciouſly pleaſed to manifeſt his mercy unto my ſoul.

When I was ſtricken with ſuch weakneſſes, as I apprehended might quickly have ended my life, I fell into a great fear. At the firſt, finding my heart to ſink, the Lord was pleaſed to give me ſo much reſpite, as to pour out my ſoul before him, deſiring ſtrength and ſupport from him to keep up my ſpirit, and to make me willing to ſubmit to his diſpenſations; and the Lord graciouſly anſwered my prayers, in that he removed all my former doubtings and fears, all the time of that ſickneſs, which was long, and ſo dangerous, that neither I, nor others, expected my life: The Lord then cleared up my evidence for heaven, and gave me in ſo much comfort againſt the apprehenſions of death, as I never had in all my life before.

Other like trials of the Lord's love I found ſtill, when I was in the greateſt extremity, and ſtood moſt in need of help from him, inſomuch as at ſuch times I have hoped that I ſhould never again have queſtioned the love of God to my ſoul: but I have found it otherwiſe by ſad experience: for when theſe impreſſions were worn off, I have been ready to call all in queſtion again concerning my poor ſoul. It made me oft to think of that which was ſaid to Solomon's charge, 'that he forgat the Lord that appeared to him twice.' I found it the hardeſt thing to believe that ever I went about. But this wavering condition could not ſatisfy my ſoul; for the Lord giving me ſome times a glimpſe of his love, made me long after fuller enjoyments of it, ſo that I was carried out with a reſtleſs impatience, to beg that the Lord would take away the heart of unbelief from me, which did both diſhonour him, and hinder me from that peace which the Lord was willing that his people ſhould enjoy.

My heart then being brought unto that frame, I was more willing than ever I was before, to impart my condition unto ſome ſpiritual friends, whom I deſired to deal impartially with me, acquainting them with the whole condition of my ſoul, how far the Lord had carried me on, and at what I ſtuck, and ſtill as new objections did ariſe, I laboured to get ſatisfaction: being convinced that I had too much prejudiced my ſelf in that I had no ſooner made my condition known, to ſome who were able to give me advice.

This way of communicating my condition, I found the Lord bleſſed unto my ſoul, inſomuch that my hopes were more confirmed, my fears more removed, my faith more ſtrengthned, and by the hearing of ſuch ſermons and reading ſuch books as came cloſeſt into the conſcience, and were moſt for trial of ones ſpiritual condition, I found the greateſt benefit by, and received the moſt comfort from them.

Formerly I had many fears that I was not one of them who had an intereſt in the election of grace: but the Lord afterwards put into my heart to enquire whether I had thoſe graces of his ſpirit wrought in me which none but his own elect people could have.

Upon the ſtricteſt ſearching into mine own heart, the Lord was pleaſed after many years of fear, at laſt, to evidence unto my ſoul that there was a change wrought in my heart, will and affections, notwithſtanding the remainders of ſin and corruption, which ſtill encompaſſed me about; being confident that he that had begun this good work, would not leave it unfiniſhed unto the day of Jeſus Chriſt; and the Lord was pleaſed to ſet home divers promiſes for the ſtrengthening of my faith; to wit, thoſe which ſet down the everlaſting covenant, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. The 'everlaſting love of God,' Jer. xxxi. 3. John xiii. 13. The certainty of the foundation, 2 Tim. ii. 19. The certainty of the promiſes, 2 Cor. i. 20. They 'are all in Chriſt yea and amen;' and that the children of God have eternal life promiſed unto them, and that none ſhall be ever 'able to pluck them out of Chriſt's hands, John x. 28. Then for divers years the Lord was pleaſed to ſtay me, to lead, and guide me, till he had 'ſet my feet upon the rock which is higher than I,' from whence I truſt, that I ſhall never be removed.

And now my heart's deſire is, to aſcribe that meaſure of hope and comfort which the Lord hath given me at any time, only unto the praiſe of the glory of his grace, who hath made me 'accepted in his beloved,' which is ſo great a mercy as I can never be thankful enough for, nor walk anſwerable thereunto. I know, when I look into my heart, there is matter of fear that the Lord will withdraw the influences of his comforts from me: but that which I reſt upon is, the free mercy of God in Chriſt, expecting performance of his promiſes made, Rom. vi. 16. 'Sin ſhall not have dominion over you, becauſe you are not under the law, but under grace:' and Ezek. xxxvi. 25. 'that he will 'ſprinkle clean water upon me, and that he will give me a new heart, and put a new ſpirit within me, that he will take away my ſtony heart, and give me an heart of fleſh; being perſuaded that the Lord will keep me by his own 'power through faith unto ſalvation.

And now, that I may have all the graces of the ſpirit ſtrengthned and encreaſed in me, which I find that I ſtand in continual need of: it is the deſire of my ſoul to be a partaker of the Lord's ſupper, which, through the blood of Chriſt only, I have right unto.

This is the particular account of God's gracious dealing with this godly gentlewoman: conſidering there was no adminiſtration of the ſacrament in that parochial congregation where ſhe lived, and uſed formerly to receive it, nor any paſtor at all to officiate there, ſhe being deſirous to enjoy that great ordinance, and that after a pure way of adminiſtration, ſent this forementioned narrative to the rev. Dr Harris, living then in the univerſity, who admitted her to the participation of the Lord's ſupper in that public aſſembly where he adminiſtred it.

Now

Now let us ſee alſo a letter written by Dr Harris concerning this godly gentlewoman, whom he highly honoured, upon the occaſion of his communicating the aforeſaid letter of hers to a friend: 'Do not, ſaith he, think it loſt time to read over this narrative: it was penned by this gracious woman upon a ſerious occaſion, what time ſhe was to give an account of herſelf at her admiſſion to the Lord's ſupper. The diſcourſe is plain, but pregnant of inſtruction. I alter nothing in the thing, I only take notice of the perſons therein mentioned: as 1. God, 2. Satan, 3. The party's ſelf: all which offer matters worthy thy thoughts.'

Firſt in Satan, thou ſeeſt his moſt ordinary way and method in tempting. His firſt attempt is to blow out all light left in the ſoul, and to quell all thoughts of a deity if poſſibly he can, that ſo no room at all may be left for God: if that cannot be, but the conſcience will be ſometimes talking; then his next work is to queſtion and argue the caſe, whether indeed there be ſuch a perſon as God, ſuch a thing as the ſoul, ſuch a book as the Bible, ſuch a place as an heaven or hell; and if he cannot gain ſuch a concluſion from the ſoul, then in the third place the queſtion is, What manner of one this ſuppoſed God is? and firſt, whilſt thou art under mercy, all of vengeance and fury; there was no place for fear, and here is none for hope: there ſin was an inconſiderable thing, and beneath God's cogniſance; here ſin is unpardonable, and beyond God's mercy. In both eſtates he labours the deſtruction of faith; now in the threats, then in the promiſes. In the firſt eſtate you muſt never yield to ſelf deſpair; no, ſpit in his face that ſhall once queſtion thy belief in God, without the leaſt doubting. What? not believe my Maker with all my ſoul? what? once doubt and ſuſpect him? I defie him, and the ſoul fiend that ſhall ſay ſo. On the other ſide, when once converted, what haſt thou to do with the covenant of grace and peace? That is bread for children, not for dogs, hypocrites, for ſins as have ſinned againſt the Holy Ghoſt, as thou haſt done; and at this bay he holds the ſoul for ſome ſpace; and ſoon recruits his forces, and renews his interrogatories, thus; Thou within the promiſe? thou a believer? canſt thou ſay, dareſt thou ſay that thou haſt faith? it may be thou dareſt not deny it, but what is that to the point? thou dareſt not affirm it, though partial enough to thy ſelf: be adviſed by me, who loves plain dealing, and let not thy falſe heart, and theſe fawning preachers befool thee unto deſtruction.

Thus the devil up and down, firſt and laſt, thus he proceeded with man at the firſt, and though ſometimes he alters hands, and finds out new ways, yet here lies his road for the moſt part, and this is the firſt party here named.

Now in the ſecond place, what doth God? it muſt be granted that he permitteth theſe helliſh ſcullions to ſcour his plate, and to fit the veſſels of honour for their maſter's uſe, and they (as glad of the office) beſtir themſelves, they draw their veſſels, and render them as foul and ugly as they can; but when they have done their work, God takes his plate out of their hand to their no ſmall grief; and in the mean while God goes along with the temptation, and in them all ſupports his poor ſervants now more immediately by his own hand, prompting their petitions, ſhining into their ſoul ſome glimpſes of comfort, minding them of ſome promiſe; to be ſure, yielding them ſome ſecret hope, ſomething or other which draws them along ſtill more or leſs. 2. Now more immediately by men, and other means; ſometimes he directs them to ſome ſpecial book or treatiſe which fits their caſe, and holds ſoul and life together at preſent; ſometimes he ſends them an interpreter one of a thouſand, that ſhall rip up their miſery, and ſhew them their remedy, and at laſt fetches off his captives, even then when Satan began to crow, and cry victory, that extremity being God's opportunity; and this is uſually, though not ever, God's way.

Now look upon the third concerned, the party tempted, what doth he? he ſticks (often) in the birth, fool as he is; his firſt work is to keep the devil's counſel, confeſs and be damned for ever; the devil is true to him, and he will be as true, and never peach: he travels with a woful burden of ſin, guilt, horror; but if thou loveſt thy ſelf (ſaith the devil) keep thy own counſel, truſt not God nor man. But if the preacher doth force him to a confeſſion, and he can hold no longer, then he makes forth but fair and ſoftly. Firſt, he makes many offers, goes and comes, and ſomething he would ſay, but is loath; he begins afar off, and then ſtops, begins again, with a purpoſe of uttering all; and when he comes to his friend, either all is quiet for the preſent, and the pang over; or elſe, if he hangs ſtill on the rack, then he drops out ſomewhat, but reſerves the worſt, and ſo is little the better, becauſe he comes not to the bottom quickly; or, if he ſpeaks out all, yet there is another rub in the way; how can I tell whether this party's teſtimony be true or no? his judgment and affection being right. He ſhews me promiſes, but knows he or I whether theſe promiſes do belong to me? He ſpeaks of a Chriſt, but what is that to me, if he be none of mine? He talks of believing, ſeeing is believing: It is a ſenſeleſs thing to truſt to another's goodneſs, when I have nothing of mine own: To believe mercy when I feel wrath; ſhall I not believe mine own eyes? And thus, after a world of ſermons, ſacraments, conferences, the poor ſoul hovers, and finds no reſt or ſatisfaction, till God be pleaſed to work him to theſe things:

1. To a reſolution of imparting himſelf to ſome godly friend, and of ſpeaking his whole heart to ſome one or other.

2. Of reſting in God's bare word, without the aſſurance of ſenſe.

3. Of accepting of Jeſus Chriſt, without any Ifs and Ands, notwithſtanding his own unworthineſs.

4. Of waiting upon God, and hearkening when he will ſpeak peace.

And when he is brought thus far, that he will be beholden to a communion of ſaints, and will take God's word, without any further ſurety, and owe all to Chriſt, though he can contribute nothing, and in deſpight of all ſuggeſtions and diſcouragements, will ſtick to the peace of Chriſt, and look for all his peace in that way, ſaying, 'Though he kill me, yet will I truſt in him,' I will wait and hearken to him; when, I ſay, he is thus far proceeded, Satan may now go ſhake his ears, and receive his anſwer, 'It is God that juſtifies, who ſhall condemn?' O hell! where is thy power? O death! O devil! what is thy commiſſion?

It is not my meaning to preſcribe to God any one way of working; but this is the way he often takes with his children; and this we may find exemplified in this foregoing narrative, touching the converſion and procedure of this ſaint, ſo far as ſhe hath commented upon her own life.

Now, for her death, I will tell thee what my obſervations were thereabout.

1. I find that God began with her quickly, and called her hence before ſhe was aged; and that is moſtly his method where an early harveſt is intended, a timely ſeed-time is promiſed; they live quickly, and live apace, who ripen betimes; ſo it was with her, who was ſeldom out of action after her entrance, but gained as much time in ſo little a time, as any I knew.

2. I obſerve that death came not all at once upon her; ſhe was yearly dying ſome years before ſhe died her laſt, and thus death was made familiar to her. I have ſeldom known any of her age that was leſs amazed at the ſpeech and thoughts of death, ſo good a thing it is to know experimentally what it is to die before-hand.

3. Obſerve how God's power triumphs in weakeſt veſſels. It is a thing I have often thought on, that godly women, for the moſt part, die more confidently and comfortably than good men, the Lord trampling upon Satan in them, and in her very eminently.

4. Her patience was remarkable in the midſt of ſore pains, which frequented her in the breeding and bearing of children; yet then her ſpeech was, 'I fear not pains, I fear myſelf; leſt through impatiency I ſhould let paſs any unfitting word.' It is a bleſſed frame when pains ſeem light, and ſin heavy.

5. I plainly ſaw in her the power of grace beyond nature; 1. When life and death were both laid before her, her her ſpeech was this, 'I am at my father's diſpoſal; howbeit of myſelf I rather incline to death than life. 2. Whereas her affections were very ſtrong both to her loving huſband and children, inſomuch as it was conceived that the laſt farewel would go very near her, when ſhe ſhould part with ſo precious and dear friends; ſhe was ſo much taken up with the thoughts of Chriſt, that ſhe ſeemed not to ſtick at any ſuch relations. Nay, thirdly, She ſeemed wholly to forget her natural ſelf; for being entreated to favour her body and ſpeech, in regard of the lowneſs of her ſpirits, after ſome pauſe, ſhe brake forth into theſe words; 'Shall I, for this poor carcaſe, be wanting to my ſoul's comfort and my Saviour's praiſes? Let me have your prayers ſtill, and God his praiſes; yea, pray not only for, but with me.' Which being done, ſhe overflowed with comfort; and in that condition I left her: And that ſtream of comfort led her, not long after, where are rivers of joy for evermore.

Thus lived ſhe a moſt profitable life; thus died ſhe a moſt fruitful death. God ſo turned this his ſervant, that living, dying, and after death, ſhe ſhould be fruitful. Thus will God honour thoſe that honour him. To him be all honour to eternity. Amen."

Now it may be uſeful to make mention of her laſt ſickneſs, eſpecially eight weeks before her death.

From the very firſt of her laſt ſickneſs, her apprehenſion was that ſhe ſhould die ſhortly, and her longing deſire was to be diſſolved and to be with Chriſt. She often repeated thoſe words of Job, 'There the weary go to reſt;' and thoſe words in the cloſe of the Revelations, 'Come, Lord Jeſus, come quickly. Upon the approach of her death, whereof ſhe was very ſenſible, ſhe aſked her huſband, what promiſes of aſſurance were a firm ground for her to bottom upon? He named John x. 28. 'And I give unto them eternal life, and they ſhall never periſh; neither ſhall any man pluck them out of my hand.' Likewiſe he added, Rom. viii. 33. 34. 'Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Chriſt that died, yea, rather that is riſen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who alſo maketh interceſſion for us.' He added ver. 38. 39. 'For I am perſuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things preſent, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord.' Theſe, ſaid ſhe, are ſweet promiſes.

That morning ſhe died, ſhe deſired her huſband to read the ſeventeenth chapter of John, (which chapter that eminent and holy Scotchman, Mr Rollock, cauſed to be read to him when he was dying); after that was read, ſhe was ravished with great joy, and expreſſed herſelf accordingly. Her huſband and two other friends prayed with her. After the laſt prayer was ended, ſhe ſaid, 'My fleſh and my heart faileth:' her huſband anſwered, 'That God was the ſtrength of her heart, and her portion for ever.' He would never fail her. She returned an anſwer, which were the laſt words which ever ſhe ſpoke to him, 'He will never fail me.' About an hour after ſhe reſigned up her ſpirit unto God who gave it; and her laſt words were, 'I have finiſhed my courſe.' She ſlept in Jeſus, December the 8th, 1654. To her, 'to live was Chriſt, and to die was gain.' She lived much deſired, and died much lamented. Her name is like precious ointment poured forth. She lived holily, and died comfortably, and now partakes of thoſe joys which 'eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, neither can enter into the heart of man to conceive,' even thoſe things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

Divers epitaphs were made at the death of this rare gentlewoman; I ſhall only inſert two, which were made by two reverend and learned doctors.

On the truly virtuous and religious Mrs Elizabeth Wilkinſon. To her Huſband.

SAy; ſhall I ſpeak, or hold my peace?
That ſeems more due; but this more eaſe:
Where, what to ſpeak, is hard to ſay;
For, ſhould I utter all I may,
'Twere endleſs: and to praiſe a friend
By halves, is but to diſcommend.
And would I ſpeak; to whom, and what?
To thoſe that knew, or knew her not?
Who knew her need it not; for they
Know more than I am like to ſay:
Who knew her not may think, that ſhe
Deſerv'd but what they hear from me:
And ſo, inſtead of ſetting forth
Her praiſe, I ſhall but wrong her worth.
He that adores with ſilent view,
Doth not detract from what is due;
But, all that while, his ſilence ſays,
He knows not how enough to praiſe.
So, might I chuſe, I would adore
Her ſpeaking worth, and ſay no more.
But, ſince I muſt, (for ſo you ſay)
Not hold my peace, I muſt obey;
Yet 'tis, I ſay, too hard a taſk,
To anſwer fully what you aſk,
To know what firſt I ſhould commend,
And harder, where to make an end.
Should I begin, where firſt appear
Her worths, I muſt begin with her.
Higher than ſo I need not go,
Tho' whence ſhe came be worthy too.
For, firſt: Her own deſerving merit
Claims more than others do inherit:
Nor, is it eaſy to expreſs
What age of hers was ſpent amiſs.
Her temper meek; her carriage ſuch;
Her language good, and not too much;
Her habit comely, more than brave;
Her converſation humbly grave.
What virtues deck'd a ſingle life,
Were doubled when ſhe was a wife.
How good a wife, I need not tell
To him who knew her worth ſo well;
Nor, what was her maternal care,
To whom her children were ſo dear.

Nor

Nor was her good confin'd to home,
But challenged a larger room,
To heal the ſick, the hungry feed,
And ſuccour thoſe that ſtood in need;
Good both to ſoul and body too,
Of thoſe with whom ſhe had to do;
To rich, to poor, to great and ſmall;
But in her cloſet beſt of all,
Which was her Chriſtian daily walk,
In doing that which others talk:
Forward to good, without conſtraint:
And, as ſhe liv'd, ſhe died a ſaint.
But this, to ſpeak at large, would crave
A volume, not an epitaph.

And, were it done, I might offend,
By ſhaming many left behind;
Tho' more there may be found, I fear,
That will commend, than follow her.
Some mind good words, more than good lives;
Some are good women, not good wives;
Some, neither this, nor that; and ſome
Abroad are better than at home:
Some hope to die like ſaints, although
'Tis too, too plain, they live not ſo.
'Tis rare, in all reſpects, to ſee
A wife, a woman, like to thee;
At home, abroad, in life, in death,
Like unto our Elizabeth. J. WALLIS, D. D.

CONSTANTIUS, the father of CONSTANTINE, was for his paleneſs ſirnamed Chlorus, a Roman by birth, whoſe father was a ſenator. He was made Cæſar by Maximianus, who together with Diocleſian reſigned the empire, choſe Conſtantius to ſucceed him, to whom the government of the weſt fell by lot. He was a man of ſingular clemency towards men, and piety towards God, not ſtaining his reign with the blood of the ſaints, as his predeceſſors had done: he little regarded his private profit, but fought rather the enriching of his ſubjects, ſaying, That it was more behoofful for the common-wealth, that the wealth of the land ſhould be diſperſed in the hands of the commons, than locked up in the prince's coffers.

He was ſo averſe from all ſuperfluities, that upon feſtival days, and when he entertained ſtrangers, he was fain to borrow plate of his friends to furniſh his cup-boards. This coming to Diocleſian's ear, he ſent ambaſſadors to him, reproaching him with poverty, becauſe his treaſury was empty: but Conſtantius intreating them to ſtay a while, ſummoned a parliament of his wealthieſt ſubjects, to whom he declared his need of money, telling them, that now was the time for them to expreſs their love to their lord and king; whereupon, without delay, they ſtrove to fill his exchequer with gold and ſilver; which being done, Conſtantius ſhewed it to the ambaſſadors, bidding them tell their maſter, that his treaſure which he had now collected was before in the hands of his ſubjects, who as ſo many treaſurers kept it for his uſe. The ambaſſadors wondered at it; but after their departure, the good emperor reſtored it again to the former owners, with many expreſſions of his royal favour towards them.

Alſo, to try his courtiers, he commanded all to ſacrifice to idols, pretending to diſcard all that refuſed ſo to do; but contrariwiſe, thoſe that obeyed he put from the court, ſaying, That they which are diſloyal to God, will never be true and truſty to their prince.

His firſt wife was Helena, by birth a Britain, the daughter of Coilus a Britiſh prince, on whom he begat Conſtantine the Great, in Britain.

Conſtantine in his youth was brought up, firſt with Diocleſian, whom he accompanied in his travels through Paleſtine; and afterwards was left an hoſtage with Galerius at Rome. He was of a comely ſtature, excelled others in ſtrength, very affable, and of a royal diſpoſition, his inward virtues being equal to his outward ſhape; for which he was envied by ſome, and feared and hated by the tyrants, who thereupon ſought opportunity to work his overthrow; which Conſtantine obſerving, (after God had twice or thrice diſcovered the conſpiracies that were plotted againſt him) he fled from Rome, having laid all the way with poſt-horſes for the purpoſe, which he left houghed, for fear of purſuit; and ſo he came with all ſpeed to York, where his father lay ſick, being lately returned from an expedition, which he had made againſt the Caledonians and Picts. Conſtantius much rejoiced when he ſaw him, and ſitting upright in his bed, in the preſence of his counſellors, he ſaid, 'It now ſufficeth, and death is not unwelcome, ſeeing I leave my unaccompliſhed actions to be performed by thee, my ſon,' &c. 'Govern the empire with upright juſtice; protect the innocent from the tyranny of oppreſſors, and wipe away all tears from the Chriſtians eyes, for therein, above all other things I have accounted myſelf moſt happy. To thee therefore I leave my diadem, and their defence, taking my faults with me to my grave, there to be buried in everlaſting oblivion; but leaving my virtues, if ever I had any, to revive and live in thee.' And ſo, taking his laſt farewel farewel of his son and friends, he ended his days in the year 306, and of his age fifty-six, having been Cæsar sixteen years, and Augustus two years.

Immediately Constantine, by acclamation of the people, assistance of the soldiers, and advice of Erocus king of the Almains (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome), was proclaimed emperor, and successor to that part of the world which his father held, which election was joyfully ratified by the senate at Rome, and gladly accepted by all other provinces, who accounted this island of all others most happy which first saw him Cæsar.

His first work was to prosecute the war begun by his father against the Caledonians and Picts, whom he subdued, together with the inhabitants of the western islands. But the unruly Pretorian soldiers at Rome, hearing of the death of Constantius, proclaimed Maxentius, the son of Maximianus Herculius, emperor, who, by his necromancies, adulteries, persecutions, and murders, grew so odious and intollerable to all, that the senate sent to Constantine, craving his aid to redress these things. But, in the mean time, Maxentius was grown to that height of impiety and impurity, that he violently took away mens wives from them, and having violated their chastity, sent them back to their husbands again. Amongst the rest, a Christian matron, wife to a senator, understanding that the tyrants messengers were at the door to fetch her to him, she desired some time to dress herself; and so, going into her chamber, she ran a sword into her side, and fell down dead, leaving her body to the burial, rather than to satisfy the tyrants lust. He also massacred and put his subjects to death upon every light occasion. Many of the senators he slew for their wealth. He gave himself over to magical arts, ripping open the wombs of women great with child, searching the bowels of tender infants and other creatures. He, by conjurations, raised up devils to consult with them about the issue of his wars.

Maximianus, his father, pretending a dislike of these outragious courses of his son, repaired to his son-in-law Constantine, who had married his daughter Fausta, to complain of him to them; but whilst he was with him, he secretly tampered with his daughter to make away her husband; but the good Lady, knowing that her bond to her husband was greater than to her father; she revealed it to Constantine, who thereupon caused him to be put to death; and then commiserating the lamentable condition of the Romans, he raised an army, and marched towards Rome against that tyrant Maxentius, and drawing Licinius, governour of Sclavonia, who was made Cæsar to his side, by giving him his sister Constantia to wife, he hasted towards Rome with an army of ninety thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, levied out of Britain, France and Germany; but knowing well that success in war dependeth more on divine assistance than human strength; he considered unto what god he should address his prayers for success, for as yet he was not fully settled in the Christian faith, and considering, that his predecessors, who had worshipped many gods, and put their trust in them, had so often miscarried, and that on the contrary, his father, that had only worshipped one, and the true God, had a happy reign, and was still preserved from many dangers, he therefore resolved to worship and adore that God only which his father had served; wherefore he earnestly prayed unto God, to reveal himself to him, and to prosper him in his journey. and whilst he was thus praying, lifting up his eyes to Heaven about noon-day, he beheld the sign of a cross lively figured in the air, with this inscription, In hoc vince, by this overcome; himself and all the army wondering at so strange a prodigy, and being much troubled in his mind to know the meaning of it, the night following Christ appeared to him in his sleep, commanding him to make the like figure and banner against his enemies; whereupon the next day, imparting the vision to his friends, he sent for the best goldsmiths and lapidaries, to make the like cross with gold and precious stones, and withal resolving to worship that God only, who had thus appeared to him, he sent for godly ministers to instruct him therein, who shewed him that Christ was the only begotten Son of God, of his coming into the world, his holy life, death, &c.

Afterwards with great courage, he went forwards bearing before him and his victorious army, instead of the Imperial Eagle, the form of this vision embroidered upon his standard; Maxentius, as much depending upon his sorcerers, was no less confident of victory, for the furtherance whereof, he framed a deceitful bridge over Tyber, to entrap Constantine; and also sent out divers armies to oppose him before he came near the city: but Constantine trusting only in God, overthrew at the first encounter, his first, second, and third armies, and so marching thorough all Italy, he brought his victorious ensigns near the walls of Rome.

Hereupon Maxentius led forth his army above a mile from Rome, and joined battle with Constantine, but being overcharged by the vanguard of Constantine, he, with the rest of his army fled, and either through haste or forgetfulness, took over the deceitful bridge, which he made to entrap Constantine, but no sooner were they entred upon it, but it fell in sunder, whereby they were all drowned.

Constantine and his army remaining victorious sang praises unto God for the same. The senators, nobles, and all the people of Rome, being freed from servitude, received him with rejoicing hearts and loud acclamations; men, women, children and servants called him their patron and preserver. But his humble mind was not puffed up with their praises and applause, but ascribing all to God, he gave thanks to him as the giver of victory: He erected for a trophy his own image, holding a banner with a cross quartered in it. All the western nations also having obtained liberty, kept festivals in honour of Constantine.

He published his royal edicts, whereby he restored to his subjects all those lands which had been injuriously taken from them; calling some from banishment, and freeing others from captivity whom the tyrants had imprisoned; he gat godly ministers about him, and although they went in poor and mean habits, not considering their outside, but honouring the image of God in them, he set them at his own table, took them with him whither soever he went, that he might enjoy the benefit of their prayers. He repaired some churches, built others, and relieved many poor men with many bountiful donations and gifts; to those that begged in the streets, and at his gate, he gave money, meat and clothing; and to such as by wrongs and oppressions were fallen into want, he gave pensions.

He was a father to the fatherless, an husband to the widows; he married young maids that were orphans to honest wealthy men, and gave them portions, and was very gracious to all petitioners and distressed suitors. And perceiving, that there was much discord and various opinions in matters of religion, he called a synod of the clergy, where he was present himself; dismissing his guard as superfluous, whilst he was environed with godly and learned men; he declared to them the controverted points, whereof they were to consult, being very desirous to settle the church in peace and unity; those which were of a quiet and peaceable temper, he made much of and much disliked those which were otherwise; and God to requite the care of his house, made all the barbarous nations to prostrate themselves at his feet; he made him a conqueror and terrible to his enemies, who of his own nature was of a most gentle and gracious disposition.

Yet some of the kindred of Maximianus, conspired treason against him, but through the mercy of God, (who in a wonderful manner revealed all their conspiracies to Constantine, by visions and revelations) they were prevented. God also gave him much peace and safety, whereby he delighted himself in the love of his subjects, but chiefly to see the Church of God in a flourishing condition, and so continuing to the tenth year of his reign, he celebrated public and solemn festivals, wherein he offered up prayers and praises unto God.

But as his fame encreased in the minds of most, so was it much maligned by Licinius, his fellow emperor, who sought an occasion against Constantine, by raising a cruel persecution in the east against Christians, whom he never favoured in his heart, though for a time he had suffered them in the exercise of their religion; and besides he plotted plotted many treaſons againſt Conſtantine, to whom God revealed them, whereby they were prevented; then by feigned and crafty accuſations, he raiſed a perſecution againſt the godly miniſters, prohibiting them from meeting together in ſynods, to conſult about matters concerning their own and the churches good, and thereby ſeeking to break off and interrupt the harmonious agreement of the church, which could not be long preſerved without ſuch meetings, wherein great and weighty matters of controverſy were fairly debated and determined. Then he baniſhed all godly men out of the court, others he degraded from their dignity, and employed them in ſervile offices; he ſought to enrich himſelf by the ſpoils of others; he threatned with death others that profeſſed the name of Chriſt; he committed many adulteries, and held that no man could live chaſtily, without meaſuring others diſpoſitions by his own vicious inclination.

Then he made a law, that men and women ſhould not be preſent together at divine ſervice; that biſhops ſhould not expound the ſcripture to women, but that women ſhould chuſe women to be their inſtructers and preachers; then he commanded the congregations to meet together without the city gates in the open fields; ſuch ſoldiers, as would not ſacrifice to devils, he put out of their places and offices; he forbad any to relieve thoſe that lay in priſon and were almoſt famiſhed; yea, he made a law, that ſuch as did relieve them ſhould be impriſoned themſelves.

His avarice was inſatiable, taxing the lands of his ſubjects, whereby filling his treaſury with ſilver and gold, and yet complaining of his poverty. He unjuſtly baniſhed many and confiſcated their goods; he made his ſervants to abuſe the wives of noblemen, and then to accuſe them. Himſelf deflowred virgins, and fell to open proſecution of the church, eſpecially of the miniſters, the chiefeſt of whom he cauſed ſecretly to be murdered. Some churches he wholly demoliſhed, and cauſed others to be ſhut up, that the congregations might not meet in them; he invented new kinds of tortures for the Chriſtians; ſome he cauſed to be cut into ſmall pieces, and ſo be thrown into the ſea to feed fiſhes.

But the afflictions of the church coming to the ears of Conſtantine, who ſaw that he could not otherwiſe prevent them, this champion of God, preſently raiſed military forces, ſo that many troops of horſe and foot reſorted to him to follow his Chriſtian ſtandard againſt the tyrant, and by way of preparation, he betook himſelf to prayer, and choſe ſome godly miniſters to attend him; eſteeming them as his ſoul's guard. On the contrary, the tyrant having that Conſtantine had undertook, by God's aſſiſtance, to free the Chriſtians from his tyranny, and had got religious men about him, he derided him, and ſent for the Egyptian conjurers and magicians, and their prieſts to ſacrifice to his falſe gods, and to enquire the ſucceſs of his war, who all with one conſent promiſed, that he ſhould proſper and be victorious; and thus truſting to their promiſes, he marched forward and prepared to join battle.

The two armies meet in Hungary, and a little before the battle, Licinius calling his friends and favourites unto a grove where were many idols, having lighted up waxen tapers, and made his uſual ſacrifices to them, he ſaid, "My friends, theſe are our country Gods, which we from our anceſtors do religiouſly worſhip. Our enemy violating the antient cuſtoms, and blinded with error, worſhips a ſtrange God, which wickedly he conceiveth to be the true God, under whoſe colours he intends to fight, and bear-eth his ſtandard before his army. In confidence of whoſe aſſiſtance he warreth againſt us and our gods, whom he hath traiterouſly forſaken, and relinquiſhed the worſhip of them. Now it will appear whether of us is in an error: for if we have the victory, we ſhall know that our gods preſerve and aſſiſt us: if Conſtantine's ſtrange God ſhall give him the victory over us, who are many more than they, we ſhall thereby know which God ought to be reverenced, &c. And having ended his oration, he commanded his ſoldiers ſtraight to give battle to the enemy.

About this very time, in ſome of theſe cities which were ſubject to Licinius, the citizens thought that they ſaw troops and bands of men of Conſtantine's army marching at noon day through the city, as if they had gotten the victory, Conſtantine having made his prayers to God, joined battle with Licinius, and gave him a great overthrow: many of his enemies caſt away their weapons, and falling down at his feet, craved mercy, which he willingly granted them.

Licinius forſaken of all his forces, and finding by experience, that the confidence which he placed in his falſe gods was fruitleſs, fled away, and Conſtantine forbad his ſoldiers to purſue him, hoping that the ſenſe of his preſent calamity would make him leave off his wicked courſes, and convert him to a milder temper: but he eſcaping into Aſia the leſs, conſults again with conjurers, is confident of ſucceſs promiſed by them, raiſeth another army, which Conſtantine being informed of, devoted himſelf for a time to prayer, and having erected a tabernacle diſtant from his tents, he gave himſelf to godly meditations and prayer, ſome other faithful and religious men accompanying him in theſe religious exerciſes; and ſo marching againſt his enemies, they came to a ſecond battle, where he ſlew many, got the victory, and carried away many trophies: yet he commanded his ſoldiers to ſhew mercy to the captives, and to expreſs humanity towards them, yea himſelf payed their ranſom, whereby they were delivered.

Licinius being taken priſoner, by the mediation of his wife Conſtantia, had his life ſpared, and was confined to the city of Nicomedia: but he after a while practiſing new treaſons, was at laſt by command of Conſtantine put to death: whereupon the peace of God's ſaints manifeſtly appeared, and the goſpel of Chriſt had a free progreſs.

For no ſooner was the blaſting tempeſt of perſecution blown over, but the faithful chriſtians, who before had hidden themſelves in woods and deſerts, and ſecret caves, came forth, re-edified the churches, celebrated feſtival days to God with pure hearts, and faith unfeigned: and now the whole Roman empire enjoying peace, religion ſpread abroad her bright beams to illuminate thoſe which ſat in darkneſs and the ſhadow of death: former miſeries were forgotten, and God was praiſed as the author of this happineſs.

Then were Conſtantine's proclamations ſent abroad to call home thoſe that were baniſhed out of their countries: thoſe which had been condemned to ſlavery were freed; their goods which had been confiſcated were reſtored: ſuch as for their conſtancy in religion had been diſcarded out of their military offices, were put into their places again, and ſuch as were condemned to the ſervility of feminine employments, he enfranchiſed from ſuch baſe ſubjection.

He made laws to redreſs the grievances of his ſubjects: enacted that the goods of thoſe which had ſuffered martyrdom ſhould be reſtored to their kindred, or if they had none, to the church: by his edicts ſent abroad to all nations in Greek and Latin, he acknowleged that God was the owner, and donor of all things, and that by his own ſtrength he had not obtained the victory, but by God's aſſiſtance to whom he aſcribed the glory.

He alſo enacted that the church lands and goods that had been injuriouſly taken away, though now belonging to his own crown, ſhould be reſtored: that ſuch as had purchaſed church lands, or goods, though they had grievouſly offended, yet out of his accuſtomated clemency he freely forgave them, provided that they made preſent reſtitution of the ſame: then he proceeded to confer great dignities on the Chriſtians, making them governors of provinces, and prohibited the heathens to ſacrifice to idols, or to erect their images: he commanded that churches ſhould be built and enlarged, and that the charge thereof ſhould be defrayed out of their own treaſury

Having made himſelf famous by his pious actions, a report was brought to him of a great faction which was growing up in the church, which beginning in the church of Alexandria, ſpread it ſelf through Egypt, Libya, and Thebes, and many other provinces and cities, the biſhops writing, and enveighing one againſt another: this fire was firſt kindled by Arius, which grieved Conſtantine as much as if himſelf had fallen into ſome great calamity, whereupon preſently he choſe one about him, who had

her ſpeech was this, 'I am at my father's diſpoſal; howbeit of myſelf I rather incline to death than life. 2. Whereas her affections were very ſtrong both to her loving huſband and children, inſomuch as it was conceived that the laſt farewel would go very near her, when ſhe ſhould part with ſo precious and dear friends; ſhe was ſo much taken up with the thoughts of Chriſt, that ſhe ſeemed not to ſtick at any ſuch relations. Nay, thirdly, She ſeemed wholly to forget her natural ſelf; for being entreated to favour her body and ſpeech, in regard of the lowneſs of her ſpirits, after ſome pauſe, ſhe brake forth into theſe words; 'Shall I, for this poor carcaſe, be wanting to my ſoul's comfort and my Saviour's praiſes? Let me have your prayers ſtill, and God his praiſes; yea, pray not only for, but with me.' Which being done, ſhe overflowed with comfort; and in that condition I left her: And that ſtream of comfort led her, not long after, where are rivers of joy for evermore.

Thus lived ſhe a moſt profitable life; thus died ſhe a moſt fruitful death. God ſo turned this his ſervant, that living, dying, and after death, ſhe ſhould be fruitful. Thus will God honour thoſe that honour him. To him be all honour to eternity. Amen."

Now it may be uſeful to make mention of her laſt ſickneſs, eſpecially eight weeks before her death.

From the very firſt of her laſt ſickneſs, her apprehenſion was that ſhe ſhould die ſhortly, and her longing deſire was to be diſſolved and to be with Chriſt. She often repeated thoſe words of Job, 'There the weary go to reſt;' and thoſe words in the cloſe of the Revelations, 'Come, Lord Jeſus, come quickly. Upon the approach of her death, whereof ſhe was very ſenſible, ſhe aſked her huſband, what promiſes of aſſurance were a firm ground for her to bottom upon? He named John x. 28. 'And I give unto them eternal life, and they ſhall never periſh; neither ſhall any man pluck them out of my hand.' Likewiſe he added, Rom. viii. 33. 34. 'Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Chriſt that died, yea, rather that is riſen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who alſo maketh interceſſion for us.' He added ver. 38. 39. 'For I am perſuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things preſent, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord.' Theſe, ſaid ſhe, are ſweet promiſes.

That morning ſhe died, ſhe deſired her huſband to read the ſeventeenth chapter of John, (which chapter that eminent and holy Scotchman, Mr Rollock, cauſed to be read to him when he was dying); after that was read, ſhe was ravished with great joy, and expreſſed herſelf accordingly. Her huſband and two other friends prayed with her. After the laſt prayer was ended, ſhe ſaid, 'My fleſh and my heart faileth:' her huſband anſwered, 'That God was the ſtrength of her heart, and her portion for ever.' He would never fail her. She returned an anſwer, which were the laſt words which ever ſhe ſpake to him, 'He will never fail me.' About an hour after ſhe reſigned up her ſpirit unto God who gave it; and her laſt words were, 'I have finiſhed my courſe.' She ſlept in Jeſus, December the 8th, 1654. To her, 'to live was Chriſt, and to die was gain.' She lived much deſired, and died much lamented. Her name is like precious ointment poured forth. She lived holily, and died comfortably, and now partakes of thoſe joys which 'eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, neither can enter into the heart of man to conceive,' even thoſe things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

Divers epitaphs were made at the death of this rare gentlewoman; I ſhall only inſert two, which were made by two reverend and learned doctors.

On the truly virtuous and religious Mrs Elizabeth Wilkinſon. To her Huſband.

SAy; ſhall I ſpeak, or hold my peace?
That ſeems more due; but this more eaſe:
Where, what to ſpeak, is hard to ſay;
For, ſhould I utter all I may,
'Twere endleſs: and to praiſe a friend
By halves, is but to diſcommend.
And would I ſpeak; to whom, and what?
To thoſe that knew, or knew her not?
Who knew her need it not; for they
Know more than I am like to ſay:
Who knew her not may think, that ſhe
Deſerv'd but what they hear from me:
And ſo, inſtead of ſetting forth
Her praiſe, I ſhall but wrong her worth.
He that adores with ſilent view,
Doth not detract from what is due;
But, all that while, his ſilence ſays,
He knows not how enough to praiſe.
So, might I chuſe, I would adore
Her ſpeaking worth, and ſay no more.
But, ſince I muſt, (for ſo you ſay)
Not hold my peace, I muſt obey;
Yet 'tis, I ſay, too hard a taſk,
To anſwer fully what you aſk,
To know what firſt I ſhould commend,
And harder, where to make an end.
Should I begin, where firſt appear
Her worths, I muſt begin with her.
Higher than ſo I need not go,
Tho' whence ſhe came be worthy too.
For, firſt: Her own deſerving merit
Claims more than others do inherit:
Nor, is it eaſy to expreſs
What age of hers was ſpent amiſs.
Her temper meek; her carriage ſuch;
Her language good, and not too much;
Her habit comely, more than brave;
Her converſation humbly grave.
What virtues deck'd a ſingle life,
Were doubled when ſhe was a wife.
How good a wife, I need not tell
To him who knew her worth ſo well;
Nor, what was her maternal care,
To whom her children were ſo dear.

Nor

Nor was her good confin'd to home,
But challenged a larger room,
To heal the ſick, the hungry feed,
And ſuccour thoſe that ſtood in need;
Good both to ſoul and body too,
Of thoſe with whom ſhe had to do;
To rich, to poor, to great and ſmall;
But in her cloſet beſt of all,
Which was her Chriſtian daily walk,
In doing that which others talk:
Forward to good, without conſtraint:
And, as ſhe liv'd, ſhe died a ſaint.
But this, to ſpeak at large, would crave
A volume, not an epitaph.
And, were it done, I might offend,
By ſhaming many left behind;
Tho' more there may be found, I fear,
That will commend, than follow her.
Some mind good words, more than good lives;
Some are good women, not good wives;
Some, neither this, nor that; and ſome
Abroad are better than at home:
Some hope to die like ſaints, although
'Tis too, too plain, they live not ſo.
'Tis rare, in all reſpects, to ſee
A wife, a woman, like to thee;
At home, abroad, in life, in death,
Like unto our Elizabeth. J. WALLIS, D. D.

CONSTANTIUS, the father of CONSTANTINE, was for his paleneſs ſirnamed Chlorus, a Roman by birth, whoſe father was a ſenator. He was made Cæſar by Maximianus, who together with Dioclesian reſigned the empire, choſe Conſtantius to ſucceed him, to whom the government of the weſt fell by lot. He was a man of ſingular clemency towards men, and piety towards God, not ſtaining his reign with the blood of the ſaints, as his predeceſſors had done: he little regarded his private profit, but ſought rather the enriching of his ſubjects, ſaying, That it was more behoofful for the common-wealth, that the wealth of the land ſhould be diſperſed in the hands of the commons, than locked up in the prince's coffers.

He was ſo averſe from all ſuperfluities, that upon feſtival days, and when he entertained ſtrangers, he was fain to borrow plate of his friends to furniſh his cup boards. This coming to Dioclesian's ear, he ſent ambaſſadors to him, reproaching him with poverty, becauſe his treaſury was empty: but Conſtantius intreating them to ſtay a while, ſummoned a parliament of his wealthieſt ſubjects, to whom he declared his need of money, telling them, that now was the time for them to expreſs their love to their lord and king; whereupon, without delay, they ſtrove to fill his exchequer with gold and ſilver; which being done, Conſtantius ſhewed it to the ambaſſadors, bidding them tell their maſter, that his treaſure which he had now collected was before in the hands of his ſubjects, who as ſo many treaſurers kept it for his uſe. The ambaſſadors wondered at it; but after their departure, the good emperor reſtored it again to the former owners, with many expreſſions of his royal favour towards them.

Alſo, to try his courtiers, he commanded all to ſacrifice to idols, pretending to diſcard all that refuſed ſo to do; but contrariwiſe, thoſe that obeyed he put from the court, ſaying, That they which are diſloyal to God, will never be true and truſty to their prince.

His firſt wife was Helena, by birth a Britain, the daughter of Coilus a Britiſh prince, on whom he begat Conſtantine the Great, in Britain.

Conſtantine in his youth was brought up, firſt with Dioclesian, whom he accompanied in his travels through Paleſtine; and afterwards was left as hoſtage with Galerius at Rome. He was of a comely ſtature, excelled others in ſtrength, very affable, and of a royal diſpoſition, his inward virtues being equal to his outward ſhape; for which he was envied by ſome, and feared and hated by the tyrants, who thereupon ſought opportunity to work his overthrow; which Conſtantine obſerving, (after God had twice or thrice diſcovered the conſpiracies that were plotted againſt him) he fled from Rome, having laid all the way with poſt-horſes for the purpoſe, which he left houghed, for fear of purſuit; and ſo he came with all ſpeed to York, where his father lay ſick, being lately returned from an expedition, which he had made againſt the Caledonians and Picts. Conſtantius much rejoiced when he ſaw him, and ſitting upright in his bed, in the preſence of his counſellors, he ſaid, 'It now ſufficeth, and death is not unwelcome, ſeeing I leave my unaccompliſhed actions to be performed by thee, my ſon,' &c. 'Govern the empire with upright juſtice; protect the innocent from the tyranny of oppreſſors, and wipe away all tears from the Chriſtians eyes, for therein, above all other things I have accounted myſelf moſt happy. To thee therefore I leave my diadem, and their defence, taking my faults with me to my grave, there to be buried in everlaſting oblivion; but leaving my virtues, if ever I had any, to revive and live in thee.' And ſo, taking his laſt farewel farewel of his ſon and friends, he ended his days in the year 306, and of his age fifty-ſix, having been Cæſar ſixteen years, and Auguſtus two years.

Immediately Conſtantine, by acclamation of the people, aſſiſtance of the ſoldiers, and advice of Erocus king of the Almains (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome), was proclaimed emperor, and ſucceſſor to that part of the world which his father held, which election was joyfully ratified by the ſenate at Rome, and gladly accepted by all other provinces, who accounted this iſland of all others moſt happy which firſt ſaw him Cæſar.

His firſt work was to proſecute the war begun by his father againſt the Caledonians and Picts, whom he ſubdued, together with the inhabitants of the weſtern iſlands. But the unruly Pretorian ſoldiers at Rome, hearing of the death of Conſtantius, proclaimed Maxentius, the ſon of Maximianus Herculius, emperor, who, by his necromancies, adulteries, perſecutions, and murders, grew ſo odious and intollerable to all, that the ſenate ſent to Conſtantine, craving his aid to redreſs theſe things. But, in the mean time, Maxentius was grown to that height of impiety and impurity, that he violently took away mens wives from them, and having violated their chaſtity, ſent them back to their husbands again. Amongſt the reſt, a Chriſtian matron, wife to a ſenator, underſtanding that the tyrants meſſengers were at the door to fetch her to him, ſhe deſired ſome time to dreſs herſelf; and ſo, going into her chamber, ſhe ran a ſword into her ſide, and fell down dead, leaving her body to the burial, rather than to ſatisfy the tyrants luſt. He alſo maſſacred and put his ſubjects to death upon every light occaſion. Many of the ſenators he ſlew for their wealth. He gave himſelf over to magical arts, ripping open the wombs of women great with child, ſearching the bowels of tender infants and other creatures. He, by conjurations, raiſed up devils to conſult with them about the iſſue of his wars.

Maximianus, his father, pretending a diſlike of theſe outragious courſes of his ſon, repaired to his ſon-in-law Conſtantine, who had married his daughter Fauſta, to complain of him to them; but whilſt he was with him, he ſecretly tampered with his daughter to make away her huſband; but the good Lady, knowing that her bond to her huſband was greater than to her father; ſhe revealed it to Conſtantine, who thereupon cauſed him to be put to death; and then commiſerating the lamentable condition of the Romans, he raiſed an army, and marched towards Rome againſt that tyrant Maxentius, and drawing Licinius, governour of Sclavonia, who was made Cæſar to his ſide, by giving him his ſiſter Conſtantia to wife, he haſted towards Rome with an army of ninety thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, levied out of Britain, France and Germany; but knowing well that ſucceſs in war depended more on divine aſſiſtance than human ſtrength; he conſidered unto what god he ſhould addreſs his prayers for ſucceſs, for as yet he was not fully ſettled in the Chriſtian faith, and conſidering, that his predeceſſors, who had worſhipped many gods, and put their truſt in them, had ſo often miſcarried, and that on the contrary, his father, that had only worſhipped one, and the true God, had a happy reign, and was ſtill preſerved from many dangers, he therefore reſolved to worſhip and adore that God only which his father had ſerved; wherefore he earneſtly prayed unto God, to reveal himſelf to him, and to proſper him in his journey. and whilſt he was thus praying, lifting up his eyes to Heaven about noon-day, he beheld the ſign of a croſs lively figured in the air, with this inſcription, In hoc vince, by this overcome; himſelf and all the army wondering at ſo ſtrange a prodigy, and being much troubled in his mind to know the meaning of it, the night following Chriſt appeared to him in his ſleep, commanding him to make the like figure and banner againſt his enemies; whereupon the next day, imparting the viſion to his friends, he ſent for the beſt goldſmiths and lapidaries, to make the like croſs with gold and precious ſtones, and withal reſolving to worſhip that God only, who had thus appeared to him, he ſent for godly miniſters to inſtruct him therein, who ſhewed him that Chriſt was the only begotten Son of God, of his coming into the world, his holy life, death, &c.

Afterwards with great courage, he went forwards bearing before him and his victorious army, inſtead of the Imperial Eagle, the form of this viſion embroidered upon his ſtandard; Maxentius, as much depending upon his ſorcerers, was no leſs confident of victory, for the furtherance whereof, he framed a deceitful bridge over Tyber, to entrap Conſtantine; and alſo ſent out divers armies to oppoſe him before he came near the city: but Conſtantine truſting only in God, overthrew at the firſt encounter, his firſt, ſecond, and third armies, and ſo marching thorough all Italy, he brought his victorious enſigns near the walls of Rome.

Hereupon Maxentius led forth his army above a mile from Rome, and joined battle with Conſtantine, but being overcharged by the vanguard of Conſtantine, he, with the reſt of his army fled, and either through haſte or forgetfulneſs, took over the deceitful bridge, which he made to entrap Conſtantine, but no ſooner were they entred upon it, but it fell in ſunder, whereby they were all drowned.

Conſtantine and his army remaining victorious ſang praiſes unto God for the ſame. The ſenators, nobles, and all the people of Rome, being freed from ſervitude, received him with rejoicing hearts and loud acclamations; men, women, children and ſervants called him their patron and preſerver. But his humble mind was not puffed up with their praiſes and applauſe, but aſcribing all to God, he gave thanks to him as the giver of victory: He erected for a trophy his own image, holding a banner with a croſs quartered in it. All the weſtern nations alſo having obtained liberty, kept feſtivals in honour of Conſtantine.

He publiſhed his royal edicts, whereby he reſtored to his ſubjects all thoſe lands which had been injuriouſly taken from them; calling ſome from baniſhment, and freeing others from captivity whom the tyrants had impriſoned; he gat godly miniſters about him, and although they went in poor and mean habits, not conſidering their outſide, but honouring the image of God in them, he ſet them at his own table, took them with him whither ſoever he went, that he might enjoy the benefit of their prayers. He repaired ſome churches, built others, and relieved many poor men with many bountiful donations and gifts; to thoſe that begged in the ſtreets, and at his gate, he gave money, meat and clothing; and to ſuch as by wrongs and oppreſſions were fallen into want, he gave penſions.

He was a father to the fatherleſs, an huſband to the widows; he married young maids that were orphans to honeſt wealthy men, and gave them portions, and was very gracious to all petitioners and diſtreſſed ſuitors. And perceiving, that there was much diſcord and various opinions in matters of religion, he called a ſynod of the clergy, where he was preſent himſelf; diſmiſſing his guard as ſuperfluous, whilſt he was environed with godly and learned men; he declared to them the controverted points, whereof they were to conſult, being very deſirous to ſettle the church in peace and unity; thoſe which were of a quiet and peaceable temper, he made much of and much diſliked thoſe which were otherwiſe; and God to requite the care of his houſe, made all the barbarous nations to proſtrate themſelves at his feet; he made him a conqueror and terrible to his enemies, who of his own nature was of a moſt gentle and gracious diſpoſition.

Yet ſome of the kindred of Maximianus, conſpired treaſon againſt him, but through the mercy of God, (who in a wonderful manner revealed all their conſpiracies to Conſtantine, by viſions and revelations) they were prevented. God alſo gave him much peace and ſafety, whereby he delighted himſelf in the love of his ſubjects, but chiefly to ſee the Church of God in a flouriſhing condition, and ſo continuing to the tenth year of his reign, he celebrated public and ſolemn feſtivals, wherein he offered up prayers and praiſes unto God.

But as his fame encreaſed in the minds of moſt, ſo was it much maligned by Lucinius, his fellow emperor, who fought an occaſion againſt Conſtantine, by raiſing a cruel perſecution in the eaſt againſt Chriſtians, whom he never favoured in his heart, though for a time he had ſuffered them in the exerciſe of their religion; and beſides he plotted plotted many treaſons againſt Conſtantine, to whom God revealed them, whereby they were prevented; then by feigned and crafty accuſations, he raiſed a perſecution againſt the godly miniſters, prohibiting them from meeting together in ſynods, to conſult about matters concerning their own and the churches good, and thereby ſeeking to break off and interrupt the harmonious agreement of the church, which could not be long preſerved without ſuch meetings, wherein great and weighty matters of controverſy were fairly debated and determined. Then he baniſhed all godly men out of the court, others he degraded from their dignity, and employed them in ſervile offices; he ſought to enrich himſelf by the ſpoils of others; he threatned with death others that profeſſed the name of Chriſt; he committed many adulteries, and held that no man could live chaſtily, without meaſuring others diſpoſitions by his own vicious inclination.

Then he made a law, that men and women ſhould not be preſent together at divine ſervice; that biſhops ſhould not expound the ſcripture to women, but that women ſhould chuſe women to be their inſtructers and preachers; then he commanded the congregations to meet together without the city gates in the open fields; ſuch ſoldiers, as would not ſacrifice to devils, he put out of their places and offices; he forbad any to relieve thoſe that lay in priſon and were almoſt famiſhed; yea, he made a law, that ſuch as did relieve them ſhould be impriſoned themſelves.

His avarice was inſatiable, taxing the lands of his ſubjects, whereby filling his treaſury with ſilver and gold, and yet complaining of his poverty. He unjuſtly baniſhed many and confiſcated their goods; he made his ſervants to abuſe the wives of noblemen, and then to accuſe them. Himſelf deflowred virgins, and fell to open proſecution of the church, eſpecially of the miniſters, the chiefeſt of whom he cauſed ſecretly to be murdered. Some churches he wholly demoliſhed, and cauſed others to be ſhut up, that the congregations might not meet in them; he invented new kinds of tortures for the Chriſtians; ſome he cauſed to be cut into ſmall pieces, and ſo be thrown into the ſea to feed fiſhes.

But the afflictions of the church coming to the ears of Conſtantine, who ſaw that he could not otherwiſe prevent them, this champion of God, preſently raiſed military forces, ſo that many troops of horſe and foot reſorted to him to follow his Chriſtian ſtandard againſt the tyrant, and by way of preparation, he betook himſelf to prayer, and choſe ſome godly miniſters to attend him; eſteeming them as his ſoul's guard. On the contrary, the tyrant hearing that Conſtantine had undertook, by God's aſſiſtance, to free the Chriſtians from his tyranny, and had got religious men about him, he derided him, and ſent for the Egyptian conjurers and magicians, and their prieſts to ſacrifice to his falſe gods, and to enquire the ſucceſs of his war, who all with one conſent promiſed, that he ſhould proſper and be victorious; and thus truſting to their promiſes, he marched forward and prepared to join battle.

The two armies meet in Hungary, and a little before the battle, Licinius calling his friends and favourites unto a grove where were many idols, having lighted up waxen tapers, and made his uſual ſacrifices to them, he ſaid, 'My friends, theſe are our country Gods, which we from our anceſtors do religiouſly worſhip. Our enemy violating the antient cuſtoms, and blinded with error, worſhips a ſtrange God, which wickedly he conceiveth to be the true God, under whoſe colours he intends to fight, and beareth his ſtandard before his army. In confidence of whoſe aſſiſtance he warreth againſt us and our gods, whom he hath traiterouſly forſaken, and relinquiſhed the worſhip of them. Now it will appear whether of us is in an error: for if we have the victory, we ſhall know that our gods preſerve and aſſiſt us: if Conſtantine's ſtrange God ſhall give him the victory over us, who are many more than they, we ſhall thereby know which God ought to be reverenced. &c. And having ended his oration, he commanded his ſoldiers ſtraight to give battle to the enemy.

About this very time, in ſome of theſe cities which were ſubject to Licinius, the citizens thought that they ſaw troops and bands of men of Conſtantine's army marching at noon day through the city, as if they had gotten the victory, Conſtantine having made his prayers to God, joined battle with Licinius, and gave him a great overthrow: many of his enemies caſt away their weapons, and falling down at his feet, craved mercy, which he willingly granted them.

Licinius forſaken of all his forces, and finding by experience, that the confidence which he placed in his falſe gods was fruitleſs, fled away, and Conſtantine forbad his ſoldiers to purſue him, hoping that the ſenſe of his preſent calamity would make him leave off his wicked courſes, and convert him to a milder temper: but he eſcaping into Aſia the leſs, conſults again with conjurers, is confident of ſucceſs promiſed by them, raiſeth another army, which Conſtantine being informed of, devoted himſelf for a time to prayer, and having erected a tabernacle diſtant from his tents, he gave himſelf to godly meditations and prayer, ſome other faithful and religious men accompanying him in theſe religious exerciſes; and ſo marching againſt his enemies, they came to a ſecond battle, where he ſlew many, got the victory, and carried away many trophies: yet he commanded his ſoldiers to ſhew mercy to the captives, and to expreſs humanity towards them, yea himſelf payed their ranſom, whereby they were delivered.

Licinius being taken priſoner, by the mediation of his wife Conſtantia, had his life ſpared, and was confined to the city of Nicomedia: but he after a while practiſing new treaſons, was at laſt by command of Conſtantine put to death: whereupon the peace of God's ſaints manifeſtly appeared, and the goſpel of Chriſt had a free progreſs.

For no ſooner was the blaſting tempeſt of perſecution blown over, but the faithful chriſtians, who before had hidden themſelves in woods and deſerts, and ſecret caves, came forth, re-edified the churches, celebrated feſtival days to God with pure hearts, and faith unfeigned: and now the whole Roman empire enjoying peace, religion ſpread abroad her bright beams to illuminate thoſe which ſat in darkneſs and the ſhadow of death: former miſeries were forgotten, and God was praiſed as the author of this happineſs.

Then were Conſtantine's proclamations ſent abroad to call home thoſe that were baniſhed out of their countries: thoſe which had been condemned to ſlavery were freed; their goods which had been confiſcated were reſtored: ſuch as for their conſtancy in religion had been diſcarded out of their military offices, were put into their places again, and ſuch as were condemned to the ſervility of feminine employments, he enfranchiſed from ſuch baſe ſubjection.

He made laws to redreſs the grievances of his ſubjects: enacted that the goods of thoſe which had ſuffered martyrdom ſhould be reſtored to their kindred, or if they had none, to the church: by his edicts ſent abroad to all nations in Greek and Latin, he acknowleged that God was the owner, and donor of all things, and that by his own ſtrength he had not obtained the victory, but by God's aſſiſtance to whom he aſcribed the glory.

He alſo enacted that the church lands and goods that had been injuriouſly taken away, though now belonging to his own crown, ſhould be reſtored: that ſuch as had purchaſed church lands, or goods, though they had grievouſly offended, yet out of his accuſtomated clemency he freely forgave them, provided that they made preſent reſtitution of the ſame: then he proceeded to confer great dignities on the Chriſtians, making them governors of provinces, and prohibited the heathens to ſacrifice to idols, or to erect their images: he commanded that churches ſhould be built and enlarged, and that the charge thereof ſhould be defrayed out of their own treaſury

Having made himſelf famous by his pious actions, a report was brought to him of a great faction which was growing up in the church, which beginning in the church of Alexandria, ſpread it ſelf through Egypt, Libya, and Thebes, and many other provinces and cities, the biſhops writing, and enveighing one againſt another: this fire was firſt kindled by Arius, which grieved Conſtantine as much as if himſelf had fallen into ſome great calamity, whereupon preſently he choſe one about him, who had been a zealous and faithful confeſſor of the truth in times of perſecution, whom he ſent to Alexandria to draw them to peace and concord, writing his letters to the authors of ſedition to this purpoſe, that, whereas all his deſigns and endeavours had tended to bring all nations to agree in one opinion in matters of religion, the rather that the heathen by ſuch an example might the ſooner be converted; and whereas ſome raſh, and ſeditious ſpirits, had by their errors made a ſchiſm in the church of Afric, he had ſent ſober and religious miniſters to reconcile their factious ſpirits, and ſettle peace in the church; but hearing that new factious ſeditions were ſprung up amongſt them, he was much grieved at it, and now wrote to them, proffering himſelf to arbitrate and moderate their mutual diſſentions, not doubting, through the help of God, and aſſiſtance of godly and learned men, to reconcile their differences, and ſettle peace amongſt them again.

And ſaith he, 'Whereas I was at Nicomedia purpoſing a journey into the eaſt, the receipt of your letters diverted my intentions, being unwilling to behold that, which I was grieved to hear of, viz. your contentions, therefore by your concord and agreement open me a paſſage into the eaſt, where your diſſentions have ſhut me out, and let me ſee a joyful agreement amongſt you, that all of us being reconciled together may praiſe and glorify God.

The meſſenger did not only deliver the letter, but dealt very earneſtly with them for the ſettling of peace, yet he could not bring it to paſs, the faction being grown ſo ſtrong, that it was ſpread all over the eaſtern provinces, the devil envying the happineſs of the church, cauſed this diſcord and contention ſtill to continue; the firſt original of it was this.

Arius a preſbyter in the city of Alexandria, a man which outwardly made a great ſhew of holineſs, denied the eternity of the Son of God with the Father alledging that he was not of the ſame ſubſtance with him; at the ſame time Alexander a man of great holineſs and learning was biſhop in that city, who being of a gentle and mild condition, endeavoured to have cured Arius of that hereſy, praying and admoniſhing him to leave his errors; but he being of a proud and inſolent nature, perſiſted therein, and ſo drew many followers after him, hereupon Alexander proceeded to excommunicate him, which prevailing no thing, Alexander acquainted the emperor with it, ſaying that the miſchief was grown ſo great that it required a great and ſpeedy remedy.

Conſtantine underſtanding that theſe diviſions increaſed in Egypt, and amongſt the Thebans, in ſo much as the people grew tumultuous, killing and murdering one another, and committing many other outrages: and another diviſion ſprang up alſo at the ſame time concerning the celebration of Eaſter. Hereupon he called a general council in the city of Nicea in the province of Bythinia in Aſia, and having ſent abroad his writs into every province, the biſhops and miniſters repaired cheerfully to that place, ſome hoping that an univerſal peace would be eſtabliſhed, others deſiring to ſee this godly emperor.

Here were congregated out of Aſia, Africa and Europe three hundred and eighteen biſhops, beſides preſbyters and deacons, whereof ſome were famous for their doctrine; ſome for their gravity and conſtancy; ſome for their experience and age; ſome for their acuteneſs and ingenuity; and all had their diet allowed them by the emperor; who himſelf in perſon was preſent amongſt them.

Upon the day appointed to begin the council, they all aſſembled in the hall of the emperor's palace, where ſeats being ſet on both ſides, they took their places according to their degree and dignity: then came the emperor with an humble countenance, and modeſt aſpect, whereupon they all roſe up; at the upper end of the hall he ſtood a while, and would not ſit down, till he had given a ſign to the biſhops to ſit down alſo; then one of the chiefeſt among them made a brief ſpeech to the emperor, and recited a hymn of thankſgiving unto God: whereupon the emperor ſpoke to this purpoſe;

'It was my deſire, dear friends, to convocate you in a general council, and ſeeing you now aſſembled, I give God thanks for it; let not therefore any private envy deprive us of that good which we expect by this meeting: And God having made us victorious over the tyrants, let not the devil's tares of diſſention ſpring up, to the diſturbance of the peace of the church, for theſe are of worſe conſequence than war; for that kills the body, the other deſtroys the ſoul. I rejoice to ſee you here together, but ſhall much more rejoice to ſee unity in affection, and concord amongſt you, which, being devoted to God's ſervice, you ought to deſire, and to encourage others, by your example, to embrace peace and concord. I entreat you therefore, beloved miniſters of God, and ſervants of Chriſt, take away the cauſes of diſſention, cut off this Hydra's head of hereſy, and eſtabliſh peace, ſo ſhall you pleaſe God, and me your fellow ſervant in the Lord.'

But amongſt ſo many biſhops, though many were good and holy men, yet others were full of envy and contention; whereupon they accuſed one another to the emperor, exhibiting their complaints to him in writing; but he calling them before him, burnt their informations, that none ſhould ſee them, and ſaid unto them; 'Fathers, and miniſters, God hath called you to the miniſtry, and thereby hath given you power, in an orderly way, to judge me, but you cannot be judged by me, wherefore I refer your controverſies to the judgment of God and the council. Wherefore, ſetting apart all malice and diſcord, for God's ſake, apply yourſelves to peace, and to the forgetting of all theſe private injuries.'

In the council alſo he perſuaded ſome, pacified others, praiſed others, and endeavoured to bring them all to concord and agreement; and ſo at length, by God's bleſſing, he brought moſt of them to unity in opinion in all points of controverſy, that they did not only agree in matters of faith, but alſo of one certain time for the celebration of Eaſter; to which decrees they all ſet their hands, and they were ingroſſed as the determinate acts of the counſel. Arius and his wicked ſect were condemned by all the biſhops, except ſeventeen, which held with him, whereof eleven afterwards recanted; and Arius, with the other ſix, were excommunicate, and baniſhed by the emperor: and ſo was the holy and Chriſtian council diſſolved.

After which the good emperor affirmed, That he had gained a ſecond victory againſt the enemy of the church: having now reigned twenty years, he made a great feaſt, to the honour and glory of God, and invited the biſhops thereunto, and ſome of them he placed at his own table, the reſt at tables on either hand him.

The feaſt being ended, he gave gifts and preſents to all the biſhops; and by his letters divulged and confirmed the council acts, and by his decrees enjoined ſubmiſſion to the ſame.

When he diſmiſſed the biſhops, he made a ſpeech to them, admoniſhing them to preſerve peace, to avoid contention, not to envy one another for gifts or wiſdom, but to eſteem their abilities as a common good.

His next care was to demoliſh and pull down idolatrous temples and images, as the grove and temple of Venus in Phœnicia, which was a ſchool of wickedneſs to thoſe who were addicted to luſt, where men and women frequently committed adulteries, fornications, &c. Conſtantine thinking it unfit that the ſun ſhould behold ſuch villainy, ſent a band of ſoldiers to ſuppreſs it; as alſo the temple of Æſculapius, and the image of Venus at Heliopolis, and many ſuch like in other places.

But the devil envying the proſperity of the church, raiſed a new ſedition in Antioch, where the whole city was divided into two factions about the choice of a biſhop, and were ſo mad againſt each other, that had not Conſtantine interpoſed, they had deſtroyed one another; to them therefore he ſent ambaſſadors to pacify their fury, adviſing them, by letters, to preſerve peace, and approve themſelves dutiful ſubjects, perſuading them to refer their cauſe to him, and that they ſhould not ſeek the biſhop of another church, but ſhould chuſe him for their biſhop, whom God of his providence had appointed them. The biſhop whom they deſired was Euſebius, biſhop of Cæſaria, but the emperor wrote one letter to them to diſſuade them from that choice, and another to Euſebius, to commend him for refuſing of it.

To end this controverſy, a ſynod was called, and Conſtantine wrote to them to do all things according to the preſcript of God's word, commending ſome to them whom he judged fit for the place.

He

He endeavoured to extirpate and root out all hereſies, writing to the Valentinians, Marcioniſts, Cataphrigians, &c. that their doctrine was falſe and ſeditious, that they were enemies to truth and eternal life; and therefore, that he would not ſuffer that contagion to ſpread further, ſeeing the whole and ſound were daily infected with their peſtilent errors, but would ſeverely puniſh the offenders and delinquents. Then he enacted, That none of them ſhould meet together in conventicles: That the churches where they uſed to meet ſhould be demoliſhed, and confiſted to the catholic church, and other places of their meeting converted to the uſe of the common-wealth; commanding, that from that day they ſhould have no places of meeting, neither public nor private. Hereby many being brought to a ſight of their errors, publicly manifeſted their repentance, and ſo were again received into the church.

He was eminent for juſtice, neither denying nor delaying any juſt and reaſonable petitions. He remitted to the owners of the land the fourth part of ſuch rents as were formerly paid him. He mitigated the heavy tributes; and being unwilling that ſuch as were caſt in ſuits of law ſhould be utterly undone, he freely beſtowed on them both land and money. He thought it unfit, that any one admitted into the preſence of his imperial majeſty ſhould go haſtily out of his preſence.

And as his care was to advance God's glory, God alſo highly advanced him, by making him victorious over the Scythians and Sauromatians.

Ambaſſadors came to him from all nations, preſenting him with precious gifts, and offering him from their kings, if he pleaſed, to ſerve him in all his wars. He returned gifts to the ambaſſadors, and dignified the deſerving with Roman honours, ſo that ſome of them embraced Roman civility, and never returned into their own countries again.

The king of Perſia ſending ambaſſadors with rich preſents to him, deſiring to renew their league: he returned them with far richer gifts; and underſtanding that many Chriſtians ſuffered perſecution under him, he wrote effectually to him in their behalf, deſiring him to receive them into his protection; for, ſaid he, 'by dealing graciouſly with them, you ſhall do me and yourſelf a great benefit.

He knowing how effectual the prayer of faith was, did not only frequently proſtrate himſelf before God in private, but commanded and deſired the public prayers of the church alſo in his behalf. He made his court a church where prayers were made, and the ſcriptures were read and expounded daily. He made laws for the ſtrict obſervation of the Lord's day, commanding, that through all the Roman empire all work and labour ſhould be forborn. He preſcribed a form of prayer to the legions of ſoldiers, to be uſed both on the Sabbaths and other days. He prohibited the adoration of images; as alſo the ſingle combat of ſword players, who ſlew one another to make the people paſtime.

And whereas the Egyptians worſhipped the river Nilus, with many ſuperſtitious ceremonies, thinking that otherwiſe the river would not overflow, he forbad it upon pain of death, and that wicked cuſtom being put down, the river overflowed the country, and made it more fruitful than formerly.

And whereas certain unjuſt laws were made againſt thoſe that were childleſs, he aboliſhed them, and enacted that their inheritance ſhould deſcend to thoſe that were next of kin to them.

He ordained that the determination of ſynods ſhould be a binding rule for deciding of eccleſiaſtical controverſies. He endowed and much enriched the churches of God. Meeting with a covetous man, he ſaid, O good man, when will thy thirſt of covetouſneſs be ſatisfied?' And having drawn forth with his ſpear the meaſure of a man's ſtature upon the ground, he ſaid, 'If thou hadſt at home all the wealth and treaſure of the world, yet muſt thou leave it, and poſſeſs no more than this figure on the earth, if thou obtaineſt that.

But whilſt he took pleaſure in meekneſs, and mercy, ſaving offenders, he made his government to be derided and contemned by ſome wicked perſons. He ſent to Euſebius to get him fifty Bibles fairly written on parchment for the city of Conſtantinople, appointing the governour of the province to provide him with all things neceſſary for the charge thereof.

Gaza, formerly a mart town in Paleſtine, receiving the faith, he much rejoiced at it, and made it a city, which he named Conſtantia. In many other cities he cauſed idols to be taken away, and churches to be erected.

But whilſt he was thus buſy for the church's good, the devil ſtirred up new factions and diviſions in Egypt, whereupon he aſſembled a ſynod, commanding them ſpeedily to determine and end theſe controverſies: he ſent his delegate to it with authority, that if any condemned his command, in not coming to it, he ſhould baniſh him. On a time, a flattering preſbyter telling him, That he was a bleſſed man, and worthy to be emperor over the whole world, and to reign with the Son of God in eternal glory; he manifeſted his diſlike, commanded him that he ſhould not dare hereafter to uſe any ſuch ſpeeches; but rather pray earneſtly for him, that he might live and die God's faithful ſervant.

About this time came ambaſſadors to him from the Eaſt Indies, bringing him all kind of precious ſtones and pearls, and ſtrange living creatures, declaring that their princes did acknowlege him the king and emperor of the world.

He had three ſons, Conſtantine, Conſtantius, and Conſtance; theſe he made Cæſars whilſt he lived, and inſtructed them in thoſe arts which do adorn imperial majeſty: he appointed them a counſel for the diſpatch of public affairs: he adviſed them to prefer the knowlege and worſhip of God before wealth and kingdoms: he placed religious officers about them; and amongſt theſe three ſons he divided his empire when he died.

Hearing that the eaſtern barbarians roſe againſt him in his old age, he raiſed an army, and took ſome biſhops along with him to pray for ſucceſs, and ſo marched againſt them; but they hearing of it, ſent ambaſſadors to crave pardon, and promiſe obedience; and he being always deſirous of peace, entertained them courteouſly, and granted their requeſts.

Falling into ſome diſtemper, he reſolved to go to the warm baths, but fell ſick at Hellenopolis; and finding his end to approach, he humbly confeſſed his ſins to God; and (as Euſebius ſaith) was there baptized, but moſt probably he was long before baptized at Rome; and ſo quietly reſigned up his ſpirit unto God, in the thirty-third year of his reign, and of his age ſixty-ſix, in the year 342.

Till his laſt ſickneſs his body continued ſtrong and luſty, not troubled with any diſeaſe, pain, or infirmity: he was of a comely preſence and aſpect, and was ſtout and hardy to endure exerciſe, riding, travel, and wars: he made and penned holy prayers to his dying day.

He removed the imperial ſeat from Rome to Byzantium in Thracia, which he adorned with ſtately edifices and privileges above other cities; he enriched and adorned it with the ſpoils of Rome, as ſtatues, pillars, coloſſes, and all other things that were ſingular and excellent, either of ſtone or metal; the like he did from other cities alſo: he built in it a ſtately palace, a moſt magnificent church, wherein he erected his own tomb, a famous library, wherein he put an hundred and twenty thouſand of the chiefeſt written books, and in the midſt thereof was admirably written, in letters of gold, Homer's Illiad. His death was much bewailed amongſt all ſorts of perſons; his guard and officers tore their garments, caſt themſelves on the ground, beat their heads againſt the pavement, crying out that they had loſt a gracious lord, &c. The centurions and captains bewailed the loſs of their general; the ſoldiers of their ſhepherd: the people ran about the city with weeping and lamentation. When the ſenate and citizens of Rome heard of it, they ſhut up their baths, prohibited all public places and recreations, lamenting and mourning exceſſively.

He uſed to ſhew much reverence and attention to the word of God preached, ſo that many times he would ſtand up all the ſermon time; and when ſome of his courtiers told him, that it would tend to his diſparagement, he anſwered, That it was in the ſervice of the great God, who is no reſpecter of perſons. He uſed to kiſs the hollow of old Paphnutius's eye, which he had loſt for the cauſe of Chriſt in the former perſecutions.

The days of this godly emperor's reign were the breathing days of the perſecuted church: and in his time the goſpel was propagated into East India by Frumentius and Edeſius. As alſo into Iberia, in the uttermoſt part of the Euxine ſea, by the means of a captive Chriſtian woman, by whoſe prayers a child that was mortally ſick recovered health; and the lady of Iberia herſelf was delivered from a mortal diſeaſe: whereupon the king her huſband ſent ambaſſadors to Conſtantine, entreating him to ſend him ſome preachers into Iberia, to inſtruct them in the true faith of Chriſt; which Conſtantine performed with a glad heart.

He uſed to ſay, That an emperor ſhould not refuſe labour for the benefit of the common-wealth; as alſo, That an empire is given by the determinate purpoſe of God; that he to whom it is given ſhould ſo employ his diligence, that he may be thought worthy of the ſame by him that gave it.

He made and publiſhed a decree, That all miniſters, and ſuch whoſe vocation was to ſerve in the church, ſhould be free, and exempted from all public duties, taxes, and burdens whatſoever, that being ſo privileged, they might with more cheerfulneſs attend upon divine adminiſtrations. Yea, ſo careful was he to nouriſh and cheriſh learning, and learned men, that he enacted a law which ran in this form, "Medicos, grammaticos, et alios profeſſores literarum, "et doctores legum cum uxoribus, et liberis." We will and decree, That phyſicians, grammarians, and other profeſſors of the liberal arts, and doctors of the law, with their wives and children, ſhall be free, together with their lands and poſſeſſions, from all civil charges and offices, &c. As alſo, That their ſtipends and ſalaries ſhall be well and truly paid them, whereby they may more freely attend upon their offices, &c.

So ſtudious he was of peace, that when any biſhops or miniſters brought complaints one againſt another, he would take their bills of complaint, and burn them before their faces; and withal, ſo tender he was of their honour, that he uſed to ſay, That if he ſaw a biſhop committing wickedneſs, he would rather caſt the ſkirt of his gown over him to cover it, than by ſpeaking of it to diſhonour his holy calling.

The Life of JOVIANUS the Emperor, who died Anno Chriſti 363.

JULIAN the Apoſtate having led the Roman army into Perſia, in the winter time, in a battle againſt the Perſians, was wounded with an arrow from an unknown hand, with which wound loſing his ſenſes, he fell upon his horſe neck, and by his ſoldiers was carried into his tent, where, after means uſed, coming to himſelf again, and recovering ſtrength, he called for his horſe and arms, that he might return again into the battle; but afterwards feeling his force to fail, in extreme pride, he took his blood in his hands, and holding it up to heaven, he uſed theſe words againſt our Saviour Chriſt, 'It ſufficeth that thou Chriſt the Galilean haſt overcome me;' for ſo he was accuſtomed to call Chriſt in ſcorn.

By his death there was ſo great a confuſion in the camp, that they were in danger to be overthrown by the Perſians, and beſides they were in much diſtreſs for want of victuals; the Perſians alſo underſtanding theſe things, never ceaſed to moleſt them with ſudden aſſaults and alarms; whereupon the chief commanders of the army aſſembled together to chuſe an emperor to govern them, and after much contention and diverſity of opinions, they all conſented to chuſe JOVIANUS Emperor. He was the ſon of Varronianus, a noble Hungarian, who leaving the wars to avoid tumults and troubles, retired himſelf to his poſſeſſions in Hungary, there to live in reſt and quiet; but Jovianus, his ſon, went to the emperor Conſtantius's court, followed the wars, was valiant, and of a goodly perſonage, and therefore much eſteemed by Julian, who made him the chief commander of his ordinary troops.

Jovianus was of an excellent wit, ſound judgment, given to ſtudy, well learned, and withal a faithful Chriſtian, inſomuch, as when Julian commanded that no Chriſtian ſhould be a captain, neither ſhould have any charge or office in the wars, Jovianus pleaſantly ſaid, that he made greater account of the faith whereof he made profeſſion, than of any dignity of honour that he enjoyed; and ſo he gave up his charge, chuſing rather to throw away his military belt, the enſign of his honour, than to do ſacrifice, or ſatisfy the wicked edict of the emperor. Yet afterwards Julian, when the neceſſities of the Perſian wars conſtrained him, re-aſſumed him into the number of his captains.

This Jovianus being choſen emperor, conſidering that Julian had drawn the men of war of his army to commit idolatry, and to ſacrifice to devils, he, in a public oration which he made to them, ſaid, That although he might, yet he would not, being a Chriſtian, be an emperor of infidels; and ſo he reſiſted, and abſolutely refuſed the empire. But all the army was ſo well pleaſed with the election, that they cried out aloud, ſaying, We are all Chriſtians; and, for his ſake, they that were not ſo reſolved to become Chriſtians, upon condition that he would accept the empire; which he then conſented to. They all, with incredible joy and gladneſs, ſware obedience unto him, and gave him the emperial enſigns: whereupon he preſently ordered and re-inforced the army. But Sapor king of Perſia gathering together the greateſt forces that he could make, did ſo moleſt and environ them, that they were glad to come to an agreement with him, though ſomewhat to the diſhonour of the Romans; but it was the beſt end that he could make in thoſe ſtraits whereinto Julian by his pride had brought the army.

Then he marched into Soria, the Chriſtians every where wonderfully rejoicing at his election. And his firſt work was, by proclamation, to call home all thoſe biſhops which were exiled for oppoſing the Arian hereſy, or any other unlawful occaſion, whom he reſtored to their former places, and principally the great Athanaſius. He alſo revoked and made void all the prohibitions and decrees made by Julian againſt the Chriſtians, and ordained that they ſhould be admitted to offices, dignities, magiſtracy, and ſtudy, as in the days of Conſtantine the Great. He cauſed to be paid to the churches thoſe rents of corn, and other things that Conſtantine had given them, and which, by the command of Julian, had been ſequeſtered. Then he cauſed the idol groves and temples to be ſhut up, and the Pagans wandered about hiding themſelves here and there.

The bloody and deteſtable ſacrifices uſed in Julian's time, he wholly took away.

The biſhops of all ſects and opinions poſted unto him, hoping every one of them to find him according to their own minds; but he adhering to the Nicene creed, made them flat anſwer what his judgment and faith was, and whom he would countenance. Then the Macedonians exhibited to him a ſupplication, requeſting that they which held a diſſimilitude and unlikeneſs between the Father and the Son ſhould be baniſhed the church, and themſelves ſubſtituted in their rooms; but he ſent them away with theſe words, 'I tell you truly, I cannot away with contention; but ſuch as embrace unity and concord, I both honour and embrace them.'

When the emperor had thus appeaſed the contentions of ſeditious perſons, he went from Antioch to Tarſus, where he buried the corpſe of his predeceſſor; and immediately after he was proclaimed conſul, and ſo from thence he went to Conſtantinople.

He laid a godly foundation to his empire, by eſtabliſhing the Chriſtian faith, giving in all things good ſigns of a juſt and virtuous prince, every man conceiving much hope of him. But this, and all his noble reſolutions, and other Chriſtian-like purpoſes, were interrupted by his immature death, the iniquity of the people not deſerving ſo good a prince, which happened thus: He coming to a place called Dadaſtana, in the confines of Bithynia, the weather being very cold, they ſet in his chamber where he lay, a great pan with kindled char-coals, which coals were wet, and as his attendants were gone to take their reſt, his chamber-door being locked, and he aſleep, the vapour of the fire waxing groſs and thick, and filling the chamber with ſmoke, which had no place to evaporate, ſtopped stopped the emperor's breath, so that in the morning he was found dead in his bed; in the eighth month of his reign, and of age about forty, anno Christ 363. His loss was much bewailed of all good men. He used to wish, that 'he might govern wise men, and that wise men might govern him.' He restored the Christian faith in every part of his empire; strictly commanding all the idol temples to be shut up, which his predecessor Julian had opened, and upon great penalties forbad all manner of Gentilitious sacrifices; he called home from banishment, that worthy Captain Valentinian whom Julian had banished; he resolved to follow the advice and counsel of Athanasius, in matters of faith and church-government.

For his personage, he was of a goodly presence, both tall and big; his gesture grave, his eyes gray and countenance pleasant; an affectionate lover and professor he was of the Christian religion; of indifferent learning himself, but a most honourable embracer thereof in others; very prudent and considerate in chusing of judges and magistrates, and very facile and familiar to his servitors about him.

The Life of Theodosius senior, who died Anno Christi, 397.

Gratian governing the empire with Valentinian the younger, finding that the Roman empire daily decreased, and that the Barbarians waxed strong and encreased daily, he found that the common-wealth stood in great need of a valiant and worthy man to govern it; and knew that there lived at that time in Spain, one Theodosius, the son of a noble captain, whose name was Theodosius also, whom Valens had caused to be slain, because his name was Th. and the devil had revealed to him, that after him should reign one whose name began with those letters; this Theodosius perceiving, that he also was in great danger upon the same reason, he retired himself into his own country, being as well for the nobility of his ancestors, as for his own valour and exploits in arms, the most renowned and of greatest account of any man in his time. Hereupon Gratian sent for him, made him captain-general of the empire, and shortly after his fellow-emperor.

Theodosius having received the Emperors letters, and accepting of the charge, with the greatest speed that could be, he went into those countries where the Goths were, who knowing of his coming, gathered themselves together to fight with him. Theodosius being very desirous thereof, levied a sufficient army, and having tried his soldiers in some skirmishes, he gave them battle, which was one of the cruelest and most bloody that ever was. But holy Theodosius carried himself so discreetly, and valiantly in directing, encouraging and fighting, that through God's mercy he obtained the victory, and made an incredible slaughter of the enemies; and ceased not till he had wholly driven them out of the province; and then marching with his army in good order to Gratian, he made him Emperor of Constantinople and the east.

Presently he went thitherward, and coming to Thessalonica, he fell sick of a dangerous disease, and much desiring to be baptized, he sent for the old bishop of that place; and when he was come, he demanded of the bishop of what faith he was? The bishop answered, that the opinion of Arius prevailed not in these parts, and that the new-found invention of his pestilent brain, had not crept in amongst them, but that all Christians in those parts, retained the authentic and ancient faith delivered by the apostles, and confirmed by the council of Nice; and thereupon the emperor was willingly baptized of him.

Not long after he recovered his health, and so went to Constantinople. A little before whose coming, Gregory Nazianzen was translated by the consent of all the catholic bishops to govern the See at Constantinople; but perceiving, that some murmured and objected, that he was a stranger and foreigner, though he was glad of the emperor's coming, yet he refused to continue any longer at Constantinople. Theodosius finding the church there out of order, endeavoured by all means to reduce it to peace and unity; wherefore immediately he gave Demophilus, the Arian bishop, to understand his pleasure, demanding, whether he would embarce the Nicene Creed, set the people at unity, and embrace concord himself; which he refusing, the emperor said to him, 'If thou refuse to embrace peace and unity, I command thee to avoid the church, and accordingly he, with many more of his adherents departed, leaving their churches to the orthodox.

Presently after the emperor summoned a council of one hundred and fifty orthodox bishops; he cited also the bishops of the Macedonian sect, hoping thereby to reclaim them; of which there appeared thirty-six, most of them out of Hellespont; there the emperor and the other godly bishops, used all the means possible to reconcile them to the catholic church; but neither admonition nor reprehension would prevail with them, and so they departed, professing, that they would rather join with the Arians than with them; then the council proceeded to the election of a bishop for Constantinople, and chose one Nectarius, a man of a holy life and godly conversation; they decreed, that a provincial synod should determine provincial affairs; the emperor confirmed their canons, and so the council was dissolved.

But though the Arians were banished the churches, yet the schism and tumults ceased not, whereupon the godly emperor aiming at peace, summoned another council, charging that men of all sects and opinions should meet there together, hoping that by conference and communication amongst themselves, they would at length be brought to establish one faith and opinion: and when they were all come together, the emperor sent for Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, reasoning with him how he might rid the Christian religion of that discord and dissention, and reduce the church of Christ to unity and concord; he said also, that the controversies and quarrels that molested the quiet state of the church, and rent asunder the members of Christ, were to be sifted out, and the punishment to light upon them that were found to be the authors of schism, and disturbers of peace. Nectarius leaving him for the present, went to Agelius the Novatian bishop, who embraced the faith of one substance, and opened to him the mind of the emperor. He, altho' he was otherwise a man of rare parts, yet was no body in controversies, but appointed Sisinius, a minister of his church, to reason with them in his stead: Sisinius being a well experienced man, knew that disputations would not only not reconcile schisms, but rather exasperate mens spirits, and inflame contentions, therefore he advised Nectarius after this sort; That instead of disputation, the emperor should demand of the ring-leaders of the heretics, whether they esteemed the ancient fathers that lived before this schism sprang up, or whether they condemned them? If they own them, saith he, out of their writings we can confirm the truth, and confute these men. If they reject them, all men will cry out upon them. Nectarius liking this advice, reported it presently to the emperor, who approving of it also, he presently demanded of all the heretics, Whether they esteemed and allowed the fathers, which governed the church before them, and would be tried by their testimonies touching the true and right faith? They hearing this, knew not what answer to make, and so were divided amongst themselves; whilst some would assent to the emperor, others dissented; yea, they that were of one opinion, were divided amongst themselves. The emperor perceiving that they relied not upon the antient fathers exposition of the faith, but upon their own wit and quirks of logic, he bad every sect to lay down their faith and opinion in writing, which accordingly they did, and brought them to the emperor. The emperor received them courteously, and then retired into his closet, fell down upon his knees before God, humbly beseeching him to reveal the truth unto him, and to assist him in finding of it out; then perusing every ones opinion, and seriously weighing of it in the balance of the sanctuary, he condemned and tore in pieces all those creeds that derogated from the unity that is in the blessed Trinity, allowing and highly commending the other. The sectarian bishops, because there reigned amongst them mutual discords and dissention, were set at nought even of their own people and party.

Thus, as Theodosius was careful to build God's house, the Lord built him an house, and prospered him in all his enterprizes; for, about this time, the Alanes and Huns (people of Scythia) entered again into Hungary, against whom the emperor went with his army. He fought many cruel battles with them, and in them all had the upper hand, slaying an infinite number of them, and driving the rest out of the confines of the empire; insomuch as Athanaricus, king of the Goths, offered himself and his people to do him service, and Theodosius not being willing to over-tire his men of war, granted him peace; and so taking Athanaricus with him, he returned victoriously to his city of Constantinople, where Athanaricus beholding the power of the emperor, the solemnity and greatness of his court, the riches, furniture, and order of his house, and service, he said, That truly the Roman emperor was God on the earth, and represented the God of heaven, against whom none ought to be so hardy as to lift up his hand or heart, except he would presently be condemned to death.

Not long after Athanaricus fell sick, and died, but the Goths that served in his house and army, having had experience of the goodness and bounty of Theodosius, desired to continue in his service, and afterwards carried themselves faithfully and valiantly in all his wars; but Gratian and his son Valentinian ruling in the west very remissly and negligently, gave occasion to the British legions to rebel and chuse an excellent captain, one Maximus, for their emperor, who thereupon presently marched into France, where Gratian was, who being ill beloved of his soldiers, many of them forsook him, and went to Maximus; hereupon Gratian resolved to retire into Italy, but being circumvented by the policy of Maximus, he was slain in the way, Anno Christi. 387.

Maximus marching forward with a great army into Italy, Valentinian the emperor knowing his own weakness, deserted it, and went to Constantinople to Theodosius, to entreat aid; who compassionating his condition, of his natural and accustomed valour, resolved to go into Italy to revenge the death of Gratian, and to restore Valentinian to his empire; and thereupon leaving his son Arcadius in Constantinople, and taking Valentinian along with him, he raised the greatest and best forces he could, and so marched through Lombardy, where Maximus already was, having left Andragatius general of his army to resist Theodosius, who expecting that he would come by sea into Italy, he embarked all his army aboard a great number of his ships and barks, purposing to overthrow Theodosius upon the water; the valiant Theodosius being advertised hereof, marched by long journeys, finding the passages open into the plains of Lombardy, and besieged the city of Aquileia where Maximus was, and compassing the city round about, they within it, having guilty consciences, and being full of fear, delivered Maximus into Theodosius hands, without staying for any assault, or fight, who caused him as a traitor to his prince, to be put to death.

When Andragathius, his general, being upon the sea with a very mighty navy, heard of it, he was so overcome with sorrow and despair, that he cast himself overboard, and drowned himself, and thereupon his army yielded themselves to Theodosius, and so without either slaughter or bloodshed, God gave unto his holy servant Theodosius a very great victory: and from France, Spain, Germany, and Britain, there came ambassadors to him, yielding him their obedience with great humility and devotion.

Thence he marched with Valentinian to Rome, where they received him with a solemn triumph: he continued there certain days, reformed many abuses and disorders, inflicted punishments, and did justice upon sundry wicked and dissolute persons, and as an holy and faithful Christian, he reformed the abuses of the church also: and setting all things in good order, he returned to Constantinople, leaving with Valentinian an army and power sufficient to defend his empire.

Theodosius through God's mercy, and goodness, was so feared, and honoured by all nations, that the king of Persia, notwithstanding his former victories, in great humility sent his ambassadors to Constantinople, entreating a perpetual league, and peace with him, and he seeing with how great submission that potent king sued for peace, granted it.

Not long after, Valentinian the emperor went into France, and there living in prosperity, and void of care, one Argobastes, a captain of his, conspired with Eugenius to kill him, and for that end suborned some of his Eunuchs to strangle him in his bed, which they did, publishing abroad, that he had hanged himself: whereupon Argobastes nominated and made Eugenius emperor; Theodosius being advertised of this fact, was very sorry, and much troubled, considering how dangerous a war lay before him, yet thinking it a great dishonour to suffer such an action to go unpunished, he mustered up his army, and leaving his son Arcadius in Constantinople, with all possible speed he marched against them; but as a good and holy Christian, he first betook himself to fasting and prayer, seeking unto God the giver of victory, for success in the enterprise, requesting the prayers of other holy men also, whereof one of them sent him word, that he should have the victory, but should die in Italy, and never return again to Constantinople.

When Theodosius with his army came to the confines of Italy, the tyrants had such great forces, and had taken such good order for all matters, that all the passages of the Alps were stopped, and at the foot thereof they attended his coming with all their forces: yet Theodosius having overcome those passages, and being entered into Lombardy, found himself much distressed, the enemies being more in number, and having as valiant and experienced soldiers as he; who compassed him about, and kept all victuals from being brought to his camp: but the valiant emperor using the best means he could, as a faithful Christian, expected and hoped for his best relief from God, to whom with tears he made continual supplications; and truly his danger was so great, that had not God miraculously fought for him, he had there been lost.

The night before the battle he spent wholly in prayer, neither eating nor sleeping, and the next day, seeing himself charged on every side, he set his men in very good order to fight, with great courage and resolution attending the coming of his enemies, and just as the battle was ready to begin, behold the goodness of God: Arbicius a captain of the enemies came over to his side with all under his charge.

The battle beginning, where Romans were against Romans, they fought at even hand, most cruelly wounding, and killing one another. But Theodosius his auxiliaries were worsted, and at the first charge ten thousand Goths, which were in his pay were slain, which when he saw, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and with a true faith and stedfast hope, shedding many tears, prayed unto the Lord that he might not be overthrown in so just a cause. At that instant a captain of his, with a great troop of soldiers came to the rescue of certain squadrons, which in all shew were overthrown, and they charged the enemy with such courage and resolution, that they which were in a manner vanquished, recovered strength and heart again; but the enemies were so many, that it seemed impossible for them to defend themselves, at which instant it pleased God to send them succour from heaven, for suddenly there arose so violent a wind and tempest, as the like had never been seen by man then living, which without annoyance to the emperor's army, did beat into the enemies faces with such force, that it bereaved them of their sight, so that they were not able to march forwards, yea the wind was so strong that all the arrows, stones, darts and lances, which they threw and shot, were born back again, wounding those that threw them.

The most Christian emperor taking notice of this miraculous providence of God, rendered thanks unto him for the same, encouraging and animating his soldiers so, as in a short space they obtained a compleat victory. Eugenius himself was taken fighting, and brought to Theodosius, who commanded him to be slain for his treason, and Argobastes flying, and finding no certain place of refuge, with his own sword cut his throat. Theodosius had the spoil of his enemies camp.

Presently

Presently after, all the princes of the empire sent their ambassadors to Theodosius to congratulate his victory, and many barbarous nations did the like, so that he remained the absolute Lord both of the east and west. And being freed from wars, he came to Millaine, where St Ambrose was the bishop, in which place he remained the rest of his time, applying himself to civil government, whereof, in the time of war, he neglected not to take great care.

Being thus in Millaine, meditating upon his mortality, by reason of his diseases, he resolved to settle his estate, and sending to Constantinople for his son Honorius, by the general approbation of all, he made him emperor of the West, and his elder son Arcadius of the East, after which he lived in great prosperity three years in Millaine, in the company of that holy man Ambrose, during which time this fell out:

In Thessalonica, a rich and populous city in Macedonia, there happened a great tumult amongst the people against the magistrates and governors under the emperor; and their fury grew so great that they slew them, which when Theodosius understood, he was so incensed against them, that he made his soldiers put to death seven thousand of the common people, making no difference between the guilty and innocent. Ambrose hearing of it, when the emperor came to church, as his manner was, Ambrose, that his repentance might be as public as his offence, set himself in the church door, and told the emperor that he should not enter there, making a learned oration to him, wherein he opened his fault, and then excommunicated him; all which the emperor heard with great patience, and returning to his palace, he continued there eight months before he was absolved, at the end whereof he said to one about him, 'Truly, I will go and see what penance my pastor will lay upon me for my offence; and so he went to the church door where Ambrose was, entreating him to absolve him. 'But what repentance hast thou shewed, said the bishop, for so heinous an offence? and with what salve hast thou healed so mortal a wound?' 'Thou, said the emperor, art to instruct, and shew me what I am to do, and thou shalt see that I will accomplish what thou shalt prescribe.' The bishop seeing the emperor's mildness, thinking it penance sufficient that he had been so long excommunicated, with mild and courteous speeches, said unto him, 'Thy penance, Theodosius, shall be this, That seeing in thy hasty fury thou committedst such an horrid murder, thou shalt presently establish a law, that no man whom thou shalt adjudge to die shall be executed within thirty days after thou hast pronounced the sentence, at the end of which time thou shalt either ratify or disannul thy sentence, as thou first canst.' The emperor immediately caused this law to be written and proclaimed, which he ever after observed, and whereof much good ensued: and so, being absolved, he came into the church, prayed, and received the sacrament, and ever after loved Ambrose very dearly, and used his council in many matters; and for his company's sake he continued in Millaine the remainder of his life.

In the good emperor's absence the Arians at Constantinople began to wax bold, raised tumults, and proceeded to that insolency, that they set the house of Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, on fire. In other cities also, where they were thrust out of their churches by the authority of the emperor, they kept conventicles in the suburbs, and thereby much propagated their damnable opinions.

About this time the emperor commanded that all the idol groves and temples in Alexandria should be demolished, and that Theopholus the bishop thereof should see it done, which he with much zeal prosecuted, which so enraged the Heathens, that they made head together, ran upon the Christians, and sought to destroy them every kind of way. The Christians withstood them, and so they fought till both sides were weary, many were slain, and more wounded: but the Heathens, when that heat was over, were wonderfully afraid of the emperor's displeasure, and therefore forsook the city, and hid themselves in several places. Afterwards the governor and captain of the host assisted Theophilus in the overthrow of those temples; all the images, by the emperor's orders, were given to the relief of the poor.

Whilst Theodosius was at Rome, after he had overthrown Maximus, he reformed two most abominable wickednesses; the first was this: In Rome was an huge house of antient building, where all the bread that served the city was baken, and most of the rooms were under ground; round about it were taverns and victualling houses full of harlots, so that many that resorted thither, either to satisfy their hunger or lusts, were by these whores spoiled of all they had, and usually so made away that their friends could never hear of them more; for by privy conveyances, they were thrown into these back houses, and there kept to grinding and drudgery all their life after. It fell out, that one of the emperor's soldiers was thus thrown into this hole, who, when they would not suffer him to depart, drew his dagger, and slew some that stopped his passage, so that the rest being afraid, let the soldier go; and the emperor being informed by him, sent for the millers and bakers, punished the masters with extreme torments, overthrew those blind houses, and so rid the princely city of that shameful doing.

The other abuse which he reformed was this: If a woman were taken in adultery, they shut her up in a narrow stew, and compelled her, beastly, and without all shame, to play the harlot, ringing a bell whilst the deed was doing, that all the neighbours might be made privy to it, which was so far from removing the sin, that it encreased the rather. The good emperor being informed hereof, caused the stews to be pulled down, and wholely suppressed; and made other laws for the punishment of adultery.

Theodosius being aged and infirm, at last fell extreme sick, and therefore he disposed of the empire to his two sons; and because they were young, and not of fit years for such a burden, he left, as tutors and governors to them, two very sufficient men both for war and peace. After he had set all things in order, his disease so encreased, that being overcome by it, he recommended his soul to God, and so departed out of this present life, in the year 397, of his age fifty, or as others sixty, and of his empire seventeen.

In all his wars he was very valiant and politic, of an excellent wit and judgment in civil government, a lover of justice and equity, very merciful, and of a most noble inclination, yet somewhat hasty and choleric, but presently pacified, and easily entreated. To moderate his passion, besides Ambrose's law in matters of death, he used (knowing his own hasty disposition) not to determine any thing till he had repeated over the letters of the Greek alphabet, for in that space his wrath would be tempered: he was exceeding liberal, temperate, and chaste: he greatly honoured learned and wise men: he was well spoken, and cheerful in his deportment.

His wife Placilla was an excellent and most religious woman: he used to say, That he accounted it a greater honour that he was a member of the church, than that he was the head of the empire.

He wrote out the whole New Testament with his own hand, accounting it a great jewel, and read a part of it every day.

He commanded that they which reviled and spake evil of him should not be punished, "Quoniam si ex levitate "processerit, contemnendum est: si ex insania, misera- "tione dignum: si ab injuria, remittendum est." 'Because if it proceeded of levity, it is not to be regarded: if of madness, it is to be pitied: if of an injury received, it is to be pardoned in them.'

In this emperor's reign there was much hurt done by earthquakes in sundry places. In the imperial city of Constantinople there were thrown down at one time fifty-seven towers of the city wall, which were newly built a little before. It endured by fits six months together, so that many fair and goodly churches and fortresses were demolished, and the inhabitants were fain to forsake their houses and lie in the fields. It raged by sea also, so that many ships and whole islands were swallowed up by it. After which ensued famine and pestiferous airs, by which many thousands of people and beasts perished; and in Chersonesus whole parishes sunk into the ground.

Also, in the last year of his reign, in Epyrus there was a dragon seen of that vast bigness, that when he was dead, eight yoke of oxen could hardly draw him. The inhabitants of Antiochia overthrowing the brazen portraiture of his beloved wife Placilla, Theodosius was so incensed against them for it, that he deprived their town of the dignity of a metropolitan city, conferring it upon their neighbour town of Laodicea: he threatened also to burn it down, but by the persuasion of Flavianus bishop of Antiochia, the good emperor, moved with pity, pardoned their fault.

At one time he was very favourable to the Arians, whom he permitted to keep conventicles in his principal cities, which Amphilochius bishop of Iconium taking notice of, he came before the emperor, and did his reverence unto him, but not to his son Arcadius, though he was already made Augustus, whereat Theodosius being offended, Amphilochius presently answered, that the God of heaven would also be offended with them, who tolerated the blasphemers of his only begotten son Jesus Christ. The godly emperor being hereby brought to a sight of his great sin, presently made a law, prohibiting the conventicles of the Arians in all his cities.

Concerning that miraculous tempest that God sent for the destruction of his enemies, Claudian the poet writes these verses:

O nimium dilecti Deo! cui fundit ab antris
Æolus armatas hyemes, cui militat æther,
Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti.

The Life of THEODOSIUS the Second, who died Anno Christi 453.

ARCADIUS, the elder son of Theodosius, in the thirteenth year of his reign, falling sick at Constantinople, left his son Theodosius to succeed in the empire, who being but eight years old, Arcadius, by his last will and testament, made Hisdigerus king of Persia and Parthia, his tutor, who understanding what Arcadius had done, accepted of the charge, and speedily sent one Antiochus, an excellent man, and a great soldier, to Constantinople, who, with the good will and consent of Honorius emperor of the west, and uncle to young Theodosius, governed the eastern empire with great fidelity and discretion, and so maintained the same in peace and justice till Theodosius came to age. About which time the western empire was much infested by the barbarians; but Theodosius being now of sufficient age, was freed from his tutors, and as he was a godly man, and the inheritor of his grandfather's virtues, his chiefest care was for the service of God, and the defence and advancement of his church; whereupon he fell out with Barrabanus king of Persia, who succeeded Isdigerus, because he persecuted the Christians that were in his dominions, and when persuasions would not prevail, he sent Ardaburus an excellent captain against him, who fought a battle with Nasius, general of the Persians, overthrew him, and made a great slaughter of his men, and afterwards entered his country, and made great spoil therein.

By another way Theodosius sent Gratianus, another captain, against Alamander king of the Saracens, who came to aid the king of Persia, who overthrew him in battle, and slew a great multitude of his Saracens. And in an another place, another of Theodosius's captains overthrew the Persians, so that at last Barrabanus ceased from persecuting the Christians, and a peace was concluded between Theodosius and him.

About this time Honorius, having reigned in all thirty years, died at Rome without issue, and thereby the whole Roman empire was devolved upon Theodosius; and some held for him, as reason and duty required: but the greatest potentates in the west began to make themselves lords of the empire, in several parts of it. But they falling out amongst themselves, Theodosius, not thinking it safe to leave the east, made his cousin-german Valentinian Cæsar, who was the son of Placidia, sister to Arcadius and Honorius, and wife to the emperor Constantius; and so, with sufficient troops, he sent him into Italy, with his mother Placidia, whose virtues and wisdom was sufficient to govern all, till her son came to years fit for government.

In the mean time, one John, who had usurped the empire at Rome, sent his ambassadors to Theodosius, requesting him to accept him as partner in the empire; but Theodosius caused them to be apprehended as traitors and rebels; and withal, he sent command to Ardaburius, an excellent captain of his, that, with the greatest power he could make, he should pass by sea into Italy, before Placidia, and should seek to defeat the tyrant John; but in his passage there befel him such a storm at sea, that his own ship being severed from the rest, was driven to an haven where he was taken, and carried prisoner to Ravenna. His son Aspar (who was in the same fleet) being informed hereof, landed his men, after the storm was over, and passing the lakes and boggs near to Ravenna, which were always judged impassable, and never known to be dry before, entered the city, freed his father, took the tyrant John and cut off his head. This miraculous deliverance of Ardaburius was judged to be the fruit of the effectual prayers of the godly emperor.

Presently after came Placidia with her son into Italy, and passed to Ravenna, where hearing of another usurper, that was coming with all his forces from Spain, to seize upon Rome, she sent Ardaburius against him, who fought a great battle with him, and overthrew him; after which, his own soldiers mutinying against him, delivered him to Ardaburius.

Valentinian being thus peaceably possessed of Italy, was by the consent of Theodosius, and with the good will of all men, made emperor: and not long after, leaving all things in the best order that he could in Italy he took his passage for Greece, and went to Constantinople to see Theodosius, where he married Eudoxa, daughter to Theodosius, and so he returned into Italy: at which time Genserichus king of the Vandals exercising great cruelties upon the Christians in Africa, godly Theodosius was so grieved, that he sent two of his captains with great forces against him.

But whilst they prolonged time in Sicily, Attilla, a mighty king of the Huns, with many other barbarous nations, which, like swarms of bees, came to him, intended to invade the eastern empire, knowing that the best and greatest part of the men of war were gone with the two captains into Sicily; and at his first entry he took many cities in Thrace and Slavonia, whereupon Theodosius, in great haste, called back his army out of Sicily, raised more forces, and fought with Attila many battles, much repressing his fury; but, in the midst of his preparations against these barbarians, it pleased God that he fell sick of the plague, whereof he died; or, as some hold, by a fall from his horse; in the fiftieth year of his age, and of his reign forty-two, in the year 453.

Socrates Scholasticus gives this character of him. Theodosius, though born and brought up in the imperial palace, yet was he free from all light and vain behaviour. He was so wise and discreet, that he seemed in his youth, to all that conferred with him, a man of great experience: he was of such hardiness and sufferance, both inwardly in mind, and outwardly in body, that he could endure the pinching cold of winter, and the parching heat of summer.

He used to fast twice every week; his palace and court seemed no other than a religious family: at the dawning of the day, he used with his sisters to sing psalms and hymns of praise to God. He learned much of the holy scriptures without book: he so reasoned of them with the bishops, as if he himself had been an experienced minister.

He gathered together a very great library of the antient fathers works, but especially many books of the sacred scriptures.

He excelled all men in patience, courtesy, and clemency: he learned to bridle his anger, to bear afflictions patiently, to revenge him of none that did him injury: and when one of his familiars asked him why he would not put to death some that had wronged him? he answered, 'I would to God it lay in my power to revive them that are

are dead; indeed it is no hard matter to bereave a man of his life, but when that is done, be a man never so sorry, he cannot revive him again.' When any traitor was condemned, he would not suffer him to go so far as the gates of the city, towards the place of execution, before he sent him a reprieve.

One day, as he set forth some public shews to the people of Constantinople, wherein beasts fought together, the people shouting, desired that one of the strongest men should be set to encounter with one of those beasts, his answer was, 'Do not you know that we cannot abide cruel spectacles.'

He highly honoured God's ministers, especially such as excelled in godliness. Once as he was at the public shews, to please the people, there fell out an exceeding great tempest, whereupon he commanded his beadles to speak to the people, telling them, that it was far better to lay aside those shews and pastimes, and, with one heart and voice, to pray unto God to cease that violent storm; the words were no sooner spoken, but all jointly fell down to the ground, and poured out zealous and earnest prayers unto God, so that the whole city was become as one church; and it pleased God that the weather presently cleared up, and became fair: and whereas there was a great dearth and scarcity before, through God's mercy, they had afterwards great store and plenty.

At another time, as this most godly emperor was celebrating those shows in the same place, he had news brought him of Aſper's success, and of the tyrant John, whereupon he thus spoke to the people; 'Let us give over this vain pastime, and let us repair unto church and serve God devoutly, pouring out our zealous prayers to him, and praise him for his wonderful mercy, who by his own hand, and out stretched arm, hath deprived the tyrant of his life.' No sooner had he made an end of speaking, but all the people gave over their spectacles and passing through the theatre, sang praises, together with the emperor, unto God; and so, going directly to church, spent the whole day in those holy exercises. When wars were at any time proclaimed, after the examples of David and Jehosophat, he made God his refuge, and, by prayer, he always obtained prosperous success.

Nestorius denying Christ to be God, Theodosius summoned a council at Ephesus to suppress that heresy, by which Nestorius was deposed from his bishopric. He greatly detested all heretics. His wife was Eudoxia, a very godly and discreet woman. His usual saying was, 'That emperors, of all other men, were most miserable, because commonly the truth of businesses is concealed from them.

In his time there was such a famine in Rome, that the poor sort were fain to make bread of the bark of trees, and the richer sort of chesnuts; a pound of flesh was worth fifty-pence, and dead mens flesh was sold and eaten.

In one battle that this general fought against Attila, there were slain 162000 men, whose blood made a neighbour brook to overflow its bank. This Attila was called The terror of the world, and the whip wherewith God scourged many nations.

Theodosius in godliness was like unto his grand-father. In collecting a great library of good books, nothing inferior to Ptolemæus Philadelphus. In gathering into one short sum the laws of his predecessors, he trode a path wherein Justinian followed him, to the great benefit of learned men. His house was like unto a sanctuary for exercises of reading the holy scriptures, and devout prayers. His facility in subscribing unread letters was corrected by the prudent advice of his sister Pulcheria.

In his time Attila entered into Italy, took, sacked, and razed Aquillia, Ticinum, and Millaine, and intended the same cruelty against Rome; but Leo bishop thereof went forth to him, and with gentle words so mitigated his mind that he forbore to do it.

He had a man whose name was Palladius, one that had rare gifts, both outwardly in body, and inwardly in mind, and of that strength and agility of body, that he was able in three days to run post into the furthest bounds of the Roman and Persian dominions, and back again in the same space to Constantinople; so that by his clerity he made the Roman empire, which was vast and wide, to be but narrow and strait.

When Theodosius sent his army under Ardaburius against the Persians, and for the relief of the persecuted Christians there, the citizens of Constantinople were sad and heavy, fearing the variable event of the wars; but a company of angels appeared to certain men in Bithynia, that were travelling to Constantinople, and willed them to bid the citizens be of good cheer, and to pray, and put their trust in God; and that they should be confident of Ardaburius's victory, for God had sent them as governors and sovereign captains of the wars.

The heresy of Nestorius was so hateful to him, that he made this law concerning the followers of it; 'We decree, That whosoever doth embrace the wicked opinion of Nestorius, and shall give ear to his lewd doctrine, if he be a bishop he shall be banished; if a lay person, that he shall be accursed.'

In the time of Theodosius's reign, the Britains sent for the Saxons out of Germany, to assist them against the Scots and Picts; and when they came, Vortinger the British king entertained them, conferred with them of their faith, and found them Pagans that worshipped Mercury, whom they called Woden, and in honour of him Wodensday (Wednesday). They worshipped also Venus, whom they called Frea, whence came Friday. These Saxons, when, together with the Britains, they had foiled the Scots and Picts, traiterously fell upon their own masters the Britains, slew many, and drave the rest into the mountains, whom they called after their country language Welshmen, i. e. strangers.

The Life of JUSTINIAN, who died Anno Christi 538.

JUSTINE, Emperor of the east, being grown old, and having no sons of his own, adopted his sister's son, called Justinian, appointing him to succeed in the empire; he was a very godly man, zealous for the truths against heresies, and would suffer no faith to be openly professed, but that which was allowed in the four general councils; and accordingly God blessed him in his wars; for coming to the empire in a very troublous time, the first war that he made was against the Persians, who for fifty years together had often invaded the Roman empire, and commonly had the better of it; against them therefore Justinian sent a great army under the conduct of Belisarius, a noble and valiant captain, who fought a bloody battle with the Persians, which continued almost a whole day, but in the conclusion, through God's mercy, Belisarius prevailed, and made a great slaughter of the enemies; after which notable victory he recovered sundry places in Mesopotamia, which the Persians had usurped from the empire.

Another army also of Justinian's entering into Armenia, by the same good hand of providence obtained victory, and recovered most part of that which was formerly lost; hereupon Cavadas, King of Persia, raised a mighty army under the command of a valiant old captain of his, called Alamander, who had formerly gotten many victories against the Romans, with whom Belisarius after some encounters, came to a battle, which was the greatest and cruelest that ever happened in those wars; this battle was fought near to the river Euphrates, and much against the opinion of Belisarius, who, knowing that the enemy had the advantage, would not have fought, but his men against his will preparing themselves; he ordered and encouraged them all that he could; the fight was maintained with such obstinacy and fury on both sides, that for the greatest part of the day, it appeared not to which side victory would encline; but, at last, the Imperialists waxing faint, having fasted all day because it was Easter-eve, they began to retreat; which the Persians seeing, they charged the horse troops of Belisarius with such fury, that they brake them also; Belisarius did what he could to encourage and reinforce them, but when he could not prevail he alighted from his horse, and placed himself in a squadron of footmen that kept their ground, and encouraging them with his presence, they all resolved to conquer or die, insomuch, as when the Persian general saw ſaw them remain whole, he came upon them with great fury, thinking eaſily to have had the execution of them, but they kept themſelves ſo cloſe together, that they could not be broken, and fought ſo valiantly, that they ſlew many of the Perſians, till night coming on, the Perſians left them,

Then did Beliſarius with his men retire into an iſland, which was in the river Euphrates hard by, whither the reſt of his army came to him, and the next morning ſet his men in order to fight again; but the Perſians having loſt more men than the Romans, removed into another quarter, and the King of Perſia underſtanding his great loſs, ſickened, and ſhortly after died, whereupon his ſon made peace with Juſtinian; and Beliſarius returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received with much triumph.

A few days after two potent men in the city, which were ſiſters ſons of Anaſtaſius the emperor, with a great party that adhered to them, rebelled againſt Juſtinian, one of them taking the enſigns and name of emperor; and the war was ſo cruel within the city, that thirty thouſand perſons were ſlain together with the uſurpers, whereby God did wonderfully deliver Juſtinian from an imminent danger, after which time he lived in peace and better eſtimation than before; in this ſcuffle Beliſarius did him better ſervice than all others.

After the Vandals had ſeized upon Africk, they raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, ſome of them being Heathens and Arians; but after the death of Genſericus, Gilimer his nephew ſucceeding in the kingdom, Juſtinian ſent Beliſarius with a purpoſe to regain the kingdom of Africk, who embarked himſelf accompanied with many captains in five hundred ſail of ſhips and ninety-two gallies, and ſo began his voyage towards Africk, where, through God's mercy he ſafely arrived; Epiphanius, biſhop of Conſtantinople going in the fleet, prayed for their proſperous ſucceſs; when they were landed, they found ſome that took part with them, and ſo they marched along the ſea-coaſt toward Carthage, and the navy did the like by ſea; when Gilimer underſtood this, he left his brother Amata in the city for the guard of it, commanding him to kill all the priſoners, and at ſuch an hour the next day to iſſue out of the city with all his forces againſt Beliſarius, promiſing that himſelf with his army, would charge him, at the ſame time in the rear, and ſo he departed out of Carthage with his army; and ſent a captain with ſome troops to alarm and trouble Beliſarius in his march.

The next day Amata came forth accordingly by the vanguard; and Gilimer with his forces ſo reſolutely upon the rear, that the Imperialiſts began to retire; but Gilimer hearing of the defeat, and death of his brother, made an halt, whereupon Beliſarius his ſoldiers charged with ſuch fury, that Gilimer was wholly overthrown, many of his men ſlain, and he by flight ſaved his life.

The next day Beliſarius marched to the city, where arriving in the evening, he found no reſiſtance, and the gates open, yet would he not enter into an enemy's city by night, but the next day he marched in with great quietneſs, neither ſuffering his ſoldiers to plunder or murder any who were obedient to him; poſſeſſing the city, he commanded preſently the walls to be repaired, which were very ruinous; and, in the mean time, Gilimer unbroken in ſpirit, rallied his army, raiſed more forces, ſent for his brother Zazon, with a great army out of Sardinia, and having thus gotten a ſufficient number, he went towards Carthage, either to fight or beſiege Beliſarius.

But Beliſarius, for certain days, would not take the field, till he had ſufficiently repaired the walls, and then he marched forth with his army to give Gilimer battle, and when the commanders ſaw each other, they ſet their men in good order, one relying upon the arm of fleſh, the other putting his confidence in God. The fight began with great fury, but in the firſt charge Zazon was ſlain, and ſome other principal men of the Vandals, whereupon the reſt fled into their camp, which they had ſtrongly fortified; Beliſarius gathering his forces together preſently purſued them, which, when Gilimer ſaw, ſuſpecting that he could not defend the camp; with a few ſervants he fled away, and Beliſarius entered it, putting all in arms to the ſword, taking the women and children captives. In the camp, they found an infinite quantity of gold, ſilver, money, and jewels for the Vandals, having no place of refuge which they counted ſafe, carried all their treaſure with them, and ſo in one hour they loſt all they had ſtolen, and gotten in Africa in ninety five years before; thus, God bleſſed his ſervant Juſtinian, and juſtly plagued thoſe wicked Vandals, who had cruelly perſecuted the Orthodox, cutting out their tongues, impriſoning the godly miniſters, and making them their drudges, making ſtables of their churches, &c.

The next day, Beliſarius ſent an excellent captain with a good troop of horſe to purſue Gilimer, and ſhortly after himſelf followed with ſome choice men of his army, but finding, that Gilimer was fled into ſome inacceſſible mountains in Numidia, he left a captain with ſufficient forces to beſiege him, and ſo returned to Carthage, in his paſſage taking in many towns, and much people reſorted to him with joy, being glad that they were freed from the miſerable ſervitude of the Vandals, and reſtored to the liberty of the empire.

Shortly after he ſent to take in Sardinia, and others into Mauritania, and in all places God gave him wonderful ſucceſs, ſo that in little more than four months he took in all Africk, that had been poſſeſſed by thoſe wicked Vandals, for the ſpace of ninety-ſix years, wherein they had been oppreſſors of the true church of Chriſt, and had almoſt extirpated it.

Gilimer, being ſtraitly beſieged as before is ſaid, at laſt yielded himſelf upon quarter for his life, and ſo was brought priſoner to Beliſarius, who ſent the Emperor Juſtinian news of his ſucceſs, requeſting, that he might return to Conſtantinople, and bring Gilimer with him. Juſtinian referred it to himſelf, whether to ſtay and govern that province or to return; he made one Solomon governor, left with him a good part of his army, and ſo took Gilimer, and his kindred, and infinite jewels, treaſures and riches, which the Vandals had plundered from Rome, Spain, Africk, and other provinces, and ſo returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received in triumph.

In the mean time the churches of the eaſt being much infected with the Arian Hereſy, were full of diſſentions and troubles, but the good Emperor publiſhed an edict wherein he accuſed the principal ringleaders, and inflicted great penalties on them that held and maintained ſuch damnable opinions, thereby that no diſſention might take root in any of the churches through the world.

About this time the nation that dwelt by the river Tanais ſent to Juſtinian, requeſting him to ſend a biſhop to them, who willingly aſſented to their requeſts, by which means they were converted to the Chriſtian faith.

Beliſarius did not long continue at Conſtantinople before Juſtinian gave him the charge of his wars in Sicily and Italy againſt the Goths, and Theodatus who at that time was lord thereof, an enterpriſe of no leſs importance, and of greater danger than the former of Africk; but Theodatus dying about that time, he left his kingdom to his nephew Atalaricus being eight years old, wherefore his mother Amalaſunta had the education of him, and the government of the kingdom: but Athalaricus ſhortly after dying, Theodatus his couſin-german uſurped the kingdom, and treacherouſly put Amalaſunta to death.

Juſtinian deteſting ſo vile a fact, ſent Beliſarius with his victorious army againſt him, who by the way landing in Sicily, took in Catania, Syracuſe, and many other towns and cities, and after a while the whole iſland ſubmitted to him.

Theodatus being informed hereof, was much afraid, and preſently diſpatched ambaſſadors to Juſtinian, proffering to renounce his title to Sicily: and that in Italy in all decrees and proclamations, Juſtinian's name ſhould be firſt uſed, and that once every year he would ſend him a golden crown in token of ſubjection: withal giving them in charge, that if Juſtinian refuſed that proffer, that then they ſhould offer the whole kingdom of Italy to him, upon condition that he ſhould give him ſome lands and poſſeſſions in Greece, or elſewhere, Juſtinian refuſed the firſt, but embraced the ſecond, and ſent back his ambaſſadors with them to conſummate the agreement; but in the interim Theodatus having by his captains gotten a victory againſt ſome of Juſtinian's captains in Slavonia, he was ſo puffed up up with pride, that he refuſed to ſtand to his former offer, ten, his inſolency was ſuch, that he apprehended, and imprifoned Juſtinian's ambaſſadors: and he was the more encouraged, hearing that Beliſarius was gone from Sicily into Africk, where a captain with a great part of the army had mutinied againſt Salomon, put the judges and governors to death, and poſſeſſed themſelves of a great part of the country, but Beliſarius arriving there, overthrew them in battle, and ſo leaving all in peace, he ſailed into Italy.

About this time there was ſeen ſo prodigious a ſight about the ſun, that the like hath never been heard of: for the ſun, for the greateſt part of the year, gave ſo little light, that it was but equal to the light of the moon, the ſky being clear, without clouds or any thing to ſhadow it, after which there followed a great famine, and much war and bloodſhed.

Juſtinian ſeeing the inconſtancy of Theodatus, and being greatly diſpleaſed with the death of his captains in Dalmatia, and the impriſonment of his ambaſſadors, with the wiſdom, courage and reſolution of a worthy prince, he ſent Conſtantius a noble captain into Dalmatia, and Slavonia, who quickly recovered moſt of that which was loſt: and ſending to Beliſarius ſpeedily to enter Italy with the greateſt power he could: Beliſarius with his accuſtomed expedition and courage, leaving ſufficient gariſons in Sicily, tranſported his army into Italy, landing at Meſſina, and finding no oppoſition, he ſeized on many towns thereabouts, conquering all to the city of Naples, into which Theodatus had put a great gariſon of his Goths; them Beliſarius beſieged, and after many ſkirmiſhes, he took the city by force, where his ſoldiers took great ſpoils and ſlew many of the Goths: but the next day he ſet all the inhabitants at liberty, and reſtored to them the greateſt part of their goods again: this action ſtruck a great fear into the Goths, who held Naples to be impregnable.

Theodatus in the mean time making but ſlender proviſion for his defence, all his chief captains met together, and choſe for their king, one Vitiges a wiſe and valiant captain, which Theodatus hearing of, fled to Ravenna, but being purſued, he was overtaken and ſlain. Vitiges preſently called a council of war, where it was reſolved, that they for the preſent could neither defend Rome, nor fight Beliſarius, and therefore he ſhould retire to Ravenna, till having received ſufficient forces, he might return and give him battle.

Beliſarius leaving a ſtrong gariſon in Naples, marched to Rome, to whom the inhabitants opened their gates, and let him in. In the ſenate he made an excellent ſpeech, exhorting them to embrace, and defend their liberty; then repaired the city walls, and brought in ſtore of proviſion from all the adjacent parts.

In the mean time Vitiges left no means untried to encreaſe his power, concluding a peace with the king of France, and drew all his forces thence, and from Germany and other parts, he procured all the aid that poſſibly he could; ſo that he raiſed 150,000 men, horſe and foot, good ſoldiers, and moſt of them well armed, and ſo he marched towards Rome where Beliſarius was, but with an inconſiderable army, and therefore not able to take the field.

Whereupon Vitiges, nothing doubting of the victory, grew ſo proud, that he aſked every one he met, whether Beliſarius was not fled away, and rejoiced infinitely when he heard that he was fortifying of Rome. But the valiant Beliſarius truſting in God, was far from flying, reſolving rather to die than to abandon what he had gotten; Vitiges coming near Rome, Beliſarius had cauſed two very ſtrong towers to be built by the bridge to ſtop his approach, and had placed in them very good guards; but when Vitiges' army approached, they which guarded the bridge were in ſuch fear, that they preſently ſurrendered the place, and the ſame night Vitiges paſſed over a great part of his army; the next morning Beliſarius ſuſpecting no ſuch matter, iſſued out of Rome with a thouſand choice horſe, with which he marched towards the bridge, and coming near to it, he ſuddenly met with Vitiges' men at arms, which ſo vexed Beliſarius, imagining that his men that guarded the bridge were loſt, that with leſs prudence than was requiſite, he charged them with ſo much fury, that there fell out a cruel fight, ſo that theſe men at arms were driven back to the batallion where Vitiges was, who charged with ſo great a troop of his Goths, that Beliſarius and his company were held for loſt, yet he in his own perſon did wonders, wounding and ſlaying many of his enemies, and charged ſo far in amongſt them, that though he did the part of an excellent ſoldier, yet not of a diſcreet general; for he put his perſon in ſuch danger, that he was held for dead, and ſo ſome of his men that fled, reported of him in Rome.

Being in this diſtreſs, and unable any longer to maintain the fight, his people began to retire on the ſpur, and he alſo did the like, after he had ſlain a thouſand of the Goths.

Many of Vitige's horſemen purſued him to the gates of Rome, which were ſhut, and the guard would not open them, leſt the enemy ſhould have entered with them; beſides, the noiſe was ſuch, that they knew not Beliſarius his voice, whom they accounted for dead; he having fought the greateſt part of the day, was driven to run to the wall, and ranging his ſoldiers into a ſquadron, made head againſt the enemy, and ſo continued fighting without meat and drink till it was night; in which he did a valiant though a dangerous exploit: charging the Goths with ſuch fury, that they all believed (through the darkneſs of the night) that great troops were ſallied forth againſt them, whereupon they retired to their camp; thus God almoſt miraculouſly preſerved this brave captain, who afterwards coming to the gates, and calling to the watch, they knew him, and joyfully let him in.

He had abundance of arrows ſticking in his horſe, and armour, and ſome blows and cuts with the ſword, (but through God's mercy) none of them came to his skin, which was held for a wonder by thoſe which ſaw what great danger he had been in.

The next day Vitiges came with all his army to the city; but being unable by reaſon of the great circuit to compaſs it all about, he made ſix ſtrong camps in ſeveral parts of it; many dangerous conflicts there was during this ſiege, which laſted a year and nine days.

For the firſt ſeven months the enemy never ceaſed to aſſault and batter the city on all parts, where they did and received much hurt: and Beliſarius never ceaſed from defending, ſallying forth, and fighting with them, ſo that they ſlew above forty thouſand of the Goths, in which his valour and wiſdom did wonderfully appear; for it was the moſt terrible and bloody ſiege that ever was.

The good emperor Juſtinian neglected them not, but ſent them ſuccour of companies of horſe, and foot, valiant captains, corn and other neceſſaries, though with much difficulty: notwithſtanding which, the city endured extreme famine. Beliſarius managed all things with ſuch prudence and valour, that Vitiges ſeeing his men tired, and weakened, he ſent and concluded a truce with him for ſix month; yet it continued not ſo long, for Vitiges underſtanding the wants of the city, renewed the wars, whereupon Beliſarius ſent the marſhal of his army with two thouſand horſe, and other ſoldiers, to begin war in the marſhes of Ravenna; and God ſo proſpered them, that they took in Arminum, and other places; which Vitiges hearing of, and fearing the loſs of Ravenna, raiſed the ſiege, and returned to defend the reſt.

In his retreat, Beliſarius charged his rear-guard ſo furiouſly, that he ſlew a number of his men; and ſo with ſhame, diſonour and loſs, Vitiges went back to Ravenna, and preſently after laid a ſtrong ſiege to Arminum, where the aforeſaid forces were; Beliſarius preſently raiſed ſuch forces as he could, went to Naples, fortified that city, and ſo marched ſtraight towards the city of Ravenna, and by the way he met with Narſes, a brave and religious captain, that Juſtinian had ſent with new ſupplies to his aid; being thus ſtrengthened, he marched to Arminum, forced Vitiges to raiſe his ſiege, and ſo relieved his men. Hereupon Lombardy, Milan, and other places declared for the emperor: and Beliſarius ſent them aid of captains and men, and there fell out many conflicts and battles both with the Goths, and with Theodoricus king of France, who came with a great army, thinking to poſſeſs himſelf of that country.

eight yoke of oxen could hardly draw him. The inhabitants of Antiochia overthrowing the brazen portraiture of his beloved wife Placilla, Theodosius was so incensed against them for it, that he deprived their town of the dignity of a metropolitan city, conferring it upon their neighbour town of Laodicea: he threatened also to burn it down, but by the persuasion of Flavianus bishop of Antiochia, the good emperor, moved with pity, pardoned their fault.

At one time he was very favourable to the Arians, whom he permitted to keep conventicles in his principal cities, which Amphilochius bishop of Iconium taking notice of, he came before the emperor, and did his reverence unto him, but not to his son Arcadius, though he was already made Augustus, whereat Theodosius being offended, Amphilochius presently answered, that the God of heaven would also be offended with them, who tolerated the blasphemers of his only begotten son Jesus Christ. The godly emperor being hereby brought to a sight of his great sin, presently made a law, prohibiting the conventicles of the Arians in all his cities.

Concerning that miraculous tempest that God sent for the destruction of his enemies, Claudian the poet writes these verses:

O nimium dilecti Deo! cui fundit ab antris
Æolus armatas hyemes, cui mitat æther,
Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti.

The Life of THEODOSIUS the Second, who died Anno Christi 453.

ARCADIUS, the elder son of Theodosius, in the thirteenth year of his reign, falling sick at Constantinople, left his son Theodosius to succeed in the empire, who being but eight years old, Arcadius, by his last will and testament, made Hisdigerus, king of Persia and Parthia, his tutor, who understanding what Arcadius had done, accepted of the charge, and speedily sent one Antiochus, an excellent man, and a great soldier, to Constantinople, who, with the good will and consent of Honorius emperor of the west, and uncle to young Theodosius, governed the eastern empire with great fidelity and discretion, and so maintained the same in peace and justice till Theodosius came to age. About which time the western empire was much infested by the barbarians; but Theodosius being now of sufficient age, was freed from his tutors, and as he was a godly man, and the inheritor of his grandfather's virtues, his chiefest care was for the service of God, and the defence and advancement of his church; whereupon he fell out with Barrabanus king of Persia, who succeeded Isdigerus, because he persecuted the Christians that were in his dominions, and when persuasions would not prevail, he sent Ardaburus an excellent captain against him, who fought a battle with Nasius, general of the Persians, overthrew him, and made a great slaughter of his men, and afterwards entered his country, and made great spoil therein.

By another way Theodosius sent Gratianus, another captain, against Alamander king of the Saracens, who came to aid the king of Persia, who overthrew him in battle, and slew a great multitude of his Saracens. And in an another place, another of Theodosius's captains overthrew the Persians, so that at last Barrabanus ceased from persecuting the Christians, and a peace was concluded between Theodosius and him.

About this time Honorius, having reigned in all thirty years, died at Rome without issue, and thereby the whole Roman empire was devolved upon Theodosius; and some held for him, as reason and duty required: but the greatest potentates in the west began to make themselves lords of the empire, in several parts of it. But they falling out amongst themselves, Theodosius, not thinking it safe to leave the east, made his cousin-german Valentinian Cæsar, who was the son of Placidia, sister to Arcadius and Honorius, and wife to the emperor Constantius; and so, with sufficient troops, he sent him into Italy, with his mother Placidia, whose virtues and wisdom was sufficient to govern all, till her son came to years fit for government. In the mean time, one John, who had usurped the empire at Rome, sent his ambassadors to Theodosius, requesting him to accept him as partner in the empire; but Theodosius caused them to be apprehended as traitors and rebels; and withal, he sent command to Ardaburius, an excellent captain of his, that, with the greatest power he could make, he should pass by sea into Italy, before Placidia, and should seek to defeat the tyrant John; but in his passage there befel him such a storm at sea, that his own ship being severed from the rest, was driven to an haven where he was taken, and carried prisoner to Ravenna. His son Asper (who was in the same fleet) being informed hereof, landed his men, after the storm was over, and passing the lakes and boggs near to Ravenna, which were always judged impassable, and never known to be dry before, entered the city, freed his father, took the tyrant John and cut off his head. This miraculous deliverance of Ardaburius was judged to be the fruit of the effectual prayers of the godly emperor.

Presently after came Placidia with her son into Italy, and passed to Ravenna, where hearing of another usurper, that was coming with all his forces from Spain, to seize upon Rome, she sent Ardaburius against him, who fought a great battle with him, and overthrew him; after which, his own soldiers mutinying against him, delivered him to Ardaburius.

Valentinian being thus peaceably possessed of Italy, was by the consent of Theodosius, and with the good will of all men, made emperor: and not long after, leaving all things in the best order that he could in Italy he took his passage for Greece, and went to Constantinople to see Theodosius, where he married Eudoxa, daughter to Theodosius, and so he returned into Italy: at which time Genserichus king of the Vandals exercising great cruelties upon the Christians in Africa, godly Theodosius was so grieved, that he sent two of his captains with great forces against him.

But whilst they prolonged time in Sicily, Attilla, a mighty king of the Huns, with many other barbarous nations, which, like swarms of bees, came to him, intended to invade the eastern empire, knowing that the best and greatest part of the men of war were gone with the two captains into Sicily; and at his first entry he took many cities in Thrace and Slavonia, whereupon Theodosius, in great haste, called back his army out of Sicily, raised more forces, and fought with Attila many battles, much repressing his fury; but, in the midst of his preparations against these barbarians, it pleased God that he fell sick of the plague, whereof he died; or, as some hold, by a fall from his horse; in the fiftieth year of his age, and of his reign forty-two, in the year 453.

Socrates Scholasticus gives this character of him. Theodosius, though born and brought up in the imperial palace, yet was he free from all light and vain behaviour. He was so wise and discreet, that he seemed in his youth, to all that conferred with him, a man of great experience: he was of such hardiness and sufferance, both inwardly in mind, and outwardly in body, that he could endure the pinching cold of winter, and the parching heat of summer.

He used to fast twice every week; his palace and court seemed no other than a religious family: at the dawning of the day, he used with his sisters to sing psalms and hymns of praise to God. He learned much of the holy scriptures without book: he so reasoned of them with the bishops, as if he himself had been an experienced minister.

He gathered together a very great library of the antient fathers works, but especially many books of the sacred scriptures.

He excelled all men in patience, courtesy, and clemency: he learned to bridle his anger, to bear afflictions patiently, to revenge him of none that did him injury: and when one of his familiars asked him why he would not put to death some that had wronged him? he answered, 'I would to God it lay in my power to revive them that are

are dead; indeed it is no hard matter to bereave a man of his life, but when that is done, be a man never so sorry, he cannot revive him again.' When any traitor was condemned, he would not suffer him to go so far as the gates of the city, towards the place of execution, before he sent him a reprieve.

One day, as he set forth some public shews to the people of Constantinople, wherein beasts fought together, the people shouting, desired that one of the strongest men should be set to encounter with one of those beasts, his answer was, 'Do not you know that we cannot abide cruel spectacles.'

He highly honoured God's ministers, especially such as excelled in godliness. Once as he was at the public shews, to please the people, there fell out an exceeding great tempest, whereupon he commanded his beadles to speak to the people, telling them, that it was far better to lay aside those shews and pastimes, and, with one heart and voice, to pray unto God to cease that violent storm; the words were no sooner spoken, but all jointly fell down to the ground, and poured out zealous and earnest prayers unto God, so that the whole city was become as one church; and it pleased God that the weather presently cleared up, and became fair: and whereas there was a great dearth and scarcity before, through God's mercy, they had afterwards great store and plenty.

At another time, as this most godly emperor was celebrating those shows in the same place, he had news brought him of Asper's success, and of the tyrant John, whereupon he thus spoke to the people; 'Let us give over this vain pastime, and let us repair unto church and serve God devoutly, pouring out our zealous prayers to him, and praise him for his wonderful mercy, who by his own hand, and out stretched arm, hath deprived the tyrant of his life.' No sooner had he made an end of speaking, but all the people gave over their spectacles and passing through the theatre, sang praises, together with the emperor, unto God; and so, going directly to church, spent the whole day in those holy exercises. When wars were at any time proclaimed, after the examples of David and Jehosophat, he made God his refuge, and, by prayer, he always obtained prosperous success.

Nestorius denying Christ to be God, Theodosius summoned a council at Ephesus to suppress that heresy, by which Nestorius was deposed from his bishopric. He greatly detested all heretics. His wife was Eudoxia, a very godly and discreet woman. His usual saying was, 'That emperors, of all other men, were most miserable, because commonly the truth of businesses is concealed from them.

In his time there was such a famine in Rome, that the poor sort were fain to make bread of the bark of trees, and the richer sort of chesnuts; a pound of flesh was worth fifty-pence, and dead mens flesh was sold and eaten.

In one battle that this general fought against Attila, there were slain 162000 men, whose blood made a neighbour brook to overflow its bank. This Attila was called The terror of the world, and the whip wherewith God scourged many nations.

Theodosius in godliness was like unto his grand-father. In collecting a great library of good books, nothing inferior to Ptolemæus Philadelphus. In gathering into one short sum the laws of his predecessors, he trode a path wherein Justinian followed him, to the great benefit of learned men. His house was like unto a sanctuary for exercises of reading the holy scriptures, and devout prayers. His facility in subscribing unread letters was corrected by the prudent advice of his sister Pulcheria.

In his time Attila entered into Italy, took, sacked, and ruined Aquillia, Ticinum, and Millaine, and intended the same cruelty against Rome; but Leo bishop thereof went forth to him, and with gentle words so mitigated his mind that he forbore to do it.

He had a man whose name was Palladius, one that had rare gifts, both outwardly in body, and inwardly in mind, and of that strength and agility of body, that he was able in three days to run post into the furthest bounds of the Roman and Persian dominions, and back again in the same space to Constantinople; so that by his clerity he made the Roman empire, which was vast and wide, to be but narrow and strait.

When Theodosius sent his army under Ardaburius against the Persians, and for the relief of the persecuted Christians there, the citizens of Constantinople were sad and heavy, fearing the variable event of the wars; but a company of angels appeared to certain men in Bithynia, that were travelling to Constantinople, and willed them to bid the citizens be of good cheer, and to pray, and put their trust in God; and that they should be confident of Ardaburius's victory, for God had sent them as governors and sovereign captains of the wars.

The heresy of Nestorius was so hateful to him, that he made this law concerning the followers of it; 'We decree, That whosoever doth embrace the wicked opinion of Nestorius, and shall give ear to his lewd doctrine, if he be a bishop he shall be banished; if a lay person, that he shall be accursed.'

In the time of Theodosius's reign, the Britains sent for the Saxons out of Germany, to assist them against the Scots and Picts; and when they came, Vortinger the British king entertained them, conferred with them of their faith, and found them Pagans that worshipped Mercury, whom they called Woden, and in honour of him Wodensday (Wednesday). They worshipped also Venus, whom they called Frea, whence came Friday. These Saxons, when, together with the Britains, they had foiled the Scots and Picts, traiterously fell upon their own masters the Britains, slew many, and drave the rest into the mountains, whom they called after their country language Welshmen, i. e. strangers.

The Life of JUSTINIAN, who died Anno Christi 538.

JUSTINE, Emperor of the east, being grown old, and having no sons of his own, adopted his sister's son, called Justinian, appointing him to succeed in the empire; he was a very godly man, zealous for the truths against heresies, and would suffer no faith to be openly professed, but that which was allowed in the four general councils; and accordingly God blessed him in his wars; for coming to the empire in a very troublous time, the first war that he made was against the Persians, who for fifty years together had often invaded the Roman empire, and commonly had the better of it; against them therefore Justinian sent a great army under the conduct of Belisarius, a noble and valiant captain, who fought a bloody battle with the Persians, which continued almost a whole day, but in the conclusion, through God's mercy, Belisarius prevailed, and made a great slaughter of the enemies; after which notable victory he recovered sundry places in Mesopotamia, which the Persians had usurped from the empire.

Another army also of Justinian's entering into Armenia, by the same good hand of providence obtained victory, and recovered most part of that which was formerly lost; hereupon Cavadas, King of Persia, raised a mighty army under the command of a valiant old captain of his, called Alamander, who had formerly gotten many victories against the Romans, with whom Belisarius after some encounters, came to a battle, which was the greatest and cruelest that ever happened in those wars; this battle was fought near to the river Euphrates, and much against the opinion of Belisarius, who, knowing that the enemy had the advantage, would not have fought, but his men against his will preparing themselves; he ordered and encouraged them all that he could; the fight was maintained with such obstinacy and fury on both sides, that for the greatest part of the day, it appeared not to which side victory would encline; but, at last, the Imperialists waxing faint, having fasted all day because it was Easter-eve, they began to retreat; which the Persians seeing, they charged the horse troops of Belisarius with such fury, that they brake them also; Belisarius did what he could to encourage and reinforce them, but when he could not prevail he alighted from his horse, and placed himself in a squadron of footmen that kept their ground, and encouraging them with his presence, they all resolved to conquer or die, insomuch, as when the Persian general saw ſaw them remain whole, he came upon them with great fury, thinking eaſily to have had the execution of them, but they kept themſelves ſo cloſe together, that they could not be broken, and fought ſo valiantly, that they ſlew many of the Perſians, till night coming on, the Perſians left them,

Then did Beliſarius with his men retire into an iſland, which was in the river Euphrates hard by, whither the reſt of his army came to him, and the next morning ſet his men in order to fight again; but the Perſians having loſt more men than the Romans, removed into another quarter, and the King of Perſia underſtanding his great loſs, ſickened, and ſhortly after died, whereupon his ſon made peace with Juſtinian; and Beliſarius returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received with much triumph.

A few days after two potent men in the city, which were ſiſters ſons of Anaſtaſius the emperor, with a great party that adhered to them, rebelled againſt Juſtinian, one of them taking the enſigns and name of emperor; and the war was ſo cruel within the city, that thirty thouſand perſons were ſlain together with the uſurpers, whereby God did wonderfully deliver Juſtinian from an imminent danger, after which time he lived in peace and better eſtimation than before; in this ſcuffle Beliſarius did him better ſervice than all others.

After the Vandals had ſeized upon Africk, they raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, ſome of them being Heathens and Arians; but after the death of Genſericus, Gilimer his nephew ſucceeding in the kingdom, Juſtinian ſent Beliſarius with a purpoſe to regain the kingdom of Africk, who embarked himſelf accompanied with many captains in five hundred ſail of ſhips and ninety-two gallies, and ſo began his voyage towards Africk, where, through God's mercy he ſafely arrived; Epiphanius, biſhop of Conſtantinople going in the fleet, prayed for their proſperous ſucceſs; when they were landed, they found ſome that took part with them, and ſo they marched along the ſea-coaſt toward Carthage, and the navy did the like by ſea; when Gilimer underſtood this, he left his brother Amata in the city for the guard of it, commanding him to kill all the priſoners, and at ſuch an hour the next day to iſſue out of the city with all his forces againſt Beliſarius, promiſing that himſelf with his army, would charge him, at the ſame time in the rear, and ſo he departed out of Carthage with his army; and ſent a captain with ſome troops to alarm and trouble Beliſarius in his march.

The next day Amata came forth accordingly by the vanguard; and Gilimer with his forces ſo reſolutely upon the rear, that the Imperialiſts began to retire; but Gilimer hearing of the defeat, and death of his brother, made an halt, whereupon Beliſarius his ſoldiers charged with ſuch fury, that Gilimer was wholly overthrown, many of his men ſlain, and he by flight ſaved his life.

The next day Beliſarius marched to the city, where arriving in the evening, he found no reſiſtance, and the gates open, yet would he not enter into an enemy's city by night, but the next day he marched in with great quietneſs, neither ſuffering his ſoldiers to plunder or murder any who were obedient to him; poſſeſſing the city, he commanded preſently the walls to be repaired, which were very ruinous; and, in the mean time, Gilimer unbroken in ſpirit, rallied his army, raiſed more forces, ſent for his brother Zazon, with a great army out of Sardinia, and having thus gotten a ſufficient number, he went towards Carthage, either to fight or beſiege Beliſarius.

But Beliſarius, for certain days, would not take the field, till he had ſufficiently repaired the walls, and then he marched forth with his army to give Gilimer battle, and when the commanders ſaw each other, they ſet their men in good order, one relying upon the arm of fleſh, the other putting his confidence in God. The fight began with great fury, but in the firſt charge Zazon was ſlain, and ſome other principal men of the Vandals, whereupon the reſt fled into their camp, which they had ſtrongly fortified; Beliſarius gathering his forces together preſently purſued them, which, when Gilimer ſaw, ſuſpecting that he could not defend the camp; with a few ſervants he fled away, and Beliſarius entered it, putting all in arms to the ſword, taking the women and children captives. In the camp, they found an infinite quantity of gold, ſilver, money, and jewels for the Vandals, having no place of refuge which they counted ſafe, carried all their treaſure with them, and ſo in one hour they loſt all they had ſtollen, and gotten in Africa in ninety five years before; thus, God bleſſed his ſervant Juſtinian, and juſtly plagued thoſe wicked Vandals, who had cruelly perſecuted the Orthodox, cutting out their tongues, impriſoning the godly miniſters, and making them their drudges, making ſtables of their churches, &c.

The next day, Beliſarius ſent an excellent captain with a good troop of horſe to purſue Gilimer, and ſhortly after himſelf followed with ſome choice men of his army, but finding, that Gilimer was fled into ſome inacceſſible mountains in Numidia, he left a captain with ſufficient forces to beſiege him, and ſo returned to Carthage, in his paſſage taking in many towns, and much people reſorted to him with joy, being glad that they were freed from the miſerable ſervitude of the Vandals, and reſtored to the liberty of the empire.

Shortly after he ſent to take in Sardinia, and others into Mauritania, and in all places God gave him wonderful ſucceſs, ſo that in little more than four months he took in all Africk, that had been poſſeſſed by thoſe wicked Vandals, for the ſpace of ninety-ſix years, wherein they had been oppreſſors of the true church of Chriſt, and had almoſt extirpated it.

Gilimer, being ſtraitly beſieged as before is ſaid, at laſt yielded himſelf upon quarter for his life, and ſo was brought priſoner to Beliſarius, who ſent the Emperor Juſtinian news of his ſucceſs, requeſting, that he might return to Conſtantinople, and bring Gilimer with him. Juſtinian referred it to himſelf, whether to ſtay and govern that province or to return; he made one Solomon governor, left with him a good part of his army, and ſo took Gilimer, and his kindred, and infinite jewels, treaſures and riches, which the Vandals had plundered from Rome, Spain, Africk, and other provinces, and ſo returned to Conſtantinople, where he was received in triumph.

In the mean time the churches of the eaſt being much infected with the Arian Hereſy, were full of diſſentions and troubles, but the good Emperor publiſhed an edict wherein he accuſed the principal ringleaders, and inflicted great penalties on them that held and maintained ſuch damnable opinions, thereby that no diſſention might take root in any of the churches through the world.

About this time the nation that dwelt by the river Tanais ſent to Juſtinian, requeſting him to ſend a biſhop to them, who willingly aſſented to their requeſts, by which means they were converted to the Chriſtian faith.

Beliſarius did not long continue at Conſtantinople before Juſtinian gave him the charge of his wars in Sicily and Italy againſt the Goths, and Theodatus who at that time was lord thereof, an enterpriſe of no leſs importance, and of greater danger than the former of Africk; but Theodatus dying about that time, he left his kingdom to his nephew Atalaricus being eight years old, wherefore his mother Amalaſunta had the education of him, and the government of the kingdom: but Athalaricus ſhortly after dying, Theodatus his couſin-german uſurped the kingdom, and treacherouſly put Amalaſunta to death.

Juſtinian deteſting ſo vile a fact, ſent Beliſarius with his victorious army againſt him, who by the way landing in Sicily, took in Catania, Syracuſe, and many other towns and cities, and after a while the whole iſland ſubmitted to him.

Theodatus being informed hereof, was much afraid, and preſently diſpatched ambaſſadors to Juſtinian, proffering to renounce his title to Sicily: and that in Italy in all decrees and proclamations, Juſtinian's name ſhould be firſt uſed, and that once every year he would ſend him a golden crown in token of ſubjection: withal giving them in charge, that if Juſtinian refuſed that proffer, that then they ſhould offer the whole kingdom of Italy to him, upon condition that he ſhould give him ſome lands and poſſeſſions in Greece, or elſewhere, Juſtinian refuſed the firſt, but embraced the ſecond, and ſent back his ambaſſadors with them to conſummate the agreement; but in the interim Theodatus having by his captains gotten a victory againſt ſome of Juſtinian's captains in Slavonia, he was ſo puffed

up with pride, that he refused to stand to his former offer, yea, his insolency was such, that he apprehended, and imprisoned Justinian's ambassadors: and he was the more encouraged, hearing that Belisarius was gone from Sicily into Africk, where a captain with a great part of the army had mutinied against Salomon, put the judges and governors to death, and possessed themselves of a great part of the country, but Belisarius arriving there, overthrew them in battle, and so leaving all in peace, he sailed into Italy.

About this time there was seen so prodigious a sight about the sun, that the like hath never been heard of: for the sun, for the greatest part of the year, gave so little light, that it was but equal to the light of the moon, the sky being clear, without clouds or any thing to shadow it, after which there followed a great famine, and much war and bloodshed.

Justinian seeing the inconstancy of Theodatus, and being greatly displeased with the death of his captains in Dalmatia, and the imprisonment of his ambassadors, with the wisdom, courage and resolution of a worthy prince, he sent Constantius a noble captain into Dalmatia, and Slavonia, who quickly recovered most of that which was lost: and sending to Belisarius speedily to enter Italy with the greatest power he could: Belisarius with his accustomed expedition and courage, leaving sufficient garisons in Sicily, transported his army into Italy, landing at Messina, and finding no opposition, he seized on many towns thereabouts, conquering all to the city of Naples, into which Theodatus had put a great garison of his Goths; this Belisarius besieged, and after many skirmishes, he took the city by force, where his soldiers took great spoils and slew many of the Goths: but the next day he set all the inhabitants at liberty, and restored to them the greatest part of their goods again: this action struck a great fear into the Goths, who held Naples to be impregnable.

Theodatus in the mean time making but slender provision for his defence, all his chief captains met together, and chose for their king, one Vitiges a wise and valiant captain, which Theodatus hearing of, fled to Ravenna, but being pursued, he was overtaken and slain. Vitiges presently called a council of war, where it was resolved, that they for the present could neither defend Rome, nor fight Belisarius, and therefore he should retire to Ravenna, till having received sufficient forces, he might return and give him battle.

Belisarius leaving a strong garison in Naples, marched to Rome, to whom the inhabitants opened their gates, and let him in. In the senate he made an excellent speech, exhorting them to embrace, and defend their liberty; then he repaired the city walls, and brought in store of provision from all the adjacent parts.

In the mean time Vitiges left no means untried to encrease his power, concluding a peace with the king of France, and drew all his forces thence, and from Germany and other parts, he procured all the aid that possibly he could; so that he raised 150,000 men, horse and foot, paid soldiers, and most of them well armed, and so he marched towards Rome where Belisarius was, but with an inconsiderable army, and therefore not able to take the field.

Whereupon Vitiges, nothing doubting of the victory, grew so proud, that he asked every one he met, whether Belisarius was not fled away, and rejoiced infinitely when he heard that he was fortifying of Rome. But the valiant Belisarius trusting in God, was far from flying, resolving rather to die than to abandon what he had gotten; Vitiges coming near Rome, Belisarius had caused two very strong towers to be built by the bridge to stop his approach, and had placed in them very good guards; but when Vitiges' army approached, they which guarded the bridge were in such fear, that they presently surrendered the place, and the same night Vitiges passed over a great part of his army; the next morning Belisarius suspecting no such matter, had out of Rome with a thousand choice horse, with which he marched towards the bridge, and coming near to it, he suddenly met with Vitiges' men at arms, which so amazed Belisarius, imagining that his men that guarded the bridge were lost, that with less prudence than was requisite, he charged them with so much fury, that there fell out a cruel fight, so that these men at arms were driven back to the battallion where Vitiges was, who charged with so great a troop of his Goths, that Belisarius and his company were held for lost, yet he in his own person did wonders, wounding and slaying many of his enemies, and charged so far in amongst them, that though he did the part of an excellent soldier, yet not of a discreet general; for he put his person in such danger, that he was held for dead, and so some of his men that fled, reported of him in Rome.

Being in this distress, and unable any longer to maintain the fight, his people began to retire on the spur, and he also did the like, after he had slain a thousand of the Goths.

Many of Vitige's horsemen pursued him to the gates of Rome, which were shut, and the guard would not open them, lest the enemy should have entered with them; besides, the noise was such, that they knew not Belisarius his voice, whom they accounted for dead; he having fought the greatest part of the day, was driven to run to the wall, and ranging his soldiers into a squadron, made head against the enemy, and so continued fighting without meat and drink till it was night; in which he did a valiant though a dangerous exploit: charging the Goths with such fury, that they all believed (through the darkness of the night) that great troops were sallied forth against them, whereupon they retired to their camp; thus God almost miraculously preserved this brave captain, who afterwards coming to the gates, and calling to the watch, they knew him, and joyfully let him in.

He had abundance of arrows sticking in his horse, and armour, and some blows and cuts with the sword, (but through God's mercy) none of them came to his skin, which was held for a wonder by those which saw what great danger he had been in.

The next day Vitiges came with all his army to the city; but being unable by reason of the great circuit to compass it all about, he made six strong camps in several parts of it; many dangerous conflicts there was during this siege, which lasted a year and nine days.

For the first seven months the enemy never ceased to assault and batter the city on all parts, where they did and received much hurt: and Belisarius never ceased from defending, sallying forth, and fighting with them, so that they slew above forty thousand of the Goths, in which his valour and wisdom did wonderfully appear; for it was the most terrible and bloody siege that ever was.

The good emperor Justinian neglected them not, but sent them succour of companies of horse, and foot, valiant captains, corn and other necessaries, though with much difficulty: notwithstanding which, the city endured extreme famine. Belisarius managed all things with such prudence and valour, that Vitiges seeing his men tired, and weakened, he sent and concluded a truce with him for six month; yet it continued not so long, for Vitiges understanding the wants of the city, renewed the wars, whereupon Belisarius sent the marshal of his army with two thousand horse, and other soldiers, to begin war in the marshes of Ravenna; and God so prospered them, that they took in Arminum, and other places; which Vitiges hearing of, and fearing the loss of Ravenna, raised the siege, and returned to defend the rest.

In his retreat, Belisarius charged his rear-guard so furiously, that he slew a number of his men; and so with shame, dishonour and loss, Vitiges went back to Ravenna, and presently after laid a strong siege to Arminum, where the aforesaid forces were; Belisarius presently raised such forces as he could, went to Naples, fortified that city, and so marched straight towards the city of Ravenna, and by the way he met with Narses, a brave and religious captain, that Justinian had sent with new supplies to his aid; being thus strengthened, he marched to Arminum, forced Vitiges to raise his siege, and so relieved his men. Hereupon Lombardy, Milan, and other places declared for the emperor: and Belisarius sent them aid of captains and men, and there fell out many conflicts and battles both with the Goths, and with Theodoricus king of France, who came with a great army, thinking to possess himself of that country.

Belisarius after many great adventures fought another terrible battle with Vitiges, who had gathered all his forces together for that end, (and through God's goodneſs) got the victory; Vitiges fled into Ravenna: Beliſarius purſued, beſieged him in the city, and in the end took it, and had Vitiges delivered into his hands, with whom almoſt all Italy came under his obedience.

Coſroes king of Perſia, hearing that Beliſarius whom he chiefly feared, was buſied in the wars of Italy, took the opportunity to make war upon the territories of the empire, and took ſome cities, whereupon Juſtinian, who was very circumſpect for all parts, ſent an army into the eaſt, under a valiant general, who being ſlain in a battle againſt the Perſians, he ſent a ſecond, yet could not the imperialiſts make ſufficient reſiſtance againſt them, but that they ſtill prevailed; wherefore Juſtinian ſent for Beliſarius, as the only man that could match the Perſians.

Beliſarius going to Conſtantinople took with him Vitiges with his queen, many of his kindred and other principal men of the Goths his priſoners, and was received into Conſtantinople with exceeding honour, and much joy, and was looked upon as the wonder of the world, every one extolling his virtues and noble acts; he was a man of a pleaſant countenance, tall of ſtature, of an excellent conſtitution, noble of condition, pious, mild, courteous; and endued with many other rare and heroical vertues.

Within few days after, he was ſent into the eaſt againſt Coſroes, and with his coming the imperialiſts took heart, and he revived the war with ſuch diſcretion and courage that there was a preſent alteration in all things; and having obtained ſome victories, he ſoon recovered moſt of that which was loſt; but whilſt he thus was far from Italy, the Goths which kept ſome garriſons there, aſſembled together, and choſe one Ydibaldus king; but not long after, his guard ſlew him: in whoſe place they choſe Araricus king, who was alſo ſlain within five months, and then they choſe Totila for their king, who preſently marched through all Italy without any great reſiſtance, and beſieged the city of Naples, which after many exploits both by ſea and land, he took and proſpered ſo much in his enterpriſes, that he was like in a ſhort ſpace to make himſelf lord of all Italy; which Juſtinian hearing of ſent to Beliſarius, commanding him to leave the affairs of the eaſt in as good a poſture as he could, and ſpeedily return to Conſtantinople, whence without any ſtay he was preſently ſent by the emperor into Italy, whither he led with him but fifty thouſand men, expecting that he ſhould have found ſufficient forces there; for the emperor was made to believe that his affairs was not in ſo low a ſtate as they proved: his coming was much expected by his friends, and feared by his enemies; but when they ſaw that he brought ſo ſmall an army with him, his friends grieved, and his enemies contemned him.

Putting himſelf into Ravenna, he fortified and kept the ſame, and within a few days took ſuch order, that though he could not match his numerous enemies in the field, yet by policy he won upon them; whereupon Totila being angry, aſſembled his whole power, ſent one part of his army to Ravenna againſt Beliſarius, and with the reſt he went to Rome, which was ſo ſlenderly provided with men and amunition, that it was not like to hold out long; Beliſarius underſtanding this, remembering with what trouble and care he had formerly defended that city, and having not ſufficient forces to relieve it by land, he was very ſorrowful, and thereupon wrote earneſtly to the emperor to ſend him men and money, and in the mean time he reſolved to put himſelf into Rome by ſea; and ſo paſſing over into Dalmatia, he went unto Duraſſo, where he met with captain John, whom the emperor had ſent with an army to aſſiſt him; but holding that the relief of Rome was preſently neceſſary, he took the ſea to enter Rome by the river Tyber, appointing captain John to haſte his march by land to relieve him; coming to the mouth of Tyber, he ſpeedily rigged a great number of barks and frigats, with which he paſſed up the river, in the narroweſt part whereof, Totila had drawn a chain a croſs, made a bridge and two caſtles at either ſide, guarded with a great number of ſoldiers; yet Beliſarius with his men charged the guard ſo luſtily that they ſcattered them, and Rome had been preſently relieved, if by a ſtrange miſhap it had not been prevented; indeed God (who had raiſed up the Goths to ſcourge the Roman empire, and to puniſh the ſins of Rome, and the decay of zeal, and encreaſe of ſuperſtition in the church) had otherwiſe determined of it.

For Beliſarius having left his wife, whom he dearly loved with his family in a port at the mouth of the river, under the care of a good captain, and ſtrong gariſon, had news brought him that the town was taken, and his wife in the enemies hand, which ſo grieved and enraged him, that he preſently returned down the river, determining to recover his wife or loſe his life, preſuming that if he ſped well, he might preſently return to the relief of Rome: being come to the port, he found the town ſafe, and his wife well, and at liberty, whereupon he was more grieved to ſee himſelf ſo deluded; and the ſame night it pleaſed God (who makes all things to concur for the effecting of his own will) that he fell ſick of a fever, and his diſeaſe daily encreaſing, he was often at the point of death.

In the mean time Totila ſo ſtraitly beſieged the city of Rome, that they within did eat cats, rats, dogs, &c. And yet many died of hunger; ſo that in the end he became maſter of it, burnt the capitol, and beſt part of all the city, threw down the third part of the walls, commanded the inhabitants upon the pain of death to depart, and live in other places; and ſo he left it burnt, deſolate and waſte, which had been the miſtreſs of the world. And then he marched againſt captain John and his army, that was coming towards Rome, who ſhewed himſelf ſo very a coward, that he durſt not ſtay his coming, but put himſelf into Otranto, whereby Totila took all Calabria, Abruzzo, and Lucania.

In the mean time Beliſarius having recovered his health, performed one of the moſt deſperate attempts that ever was; which was with thoſe troops which he had, to go and put himſelf into the deſolation of Rome, where he preſently cauſed trenches to be digged, rampires to be made, and all the victuals that could poſſibly be gotten to be brought thither. The fame whereof brought many citizens for love to their country to come and put themſelves thereinto with him.

As ſoon as Totila heard hereof, by long journies, he returned to Rome, aſſuring himſelf preſently to enter it, and therein to take Beliſarius; but Beliſarius ſo valiantly defended the ſame, that to his great loſs Totila was forced to raiſe his ſiege; afterwards Beliſarius having better fortified it, and left a good gariſon in it, went to join with John and his army, and to purſue Totila; but the king of Perſia again making wars in the eaſt, Juſtinian ſent for Beliſarius to Conſtantinople, which when the king of Perſia heard of, he concluded a peace with Juſtinian, and ſo Beliſarius remained in Conſtantinople all the reſt of his life; during which time the Huns came down into Thrace, robbing and ſpoiling all the country, againſt whom old Beliſarius was ſent, who overthrew them in a great battle, and ſo returned to the emperor.

After Beliſarius departed from Italy, Totila returned again and beſieged Rome, and after a long ſiege, wherein the inhabitants and ſoldiers endured great extremities and famine, he again took it, but did it no harm, ſeeking rather to repair and repeople it, giving great gifts, privileges and exemptions to the inhabitants. Afterwards he took many other places, and then paſſed over into Sicily, but finding that the conqueſt thereof would be difficult, he left four captains with many men of war, and ſo returned into Italy, where, in a ſhort ſpace, he had made himſelf abſolute lord of the country, had not the emperor ſent Narſes, an holy, famous and valiant captain, with a great army into Italy; and in his march towards Rome, Totila met him, and preſented battle to him. They fought, and in the fight Totila was ſlain, and his army routed, whereupon Narſes eaſily reconquered all Italy.

After Totila's death, the Goths choſe Teyas, a potent man amongſt them, king, who raiſed with Totila's treaſure a great army, and ſo marched out of Lombardy to encounter with Narſes: they both lodged their armies upon a river ſide, where, after ſome notable ſkirmiſhes, they

The Life of HUNIADES, Prince of Tranſilvania, who died Anno Chriſti 1450.

HUNIADES was born in Walachia, of noble parentage, and endowed with all thoſe virtues which adorn a prince, and therefore was, in the year 1443, made prince of Tranſilvania, which at that time was much infeſted with the incurſions of the Turks. He was a politic, pious, valiant, and famous captain: his victories ſo great, that the like were never obtained by any Chriſtian prince againſt the Turks, and his name became ſo dreadful to them, that they uſed to ſtill their crying children with it.

At his firſt coming to his ſovereignty, he began to keep the Turks ſhort, by cutting them off whenever they preſumed to enter into his country: he ſhut up alſo the paſſages whereby they uſed to enter, and ſo having made Tranſilvania ſafe, he went into Moldavia, and never reſted till he had quite won it out of the Turks hands: then he paſſed over Danubius, into their dominions, making havock of all, and carrying back a great booty, and many captives.

At this time Iſſa Baſſa, a great favourite of Amurath's, was governor of Temeſwar, and an excellent ſoldier; he, to pleaſe the Sultan his uncle, continually forraged the country about Belgrade, burning the villages, driving away the cattle, and taking the people captives; ſometimes alſo he brake into Huniades' country, laying in every place, as he went, ſtrong ambuſhes, hoping to entrap that wary captain; but Huniades, purpoſing revenge, raiſed a ſtrong army, both of horſe and foot, and paſſed over Danubius, encamping near to Belgrade, which Iſſa hearing of, preſently ſet forward, with a great army, to meet him; and coming on in good order, he found Huniades as ready for the battle as himſelf: the ſignal of battle being given, there began a great and cruel fight: at the firſt encounter the wings of Huniades' army were forced to retire, but his men at arms charged with ſuch fury, that many fell on both ſides, but moſt of the Turks, who were not able long to endure the ſhock, but were overthrown by heaps, and at laſt betook themſelves to flight, and Iſſa Beg with them: Huniades and his Hungarians fiercely purſued to the very ſuburbs of Sinderovia, ſo that moſt of the Turks was ſlain, and a rich prey and many priſoners fell to the Chriſtians, which they carried into Belgrade.

The fame of this victory coming to Buda, to Vladiſlaus king of Hungary, he cauſed public thankſgivings in every church, and ſent rich preſents to Huniades, for his encouragement.

Amurath, much grieved with this loſs, repaired his forces, ſending Meſites Baſſa, a man of great experience and valour, with a puiſſant army, to invade Tranſilvania, where he burned all that came in his way, killing man, woman, and child, without reſpect of age or ſex. Huniades having no army to oppoſe ſo potent an enemy, was much grieved for the ſpoil of his country, and therefore went to Alba Julia, to the biſhop thereof; the Turks came on within ſight of the city, laying all waſte before them, which ſo grieved Huniades and the biſhop, that with a tumultuous army, raiſed in haſte, they marched out, either to repreſs the rage of the Turks, or die honourably; but they quickly fell into ambuſhments laid by the crafty Baſſa to entrap them, and were forced to fly back into the city with ſome loſs; and the biſhop taking a river, with his horſe, was there ſlain by the Turks.

Huniades, with wonderful celerity, went into the borders of his country, perſuading all to take arms; and ſo, having raiſed ſome forces, he marched back after the Baſſa, who was returning back, loaden with the ſpoils of the country. Meſites hearing of Huniades approach, proudly anſwered, 'Let him come, and with the ſpoil of himſelf enrich our victory.' Yet withal he appointed certain companies of his beſt ſoldiers in the fight to ſet upon Huniades, knowing that if he were ſlain, the reſt would eaſily be put to flight, withal giving them tokens whereby they might know him and his horſe: this Huniades being informed of by a ſpy, he changed horſe and armour with a valiant gentleman that was like him, appointing him a ſtrong troop of horſemen to attend him; and watching his opportunity, like a violent tempeſt he fell on the Turks, and finding them out of order, he ſlew many of them; but the troops before appointed ſpying the counterfeit Huniades, made towards him, as they were ordered, where began a cruel fight, but at laſt the Turks prevailing, ſlew him and his guard, though with great loſs to themſelves; but Huniades himſelf rode up and down the army, encouraging his men, and relieving them where was moſt need: the Tranſilvanian priſoners in the Turks camp chuſing rather to die than to go into captivity, in the heat of the fight brake their bonds, and took ſuch weapons as came next to hand, with which they killed their keepers, and ſo iſſued forth to help their friends laying about them like desperate men, so that the Turks began to waver, and afterwards to fly, whom the Hungarians pursued with a most terrible execution. Mesites and his son were both slain in their flight, with twenty thousand Turks, and of the Christians were lost about three thousand. All the prey was hereby recovered, the tents and baggage of the Turks taken, and the poor prisoners released, who falling down at Huniade's feet, gave God thanks for their deliverance by him; and he, with tears in his eyes, courteously embraced them, rejoicing at the public good, himself giving most hearty thanks to God, and enjoining the like to be done in all the churches of his province; part of the spoils he gave to pious uses, the rest he divided amongst his soldiers, and sent the Turks ensigns, and the heads of the principal of them to king Vladislaus.

Amurath was so enraged at this news, that he commanded a great army to be raised against the next spring, which he committed to Abedin Bassa, commanding him to enter into Walachia, and having laid it waste by fire and sword, to go thence into Moldavia, and having done the like there, to go into Transilvania, &c. The Bassa, according to his order, marched into Wallachia, with eighty thousand fighting men. Huniades willed the people to retire into the strong holds till he came to help them.

The Bassa dividing his army into two parts, laid all waste before him, spared none that fell into his hands of any age, sex, or condition, but most of the people were in the fortresses or mountains out of his reach. Having thus raged there, he marched into Transilvania, to have done the like in that place, but Huniades attended his coming with fifteen thousand brave men, which the Bassa hearing of by his scouts, presently encamped himself, as being somewhat afraid of Huniades; yet hearing that he had not a fourth part of his number, he advanced forwards towards him: the armies being within half a mile one of the other, they made an halt, resolving to use their best policy as well as valour; yet the next morning they drew forth both their armies, warily ordering of them for the best advantage. Huniades fought, by provident foresight and policy, to match the huge multitude of his enemies, which when he had done, calling his captains together, he, with a cheerful countenance, said unto them. 'No courage, companions, and fellows in arms, could have induced me to encounter so great a multitude, did not necessity enforce; your approved valour persuade, and the assured hope I have in Christ Jesus, above all things, confirm me. Christ hath chosen us to fight this sacred battle, and with our right hands to revenge the dishonour of his holy name,' &c. And so, with a most holy and Christian speech he enflamed their hearts, with a resolution of adventuring their lives in so good a cause. The Bassa also, in the best manner he could, encouraged his soldiers, telling them of their victories, their valour, their number, and the contemptible forces of the Christians; but, above all things, he willed them in the battle to seek out Huniades, to kill him, and thereby they might secure the victory, and of him should receive honourable rewards. And so marching forward, the signal of battle was on both sides given, and they encountered together with such fury and outcries, as never was any thing more terrible; the Turkish horsemen being more, and more expert, forced the Christians to retire to their men at arms, but they charging the Turks home, slew most of them. In the main battle of foot was a most cruel fight between the Christians and Janissaries, and such a slaghter was made on both sides that the blood ran like rivers, and so the fight continued four hours, at which time the Bassa brought on his reer-ward, commanding them to compass the Christians, and slay their weary enemies, whereby they might obtain an easy victory. Huniades prepared for this storm, and encountered afresh with them: though the slaughter of the Turks was great, yet because of their number they felt it not, and so fought it out desperately, yet at last they began to faint, and by degrees to shrink back, whereby the Hungarians cheered up with hope of victory, eagerly pressed on, till they put them to open flight. The Bassa seeing that all things were desperate, fled also with some of his Janissaries' but the Christians fiercely following, slew so many of them, that of that great army not one half returned over Danubius; Huniades wonderfully enriched himself and his soldiers with the spoil of the Turks camp; he took five thousand prisoners, and one hundred ensigns, besides their tents and rich pavilions; then he caused general prayer and thanksgiving to God for three days in all the churches of his provinces; and carried the ensigns and part of the spoil to King Uladislaus at Buda. Against the next spring, Amurath raised a great army to be revenged on the Christians; Uladislaus by Huniades persuasion expecting no less, did the like, with which he marched towards Bulgary, and coming near the Turks; Huniades, with ten thousand choice horsemen in the dead of the night, went to fall upon the Turks in their camp; and the moon shining at that time, he discerned them to be buried in sleep and security, and having viewed the fittest place to assault them in, with a most hideous outcry he entred the camp, encouraging his men valiantly to affail their sleepy, naked, and fearful enemies; the Turks astonished with the noise, at first rather made a stir than fought, but hearing that Huniades was there, as men dismayed with his name, they turned their backs and fled.

In that night by Huniades, with ten thousand men, there were thirty thousand of the Turks slain; all the spoil of a rich camp taken, their ensigns, and four thousand prisoners, and all with the loss of five hundred men, and so he returned loaden with booty to the King, who received him with much joy, and honoured him exceedingly; and then through all the camp they joined in prayers, and thanksgiving unto God for so great a victory.

Afterwards the Christians marching forward, took all such towns in Bulgary as stood in their way; but being come to the great mountain Hemus, through which they should pass into Thracia, the depth of winter was come upon them, the passages of the mountain were strongly shut up, and guarded with a great army commanded by Carambey Bassa, and the army began to suffer great extremity for want of provision, so that at length they were forced to march backwards; which Carambey hearing of, presuming of a glorious and easy victory, contrary to the special command of his master, pursued them with his army; Uladislaus was gone before, and Huniades was with the rereward a day's journey behind. When news was brought of the approach of the Turks, his soldiers much rejoiced at it, as deeming it much more honour to die in fight than to starve with hunger and cold; eight times did Huniades encounter with the Turkish troops, and as often put them to flight; but when Carambey came on with his whole army, Huniades was sorry that the King was so far before him; but making a virtue of necessity, he put his men in the best order that he could, and persuaded them not rashly and furiously to run upon their enemies, as men prodigal of their lives, but to keep their ranks, and to fight like valiant men, intending to carry away the victory, or to leave unto their enemies a bloody remembrance thereof; immediately the battle began, and the armies met together with great fury, many were slain on both sides; Huniades, his horsemen fought so, as if they fought for nothing but an honourable death. The Turks stood to it for a long time, but finding that they fought against desperate men, at last they began to give ground; but Carambey coming on with fresh supplies, restored the battle almost before quite lost; Huniades, seeing the fainting of the Turks, cried out, Victory, Victory, encouraging his men as fighting under the protection of the Almighty; Carambey performed all the offices of a prudent commander and valiant soldier, so that he stayed the battle for a while. but, at last, seeing the case desperate, he fled among the rest, and his horse falling into a bog, he was taken by a private soldier; Huniades, seeing so brave a man in the hands of a common soldier, asked him if he would sell his prisoner; and he asked ten ducats for him, Huniades presently gave him four hundred ducates; the Despot of Servia coming afterwards into Huniades tent, asked him, how he would ransom his prisoner? Who answered, that he valued him at forty thousand ducates, which the Despot gave him. 'O the mutability of all worldly things? Carambey allied to the great Turk, and immediately before so great a commander, was sold twice in one day prized and valued by his enemies.'

Shortly

Shortly after, Huniades conſulting with Uladiſlaus after ſo long a victory, attempted the opening of the ſtraits, but finding the difficulties and dangers great, the winter cold and raging, and the wants in the army daily encreſing, they reſolved to return the ſame way they came; which the Turks beholding from the mountains, and having freſh ſupplies come to them, they followed them at the heels, and often ſkirmiſhed with them, but at laſt the King came to Belgrade, where he was joyfully entertained by his ſubject; and after ſome few days ſtay there he went to Buda, and in the cathedral church returned humble and hearty thanks for his good ſucceſs, hanging up in the ſame church many of the enemy's enſigns, in remembrance of ſo notable a victory.

Amurath being at this time engaged in his wars againſt Scanderbeg, by the perſuaſion of his Baſſa's, ſent embaſſadors to Uladiſlaus, who concluded an honourable peace with him for ten years, and the ſame was confirmed by the ſolemn oath of both parties; but many great kings and princes were much diſcontented at it, and endeavoured to perſuade the young king to break it; and the king calling a council of all the nobility of Hungary to conſult about that buſineſs, Julian the Pope's legat, made a large ſpeech againſt the peace; and having at laſt prevailed with the king, he abſolved him from his oath given to the great Turk. Amurath ignorant of theſe proceedings, according to his agreement withdrew his garriſon out of Servia belonging to the Deſpot, together with his two blind ſons, and ſet at liberty a great number of captive Chriſtians, faithfully performing whatſoever he had promiſed upon his religion.

But Uladiſlaus, in the mean time, prepared his forces, ſent to Scanderbeg to come and to join his ſtrength with his, (though God prevented it, as is mentioned in the life of Scanderbeg), and being daily pricked forward by the earneſt ſolicitations of the Pope's legats having aſſembled a great army of brave ſoldiers, Hungarians and Polonians, he marched into Bulgary, came to Nicopolis, the chief city thereof, where he burnt the ſuburbs, and refreſhed his army three or four days, and then marched towards Thracia, taking in many towns and forts by the way.

Amurath awakened with the noiſe hereof, raiſed a great army of an hundred thouſand men, and ſo marched with them towards Varna, where the Chriſtian army lay. Huniades, the Chriſtians general, hearing of the approach of ſo numerous an enemy, with great prudence and policy diſpoſed of his forces, guarding one ſide with a fen or marſh, and the other ſide with his carriages. The Turks approaching, began to ſkirmiſh with the Chriſtians, which was maintained with great courage till the ground was covered with the blood of the ſlain. At length the battle being joined, the victory began to encline to the Chriſtians; Huniades, with his horſe having valiantly put to flight both the wings of the Turkiſh army, making great ſlaughter wherſoever he came.

Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and all brought into extreme danger, pluckt the writing out of his boſom, wherein the late league was compriſed, and holding it up in his hand, with his eyes caſt up to Heaven, he ſaid, 'Behold thou crucified Chriſt, this is the league that thy Chriſtians in thy name made with me: which they have without any cauſe violated. Now, if thou be a God, as they ſay thou art, and as we dream, revenge the wrong now done unto thy name and me, and ſhew thy power upon thy perjured people, who by their deeds deny thee their God.' Immediately after the Janizaries, which were the greateſt ſtrength of the Turks, began a moſt cruel fight againſt the Chriſtians; yet where the king and Huniades fought, the Turks ſhrunk back; but they prevailed on the other ſide of the army, which Huniades, (having a vigilant eye to every place) perceiving, preſently rode thither, and with his preſence reſtored the battle before almoſt loſt; in the mean time the young king, with greater courage than care of himſelf, brake into the battle of the Janizaries, where a French knight of the Rhodes, wounded Amurath with a pike, and had certainly ſlain him with his ſword, had he not ſpeedily been reſcued by his guard; Uladiſlaus having performed all the parts of a valiant ſoldier, had firſt his horſe ſlain under him, and then oppreſſed with multitude, was himſelf ſlain: whoſe head Amurath cauſed to be held up upon a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Chriſtian king; which ſo diſcouraged the Chriſtians that they betook themſelves to flight, and Huniades ſeeing no hope to reſtore the battle, with ſome Valachian horſemen, fled through the woods and got into Valachia; where, by Dracula, the prince of that country, he was taken priſoner; and thus as God puniſhed good Jehoſophat for joining with Ahab; ſo Huniades eſcaped narrowly with his life, and afterwards became a priſoner for joining with the perjured popiſh king. Of the Chriſtian army ſcarce a third part eſcaped, yet was there a great ſlaughter of the Turks, who hearing ſo much ſilence in the Chriſtian camp, feared ſome deceit, ſtaid two days before they durſt adventure to take the ſpoil. Amurath was very melancholly after the victory, having loſt thirty thouſand men, whereupon he ſaid, that he wiſhed not at ſo great a price to gain many victories. This bloody battle was fought at Varna, Nov. 10. Anno Chriſti 1444.

Huniades being releaſed out of priſon, the Hungarians called a general aſſembly of the ſtates, where they choſe Ladiſlaus the ſon of Albertus arch duke of Auſtria, for their king; but he being a child of five years old, they unanimouſly choſe Huniades regent, during the king's minority, as of all others the moſt fit for ſo great and heavy a charge; in which office he ſpent four years in peace, deciding civil controverſies, compoſing quarrels amongſt the nobility: equally adminiſtring juſtice to all men: ending controverſies, and that without any ſuſpicion of corruption, uſing therein ſuch expedition and never wearied patience, in hearing every man's cauſe, that ſitting, walking, ſtanding, riding, he diſpatched many great and weighty matters, always ſhewing himſelf affable and courteous as well to the poorer ſort, as to others of greater calling that had any ſuits unto him, ſo that no man was to his friends more friendly, and to his enemies more terrible; in times of peace he was always provident for war, heaping up great treaſures without which the war could not be maintained, and in all things ſo carrying himſelf, that he was of his ſubjects both beloved and feared.

Ladiſlaus the young king of Hungary lived as yet at Vienna, about whom was Ulricus earl of Cilicia a very potent man, who much envied and maligned Huniades, and prevailed with the king to ſend for him in a friendly manner to Vienna, and then to make him away privily: but it pleaſed God that Huniades came to the knowlege of this wicked conſpiracy, and thereupon returned anſwer to the king, that he was ready to ſerve his majeſty within Hungary in all his affairs, but that it was neither beſt for the king, nor ſafeſt for himſelf to go out of that kingdom; the wicked earl being thus diſappointed of his hopes, went to the borders of Hungary with divers other in his train, intending either cunningly to apprehend, and carry away Huniades unto Vienna, or elſe to diſpatch him upon the place. But Huniades, though he profered in the open field to commune with him, yet by no means would he be got into the town; whereby the treacherous earl's expectation was diſappointed.

Afterwards an other train was laid for him, that under pretence of the king's ſafe conduct, he ſhould meet the king in the broad fields of Vienna; Huniades though he ſuſpected deceit, yet came to the place, but when he neither meet there the king, nor had the earl any ſafe conduct for him, he told the earl that it was now in his power to ſlay him, who thus ſought his blood, but for reverence to the king he would ſpare him, and ſo let him go.

In the mean while he was advertiſed by his ſpies, that Amurath was raiſing great forces againſt him; and therefore he, deſiring nothing more than than to be revenged for their great loſſes at Varna, accompanied with the greateſt part of the nobility of Hungary, and with the Vayvod of Valachia, he ſet forward againſt the Turk with two and twenty thouſand choice ſoldiers; and going into Servia, he ſent into the Deſpot, deſiring him to join his forces with them; but the falſe Deſpot did not only refuſe it, but gave intelligence to Amurath of their number, and every days march; and withal adviſed him to let them come ſo far into his country, that he might get behind them with his army, and ſo ſtop their return. Which advice the Turk followed, and ſo both the armies came into a great plain in Bulgary.

Huniades daily expecting the coming of Scanderbeg with his forces, declined the fight, though Amurath daily provocked him; but he ſtill ſtanding upon his guard, Amurath endeavours to cut him off from the water, and forage; ſo that Huniades was at laſt forced to fight, and therefore commanded his ſoldiers to prepare themſelves; and the more to encourage them, he made an excellent and moſt Chriſtian ſpeech to them, deſiring them not to be diſcouraged for the remembrance of the loſs of the battle at Varna, for therein God had juſtly revenged the Chriſtian's breach of faith, and all the authors of that perfidious dealing were juſtly cut off.

' whereas, ſaid he, we againſt our wills drawn into that woful war, through the mercy of God yet live, preſerved for the defence of the Chriſtian common wealth: hitherto we have rather fought by the power of God than of man, and in the name of Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour have eaſily overthrown theſe wicked infidels. We have fought under the leading and conduct of the higheſt, whoſe help we have always felt at hand, and therefore we need not fear their great multitude, &c.

Neither did Amurath neglect to order his battle, and encourage his men, whoſe army filled all the plain from one ſide to another, to the great aſtoniſhment of the chriſtians. About nine o'clock the ſignal of battle being given, the fierce and couragious ſoldiers began to ſkirmiſh; but afterwards they fought foot to foot, and hand to hand for three hours: at which time the Chriſtians put the right wing of the Turks to the worſt, and alſo in the left wing they did the like with great ſlaughter of the Turks. Amurath preſently ſent in ſtrong ſupplies, whereupon the Chriſtians light horſemen, wearied before, retired to their men at arms, who ferring together, eaſily repulſed the Turks, and made a great ſlaughter of them.

Huniades in the mean time with his artilery from the hill, did the Turks great harm; which Amurath perceiving, drew up his men cloſe under the hill, whereby that was prevented: Huniades encourged his men, ſometimes with cheerful ſpeech, ſometimes with his own moſt valiant hand: to the weary he ſent relief, the fearful he animated, thoſe that were flying he ſtaid, and where the enemies came faſteſt on, there was he preſent himſelf to meet them, performing all the offices of a good general, and worthy ſoldier, whereby the battle grew ſo fierce and terrible, that every place was ſoiled with the blood of the ſlain; but the Turks came on ſo faſt with freſh ſupplies, that one battalion of the Chriſtians was oft times enforced to weary four or five of the Turks before they could be relieved. The cruel fight maintained all the day, was by the coming of the night ended, both armies retiring to their trenches, and with little reſt was that night ſpent: it was ſcarce fair day, when both the armies orderly ranged, began the battle again; but the Chriſtians had almoſt ſpent their ſtrength the day before, whereas there were forty thouſand Turks that had not fought at all: yet Huniades wonderfully encouraged his men by many arguments beſeeching them for the love of God and man, with their wonted valour that day for ever, to ſet at liberty themſelves, their country, their wives, and children, and whatſoever elſe they held dear unto them.

So that both the armies being fully joined, the battle was fought with no leſs force and fury then the day before; yea many of the wounded Chriſtians came again unto the battle, their either by ſpeedy death, or ſpeedy victory, to cure their wounds, and did excellent ſervice. Thus the battle continued all day long, yet the Turks had the better, and ſo both armies throughly wearied, returned to their tents.

The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battle was again begun, where for certain hours, it was fought with like hope on both ſides, and a great ſlaughter made; many of the Hungarian nobility there loſt their lives, valiantly fighting againſt their enemies, whereupon Amurath commanded forth all his reſerves at once with their number to overwhelm the wearied Chriſtians, which accordingly ſucceeded, for the Chriſtians weak and wounded were hereby wholly overthrown, which Huniades ſeeing, ſaved himſelf by flight, the like did many of the Chriſtians, whom the Turks eagerly purſued till the night ſtopt them.

Then the Turks army compaſſing in the Hungarian camp to riffle it, were by the wounded ſoldiers, wagoners and other drudges of the army, kept out ſo long as they had any ſhot left, who at length were all ſlain, yet not altogether unrevenged. In this battle the Turks loſt four and thirty thouſand men for eight thouſand of the Chriſtians, Huniades all alone by uncouth ways travelled three days and nights without meat or drink, and the fourth day tired his horſe, and caſt him off; and afterwards being himſelf on foot diſarmed, he fell into the hands of two notable thieves, who diſpoiled him of his apparel, but falling at ſtrife in parting the prey, he took occaſion to lay hand on one of their ſwords, with which he ſlew one of them and put the other to flight, ſo travelling on almoſt ſpent with hunger and thirſt, the next day he lighted upon a ſhepherd, a ſturdy knave, who hearing of the Hungarians overthrow, was roaming abroad in hope of prey; at his firſt ſight of Huniades he ſtood at Gaze, ſtricken with his majeſty; Huniades alſo being ſo extreme weak deſired not to have to do with him; at laſt the ſhepherd bluntly asked him of his fortune, and he for God's ſake craved ſomething to eat, the ſhepherd moved with the promiſe of reward, brought him to a poor cote hard by, and cauſed bread and water with a few onions to be ſet before him, who afterwards at his banquets would pleaſantly ſay, ' That he never in his life fared better, nor more daintily, then when he ſupped with this ſhepherd.' Thus refreſhed he went to Synderovia, which the Deſpot having intelligence of, cauſed him to be apprehended and impriſoned, yet at laſt releaſed him upon certain conditions; but ſhortly after the Deſpots country being invaded by the Turks, he ſent to Huniades craving pardon for his offence, and humbly entreating aid of him, which Huniades readily granted, going himſelf with his forces, and joining with the Deſpot, he marched ſpeedily againſt the Turks, who eſpying Huniades enſigne in the Chriſtians army, as men wholly diſcouraged, betook themſelves to ſpeedy flight after whom followed the Chriſtians, with moſt bloody execution, purſuing them all that day; and had not the night come on, few of them had eſcaped. The general and moſt of the Turk's chief commanders were taken priſoners; then Huniades entered far into Bulgary, burnt the chief city, and having well revenged himſelf of the Turks, he returned with triumph to Buda.

Amurath being dead, and Mahomet ſucceeding him, having taken the great city of Conſtantinople, his next deſign was againſt Belgrade, which ſtands upon the great river of Danubius, and was the key of Hungary, which, being taken, would lead him into the heart of that country, and for that end he raiſed an army of an hundred and fifty thouſand of his beſt ſoldiers, and ſent before him two hundred ſhips and gallies up the river, to prevent the victualling of the city by water; and preſently after came himſelf with all his army, and ſat down before it, and with the fury of his artillery overthrew a great part of the wall, which the defendants with great induſtry ſpeedily repaired.

Huniades alſo ſent a fleet of ſhips, which encountering with the Turk's fleet, took twenty ſail of them, and ſo terrified the reſt, that they were glad to run themſelves a ground near to the Turk's camp, all which were preſently ſet on fire that they ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians.

Huniades being thus maſter of the river, himſelf with five thouſand valiant ſoldiers entered into the city: Mahomet reſolved to gain the city, and having made a great breach, appointed the next day to give a general aſſault, but whilſt he was preparing for it, Carazias Baſſa his lieutenant general was ſlain with a great ſhot from the town, with which the proud tyrant was exceedingly troubled, yet went on with his purpoſe, and the Janizaries his beſt ſoldiers, without any great reſiſtance entered the breach, the like did others in many parts of the city, whereupon they reckoned that it as their own: but the valiant Huniades iſſuing out on every ſide with his moſt reſolute ſol-

ders, ſo oppreſſed the Turks, that few of them that were entered the city eſcaped, but either were ſlain or taken priſoners, and the reſt with exceeding ſlaughter were beaten from the walls: preſently alſo in this confuſion, Huniades ſallied out of the town ſet upon the Turks that guarded their great ordinance, whom with great ſlaughter he drave from their charge, and enforced them to leave them to their enemies.

Mahomet ſeeing this, couragiouſly charged the Hungarians afreſh to have recovered his ordinance, but was ſo valiantly repulſed by Huniades, and beaten with murdering ſhot from the town, that he was glad when he was got into his trenches: Huniades alſo turned their own ordinance againſt their camp, with which he did them no ſmall harm; and being ſtrengthened with a new ſupply of Chriſtians, he aſſailed the Turks trenches, at which the proud tyrant never before ſo braved, iſſued out, valiantly encountring him, beat him back again to the great ordinance, from whence he was again by the chriſtians beaten to his trenches.

In theſe hot ſkirmiſhes the captain of the Janizaries, with many other valiant men, were ſlain, and Mahomet alſo himſelf was ſo ſore wounded under the left pap, that he was carried into his pavillion for dead: but coming again to himſelf, conſidering that he had loſt his whole fleet, his great ordinance, and forty thouſand of his beſt officers and ſoldiers, ſecretly in the night he aroſe with his army, and in great ſilence ſhamefully departed, ſtill looking behind when the Hungarians ſhould have purſued him, which for want of horſe they could not do.

Shortly after, this moſt valiant and renowned captain Huniades, worthy of immortal praiſe, grew mortally ſick of a wound received in thoſe fights, who feeling himſelf in danger of death, deſired to receive the ſacrament, and would in any caſe (ſick as he was) be carried to the church to receive it, ſaying, 'it is not fit that the Lord ſhould come to the houſe of his ſervant, but that the ſervant ſhould rather go to the houſe of his Lord and maſter,' and ſhortly after he reſigned up his ſpirit to God, Anno Chriſti 1456.

He was much lamented and honourably buried in Alba Julia in ſaint Stevens church.

He was prudent of wit, diſcreet in counſel, expert and politick in war, prompt of hand, very circumſpect and wary before he attempted any thing, but very quick and expeditious when once reſolved. He maintained war againſt two mighty and puiſſant emperors of the Turks, Amurath and Mahomet the great; and through the Lord's might, he defended all Panonia againſt them, and was as a mighty wall, or bulwark to all Europe againſt the cruel Turks, the enemies of Chriſt and his Chriſtians, and therefore he was called the thunderbolt and terror of the Turks; neither was there ever any Chriſtian king or prince, that got ſo many victories, and ſo profitable for Chriſtendom, as he did.

The Life of GEORGE CASTRIOT, alias SCANDERBEG, King of Epirus, who died Anno Chriſti 1466.

JOHN the father of this George, was deſcended of an ancient family, which had long reigned in Epyrus, or Albania, a part of Macedonia; yet he ſurmounted his predeceſſors, in prudence, gravity and magnanimity; in corporal beauty, and comelineſs of perſon, and in many virtuous endowments: his mother was Voiſava, daughter of the king of the Tribullians, a woman for beauty, wiſdom and excellency of ſpirit, ſurpaſſing moſt of her ſex. God bleſſed theſe perſons with nine children; four ſons, and five daughters, whereof this George was the youngeſt upon whoſe right arm when he was born, appeared the form of a ſword, as naturally imprinted, as if it had been engraven by the hands of a cunning workman.

About this time the Ottoman empire had extended itſelf into Europe, and Amurath the Great Turk having long afflicted Macedonia with a terrible and tedious war. John Caſtriot, amongſt other princes, was fain to ſue him for peace; which he obtained, upon condition, that he ſhould deliver to him all his ſons in hoſtage, which, though it was very grievous, yet neceſſity forced aſſent.

Thus was George, with his other brethren, delivered to the Great Turk, who faithfully promiſed well and honourably to entreat them. but this miſcreant having them in his power, falſified his oath, and cauſed them to be circumciſed, giving to George, (in whom ſomething more than ordinary appeared) at his circumciſion, the name of SCANDERBEG, i. e. Lord Alexander.

He was about nine years old; and Amurath taking a liking to him, appointed him good maſters and inſtructers, under whom he quickly learned the Turkiſh, Arabian, Greek, Italian, and Sclavonian languages: and, as his ſtrength encreaſed, he acquainted himſelf with all thoſe virtuous exerciſes which might fit him for the war: and, ſometimes with his ſword, ſometimes with his bow, on horſe-back and foot, he gave forth incredible proofs of agility and readineſs of body, and of a forward and courageous ſpirit: hereupon the ſultan made him a ſanziak, and colonel of five thouſand horſe. His brethren alſo proving very good ſoldiers, he employed them in ſeveral parts of his empire.

Scanderbeg being eighteen years old, was ſent by Amurath into Natolia; where, in his firſt enterprize, his virtue and good ſucceſs in war appeared, and he returned victorious: and afterwards, he, with his regiment, always made one in all enterprizes; and the good ſucceſs was, by the common conſent of all the ſoldiery, ſtill caſt upon him, without the mention of other commanders. And new troubles ariſing in Aſia, he, at thoſe years, was choſen general of the whole army; and hereby he did eaſily ſurmount the glory of his former acts, by the quick and ſpeedy defeat of his enemies. Amurath wondered not ſo much at his happy ſucceſs, as at his wiſdom and prudence.

About this time came a giant like Scythian to the court, demanding if there were any that durſt encounter him in arms, and prove himſelf in fight againſt him. Amurath proclaimed, and promiſed to the conqueror a great reward, to encourage his men to undertake the combat; but when every one abhorred the purchaſe of honour upon ſuch deſperate conditions, (for they were to fight in their ſhirts, in a narrow place, with their ſwords only) Scanderbeg ſtepping to him, ſaid, 'Either ſhalt thou not, O Scythian, bear away this prize and glory; or elſe, being made glorious by my death, thou ſhalt be enriched with theſe ſpoils and ornaments,' &c. In the duel, Scanderbeg ſlew the Scythian, without receiving the leaſt wound from him; and, preſenting his head to Amurath, received the reward of his victory.

Afterwards two Perſians, of a fair and goodly ſtature, came, and made the like challenge to fight on horſeback; and when all refuſed, he took up the gantlet againſt them; and whereas, contrary to agreement, after his firſt courſe, they both aſſaulted him together, he ſo acquitted himſelf, that he ſlew them both, and preſented their heads to Amurath: and both, by the emperor and his baſſas, was admired and rewarded with great and bountiful preſents.

If at any time he was employed againſt the Chriſtians, and he could not evade it without ſuſpicion, he uſed to pray to God that it might be far from him to purchaſe honour by ſhedding the blood of Chriſtians; and therefore he ever ſought as little as might be to endamage them, and gave them opportunity to ſave themſelves. Whatſoever money came to his hands, he diſtributed it bountifully amongſt his ſoldiers.

About this time died John Caſtriot in Epyre, which Amurath hearing of, ſeized upon his kingdom, put garriſons into all the cities and ſtrong holds, and poiſoned all the brethren of Scanderbeg, which was an extreme grief to him, yet durſt he not diſcover the leaſt ſigns of it, but carried himſelf as if he had preferred Amurath before them all.

Yet the tyrant grew jealous of him, and put him upon all deſperate ſervices, hoping that by his forwardneſs he would periſh in ſome of them; yet knowing how much intereſt he had in the affections of the men of war, he carried fair weather towards him. But rather, the admirable providence of God in preſerving of him is to be taken notice of, for the tyrant wanted not will, nor power, nor opportunities, nor provocations from his court paraſites to have taken his life, but the Lord preſerved him to be the deliverer of his people, a bulwark to the Chriſtians, and a ſcourge to that proud Ottoman empire in her greateſt height and glory.

Not long after Amurath fell out with Vladiſlaus king of Hungary, for aſſiſting the deſpot of Miſia; and thereupon raiſing an army of eighty thouſand men, he ſent Carambey the baſſa of Romania, with Scanderbeg, and twenty thouſand men, to invade the Hungarians, and himſelf following with the body of his army.

Vladiſlaus, with great Huniades, that famous captain, prepared an army of thirty-five thouſand men to encounter him.

The baſſa encamped by the river of Moravia, Huniades not enduring this bravado, with ten thouſand men, leaving the king in his camp, paſſed the river to encounter with the barbarians, who, contemning his ſmall number, began the fight. Caſtriot (ſeing an opportunity to accompliſh what he had before determined) in the beginning of the battle, with his bands began to retreat, and afterwards fled, thereby ſtriking a fear into the other Turks, who ſoon fled alſo.

Scanderbeg having before imparted his purpoſe to his friends, eſpecially to his nephew Amaſe, as they fled thro' a wood, he laid hands upon the Turk's ſecretary, and cauſed him with threatenings to write letters in the name of Amurath, to the governor of Croia, the regal city of Epyrus, to deliver up his command into the hands of Scanderbeg, as deputed by him to have the command thereof, and then killing the ſecretary, he poſted, by very long journies into the upper Dibria, where ſending for ſome of the principal men of the town, he diſcovered himſelf and purpoſes to them, who unanimouſly aſſented to what he deſired, preſenting to him their eſtates and lives for the ſettling of him in his kingdom, and ſo taking good order for all his affairs, he haſtened towards Croia, ſending Amaſe before to carry news to the governor, and to certify him that Scanderbeg, with his train, was not far behind: he took with him his friends, and a ſelect number of Dibrians, and ſo entering into Croia, he delivered the packet, which being opened and read, was eaſily believed, and the governor prepared to depart. The night after, his men at arms, which he had left ſecretly near the town, were let in, with whom many of the citizens joined, who ſetting firſt upon the watch, and then on the garriſon, put moſt of them to the ſword; and ſo, having made himſelf maſter of Croia, he preſently ſent to Dibria, to give his friends notice of his ſucceſs, and to ſtir up that country, and their allies, to lay hold upon the opportunity for the recovery of their liberty: he alſo gave notice to all the country about Croia, ſtirring them up to take arms to free themſelves from the Turkiſh yoke, who readily, and with much joy received him, and came ſo flocking in, that he quickly had a good troop of reſolute and courageous ſoldiers, with whom he preſently marched to Dibria, where Amaſe alſo had raiſed another company: then he appointed two thouſand men to guard the frontiers, and with the reſt he went into baſe Dibria, where a noble and brave captain (Moſes Galome) came to him, that afterwards did him excellent ſervice.

In the mean while, many of the Turks in thoſe parts aſſembled together to fight with him, but were eaſily vanquiſhed and moſt of them put to the ſword. Then Scanderbeg employing his captains to raiſe all the forces they could, and many noblemen of his kindred, with their followers, coming to him, he quickly had an army of twelve thouſand ſoldiers, well appointed, with theſe he marched to Petrella, a ſtrong garriſon of the Turks, ſituate upon the top of a ſteep rocky mountain; and, partly with fair words, partly with terrible threats, he ſo far wrought upon the governor, that he ſurrendered the place to him, and with his garriſon departed out of it. From thence, having garriſoned the place, he marched, though in the froſt and ſnow, to Petralba, ſituated upon the top of a mountain alſo, as were all the cities of Epyrus, there the governor was content upon the ſame terms to quit the place; and from thence Scanderbeg went to Stelluſa, to which he proffered the ſame terms as he gave to the other; the ſoldiers were willing to accept of them, but the governor oppoſed, but at laſt they laid hold on him, and delivered him bound to Scanderbeg, and ſo departed; upon this news all the weaker garriſons eaſily yielded to him. Then he went to Sfetigrade, where he attempted to have entered by a treaty, but the garriſon ſtanding out ſtoutly againſt him, and the depth of winter being come, he left Moſes with three thouſand horſe to block it up, and to have an eye to the frontiers, and ſo he retired to Croia, where he diſbanded his army, till there was further occaſion: then he betook himſelf to the ſervice of God, and ſettling of his civil affairs; but preſently came news from Moſes, that many of the Turks were gathered together near unto him. Whereupon Scanderbeg taking his followers, and an hundred horſe, went ſtraight thither, which the Turks hearing of, preſently ſcattered: Scanderbeg then took a thouſand horſe, that were with Moſes, and made an inroad into Macedonia, ſpoiling all the country, and returned loaden with the prey.

By this time Amurath heard of his eſcape, and of all that he had done in Epyrus, which exceedingly grieved and vexed him: whereupon, calling a council, he made peace with the Hungarians, and bent all his thoughts againſt Scanderbeg. In the mean while Scanderbeg aſſembles a parliament of all the eſtates of Epyrus, at Lyſſa, where he was choſen general of their forces.

The ſpring coming on, Scanderbeg levied his forces, and took the field with ſix thouſand men, and ſo marched to Sfetigrade; but the garriſon continuing obſtinate, he ſpoiled the country, that they might have no proviſion; and then, with his army, he marched into Mocrea, a pleaſant and fruitful country, which he quickly ſubdued, and added it into his dominions. This further inceaſing Amurath, he commanded a puiſſant army to be levied, which Scanderbeg hearing of, by his friends at court, he ſtrengthened himſelf by confederating with his neighbours; and in the mean time Sfetigrade was ſurrendered to Moſes.

Amurath having raiſed an army of forty thouſand choice horſe, committed them to the leading of Hali Baſſa, one of his moſt valiant and experienced captains: with the report whereof the common people of Epyrus were extremely affrighted, betaking themſelves to prayer for deliverance from ſo eminent a danger. many alſo flocked to Scanderbeg to ſerve under him, out of whom he choſe eight thouſand horſe, and ſeven thouſand foot, and diſmiſſed the reſt. With this army, after prayers made to God, he went into the lower Dibria, where he heard daily of the approach of his enemies: hereupon he cauſed Graſe Muſach and Amaſe, with three thouſand horſe to lie in ambuſcado; which was no ſooner done but the Turks began to approach, pitching their camp near to Scanderbeg, yet knew not that he was ſo nigh them. Scanderbeg having appointed good watch, bad the reſt of his men betake themſelves to their reſt. The Turks having diſcovered him, grew very inſolent, and coming near the Chriſtians camp, began to revile them, and challenge them to the battle. Scanderbeg made his men to be quiet till the riſing of the moon, then he cauſed them to refreſh themſelves with food; and ſo ſome of them to iſſue forth to ſkirmiſh with the Turks, in the mean time he ordered his battle.

Hali Baſſa, contemning the ſmall number of his enemies, gave the firſt charge with a ſmall troop of horſe, who, after they had charged, retired, hoping that the Chriſtians, with eager purſuit, would diſorder their battle; but Scanderbeg, finding their policy, kept his men in good order. So both armies coming on, the wings began the battle afreſh; Scanderbeg bringing on the main battle in the face of the baſſa, valiantly charged him. No ſooner were the battles thoroughly joined, but the ambuſcado brake out, and charged the rear ward of the Turks, making ſuch a ſlaughter, that ſome of them began to flye. Thus was the baſſa's great army diſtreſſed by a few. But he having placed his beſt ſoldiers neareſt to himſelf, with them renewed the fight, ſo that Scanderbeg's fortune was at a ſtand, till Uranacoute's coming on with ſome freſh troops from the rear, brake through the baſſa's army, with incredible ſlaughter of them; ſo that the Turks ſeeing their fellows lying by heaps, wallowing in their own blood, betook themſelves to flight, whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing, ſlew two and twenty thouſand of them, took two thouſand priſoners, and four and twenty enſigns of of the Turks; and ſo horſing all his foot ſoldiers with the horſes of the ſlain Turks, he made a road into Macedonia, laying all waſte before him, and returned with a rich booty, beſides all the ſpoils gotten in the Turk's camp, and with it went back to Croia, where he was received with wonderful joy.

Hali Baſſa, with the remainder of his men, returned to Adrianople, where he had much ado to make his peace with the ſultan, who was almoſt ready to make away himſelf for his great loſſes before in Hungary, and now in Epyrus.

About this time the pope's legate perſuaded the king of Hungary to break his league lately made with Amurath, ſaying, That faith was not to be kept with infidels and miſcreants; and he abſolved the king and his nobles from their oath to the great Turk; and thereupon great preparations were made, and a great army raiſed, whereof Hunniades was made the lieutenant general. The king of Hungary alſo wrote to Scanderbeg, to come and join his forces with them; which Scanderbeg, after a council held with his princes, aſſented unto: and raiſing a potent army, and ſeeking to God by prayer for a proſperous journey, he marched towards Hungary. But God intending to chaſtiſe the perjury of the Hungarians, and to preſerve Scanderbeg from having any hand in ſo horrid a ſin, ſtirred up the deſpot of Miſia, a very Atheiſt, to deny him paſſage through his country; whereupon Scanderbeg reſolved to force it, though it was like to prove a difficult work: and indeed, before he could do it, the Turks and Hungarians had fought a dreadful battle, wherein many were ſlain, and, amongſt others, Vladiſlaus, with his perjured nobles, and the Chriſtian army, was wholly overthrown. The news whereof coming to Scanderbeg, he was ſo grieved and enraged alſo at the deſpot, that he ſpoiled his country with fire and ſword, and ſo returned home again.

Amurath hearing of the ſpoil that Scanderbeg had made in Macedonia, reſolved in the next place to take him to task; but firſt he ſought to undermine him by treachery, and offers of peace and amity, writing to him for that purpoſe. But Scanderbeg being well acquainted with his wiles, wrote back to him, rejecting his proffered peace. Amurath was much incenſed at this, and hearing that Scanderbeg had diſmiſſed his army, and kept the field only with his horſe, who alſo ranged up and down careleſsly after prey, he ſent for Pereſey Baſſa, a captain of a fierce and ready ſpirit, and loading him with promiſes if he returned victor, he gave him nine thouſand horſe, all choſen and picked men, commanding him ſpeedily and ſecretly to enter into Epyrus, before the enemy were aware; who accordingly proceeded, and promiſed to himſelf victory before he came thither: but all this was not concealed from Scanderbeg, who ſuddenly went and ſeized on a narrow valley called Mocrea, which the Turks of neceſſity muſt paſs through; where, hiding his men in woods and rocks, till the Turks were entangled on all ſides, they then violently brake out upon them, killing and ſlaying of them at their pleaſure: the Turks made ſtout reſiſtance, but their horſes in that place rather hindered than helped them, ſo that the greateſt number of them were ſlain, and the reſt, throwing away their arms, upon their knees craved mercy, and had it, and ſo were made priſoners.

Pereſey, almoſt in the beginning of the fight, ſeeing his men incloſed and ſlaughtered, and not knowing his enemies number, turned back with thoſe troops that were about him, and ſo eſcaped, yet was purſued by the Chriſtians, and loſt many in his flight. Amurath, when he heard of it, was marvelouſly troubled and perplexed, bending all his thoughts againſt Scanderbeg; and therefore preſently ſent Muſtapha, a politic and hardy captain, with a new ſupply of ſix thouſand ſoldiers, to take Pereſey's charge, commanding him in no caſe to enter far into Epyrus, but to burn and ſpoil the frontiers of it; who accordingly coming into the valley of Mocrea, pitched his camp upon the ſide of an hill, placed his ſcouts upon the top of the mountains, kept four thouſand horſe with himſelf in his camp, and ſent nine thouſand abroad to ſpoil the country.

Scanderbeg drawing near to the valley with four thouſand horſe, and one thouſand foot, was informed of all theſe paſſages, and ſeeing that policy was not to be uſed againſt ſo wary an enemy, he reſolved to aſſault him ſuddenly in his trenches, before his diſperſed troops could retire to him; and ſo entering the valley, he was preſently diſcovered, and warning given to Muſtapha, who endeavoured to call back his men, and ſome that were near haſted to him. Scanderbeg's ſoldiers followed them at the heels, and aſſaulted them in their trenches, beat them from them, and fell pell mell upon them, filling all their camp with fear and ſlaughter. Muſtapha ſeeing that all was like to be loſt, eſcaped, at the port which was furtheſt from the enemy, ſome of his men alſo following him; five thouſand Turks were ſlain, three hundred taken; and Scanderbeg loſt but twenty horſemen, and fifty footmen.

Muſtapha afterwards obtained another great army of Amurath, with which he went againſt Scanderbeg, who lying at the ſiege of Dayna againſt the Venetians, had preſent information ſent him from his garriſons upon the frontiers of Epyrus, whom he commanded by a ſpeedy meſſenger in no wiſe to encounter with the enemy, but to keep themſelves in their ſtrong holds till his coming; and ſo leaving Amaſe to continue the ſiege, he took five hundred horſe, and a thouſand five hundred footmen, with which he haſted to the relief of his garriſons. Muſtapha had ſought by all means to draw forth Scanderbeg's men out of their holds; but ſeeing that they would not ſtir, he began to burn and ſpoil all the country, till hearing of Scanderbeg's approach, he called all his army together, and encamped within two miles of him. Scanderbeg drawing ſome forces out of his garriſons, had in all four thouſand horſe, and two thouſand foot, with which having ſtrengthened his trenches, he left three hundred for the guard of them, and iſſuing forth with the reſt he placed them in order of battle. Muſtapha did the like; but before the battle began, there came from the Turks a man at arms, in rich and gallant furniture, challenging any one of the Chriſtians to fight hand to hand with him. Paul Maneſſi thereupon ſtepped to Scanderbeg, deſiring leave that he might accept the challenge, and chaſtiſe the proud Turk, which Scanderbeg aſſenting to, and praying for his ſucceſs, he preſently mounted on horſeback, rode forth to the Turk, bidding him to prepare himſelf to the battle; both generals agreed upon the laws for the combat, and ſo the champions taking their courſe, ran each at other with their ſpears, and Maneſſi ran the Turk through the head, and ſo ſlew him, and then alighting he ſtruck off his head, took his armour, and returned to the camp loaden with his ſpoils. Scanderbeg's men were much encouraged with this good omen, and the Turks as much affrighted; whereupon Scanderbeg preſently marched forward againſt them, and charged the Turks with ſuch fury that they preſently began to retire. Muſtapha ſeeing that, put ſpurs to his horſe, reſolving to win the field or die: moſt of his chief captains did the like, which a little renewed the battle, but preſently Muſtapha and twelve of his chief men were taken priſoners, the reſt ſlain and ſcattered: there were killed of the Turks ten thouſand men, and fifteen enſigns taken: the Chriſtians loſt but three hundred; they found a rich prey in the Turk's camp. Yet did Scanderbeg make an inroad into Macedonia, ſpoiled and took a great booty, then left two thouſand horſe, and one thouſand foot for the guard of his frontiers, and ſo returned to the ſiege of Dayna.

Shortly after the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg; and Amurath ſent him rich preſents, with five and twenty thouſand duckets to redeem his captains, whom Scanderbeg had uſed honourably, and ſent them away with a ſafe convoy: the money he divided amongſt his ſoldiers, and then he made another inroad into Macedonia and dividing his army into three parts; he laid all waſte, and brought away a rich prey, that he might leave nothing for the relief of his enemies when they returned again. Amurath was ſo incenſed herewith, that he reſolved to ſend no more of his captains, but to go in his own perſon, with ſuch an hoſt, that ſhould fill every corner of Epyrus, and make an eaſy conqueſt of it. Scanderbeg either having intelligence, or ſuſpecting the worſt, when he heard of ſuch great preparations, advertiſed his Chriſtian neighbours to ſtand upon their guard, and muſtered up all his men, took up all the provisions through Epyrus, wherewith he stored his garrisons, and thrust most of the common people, with their provisions, into his strong holds, leaving nothing to relieve his enemies.

Then bending his chiefest care for his regal city of Croia, he placed in it a garrison of one thousand three hundred old soldiers, sent away all the citizens that could not bear arms, into the Venetian territories, who, after earnest prayers and supplications made unto God, departed with heavy hearts.

Out of all his bands he chose ten thousand expert soldiers for a field army; he made Uranacontes, a famous captain, governor of Croia; and so with his army marched into Dibria, and by the way he met with Moses, who had taken the like care for Sfetigrade as he had done for Croia. But Scanderbeg fearing that that city would be first assaulted, went thither, made a speech to the soldiers and citizens, exhorting them to be valiant and faithful, &c.

In the mean time Amurath had assembled his army, consisting of an hundred and fifty thousand, well furnished with all things needful, with which he set forwards towards Epyrus, sending forty thousand horse before, to begin the siege before Sfetigrade; the news whereof coming to Scanderbeg, he marched thitherward also with four thousand horse and one thousand foot: and having from the mountains viewed the encamping of the enemy, the night following, with much secrefy, he brought his men in the coverts of the woods and vallies, near unto them: the next morning he sent out Moses and thirty others, well mounted, driving some horses laden with corn before them, which the Turks espying, they sent out the like number to surprize them; but Moses and his men set upon them, seeing no more, and slew five of them, and chased the rest to the camp. hereupon the Turk's general sent out four thousand horse after them, these Moses drew along till they were within the compass of Scanderbeg's ambush, who presently rising out of the coverts, set upon them, slew two thousand of them, took a thousand horse: and of the Christians were lost but two and twenty men. Eight days after came Amurath with all his army, in the beginning of May, in the year 1449 and encamped before the city. His first work was to summon the city, and to seek to corrupt the governor; but that not prevailing, he planted his ordinance, and having made a breach in the walls, gave a terrible assault to it; but the garrison gave them as valiant a repulse: and though the assault was renewed again and again, yet still they were repulsed; so that Amurath at last caused the retreat to be sounded. There were many other assaults given, during which time Scanderbeg was still in action, setting upon the Turk's camp, sometimes in one quarter, sometimes in another, and then presently departed, so that Amurath wondered what was become of him.

The siege continuing to the end of June, Scanderbeg brought all his army towards the Turk's camp, and understanding by his espials, that they lay in great security there, the night following he set upon one of their quarters, and slew two thousand of them, and so retired, having taken two hundred and thirty horse, and seven of their ensigns, with the loss of two and forty men.

Amurath resolving to shew his wrath upon the city by a general assault, appointed twelve thousand horse and six thousand foot under Feri Bassa, to attend Scanderbeg; in the mean time promising great rewards to those that should first ascend the walls, and enter the city. There was also a great tower of wood made equal with the walls of the city, so that they fought as upon even ground; and the Turks pressing hard upon the Christians, advanced their ensigns upon the walls; but Perlat the governor coming with a company of fresh soldiers, beat them back, took their ensigns, fired their tower of wood, and so delivered the city.

Scanderbeg in the mean time came with nine thousand soldiers to assault their camp; but Feri Bassa contemning his small number, encountered with him, and withal sent four thousand horse to compass him in behind; but this matter of his art leaving Moses in the front, took two thousand horse to meet them, and so fought with them, that they had no great cause to boast of their coming; he slew also Feri Bassa, fighting with him hand to hand, and drove the rest back to the camp, making a great slaughter of them: yet Amurath continued his assault against the city till night came on, in which he lost seven thousand men, besides the wounded: of the garrison were slain only seventy, and ninety more hurt.

Amurath not prevailing by force, sought by large promises to corrupt the garrison, and at last so far prevailed with one base minded traitor, that for a great sum of money he concluded to betray the city, and for that end he cast a great dog into the only well which served the whole city, which being in the morning found by the soldiers, they, upon a superstitious conceit, refused to drink any more of the water, notwithstanding all the persuasions and arguments that the governor could use, insomuch as he was forced to make a composition with Amurath, and then delivered up the city to him, and so marched away through the Turk's camp in safety; only Mahomet, a prince of a fierce disposition, would have persuaded his father Amurath to have put them all to the sword, which yet he refused. The traitor remaining in the city was richly rewarded by Amurath, according to his promise, but within a few days, was secretly, at his command, made away, as a just recompense for his traiterous wickedness.

Amurath placed in Sfetigrade a thousand two hundred Janizaries in garrison, and so raising his camp, in the beginning of September, returned home, having lost thirty thousand of his soldiers in that expedition. Scanderbeg followed him at the heels, and in many straits and passes assaulted him, whereby he slew many more of his men; and then he besieged Sfetigrade, and gave two great assaults to it: but hearing that Amurath was re-assembling his army, and winter growing on, he left it, spending the winter in setting all things in order, and preparing for the next summer's war, having intelligence that Amurath made extraordinary preparations against the next spring; which being come, he had gotten together an army of an hundred and sixty thousand men strong; and so dispatching away forty thousand horsemen under the conduct of Sebalias, a politic captain, to encamp before Croia, and not to venture any thing against Scanderbeg, himself followed, with the rest of his great army; and when he was come, he sent to summon the city, and made mighty proffers to Uranocontes the governor of it, if he would surrender is to him; but the messenger was sent back with scorn and contempt: whereupon Amurath ordered ten great battering pieces to be cast, and with them battered the city for four days space, in two places, without intermission, so that he beat down much of the wall, which exceedingly encouraged the Turks to make an assault; and Mahomet, besides the large proffers made by his father, promised ten thousand aspers to him that should first advance his ensign upon the wall; the Christians within were nothing discouraged, but, trusting in God, resolved to defend it to the utmost.

Just as the Turks began the assault, Scanderbeg, with five thousand men, brake into one of their quarters, and, at the first encounter, slew six hundred of them, and was spoiling their tents; but Mahomet with his guard, and four thousand more, sent by Amurath, hastening thither, Moses also (having done them much harm) retreated with his men to the mountains, whilst Scanderbeg, in the heat of the fight, had so far engaged himself amongst the Turks, that he was in much danger to be slain, or taken prisoner; but at length, resolutely breaking through them, he escaped, and came to his camp, to their great joy and comfort. Then Amurath caused the assault to be renewed with more fury, and continued it till almost night, in which he lost eight thousand men, without any considerable damage to the garrison.

Mahomet hearing where Scanderbeg was encamped, took all the best soldiers in the camp, and lodged in that quarter which was next him, hoping at his next assault thereby to entrap him; which Scanderbeg being by fugitives informed of, appointed Moses, the night following, with five hundred horse, to alarm that quarter, and then to retire to his camp, whilst himself, with the rest of his men, going through by-ways, brake in on the other side of the Turk's army, where he made such havock amongst them, that their loss in the storm was forgotten in compa-

riſon of this; and then fearing to be oppreſſed with multitude, he retired to his camp. The next morning Amurath encouraged his men again to make a new aſſault, which they did perform with much fury, and continued it long by freſh ſupplies; but they were ſo bravely repulſed by the Chriſtians, that at laſt he ſounded the retreat, grieving much to ſee ſo many of his men ſlain. His next deſign was to undermine the city, and as he was doing of it, a great convoy of victuals coming towards his camp, Scanderbeg having intelligence of it, met the convoy, ſlew them, and divided the proviſion amongſt his own ſoldiers; and having encreaſed his army with two thouſand recruits, he divided it into three parts giving one to Moſes, another to Tanuſie, and took the third himſelf, appointing in the dead of the night to aſſault the Turk's camp in three parts; but himſelf being diſcovered by the ſcouts, whilſt all men ran to that ſide, Moſes and Tanuſie brake into two other parts, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoil. In the mean time Scanderbeg retreated, and ſat down on the ſide of a hill, in the ſight of the Turk's army, which they taking as a bravado, requeſted leave of Amurath to go againſt him; and accordingly they iſſued out ſeven thouſand horſe, and five thouſand foot of their beſt ſoldiers.

Scanderbeg ſeeing their approach, retreated ſoftly, waiting for Moſes and Tanuſie's coming to him: the Turks followed with much difficulty, till perceiving the other forces coming, they began to retreat; whereupon Scanderbeg charged them with much fury, and ſlew many of them. Moſes alſo came upon them, killing ſome, and taking many priſoners in ſight of the Turk's camp, and ſo retreated again into the mountains. All Amurath's hopes failing, he ſent a baſſa to the governor of Croia, to try, if by large and glorious promiſes he could win him to ſurrender the city. But Uranocontes ſcorning the preſents which he brought, and the promiſes that he made, charged him, that neither he nor any other ſhould preſume to come to him any more; but if they did, he would cut off their hands, noſes, and ears, and ſo return them to their maſter.

Hereupon Amurath, in a great rage, commanded all things to be prepared for a new ſtorm, which the next day he put in execution; but, to his own great loſs, the Chriſtians valiantly defending themſelves againſt the Turk's fury: this put him almoſt out of his wits, that he pulled off his hair; and though his baſſa's endeavoured to comfort him, yet he became ſick of grief, that a ſmall town ſhould eclipſe all his former glory: and finding that his end approached, he called his ſon and great captains, charging them not to leave his death unrevenged; and ſo ſhortly after he gave up the ghoſt.

After whoſe death Mahomet preſently raiſed the ſiege, and returned to Adrianople; yet ſhortly after ſent ambaſſadors to Scanderbeg, proffering peace if he would pay him a certain tribute. Which motion Scanderbeg ſcornfully rejected, and ſo diſmiſſed the ambaſſadors; and preſently after he made an inroad into the Turkiſh dominions, which he grievouſly waſted, and returned home loaden with ſpoil. But Mahomet to requite him, ſent Ameſa, one of his beſt captains, with twelve thouſand horſemen, to do the like in Epyrus; which Scanderbeg underſtanding by his eſpials, he lay cloſe in ambuſh with ſix thouſand ſoldiers, upon the great mountain Modriſſa, over which the Turks were to paſs; who, with much difficulty, having almoſt got to the top thereof in the night, were ſuddenly charged by Scanderbeg's footmen, who made a great ſlaughter of them, their horſes being rather an hinderance than an help to them, ſo that they were driven down the mountain amain; and when they came to the foot of it, they were again charged by Scanderbeg and Moſes, who with their horſemen were ſet in places of advantage; hereby they were totally routed, ſeven thouſand ſlain, and Ameſa, with moſt of the beſt captains, taken priſoners, with whom he returned with great joy to Croia, uſing his priſoners very courteouſly. Ameſa deſired of him, that he might ſend to Mahomet, to inform him of their ſtate, which he aſſented unto, and ſet their ranſom at thirteen thouſand duckets. Mahomet ſtormed extremely at this diſaſter, and refuſed to ranſom the priſoners; yet afterwards, by the perſuaſion of his baſſas, he ſent it, with other rich preſents to Scanderbeg: whereupon he ſent them back with a ſafe convoy, and divided the money amongſt his ſoldiers.

The proud tyrant reſolved revenge, and therefore ſent Debreas, one of his beſt captains, loaden with promiſes of great preferment, if he prevailed againſt Scanderbeg, and under him fourteen thouſand choice horſemen, which were as many as Debreas deſired, and with which he promiſed to chaſtiſe Scanderbeg. Scanderbeg having intelligence hereof, reſolved not to ſtay his coming into Epyrus, but to meet him by the way: and ſo taking ſix thouſand horſemen, he went into the enemies country, and came by night into a great plain where the Turks lay, hoping not to have been diſcovered; but the moon ſhining bright, the ſcouts had diſcovered him, and gave the alarm to their camp, and Debreas mindful of his promiſe to his Lord, ſent out ſome troops to ſkirmiſh with him, while he ſet the reſt of his army in order. Scanderbeg ſent out ſome to encounter them; and ere long both armies charged each other with much reſolution; and Debreas did ſo encourage his men, and fought ſo valiantly, that Scanderbeg's fortune ſeemed to be at a ſtand. Thus both ſides did their uttermoſt to conquer, one while one party prevailing, and then the other, till at laſt Scanderbeg encountred hand to hand with Debreas, and ſlew him, with whoſe fall the army was diſcouraged and fled, whom the Chriſtians eagerly purſuing, ſlew more in the chaſe than in the battle; for of the Turks were ſlain one thouſand one hundred and twenty; but of the Chriſtians very few. Scanderbeg returned thanks to God for that great and doubtful victory, dividing the ſpoil and priſoners amongſt his ſoldiers; and ſo returned with great joy to Croia.

At the report of this defeat, Mahomet grew very melancholy; whereupon his great Baſſa's offered to ſpend their lives in that ſervice; but the cratty tyrant intended to go another way to work, viz. to corrupt ſome of Scanderbeg's chief commanders, which would eaſilieſt turn to his ruin. And amongſt others fingling out Moſes Galome, which was counted the beſt captain next to Scanderbeg himſelf, he found means ſecretly to ſend to him, proffering him ſtore of gold, and golden mountains, honours about himſelf, yea, the kingdom of Epyrus if he deſired it. Moſes was at laſt prevailed with, yet preſently left not Epyrus, but perſuaded Scanderbeg to beſiege Belgrade in the confines of Epyrus, which was held by the Turks, gives him hopes of an eaſy conqueſt. Scanderbeg deceived by him, made all things ready for the ſiege, and ſent to Alphonſus, king of Naples, his ſpecial friend, for ſome men that were verſed in managing of ſieges, which he obtained from him, and ſo ſat down before Belgrade, with an army of fourteeen thouſand brave men, and, in a ſhort time ſo diſtreſſed the city, that the Turks deſired truce for ſixteen days, promiſing that if relief came not in that ſpace, they would ſurrender the city to him. This Scanderbeg conſented to, and ſo himſelf encamped on a high hill with three thouſand horſe and one thouſand foot, and ſent Muſachius and Tanuſius with the reſt of his army into a great plain, where they might lie freelier in that hot ſeaſon, and withall appointed five and twenty ſcouts to keep continual watch towards the enemey's country.

Mahomet hearing of this ſiege, preſently diſpatched away Sebalias, a great captain, with forty thouſand horſe to relieve Belgrade, promiſing him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg alive or dead. This Baſſa by long journies prevented the fame of his coming, and drawing near to Scanderbeg's camp, he intrapped or corrupted his ſcouts, ſo that they gave no warning of the Turks approach: yea, he came ſo ſuddenly on that part of the army which lay on the plain, that they had not leiſure to bridle their horſes or put on their armour; Muſachius arming himſelf, endeavoured to order his men, ſeeing equal danger in flight, and therefore reſolved to ſell his life as dear as he could, but ſeeing his men ſlain by heaps about him, he endeavoured to have broken through and eſcaped to the mountains to Scanderbeg, but being oppreſſed with multitude, he continued fighting to the aſtoniſhment of his enemies, till he and all about him were ſlain. Tanuſius made divers brave attempts to have reſcued him, but finding it impoſſible, he exhorted his men to fly, yet moſt moſt of them were ſlain by the Turks in their flight.

Scanderbeg from the mountains ſaw this miſerable ſlaughter of his men, and would with his handful of ſoldiers have done to their reſcue or died with them, but was with-held by his captains, who told him, that he would thereby expoſe himſelf and them to certain deſtruction: Sebalias being in the purſuit of Tenaſius and his party, with moſt of his army, Scanderbeg came down ſuddenly upon the reſt, and ſlew them in an inſtant, and then followed at the tail of the Turks, did them much miſchief, till Sebalias gathering all his forces together, made head againſt him, yet Scanderbeg again charged them, and ſlew them with his own hand two brave champions which had before ſworn to Mahomet, to kill him if they met with him. The fight continued till the night parted them, and then both armies retreated, Sebalias to Belgrade-ward, and Scanderbeg towards Epyrus, whither he marched the next day, leaving good guards upon all the ſtraight paſſes, leaſt the Turks ſhould break into Epyrus; of Scandrebeg's men were ſlain five thouſand, but moſt of them the Italians that Alphonſus had ſent him, and the Turks loſt three thouſand; Sebalias repaired the battered walls of Belgrade, re-inforced the garriſon, and then returned with great triumph to Conſtantinople; being the firſt captain that ever gave a defeat to Scanderbeg; and he was received there with ſuch applauſe, as if he had conquered a whole kingdom, every man talking of the praiſes of Sebalias; and no preferment was thought too great, or reward ſufficient for him.

The poor Chriſtian captives taken by him, were ſome ſold for ſlaves, others impaled alive upon ſharp ſtakes, others hanged on iron hooks, and others cruelly tortured to death at the proud victor's pleaſure

Moſes hearing of this loſs, thought it a fit time for him to revolt in, and ſo went to Conſtantinople, where, by Mahomet he was joyfully received, and honourably entertained; Scanderbeg hearing of his revolt, was at firſt much aſtoniſhed, but after a while he ſaid no more, but that he wiſhed that all treaſon was together with Moſes gone out of Epyrus; Moſes much ſollicited Mahomet to continue his wars with Scanderbeg, promiſing to do great matters therein; yet the crafty tyrant durſt not at firſt truſt him too far, till in time he had diſcovered that his affections were wholly alienated from Scanderbeg.

Then the ſpring following, he gave him fifteen thouſand horſe, which were as many as he deſired, and furniſhed him with all other warlike proviſion, with which he marched into Dibria; Scanderbeg hearing of the coming of Moſes, and what ſtrength he had, ſtood not upon policy againſt him that had been privy to all his ſtratagems, but marched with true valour to encounter him; when the two battles were ready to join, a meſſenger came from the Turks, to ſee if any durſt prove his valour againſt a champion of the Turks hand to hand; the challenge was accepted, and the Turk appearing, Zacharie Groppa, having obtained leave of Scanderbeg, went out againſt him and after a ſhort parley, they ran with their lances each againſt other with ſuch fury, that both horſe and man were overturned; then nimbly recovering themſelves, they drew their ſcimitars, and encountered each other with ſuch ſturdy ſtroaks, that at laſt both their ſwords fell out of their hands, then grappling together, they wreſtled ſo long till Groppa overthrew his adverſary, and with his dagger thruſt him into his throat, then taking a ſword, he cut off his head, and returned loaden with his ſpoils to Scanderbeg, who moſt honourably rewarded him; the Chriſtians ſhouted for joy, and the Turks were as much diſcouraged; then came Moſes with a loud voice challenging Scanderbeg. But when he ſaw him preparing to meet him, he went back with ſhame to his army; then the ſignal of battle being given, both armies met, and fought furiouſly, and Moſes with his choice men attended Scanderbeg hoping to have killed him, and a curagious Turk with his horſeman's ſtaffe, bare him quite backward upon his horſe, ſo that the Turks ſhouted for joy, hoping that he had been ſlain; but Scanderbeg chaſed with ſuch an unwonted diſgrace, furiouſly aſſailed the Turk, and ſlew him; Moſes did what was poſſible to encourage his men, but ſeeing at laſt he muſt yield or die, he fled through by-ways to him well known, eleven thouſand of the Turks were ſlain, and not above one hundred of the Chriſtians, and eighty wounded, Moſes before admired, was now ſcorned by the Turks, and Mahomet would have put him to a cruel death, had not the Baſſa's enterceeded for him; beſides he was tormented in the conſcience of his own guilt, and ſo at laſt reſolved to eſcape, and caſt himſelf upon the mercy of Scanderbeg, and accordingly taking his opportunity, he fled, and coming to Scanderbeg with his girdle about his neck, he fell at his feet, and craved pardon; Scanderbeg took him up, and kiſſed him, reſtored his eſtate, honour and offices, forbidding any man to ſpeak to his diſgrace of what had formerly paſſed.

This vexed Mahomet exceedingly, yet returning to his former artifices, he enveigled Amaſe with the promiſe of the kingdom to revolt to him, who to give him the better aſſurance of his fidelity, carried his wife and children with him to Conſtantinople; there he was kindly entertained by Mahomet, and the ſpring following he ſent Iſaac the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople with fifteen thouſand into Epyrus, and with him Amaſe with five thouſand more, who was to be proclaimed king at their coming into Epyrus, to draw the people to them: Scanderbeg hearing of it, ſent for all his great captains into Dibria, where the ſtorm muſt firſt fall, and cauſing all the ſtore and cattle to be removed into ſtrong holds, he left all naked. By this time Iſaac was entered Epyrus, and Scanderbeg with ſix thouſand horſe, ſeeming to be affrighted with the great army of the Turks, fled towards Lyſſa in the Venetian territories, that thereby they might ſuſpect no ſubtility. Iſaac glade hereof, ſent out ſome troops after him, to mark which way he went, and ſo reſted his army after their long journey; the horſemen at their return certified him that Scanderbeg was fled out of Epyrus, and not an enemy to be ſeen in all the country.

Hereupon the Baſſa created Amaſe in the name of Mahomet, king of Epyrus, and ſo marched forward, yet commanding his men upon pain of death, not to break their ranks; at laſt he came to the famous Pharſalian plains. In the mean time Scanderbeg in the night had ſent ſome excellently well mounted, to the tops of the mountains, to give notice of the motions of the army of the Turks, and with his own army he conveyed himſelf ſecretly by night as near as he could unto them. The enemy finding ſome ſtragling cattle in thoſe plains, fell to ſeeking after booty as men without fear; and at night encamped without any great watch, but only towards Lyſſa, whither Scanderbeg went. The next morning the Baſſa came to the ſame mountain, on the other ſide whereof Scanderbeg lay, and there encamped with half his army, ſending Amaſe with the other half to burn and ſpoil the country.

Scanderbeg like a politic captain, divided his forces into three parts, one under Moſes, another under Tanuſius, the third he takes to himſelf, appointing every one his part, and what he ſhould do, and ſo marched to the top of the mountain, from whence he beheld how the Turks lay in the plains, eſpecially they which were lately returned from ſpoiling the country with Amaſe, how their horſes were unbridled, and unſadled, themſelves ſome reſting on the ground, others victualling of themſelves, others at ſeveral kinds of ſports, and many faſt aſleep on the graſs; the like negligence was in the Baſſa's camp, all being without fear of Scanderbeg, of whom they had heard nothing for many days.

Scanderbeg delighted with this ſight, placing more drums and trumpets in every part of his army, than ordinary; himſelf with ſome of his beſt horſemen, deſcended from the mountain to oppreſs the Turk's ſcouts, and ſlew them all but one, who eſcaped and gave the alarm to the camp.

The Turk's could not believe that Scanderbeg was ſo nigh them on that ſide; but Scanderbeg following at his heels with his horſe, and his foot haſting after, began to haſten after, began to break in upon them; and the other parts of the army deſcending from the mountain with ſuch horrible ſhouts and noiſe of inſtruments of war, as if heaven and earth ſhould preſently go together; the hills and valleys with their hollow eccho encreaſing the terror of of the alarm. Amaſe firſt made head, and encouraged the Turks; with whom Scanderbeg encountered, and whilſt the Baſſa was coming to his reſcue, Moſes on the one ſide, and Tanuſius on the other, charged him ſo hotly, that he was glad to retire to his trenches.

Amaſe ſtill with great courage withſtood his uncle, and encouraged his Turks; yet Scanderbeg ſtill prevailing on them, they at laſt turned their backs, and fled: Scanderbeg's horſe purſuing the chaſe, ſlew very many, and took Amaſe priſoner. Moſes alſo had diſperſed the Baſſa's army, and purſued them till they were out of Epyrus; many were ſlain, and many taken priſoners, and twenty of the Turks faireſt enſigns, of whom were ſlain about twenty thouſand, and of the Chriſtians about ſixty. Scanderbeg poſſeſſed the rich pavilion of the Baſſa; and his captains had tents with much rich furniture, never prepared for their uſe.

And ſo with his victorious army he marched to Croia, all the country coming forth to meet him with acclamations of joy. Amaſe was condemned to perpetual impriſonment, and ſent to Alphonſus king of Naples, with part of the ſpoil, by him to be kept in durance.

Mahomet was much grieved for this loſs, and angry with the Baſſa; yet afterwards was pacified again. After which he concluded a peace with Scanderbeg for a year; and when that was expired, he ſent an army under Synanbeg of twenty thouſand into Epyrus, with which Scanderbeg forthwith encountered and overthrew, ſo that few eſcaped by flight.

Then Aſam beg with thirty thouſand, whom Scanderbeg in plain battle vanquiſhed at Ocrida, and took Aſam priſoner, and uſed him honourably, and afterwards diſmiſſed him.

Juſſum-beg came after with eighteen thouſand, was ſet upon by Scanderbeg, had many ſlain, and himſelf hardly eſcaped by flight.

Then Caraſa-beg, an old and expert captain, deſired Mahomet to let him try his fortune, who ſent him with an army of almoſt forty thouſand. Scanderbeg more feared him than any of the former, and therefore raiſed more forces then ordinary; and to welcome him the better, he ſet two thouſand of his beſt hoſemen to lie in ambuſh in the enemies country, who ſet upon the vauntguard of four thouſand Turks, who expected no danger amongſt their friends, and ſlew moſt of them. With which unfortunate beginning, Caraſa was ſo vexed, that had it not been for ſhame, he would have returned back again; yet coming into Epyrus, whilſt he was reſolving what courſe to take, Scanderbeg ſuddenly aſſailed him before he could order his men. But at the ſame time there fell ſuch a violent ſtorm, that the armies were ſundered; the ſtorm continued three days, yet Scanderbeg was always vexing the Turks on one ſide or other: whereupon the old general returned back to Conſtantinople with the remainder of his army, and was well derided by his maſter for having promiſed ſo much, and performed ſo little.

Mahomet finding that he could not prevail by force, betook himſelf to craft, writting kind Letters to Scanderbeg by his embaſſadors, concluded a peace with him, which was proclaimed with great joy, and faithfully kept for a ſeaſon, whilſt Mahomet made war with the Venetians; but there being provocations on both ſides by the borderers, Scanderbeg entered with an army into Macedonia, made much ſpoil, and returned with a great booty. Hereupon Mahomet ſent Seremet Baſſa with fourteen thouſand ſoldiers to lie upon the confines of Epyrus for a guard, but to attempt nothing againſt it.

Scanderbeg having intelligence hereof, marched thither with twelve thouſand, lying in ambuſh near the city where the Turks were; and in the morning he ſent five hundred towards the enemy, to draw him out, if they could, into the field; but if he came forth, to retreat to the place where the army lay, which fell out according to his deſire; ſo that riſing up, he aſſaulted the Turks on every ſide, ſlew ten thouſand of them, and took twelve principal men priſoners, for whom he had forty thouſand duckets in ranſom.

Then Mahomet ſent Balabanus with fifeteen thouſand horſe, and three thouſand foot to invade Epyrus, who knowing that Scanderbeg lay not far from him with a ſmall power, he intended in the night to ſet upon him at unawars, but Scanderbeg having intelligence by his ſcouts ſet forward in good order to meet him. Balabanus perceiving that he was diſcovered, made a halt; Scanderbeg when he drew nigh him, conſidering the ground where the enemies lay, encouraged his ſoldiers, which were but four thouſand horſe, and a thouſand five hundred foot, charged them on their lives, that if the enemy in the fight retired, they ſhould not purſue them beyond the ſtraits of the hill, ſuſpecting an ambuſh behind it; and ſo retired a little, which Balabanus ſeeing his ſmall number, judged to be a flight, and therefore haſtily marched after, till Scanderbeg watching his opportunity ſtayed, and ſet couragiouſly upon them, yet the battle a great while ſtood doubtful, but ſuch was the fury of Scanderbeg and his ſoldiers, that at laſt the Turks fled, and they purſued to the ſtraits of the mountains, where Scanderbeg had commanded them to ſtay. But his beſt captains in the heat of fight, forgetting his commands entered the ſtraits, and were ſet upon by many that lay there in ambuſh, where fighting like lions, at laſt they were oppreſſed with multitude, taken priſoner, and ſent to Mahomet; they were Moſes, Muſachius, Perlot, &c. the leaſt of them able to have conducted a brave army.

Scanderbeg preſently ſent to have ranſomed, or exchanged them for others, but the tyrant knowing that they were his beſt captains, refuſed, and ſlayed them by degrees, ſo that they were fifteen days in dying. Epyrus mourned for the great loſs, but Scanderbeg reſolving to revenge their blood, with fire and ſword, entered into the Turks dominions, ſparing nothing that he could burn or deſtroy.

Mahomet ſent Balabanus rich preſents for his good ſervice, commanding him to recruit his army, and proſecute the wars, which he performed with all diligence, yet uſing policy, he corrupted Scanderbeg's ſcouts, and had like to have oppreſſed him ere he was aware; but Scanderbeg himſelf, who ſpent moſt of the night in careful watch, diſcerned the approach of the enemy by the noiſe of their horſes, and ſo ſpeedily ordering all things, encountered with them, and after a great fight put them to flight, ſlew moſt of them in purſuite, Balabanus with a ſmall remnant hardly eſcaping. Yet Mahomet ſent him again with 14000 horſe, and three thouſand foot, knowing his deadly hatred to Scanderbeg, who firſt tryed by ſubtility to circumvent him, and when that prevailed not, he reſolved by plain force to ſubdue him, and ſo marching forward, Scanderbeg met him with eight thouſand horſe, and a thouſand five hundred foot near to Sfetigrade.

The fight beginning (though the Turks were two to one) yet Scanderbeg's men fought like enraged lions, without regard of danger; Scanderbeg carefully ordered all things, himſelf fighting at the head of his army, performing all the parts of a worthy cheiftain, and valiant ſoldier; but whilſt he thus fought in the midſt of his enemies, his horſe was ſlain under him, and in the fall ſorely bruiſed on of his arms; the Turks preſſed on vehemently to have ſlain him; but God delivered him, his ſoldiers reſcuing and remounting of him; he forthwith encountring with one of the Turks great commanders, ſlew him hand to hand, which ſo terrified the Turks, that they firſt retired, then fled, whom Scanderbeg purſued with ſuch execution, that few returned home with Balabanus. Mahomet was extreme angry with him, but when his fury was over, Balabanus told him, that the way to conquer Scanderbeg, was to enter Epyrus with two puiſſant armies to ſpoil the country, and encloſe Scanderbeg betwixt them, and neither to fight, but when the other was near at hand, by which means he might certainly be deſtroyed; the tyrant liked this advice ſo well, that he gave him commiſſion to take what forces he would and to chooſe his aſſociate out of all his men of war, &c.

Balabanus choſe out forty thouſand good ſoldiers, and one Jacup, a valiant captain, for his companion, whom he ſent with ſixteen thouſand one way, and himſelf with twenty thouſand horſe, and four thouſand foot went another way; Scanderbeg having ſecret intelligence of all theſe projects, gat in readineſs eight thouſand horſe and four thouſand foot choice ſoldiers, and ſent out his eſpials, who who hoping for great rewards, proved falſe traytors, and went to Balabanus, acquainting him with ſo much of Scanderbeg's deſigns as they knew; Scanderbeg marvelling that they returned not, went out himſelf with five more to ſee how the enemies lay: but he had like to have fallen into an ambuſh, had he not ſeaſonably diſcovered it, and ſpeedily retired, yet he loſt four of his men; and ſo coming to his army, he ſuddenly prepared to fight with Balabanus before the other army came, and ſo preſently marched into the valley where Balabanus lay; and divided his army into four parts, one under himſelf, the other three under three of his beſt captains, and ſo advanced towards the Turks. But Balabanus waiting for the coming of his partner, would not ſtir out of his trench-

Sanderbeg's men derided and provocked them all they could, till the Turks enraged with the affront, would have iſſued forth without the general, had he not led them. When therefore he ſaw no remedy, he advanced in good order, and Scanderbeg furiouſly aſſaulted him, ſo that there was a dangerous and doubtful battle, yet Scanderbeg and his men ſo preſſed upon them on all ſides, that at laſt they were broken in pieces, moſt of them ſlain, only Balabanus with ſome few eſcaped.

Scanderbeg had ſcarce divided the ſpoil, and breathed himſelf, when a poſt brought him news that Jacup was burning and deſtroying all in another part of his country; whereupon he preſently marched thitherward, and his men went as to an aſſured victory; Jacup hearing of his coming retired into a corner of the plain; Scanderbeg coming near him, reſted one whole day, then brought forth ſome of his priſoners before the enemies camp, which before knew nothing of Balabanus his overthrow: yet Jacup ordered his army, and fiercely charged Scanderbeg's men, where the fight laſted not long, but the Turks fled, and moſt of them were ſlain, in all there were ſlain in the two battles four and twenty thouſand men, and ſix thouſand taken priſoners; Jacup eſcaped with a few; after which Scanderbeg entered into the Turks territories, made havock of all, and ſo returned with his victorious army to Croia, where he diſmiſſed them every man to his own home.

Then Mahomet with great rewards hired two vilains to go and kill Scanderbeg, who went into Epyrus, declaimed againſt Mahomet and his ſuperſtition, deſired to be inſtructed in the principles of the Chriſtian religion, and to be baptized, and thereby found much favour with Scanderbeg, yet watching their opportunity to murder him; but treaſon againſt princes, whom God hath in his moſt mighty protection, cannot be long concealed: theſe aſſaſſinates falling out between themſelves, let ſome words fall which gave occaſion to ſuſpicion, and ſo being examined, they confeſſed the treaſon, and were juſtly executed according to their demerits.

Mahomet then reſolved to go himſelf into Epyrus with ſuch an army as ſhould ſpeedily end the war, and for that end he raiſed an army of two hundred thouſand men; Scanderbeg having intelligence of it, fortified all his cities and ſtrong holds, eſpecially Croia, which he furniſhed with all things neceſſary for a long ſiege, put into it a choice garriſon, and made Balthaſar Perduce, a worthy captain governor thereof. He left nothing abroad in the country, removed all the inhabitants into Garriſons, or other places of refuge; no ſooner was this done, but Balabanus came with fourſcore thouſand horſemen, and ſat down before Croia; in few days after came Mahomet with his huge army, and encamped there alſo; he ſummoned the city; to which the brave governor made no other anſwer then by continual thundering ſhot into his camp. Mahomet cauſed great ordinance to be caſt, and planted his batteries. In the meantime Scanderbeg with a ſmall army of choice ſoldiers, lay in the woods, cut off his forragers, and ſuch as brought victuals to the camp; and oft in the night ſuddenly brake into one or other of the quarters of the Turks camp, with great ſlaughter of them, and kept them in ſuch continual alarms, that he never gave them reſt.

Mahomet ſeeing his men to decreaſe, and that the city was not to be taken but by famine, and a long ſiege, and fearing ſome diſaſter, as had there happened to his father, left Balabanus with the greateſt part of his army, and returned himſelf to Conſtantinople. As he went back he corrupted the governor of a fort called Chidna, in which were eight thouſand of Scanderbeg's ſoldiers, promiſing them ſafety and liberty to depart. But having them in his power, the tyrant cauſed them cruelly to be cut in pieces, ſparing neither ſoldier nor inhabitant, man, woman, nor child.

Scanderbeg ſcorning to have his chief city beſieged by Balabanus, and yet wanting forces of his own to raiſe the ſiege, ſent to his friends the Venetians, and other confederate princes; ſo that by their help in few days, he got an army of above fourteen thouſand choice ſoldiers, with which he marched to Croia: but by the way underſtanding that Jonima was coming with a new ſupply to Balabanus, with ſome choice horſemen he poſted over the country. fell upon them, ſlew and put them to flight, took Jonima and his ſon priſoners, whom the next day he ſhewed to Balabanus. And with plain force he drave the Turks from a mountain near to the city of Croia, Balabanus ſeeing this, with ſome others, he rode up to the city gate, and with infinite promiſes would have perſuaded them to deliver up the city to him; but they ſallying out, drave them away, and one of them ſhot him through the throat, whereof he preſently died.

The Turks diſcouraged with theſe things, roſe in the ſilence of the night, and retreated eight miles from the city. Scanderbeg the next morning found in their tents great ſtore of corn, and other proviſion, which he convied into Croia in great triumph.

The ſame day he ſent ſeleect ſoldiers to take the ſtraits through which the Turks muſt needs paſs, when they went out of Epyrus; which the Turks hearing of, they ſent two meſſengers to Scanderbeg, promiſing him to deliver up their horſe and arms, if he would permit them ſafely to paſs out of the country. From whom they received this ſhort anſwer, that as they came into his country without his leave, ſo they muſt depart without his leave alſo. Whereupon in the dead of the night they deſperately brake through thoſe paſſes, yet not without great loſs.

Shortly after Scanderbeg recovering what he had loſt, and putting all the Turks to the ſword, brake up his army, retaining only two thouſand horſe, and one thouſand foot for the guard of his frontiers.

Mahomet was ſo vexed at this evil ſucceſs, that he could neither drink nor ſleep for a ſeaſon; yet at laſt he reſolved the next ſpring to go thither again in perſon, to make a full conqueſt of it; and Scanderbeg provided for him as he had done formerly.

Mahomet, with a mighty army, when the ſpring was come, entered into Epyrus, and with much labour and charge built a city, which he made a garriſon: from thence he marched to Dirrachium, a city belonging to the Venetians, which he had thought to have found unprovided; but it proved otherwiſe, inſomuch as having ſpent ſome time there, to his great loſs, he ſuddenly aroſe, and returned into Epyrus, and ſat down before Croia, proffering large privileges and great gifts, if they would ſurrender the city, or elſe threatened them with all the calamities of war; to which they made no anſwer but with the mouth of the canon. Scanderbeg alſo continually moleſted his camp, and brake into their quarters every night; whereupon Mahomet roſe with his army, and hearing of many Epyrots retired into the mountains, he went to ſeek them out, but was by them repulſed with great loſs. Scanderbeg alſo following him at the heels, daily cut off part of his army; ſo that at laſt the tyrant deſpairing to do any good, went back with vexation and ſhame to Conſtantinople.

After all this, Scanderbeg viewed the ſtate of his kingdom, ordered his affairs, and then went to Lyſſa, to confer with the Venetian ambaſſador, and the other confederate princes; but within few days he fell ſick of a fever, and perceiving his end to draw nigh, he ſent for his wife and ſon, and the confederate princes, diſcourſed to them of his troubleſome life, fore warned them of the dangers that were like to enſue, perſuaded them to perſevere in unity, made the Venetians protectors of his ſon and kingdom; and ſo after he had, with moſt fervent prayer, com-commended his ſoul into the hands of almighty God, he quietly left this life, January 17. in the year 1466, and of his age ſixty three, of his reign twenty-four.

His death was much lamented by all Chriſtian princes, eſpecially his neighbours, who had loſt their moſt careful watchman, and invincible champion. The ſorrow of his ſubjects is not to be expreſſed.

He was royally buried in the cathedral in Lyſſa: yet nine years after, the Turks having taken the city, with great devotion digged up his bones, reckoning it ſome part of their happineſs, if they might ſee or touch the ſame: ſuch as could get any part thereof, ſet it in ſilver or gold, and hung it about their necks, perſuading themſelves that it would make them valiant and proſperous.

He was a man of rare parts, and of an indefatigable ſpirit. During all the time of his wars he never ſlept above two hours in a night. He ever fought againſt the Turks with his arm bare, and that with ſuch fierceneſs that the blood did oft times burſt out of his lips. He, with his own hands in thoſe wars, ſlew at leaſt three thouſand of the Turks.

What his ſtrength was, may appear by theſe examples: There was in a part of Epyrus a mighty wild bull, that had murdered many, and committed a thouſand outrages; him Scanderbeg encountered with on horſeback, and with one only blow of his cimitar he cut his neck clean from his ſhoulders. Alſo, a monſtrous boar in Apulia, that had wounded many of king Ferdinand's courtiers; Scanderbeg being hunting with the king, encountered with this beaſt, and ſoon parted his head from his body.

His cimitar was made at Damaſco in Syria, and was of an excellent temper. He oft carried two of them in one ſcabbard, and ſometimes he would break them both in one battle.

Mahomet hearing that he would cut helmets, headpieces, and pouldrons clean aſunder with it, he ſent to him for one of his ſwords, thinking that there had been ſome extraordinary virtue in them: and when Scanderbeg had ſent it, he put it into their hands who had the ſtrongeſt arms about him; but perceiving no ſuch wonders as was reported of it, he ſent it back with ſcorn, ſaying, That he would not be beholden to him for that which he could get for his money; and that he credited not what was related to him of that ſword. But Scanderbeg, in the ſight of the meſſenger, having made ſtrange and admirable proofs of it, bad him tell his maſter, that it was not the virtue of the ſword, but the ſtrength of his arm, which he reſerved againſt his enemies.

God raiſed up this worthy Chriſtian prince, and endowed with ſuch excellent parts, as another David againſt thoſe proud Goliahs, Amurath and Mahomet, who were cruel and bloody perſecutors of the church of God. God made him ſucceſsful and victorious in above twenty battles that he fought againſt the Turks.

The Life of MATTHIAS CORVINUS, King of Hungary, who died Anno Chriſti 1490.

HUNIADES being dead, the young king Ladiſlaus, and Ulricus earl of Cicilia, thought they might the more boldly come into Hungary, and thereupon they preſently began their journey. Ladiſlaus, the eldeſt ſon of Huniades, who was now at the city of Alba, hearing of the king's approach, obediently opened to him the gates, but four thouſand of his armed ſoldiers, he debarred from entring into the city. Whilſt the king was there, he, with the earl of Ulricus, ſat often in council, with ſome other nobles alſo. At laſt they required Ladiſlaus to reſort unto them; he at firſt was in ſuſpenſe what to do, but afterwards, putting on a privy coat of mail, he came to them. Whilſt they were in debate, Ulricus picked a quarrel with him, and called him traitor, for ſhutting the gates againſt the king's ſoldiers; and withal, taking his ſword from his page, let fly at his head. To break the blow, ſome putting up their hands had their fingers cut off; the Hungarians without, hearing the tumult, brake into the chamber, where they preſently ſlew this falſe earl Ulrick, and cut him all to pieces. The king was much diſcountenanced hereat in his mind; yet ſeeing there was no other remedy, he diſſembled his grief for the preſent, and making fair weather to Ladiſlaus, he took him along with him towards Buda: by the way, paſſing by the town where Huniade's wife was, mourning for the death of her huſband, the king went to her, and ſeemed with many fair words to comfort her; there he reſted and refreſhed himſelf, and ſo departed with much diſſembled love, and feigned favour, and took along with him the two ſons of Huniades, Ladiſlaus, and Matthias, who were now without ſuſpicion, and therefore the more ready to wait upon him; but when he came to Buda, he cauſed them both to be ſuddenly apprehended; and immediately after, the elder (Ladiſlaus) was brought forth to the place of execution. at which time a cryer proclaimed, 'Thus are they to be chaſtened that are rebels againſt their Lord. After the hangman had three blows at his neck, Ladiſlaus having his hands bound behind him, roſe upright upon his feet after the third ſtroke. and looking up to heaven, called upon the Lord, and proteſting his innocency, meekly laid down his head again, and ſo at the fourth blow had it ſtricken off. Then did this bloody tyrant take Matthias, and carried him captive with him into Auſtria. Shortly after this young king was to marry the French king's daughter: great preparation was made againſt the wedding, which was to be celebrated at Prague in Bohemia. Many princes and potentates were invited to the ſolemnity, at which time this wicked king had intended to make an end of all the Huſſites in Bohemia; thither therefore he went, taking his priſoner Matthias along with him to Prague, where he alſo impriſoned him; but in the midſt of all his great preparations, in the year 1461, this great adverſary of God's people, Ladiſlaus king of Bohemia and Hungary, and archduke of Auſtria, was, by the revenging hand of God, ſmitten with a peſtilent ſore in his groin, whereof he died, within the ſpace of thirty-ſix hours; after whoſe death, the kingdom of Bohemia fell to George Pogiebracius, a friend and favourer of the Huſſites, whom afterwards pope Innocent the eight did excommunicate, and depoſe for his religion.

But the nobles of Hungary, hearing of the death of Ladiſlaus, met together, and for the love they bare to the remembrance of Huniades, they choſe Matthias, ſirnamed Corvinus, now a priſoner at Prague, to be their king; and withal diſpatched away ambaſſadors to Pogiebracius, to deſire him to ſend this their king elect to them. Pogiebracius having heard their meſſage at ſupper time, he immediately ſent for Matthias out of priſon, and placed him at the upper end of the table; young Matthias being but about eighteen years old, was much abaſhed at it, and began to crave pardon, but the king would needs have it ſo; and when he was ſet, to quiet his mind. he willed him to be of good cheer, for that he had good news to tell him. 'Good news, ſaid Matthias. if it would pleaſe your majeſty to grant me my liberty.' Yea, that, ſaid the king. and more too; and then ſaluting him by the name of the king of Hungary, he brake unto him the whole matter; and within few days after, he married to him his daughter, furniſhed him with all things fit for his ſtate, and royally accompanied him into Hungary, where he was with great joy and triumph received by his people, and over whom he glorioufly reigned for the ſpace of thirty-eight years, in which time he notably enlarged the kingdom of Hungary; and proving the thundering ſon of a lightning father, he became a far greater terror to the Turks than ever was his father Huniades.

Preſently after, the emperor Frederick, having the crown of Hungary remaining in his hands, which Elizabeth, the mother of Ladiſlaus had carried to him, laid claim to the kingdom, whereupon wars enſued between Matthias and him: but at laſt, by the mediation of the princes of Germany, a peace was concluded betwixt them, and Matthias ranſomed the crown from Frederick for eight thouſand florences.

At this time there were great wars between the Venetians and the great Turk; but the Venetians going by the worſe, ſent ambaſſadors to king Matthias, ſoliciting him to join in league with them, and to take up arms againſt the common enemy, offering preſently to furniſh him with a great ſum of money, beſides a large yearly penſion towards the maintenance of thoſe wars; for which he ſhould to his power power by land, defend all thoſe territories of theirs which lay between the Rhetian Alps and the Adriatic ſea, againſt the invaſion of the Turk.

Matthias, having well conſidered of this their requeſt, anſwered, That they had many times before, in the like caſe, refuſed to give aid to the Hungarian kings, his predeceſſors; yea, and judged it a thing unreaſonable, that any ſuch thing ſhould be requeſted at their hands: ſo that the Hungarian kings had many times received great loſs for want of their aſſiſtance. Yet he was willing to forget all ſuch unkindneſs, and to take their territories into his protection, according to their requeſt; promiſing withal, the next ſpring, to invade the Turks dominions. And, according to his promiſe, he honourably performed it: for, in the beginning of the ſpring, he paſſed over the Danubius at Belgrade, with a puiſſant army, and razed the forts which the Turks had built therabouts, and ſo entering into Servia, laid all the country waſte before him, and afterwards, laden with ſpoil, returned home again, carrying away with him twenty thouſand captives. And, with the like proſperous ſucceſs, he maintained wars againſt Mahomet the Great, and againſt his ſon Bajazet, almoſt always going away with the victory; ſo that there was no Chriſtian king or chieftain that did ever more often, with ſucceſs, fight againſt the Turks, or had of them greater victories.

Then did he (according to his promiſe made to the Venetians) enter into the kingdom of Boſna, where, by force, he overthrew the ſtrong forts which the Turks had built for the defence of the frontiers, and valiantly drave them all out before him, till he came to Jaitze, the chief city of Boſna, unto which he laid ſiege and took it; and ſo garriſoning it, he followed the courſe of his victories, ſcarcely ſuffering the Turks to breathe, until he had by force wreſted all that kingdom out of their hands.

This ſo vexed the proud Mahomet, that in great fury he came with a mighty army into Boſna, and laid hard ſiege unto Jaitze, which was by the Chriſtians worthily defended, till Matthias came to the relief thereof, who ſo troubled the Turk's camp, with continual ſkirmiſhes on the one ſide, and they within the town with deſperate ſallies on the other, that at length the proud Turk was driven to ſuch extremity, that he was forced ſecretly to ſteal away in the night, with all his army, into Servia; and, for haſte, left behind him all his tents, and his great ordinance.

Matthias having thus valiantly relieved the city, followed the Turk's army into Servia; and took part of that country alſo; which, together with Boſna, he annexed to the kingdom of Hungary: ſo that now the name of Matthias was unto the Turks no leſs dreadful than was ſometimes the name of his valiant father Huniades.

In the year 1475, Mahomet the Great, having ended his wars with the Perſians, reſolves to convert all his power againſt the Venetians; and for that end ſent Solyman Baſſa, with an army of fourſcore thouſand brave men, to beſiege Scorda or Scutari, within the confines of Albania: Many were the deſperate aſſaults which the Turks gave to the city, and yet they were ſtill as valiantly repulſed by the Chriſtians within.

In the mean time Matthias raiſed an army, and with it marched into the Turk's dominions, where he made ſuch havock and ſpoil of all before him, that Mahomet was glad to call back the great baſſa from the ſiege of Scorda, (after he had lain there three months with his great army, and loſt fourteen thouſand of his men) to defend his own country.

With this diſhonour Mahomet was ſo diſcontented, that he gave one a yearly penſion daily to put him in mind of the ſiege of Scorda.

In the year 1480, the Turk ſent a mighty army, conſiſting of an hundred thouſand men, under ſome of his chiefeſt and moſt expert commanders, into Tranſylvania, which brought ſuch a general fear upon the country, that Steven Batore, the vayvod, was glad with all ſpeed to fly unto Matthias king of Hungary, declaring to him the danger of his country, and craving his aid. Matthias at this time lay ſick of the gout, yet he ſent an army under his expert captains, which not far from Alba Julia, met with the Turks, and there in a great and bloody battle defeated them, ſlew Iſa, one of their chief captains, and thirty thouſand Turks beſides. By which great victory Tranſylvania was delivered from that preſent danger.

The noble acts of Matthias againſt theſe enemies to the name of Chriſt, were ſo many and ſo great, that through God's goodneſs, he was a great ſhelter not only to Hungary, but almoſt to all Chriſtian kingdoms, in repelling and beating back the proud ſwelling waves of the Turkiſh empire, which were like to have overflown all; yea, he ſo defended the confines of Illyria from the power of the Turks, that both Mahomet and Bajazet his ſon were enforced to ſeek to him for peace. But the devil, in the meantime, envying his proſperous ſucceſs in defence of the Chriſtians, ſtirred up the pope to caſt in the ball of contention between Pogiebracius and him, whereby not only his courſe of victory againſt the Turks was ſtopped, but alſo great war and bloodſhed followed among the Chriſtians. In which wars Matthias took from Pogiebracius, Moravia, and a great part of Sileſia, and joined them to his kingdom of Hungary.

Alſo, by the pope's means, a new quarrel ſprang up between the emperor Frederick and him: In which wars Frederick had utterly gone to ruin, had not Albert duke of Saxony reſcued the emperor, and repreſſed the vehemency of Matthias. Alſo, after the death of Pogiebracius, the emperor conferred the kingdom of Bohemia upon Vladiſlaus, the king of Poland's ſon; whereupon Matthias made war upon him, and alſo proclaimed open wars againſt Frederick. But it pleaſed God, in the midſt of theſe great undertakings and preparations, to take him away by ſickneſs, in the year 1490, and of his age fifty-ſix, after he had reigned with renown thirty-eight years.

Beſides his noble acts of chivalry, he was religious, according to thoſe times, learned, and a great lover of learning and learned men, whom he with great ſtipends procured to come to him out of other countries; by which means he much civilized, and reduced into good order, the barbarous rudeneſs of thoſe kingdoms which he governed, and made thereof a moſt flouriſhing common wealth.

Moreover, he erected a great and ſtately library, which he furniſhed with all ſorts of books, both for languages, arts, and hiſtory; many of which he cauſed to be tranſlated out of Greek into Latin; ſo that the like library was not to be found in all Europe beſides, except the Vatican at Rome. Out of which library we have received divers parts of Diodorus, Siculus, and Polybius, which were not extant before.

The Life of EDWARD VI. King of England, who died Anno Chriſti 1553.

EDWARD VI. born in the year 1537, was the ſon of king Henry VIII. by his third wife, Jane, daughter to Sir John Seymer, whoſe mother's body was opened for his birth, whereby ſhe died of the inciſion the fourth day after.

When he was ſix years old, he was committed to the tuition of Dr Coxe, and Mr John Cheek, the firſt inſtructed him in the knowlege of the arts and divinity, the ſecond in the languages of Latin and Greek. Others were appointed for other languages, who all endeavoured to infuſe into him knowlege and virtue by ſome mixture of honeſt delight. Under theſe he profited ſo much, that in ſhort time he ſpake French and Latin perfectly; alſo Greek, Spaniſh, and Italian. He was well ſkilled in logic, philoſophy, muſic, and aſtronomy, and other liberal ſciences, inſomuch as the great Italian philoſopher, Cardane, having made ſome trial of him, was aſtoniſhed with admiration and delight, reporting abroad, 'that he was a miracle of nature.'

When he was about nine years old, his father died, and he was proclaimed king, and brought to the tower, where he remained about three weeks; in which time his uncle, the earl of Hartford, was elected protector of the realm, and governor of the king's perſon during his minority. And a few days after he knighted the king, who, taking the ſword from him, knighted the lord mayor, and advanced divers others of the nobility. The lord protector was made duke of Somerſet; his other uncle, Sir Thomas Seymer, Seymer, was made lord of Sudely, and high admiral of England, &c.

February 19. in the year 1547, he rode in great state from the tower to Weſtminſter, and the next day was crowned by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. The ſame day a general pardon was granted to all perſons, ſix only excepted. Never was a king more loving to others, or better beloved generally of all. He was of an excellent beauty and modeſty, very courteous, and naturally ſo diſpoſed to learning, that he ſeemed rather born ſo, than inſtructed in it.

He was full of clemency, courage, care, and knowlege, in ſtate affairs: he was very tender of ſhedding blood, ſo that none were executed in his time for religion, but only two blaſphemous heretics, John Butcher, and George, a Dutchman; for the execution of the firſt, all the council could not get him to ſet his hand to the warrant, till Cranmer perſuaded him to it, to whom he ſaid, That he would lay all the charge of it upon him before God.

He took much delight in repreſentation of battles, ſkirmiſhes, and aſſaults, and ſuch like military exerciſes: he took much pleaſure in the exerciſes of activity, and cauſed his ſervants to uſe wreſtling, leaping, running, riding, and ſhooting at rovers, &c. He was exceeding ſkilful in fortifications: he knew all the principal ports of England, Scotland, Ireland, and France, how they lay, when the tide ſerved, what veſſels of burden they could receive, and what winds ſerved for entrance.

He was exceeding careful about ſtate affairs, was much with his council, and would well underſtand what matters paſſed them, and upon what grounds; and would often encounter their reaſons, and give lively reaſons of his own, inſomuch that they made an order, that no matters of weight ſhould be debated but when he was preſent. He had a cheſt whereof he himſelf carried the key, wherein he kept the records of ſuch matters as were concluded by his council.

He ſet time apart to diſpatch poor men's cauſes, without tedious attendance and delay. Of all the magiſtrates, juſtices, and gentlemen of quality in his realm, he knew their names, houſe-keeping, and manner of life. He was ſtiful in the matter and manner of exchange abroad, and provident for the mint at home. To ambaſſadors he would give anſwer upon the ſudden, and touch both orderly and fully upon every part of their ſpeech, to the admiration of his hearers.

He much frequented ſermons, and penned them with his own hands. His ſports were ingenious and manlike, whereby he always learned ſomething. He, in the midſt of all his buſineſſes, reſerved daily ſome hours for his private ſtudies and exerciſes with his teachers.

About this time preparations were made for war with Scotland, which was thus occaſioned: Mary Stuart, ſole daughter and heir to James V. being very young, was deſired by Henry the eight to be aſſured to his ſon prince Edward, which was aſſented to by the nobility and parliament of Scotland; and all conditions and covenants were concluded, ſealed, and ſworn to, on both parties, and a peace eſtabliſhed for ten years, at the end whereof both prince and queen ſhould be of age to conſent. But the king of France hearing of it, laboured by all means to break this agreement, endeavouring to get this match for Francis, afterwards king of France; and ſo far prevailed, that he made a ſtrong party for him in Scotland: yet our protector wrote friendly to the nobility, remembered them of their promiſes, ſeals, and oaths: he ſhewed them the bonds that would redound to both kingdoms by this union, &c. But notwithſtanding all this, when they would not be brought to reaſon, he raiſed a great army, with which he marched into Scotland, and ſent a great fleet by ſea to meet him there. In the army were twelve thouſand foot, and two thouſand eight hundred light horſe. The earl of Warwick was lieutenant general, the lord Gray of Wilton was marſhal of the field, &c. The protector of Scotland alſo made great preparations to reſiſt them, making his rendezvous at Muſſelburgh field, where the Engliſh marched: and ſo between the two nations a great and cruel battle was fought, wherein the Engliſh were victors, and purſued the Scots for five hours ſpace, doing great execution upon them, ſo that the river of Eſk ran red with blood.

Divers of the Scottiſh nobility and gentry were ſlain, and of the inferior ſort about ten thouſand. Of the Engliſh were ſlain fifty two, but very many hurt. And thus the Lord revenged upon them their perfidiouſneſs in breaking their oaths and covenants. In the which victory this alſo is to be noted, that the ſame day and hour wherein the images were burned openly in London, the Scots received this great overthrow.

Alſo, fifteen hundred of the Scots were taken priſoners, amongſt whom was the earl of Huntley, and ſome other noblemen. Huntley being afterwards aſked, how he ſtood affected to the intended marriage, anſwered, That he liked the marriage well; but he liked not the manner of wooing. Afterwards the Engliſh fired many places, took in divers caſtles, placed garriſons in them, and ſo returned back to England.

A great alteration alſo was made in religion; injunctions were ſet forth for removing images out of churches, godly preachers were ſent abroad to inſtruct and teach the people; and, for want of preachers, homilies were appointed to be read in churches. Edmond Bonner was committed to the Fleet, for refuſing to receive theſe injunctions, and Steven Gardiner to the tower, with biſhop Tonſtal and Heath.

In the firſt year of the king, a parliament was held, wherein was enacted, That none ſhould ſpeak againſt receiving the ſacrament in both kinds: That all proceſſes eccleſiaſtical ſhould be made in the king's name. The ſtatue of the ſix articles was repealed, and that which prohibited the uſe of the ſcriptures in Engliſh. A liturgy was ſet forth.

Commiſſioners being ſent abroad to pull down images in Cornwal, one of them was ſtabbed by a prieſt, as he was pulling down an image; and afterwards the whole country roſe in a commotion, which ſpread alſo into Wiltſhire and Sommerſetſhire: they beat down incloſures and parks; but Sir William Herbert, with ſome ſoldiers, ſet upon them, ſlew ſome, and ſcattered the reſt.

The like commotions were raiſed in other countries, which, by the prudence of gentlemen, and other honeſt perſons, were appeaſed. Yet afterwards there was another riſing in the weſt countries, to whom the king wrote; firſt reproving them for their diſordered aſſemblies; then he pitied their ignorance, and errors thence ariſing, perſuading them to return to their homes, and due obedience. In which letter he thus wrote to them, 'Aſſure yourſelves moſt ſurely, that we, of no earthly thing under the heaven, make ſuch account, as we do of this one thing, to have our laws obeyed, and this cauſe of God which we have taken in hand to be thoroughly maintained, from the which we will never remove a hair's breadth, nor give place to any creature living, much leſs to any ſubject, but therein will ſpend our own royal perſon, our crown, treaſure, realm, and all our eſtate, whereof we aſſure you of our high honour.' But they growing more unruly, went to Exeter, demanded entrance, which being refuſed, they attempted to take the city by ſtorm, by firing the gates, by mines, but all in vain, being eaſily repulſed, and ſlain like dogs. In the mean time, the lord privy ſeal, with a ſmall company, attempted the relief of the city, which the mutiniers hindered, by felling many trees croſs in his way; and in his retreat ſet upon him, but he beat them back, with the loſs of ſix hundred of them.

In the mean time the citizens ſuffered great want, made bread of the courſeſt bran; their fineſt fleſh was their horſes. An aged citizen in this their want, brought out all his ſtore, ſaying, That as he communicated to them his ſtore, ſo he would participate with them in their wants; and that he would feed upon one arm, and fight with the other, before he would conſent to put the city into the hands of the ſeditious.

But the Lord Gray coming with more forces, ſet upon them, ſlew above nine hundred of them, and diſperſed the reſt; notwithſtanding which, about two thouſand of them rallying the next day, affronted the king's forces; yet after a while they ran away. After this alſo, a great number met together, and brought with them a crucifix upon a cart, a cart, beſet with croſſes, tapers, holy bread, &c. The lord Gray ſet upon them, and ſlew the greateſt part of them, divers were taken, and ſome of the principal preſently executed.

The ſeditious in Norfolk were more dangerous, as having greater ſtrength, and the city of Norwich to favour them. To theſe the king wrote alſo, and ſent an herald with a general pardon, if they would quietly depart, which they refuſing, the lord William Parre was ſent againſt them, who entering into the city of Norwich, was the next day ſet upon by the ſeditious, but he repulſed them with the loſs of three hundred of their company.

Afterwards the earl of Warwick came with ſome more forces, and after ſome bickerings, wherein many of the rebels were ſlain, he pardoned the reſt, only executing ſome of their ring-leaders, and ſo that commotion was quieted.

Religion beginning now to flouriſh in the land, as well all ſuch godly ſubjects as were in the realm, had free liberty publicly to profeſs the goſpel; as alſo many learned and zealous preachers before baniſhed were now licenſed freely to return home; and were encouraged boldly and faithfully to travail in their function and calling, ſo that God was much glorified, and the people much edified.

About the ſame time a dangerous rebellion began in Yorkſhire, but, through God's mercy, one of the rebels revealing of it in his drukenneſs in an ale houſe, it was in ſome meaſure prevented, and the miſchief intended againſt others returned upon the contrivers pates. The French king alſo thinking to make his advantage of ſuch ſtirs in England, denounced wars againſt king Edward, and ſent a great fleet ſuddenly to have taken Jerſey, and Gerſney, together with many of the king's ſhips there; but they were ſo hotly entertained, that they loſt one thouſand of their men, and their ſhips and gallies were ſo ſpoiled, that they were forced to return home with ſhame and diſhonour. The French king alſo came in perſon with a mighty army againſt Bulloigne, where alſo he was repulſed with ſhame and great loſs; ſo that it was apparent that the mighty arm of God fought for king Edward his ſervant, to defend and deliver him from ſo many dangerous commotions at home, and attempts abroad.

But the devil envying the progreſs of the goſpel, fought to hinder it, by ſtirring up contentions amongſt our nobility: Firſt, between the lord protector and his brother the lord admiral, which was not appeaſed but by the blood of the latter. Then between the lord protector and the earl of Warwick, and other nobles that he had drawn into his party, which (notwithſtanding all endeavours uſed by the godly king to make peace betwixt them) ended in the death and deſtruction of the protector. Hereupon many of the vulgar ſort (thinking that the alteration of the Latin ſervice into Engliſh, &c. had been the only act of the protector) began to bruit it abroad, that now they ſhould have their Latin ſervice again, with holy bread and holy water, &c. Whereupon the king, with his privy council, ſent to all the biſhops, to take away all popiſh books in every pariſh, and that if any were refractory, and would not deliver them up, that they ſhould be committed to ward.

In the year 1550, latters were ſent abroad for the taking down of altars in churches, and ſetting up of tables inſtead of the ſame. And during all the time the nobles lived in peace amongſt themſelves, religion flouriſhed, the goſpel had a free paſſage, popery was confounded, and ſcarce a papiſt found that durſt ſhew his head. The popiſh doctors, Smith, Chadſey, Standiſh, Young, Ogelthorp, with many more, recanted their former ignorance and errors: yea, Bonner, with his own hand, ſubſcribed to the king's ſupremacy, and promoted his injunctions: the ſame alſo did Steven Gardiner. Yea, during all the time of peace and concord, what papiſt was found in all the realm, which, out of devotion to the pope, would put his neck into the halter, and die a martyr for his ſake? In thoſe peaceable times it was, that the king ſent for P. Martyr, Martin Bucer, Paul Fagius, with many other learned men, whereof ſome he placed at Cambridge, others at Oxford, who, with their diligent induſtry, did much good.

And whereas the emperor's ambaſſador demanded boldly, that the lady Mary might be ſuffered to have the maſs freely exerciſed in her houſe; the good king reſolutely and conſtantly denied to condeſcend thereunto. He increaſed ſermons at the court, and ordered that no man ſhould have a benefice from the king, but firſt he ſhould preach before him. He ſent five thouſand pounds beyond ſea, to relieve the poor proteſtants; and hearing that the emperor made many ſtrict laws againſt them, he charged his merchants to forbear their trade into Flanders as much as they could.

This prudent and godly king, ſeeing the woful breaches at home, intended by alliance to ſtrengthen himſelf abroad; for which end he ſent to treat of a marriage between his ſiſter the lady Elizabeth, and the king of Denmark's eldeſt ſon. But this lady, though ſhe was furniſhed with many excellent endowments both of nature and education, yet could ſhe never be induced to marry with any. The lord protector having been brought to his end, by the malice and ſubtility of the earl of Warwick, (now the duke of Northumberland) the king at firſt gave no notice of any ill-tempered paſſion, as taking it not to be agreeable to majeſty openly to diſcover it. The lords alſo laboured to diſpel ſuch melancholy thoughts, by plying of him with a variety of exerciſes and diſports; yet upon ſpeech of him afterwards, he would often ſigh and let fall tears. Sometimes he thought that he had done nothing that deſerved death: or if he had, that it was very ſmall, and proceeded rather from his wife than from himſelf. 'And where then (ſaid he) was the good nature of a nephew? where was the clemency of a prince? Ah! how unfortunate have I been to thoſe of my blood? My mother I ſlew at my very birth, and ſince have made away two of her brothers; and happily, to make a way for the purpoſes of others againſt myſelf. Alas! how falſely have I been abuſed? how weakly carried? how little was I maſter over my own judgement,' &c.

But the lords laboured to divert his thoughts otherways all that they could. The king had ſix chaplains in ordinary, concerning whom an order was made, that two ſhould remain with the king by turns, and four ſhould travel in preaching abroad: the firſt year, two in Wales, and two in Lincolnſhire; the next year, two in the marches of Scotland, and two in Yorkſhire, and ſo through all the ſhires in England. Hereby religion was much propagated, and the people taught obedience.

The king being fallen into want of money, commiſſions were ſent forth for ſelling of chantry lands, and church-jewels; chalices, &c. by purchaſing whereof many mean perſons were advanced to great eſtates, whereby they left their poſterity ranged amongſt the nobility of the land. But within a few years, moſt of them by the ſecret curſe of God, melted to nothing; and by improvidence or riot, conſumed all.

In the ſixth year of the king's reign, in April he fell ſick of the meaſles; yet, through God's mercy, in a ſhort time he recovered of the ſame. Not long after, he fell ſick of the ſmall pox; which coming kindly forth was judged a means which would much conduce to his future health; and hereof alſo he recovered perfectly. And the Summer following, he rode his progreſs with a great train; but when he found that it was burdenſome to the country, he diſcharged greateſt part of it.

Soon after the king complained of a continual infirmity of body. About which time ſundry prodigies were ſeen; in Oxfordſhire, a child was born that had two bodies from the navel upward, which lived eighteen days, and then died both together. At Queenborough three great Dolphins were taken; preſently after ſix months more at Blackwall. At Graveſend three great fiſhes, called Whirlepools were taken.

In January, and the beginning of the ſeventh year of the king's reign, his ſickneſs encreaſed upon him, attended with a ſtrong cough; and, notwithſtanding all means and remedies uſed, yet it daily encreaſed by dangerous degrees. He had alſo a great faintneſs, which ſhewed that his vital parts were moſt ſtrongly and ſtrangely aſſaulted. And the common report was, that his ſickneſs proceeded from a ſlow working poiſon. His ſickneſs was much lamented, not only by his own people, but by ſtrangers, his courteſy and wiſdom having procured him much love every where. He was famous for his fore-ſight and and judgment in affairs; and he so well tempered the greatness of his estate with modesty and gravity, that he avoided envy by the one, and contempt by the other.

In the time of his sickness, Dr Ridley preaching before him, in his sermon much commended works of charity, which as they were a duty for all men to perform, so more especially for those which were in great abilities, as for that they were obliged to give example thereby unto others.

The same day after dinner, the king sent for him into his gallery, caused him to sit in a chair by him, would not suffer him to be uncovered; and then after courteous thanks for his sermon, he repeated all the principal points of it, and then added, 'I took myself to be chiefly touched by your speech: for as in the kingdom I am next under God, so must I most nearly approach to him in goodness and mercy. For as our miseries stand most in need of help from him, so are we the greatest debtors; and therefore as you have given me this general exhortation, so direct me I entreat you by what particular act I may best discharge my duty.' The bishop partly astonished, and partly overjoyed with these speeches was silent for a time; at last, tears and words breaking forth together, he declared to the king, that as he little expected such a question, so was he not furnished with a present answer; but said withal, that he conceived the citizens of London had best experience, as overburdened with multitudes of persons of their own and from all parts of the kingdom, and therefore if his majesty pleased to afford his letter to that effect, he would confer with them, and in short time return their answer.

The king immediately caused the letter to be written, which, before the bishop he signed and sealed, and enjoined him to be the messenger, who, going to the Lord Major with it, he called certain Aldermen, and four and twenty commissioners, who ranked the poor into three sorts. such as were poor by impotency of nature, as or phans, decrepit persons, ideots and criples: others by fa culty, as w unded soldiers, diseased, &c. Thirdly, Such as were poor by idleness unthriftiness, &c. The first, to be educated and maintained: the second to be cured and relieved: the third to be corrected and reduced to good order: which being presented to the king, he gave to the city, for education and maintenance of the first, the Gray-Friers Church by Newgate Market, with all the revenues belonging to it: to the second, St. Bartholomew's near Smithfield: for the third, his house at Bridewell: and for encrease of maintenance to these, besides the Hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, he gave seven hundred and fifty merks yearly out of the rents of the Hospital of St. John Baptist, or the Savoy, with all the bedding and furniture belonging to that place: and the charter of this gift being presented to him with a blank for lands in Mortmaine, he presently filled it up with these words, 'Four thousand merks by the year:' which being done, with reverend gesture and speech, he thanked God for prolonging his life to finish that business. The king's sickness daily encreased, and so did the duke of Northumberland's diligence about him: poison was strongly suspected, for his physicians discovered an invincible malignity in his disease, which though in the lungs, a part of no quick sense, yet his sickness grew very extreme. The people did here upon break forth immoderately into passion, complaining that for this cause his two uncles had been taken away: for this cause the most faithful of the nobility and council had been disgraced and discarded, and that for this cause such were placed about him as were ready to commit or permit any mischief.

Yet at this time the Lord Guilford, fourth son to the Duke of Northumberland was married to the Lady Jane, eldest daughter to the Duke of Summerset, by Frances daughter to Mary, second sister to Henry the eight: and albeit this Lady Jane had no right to the crown, for she was excluded by the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth, by the line of Lady Margaret, eldest sister to Henry the eighth, married into Scotland, and by Frances this Lady Jane's mother, now living: yet Northumberland blinded with pride, procured the king by his letters patents under the broad seal, to appoint the Lady Jane to succeed him in the kingdom: and this the king did the more easily assent to, partly in regard of his great desire to have the reformed religion continued; which he suspected would be altered by the Lady Mary: if she succeeded, and he could not leave the crown to the Lady Elizabeth excluding Lady Mary: and partly, by reason of that entire love which he bare to his cousin Jane, a woman of most rare and incomparable perfections, not only for her religion, but for her knowlege of the liberal arts, skill in languages, wherein she exceeded all of her sex: these letters were signed by the king when he was very weak, and then by all the privy councilors: by most of the nobility, bishops, judges, (except Sir James Holles), and by the king's learned council.

Thus the duke having, as he thought, secured all, nothing remained but to dispatch the king. His disease was violent, yet the physicians had some hope of his recovery, if he might be removed into an healthfuller air; but this the duke over awing the council, would not suffer: then a gentlewoman was brought, who would undertake to cure him, the king's physician talking with her, and finding her extreme ignorant, would not consent that she should meddle with him; yet the duke caused them to be discharged, and the cure to be committed to her alone; hereupon she administring something to him, the king fell into desperate extreamities, his vital parts were mortally stuffed, he breathed with difficulty, his legs swelled, his pulse failed, his skin changed colour, and many other symptoms appeared: then were the physicians called again, who seeing how he was, departed with a sad silence: telling their friends, that they were called for fashion sake, but neither their advice nor remedies used. And that the king had been ill dealt with more than once: so the king having long wrestled with a lingering tormenting sickness, about three hours before his death, his eyes being closed, thinking that none heard him, made this godly Prayer.

"Lord God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life, and take me amongst thy chosen; howbeit, not my will, but thy will be done; Lord, I commit my spirit to thee. Oh, Lord! thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy chosens sake, send me life and health, that I may truly serve thee; O my Lord God, bless thy people and save thine inheritance: O my Lord God, save thy chosen people of England. O my Lord God, defend this realm from papistry, and maintain thy true religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy name, for thy Son Jesus Christ's sake." Then turning his face, and seeing some by, he said unto them, 'Are ye so nigh? I thought ye had been further off.' With great patience he endured his pains. Many fervent prayers he made, both for himself and this realm; the last words he spake were these, 'I am faint, Lord have mercy upon me, and take my spirit; and so he spent his last breath in committing his sweet soul into his Father's hands. And thus this blessed king, our young Josias died, Anno Christi 1553, of his age the seventeenth, and of his reign the seventh.

His zeal for religion doth eminently appear in this example, the emperor Charles the fifth sent a request to the king and council, to permit the lady Mary to have mass in her house; the council thinking it fit to gratify the emperor, sent archbishop Cranmer, and bishop Ridley to the king to request his consent thereto; who coming to the king, alledged their reasons, why they desired it of him: which the king having heard, replied again from Scripture grounds so gravely and fully, that they were forced to give way to what he had said, granting it to be true: yet upon politic grounds, they persuaded him to it, because else it might cause a breach with the emperor, &c. Unto which the king replied, willing them to content themselves, for he would, he said, spend his life and all he had, rather than to grant that which he knew certainly to be against the truth.

Yet still the bishops pressed him, and would have no nay; then the good king seeing their importunity, burst out into bitter weeping, and sobbing, and desired them to be content; whereat the bishops themselves seeing the king's zeal and constancy, wept as fast as he, and so took their leave of him, and coming from the archbishop took his school master Mr Cheek by the hand, and said, 'Ah master Cheek, you have such a scholar, that hath more divinity in his little finger, than all we have in our bodies.' He read over Melancthon's common places; all Tullies works; the greatest part of Livies history; the choicest orations of Socrates in Greek, of which he tranſlated two into Latin; Sophocle's tragedies, and the New Teſtament in Greek alſo.

Socrates

The Life of Queen ELIZABETH who died Anno Chriſti, 1602.

KING HENRY the eight being divorced from Katharine of Spain, who was his brother Arthur's widow, married the lady Anne Bullen, a godly, virtuous, and charitable woman, who was delivered of this lady, Sep. 7. Anno Chriſti 1533. whoſe godfather was archbiſhop Cranmer, and her godmothers were the old dutcheſs of Norfolk, and the old marchioneſs of Dorſet. She was brought up in the proteſtant religion from her childhood, and had for her ſchool maſter, Mr Aſcham, who inſtructed her in the knowlege of the tongues and arts; and under whom ſhe profited very much in learning. During all the reign of her father king Henry, and of her brother king Edward, ſhe lived in a princely faſhion: but under the reign of her ſiſter queen Mary, ſhe met with ſo many afflictions, that ſhe well deſerved the title of Elizabeth the confeſſor. Yet thoſe very afflictions, through God's goodneſs, did her ſo much good, that it's hard to ſay, whether ſhe were more happy in having a crown ſo ſoon, or in having it no ſooner, till affliction had firſt laid in her a low and therfore a ſure foundation of humility, for highneſs to be afterwards built upon. By which means ſhe was ſo ripened for her future rule and ſovereignty, that pope Sixtus the fifth profeſſed, that amongſt all the princes in Chriſtendom, he found but two which were worthy to bear command, if they had not been ſtained with hereſy, viz. Henry the fourth king of France, and Elizabeth, queen of England. But as in order of time her ſufferings preceded her ſovereignity; ſo that we will firſt ſet them down to the view of the reader,

When queen Mary came firſt to the crown, ſhe pretended much love to her ſiſter, the lady Elizabeth; for before ſhe was crowned, ſhe would go no whither, but ſhe would have her by the hand and ſend for her to dinner and ſupper; but after ſhe was crowned, ſhe kept her aloof from her: and ſhortly after upon the riſing of ſir Thomas Wyat, ſhe with the lord Courtney, were falſely charged to have a hand in it; whereupon the lady Mary ſent three of her councellors, with two hundred and fifty horſemen of their retinue to her, then lying at her houſe at Aſhbridge, who found her very ſick in bed, and very feeble and weak of body; yet they going up to her chamber, willed one of her ladies to tell her, that they were ſent to her with a meſſage from the queen.

Her grace being told of it, ſaid ſhe was glad of their coming, howbeit being very weak and it now ten o'clock at night, ſhe requeſted them to come again to her the next morning; to which they replyed, that they muſt needs ſee her, and would do it in what caſe ſoever ſhe were, and withal haſtily ruſhed into her chamber, whereupon ſhe being not a little amazed, ſaid unto them, 'Is the haſt ſuch that it might not have pleaſed you to have ſtaid till the morning,' they anſwered, that they were ſorry to ſee her in that caſe: and I (ſaid ſhe) am not glad to ſee you here at this time of night; they ſaid that they came from the queen, whoſe pleaſure it was, that ſhe ſhould be at London the ſeventh of that month; whereunto ſhe ſaid, 'Truly there is no creature more glad than I to come to her majeſty, and am ſorry that at this time I am not in caſe to wait on her, as you ſee, and may teſtify:' They ſaid, they were ſorry to ſee it: yet their commiſſion was to bring her either quick or dead; ſhe being troubled at this, aſked, if their commiſſion was ſo ſtrict; they ſaid yea, and withal called two phyſicians, aſking them if ſhe might be removed with life, or no? which they affirmed that ſhe might in their judgment; thereupon they willed her to prepare againſt next morning at nine o'clock to go with them; and accordingly at that time they took her forth, faint and feeble as ſhe was, being ready to ſwoon three or four times between them. That night they brought her to Redburn, where ſhe was guarded all night; the next day to St. Albans, where ſhe was both feeble in body, and comfortleſs in mind. From thence to Mimmes, and Highgate, where ſhe being very ſick, they tarried that night and the next day.

From thence ſhe was carried to the court, many people by the way flocking about her, and being very ſorry to ſee her in that caſe. At court ſhe was preſently ſhut up, and kept a cloſe priſoner for a fortnight, ſeeing no friend all that time. Then came Steven Gardiner, with nineteen more of the privy council, charging her with Wyat's conſpiracy, which ſhe utterly denied, proteſting her innocency. But after long debating of the buſineſs, they told her it was the queen's pleaſure, ſhe ſhould go to the tower. At which ſhe being agaſt, ſaid, ſhe truſted the queen would be more gracious to her; ſtill proteſting her innocency, and entreating them to mediate for her to the queen, that ſeeing ſhe was a true woman to her majeſty, both in thought, word and deed, ſhe might not be committed to ſo notorious and doleful a place; proteſting that ſhe deſired no favour, if ſhe were found guilty of theſe things. But the lords told her, there was no remedy, for that the queen was fully reſolved that ſhe ſhould go to the Tower, and ſo they departed.

And about an hour after, came Steven Gardiner again with three other of the lords, and the guard, ſecluding all her gentlemen, ladies and gentlewomen from her; and in ſtead of them, appointed three of the queen's men, and three other waiting women to attend her, that none ſhould have acceſs to her grace. They ſet alſo an hundred northern ſoldiers to watch in the gardens all night, and two lords with their companies in the houſe. The Saturday following came two lords to her, telling her, that ſhe muſt preſently go to the Tower, the barge being ready, and the tide ſerving, which would tarry for no body.

Hereupon ſhe with ſorrow entreated them, that ſhe might ſtay but till the next tide; but one of them anſwered, that neither time nor tide muſt be delayed. Then ſhe requeſted, that ſhe might be ſuffered to write to the queen before ſhe went; but that alſo was denied her by one of them; but the other (the earl of Suſſex) kneeling down, ſaid, ſhe ſhould have liberty to write, and as he was a true man, he would deliver it to the queen, and bring her an anſwer, whatever came of it. And ſo the time and tide paſſed away; but they privately prepared all things for her going the next tide, which fell out at midnight; yet fearing leſt ſhe ſhould be taken away, they ſtayed till next day, and then theſe two lords came and told her, it was time for her to depart: ſhe bade them go before, and ſince there was no remedy, ſhe would follow, adding, that ſhe wondered what the nobility meant, to ſuffer her to be led into captivity, the Lord knew whither, for ſhe did not. She ſhot the bridge with ſome danger; the boat ſtriking upon the ground. When ſhe came to the Tower, ſhe refuſed to land at the traitor's ſtairs; neither could ſhe land, but ſhe muſt be over her ſhoes. But one of the lords ſaid, ſhe ſhould land there. Whereupon ſhe coming out of the barge, ſaid, 'Here lands as true a ſubject, being a priſoner, as ever landed at theſe ſtairs, and before thee, O God, I ſpeak it, having no friends but thee alone.

At her landing ſtood many warders, and others in order: what needs all this, ſaid ſhe? going a little further, ſhe ſat down on a cold ſtone to reſt herſelf; then the lieutenant ſaid, 'Madam, you ſit unwholſomly, you had beſt come out of the rain,' to whom ſhe anſwered, 'I had better ſit here than in a worſe place; for God knoweth, I know not whither you will bring me.' Hereupon her gentleman uſher wept; to whom ſhe ſaid, 'What mean you to uſe me ſo? I took you for my comfort, not thus to diſmay me, ſeeing I know my truth to be ſuch, that none ſhall have cauſe to weep for me." And ſo ſhe went into prison; the doors were locked and bolted upon her, which much troubled her.

Then she called to her gentlewoman for her book, desiring God not to suffer her to build her foundation upon the sands, but upon the rock, that so no blustering storms might prevail against her.

Two days after, command came that she should have Mass said in her chamber. In the mean time there was much examining and racking of poor men, to force them to accuse her, that they might put her to death. And five days after came Steven Gardiner, with others of the council, and examined her very strictly about divers things: to whom she at last replied, 'My lords you do shift me very narrowly, but well I am assured you shall not do more to me than God hath appointed, and so God forgive you all.'

About that time divers of her servants, having provided her diet, brought it into the Tower gate, where the rascally soldiers received it, which so grieved them, that they desired to speak with the lieutenant of the Tower, whom they beseeched, that they might not deliver her graces food to such desperate ruffians, but that they might carry it to her themselves; but he very churlishly refused, saying, a prisoner she is, and she shall be served as other prisoners are; they replied, that they expected more favour from him, and persuaded themselves that the queen and her council would be better to her grace than so; whereupon he sware by God, that if they either frowned or shrugged at him, he would set them where they should neither see sun nor moon.

Thus taking their leave, they prayed God to make him of a better mind to his mistress: having thus continued in prison for a month, she began to be sickly, whereupon she requested the lieutenant that she might have liberty to walk out a little, but he denying her that favour she requested, that she might at least walk in the queen's lodgings, but still he pretended that he durst not permit it; Well then, said she, 'If they be so strict, God comfort me.

The next day the lord Shandois came to her, and told her, that he had sued to the council for some liberty for her, and had at last obtained, that she might walk into those lodgings, provided, that the windows were kept shut, and that the lord chamberlain, and three of the queen's women did attend her, for which she thanked him and made use of that little liberty; afterwards she had leave to walk into a little garden, the doors being locked upon her, and the prisoner on that side the house being strictly commanded not to speak, nor look out at windows, whilst she was there; for this she praised God, and was well contented with it.

During her imprisonment, a little boy four years old, a man's child in the tower, used sometimes to bring her some flowers, as he did to other prisoners: hereupon the boy was sent for and they promised him figgs and apples, and then asked him, when he was with the lady Elizabeth; he answered, every day.

Then they asked him, when he was with the lord of Devonshire, and what he sent by him to her grace; the boy said, I will go presently to him and know what he will send her; but upon this the lieutenant told him, he should be whipt, if he came any more at them; but, said the boy, I will carry my lady and mistress some more flowers: whereupon the child's father was commanded, that he should suffer him to go no more to their chambers.

The next day her grace walking in the garden, the boy peeped in at a hole, and said, mistress I must bring you no more flowers; whereat she smiled, apprehending what the reason was; this so angred the lieutenant, that he commanded his father to put him out of the Tower.

Shortly after the constable of the Tower was discharged, and Sir Hendry Benefield put into his place, who brought with him one hundred soldiers, with which she was much troubled, and asked, whither the lady Jane's husband was yet taken away, fearing that she should have died the same tragedy. Then she enquired, what this Sir Henry Benefield was, and whither if her secret murdering was required, he was a man of that conscience to do it done. They answered, they knew not what he was, but they were persuaded God would not suffer such wickedness. Well said she, God grant it: 'For thou O God canst mollify such tyrannous hearts, and disappoint all such cruel purposes; and I beseech thee, to hear me thy creature, which am thy servant, and at thy command, trusting by thy grace ever so to remain.

Shortly after, she was told by the lord Sandois, that she must be removed by the new guard, but he knew not whither, except to Woodstock. This much troubled her, desiring rather to stay there still, then to be led thence with such a sort of rascals. But he told her, there was no remedy: accordingly the Sabbath following, Sir Henry Benefield (being made her jailor) received her to his charge, with a company of Rake-helis for her guard. The lord of Tame also was joined in commission with him; the first night they carried her to Richmond, where her own attendance were removed into outward chambers, and these rude soldiers appointed to attend on her person.

Whereat she suspecting some mischief, called her usher, desiring him with the rest, to pray for her; for this night (quoth she) I think to die. But he with many tears endeavoured to comfort her; and going down into the court, he met the lord of Tame, and Sir Henry Benefield, walking there, and desiring to speak with the lord apart, he said to him, my lord, you have always been my good lord, and so I beseech you to remain; I now desire your honour unfeignedly to tell me, whither any mischief be intended to her grace this night, that I and my poor fellows may take such part as it shall please God to appoint: for certainly we will rather die than that she being innocent should secretly miscarry. Mary (said the lord) God forbid that any such wickedness should be wrought; and rather then it should be so, I and my men are ready to die at her feet also, And so thorough God's mercy she passed that doleful night with an heavy heart.

The next day, as she passed to Windsor, she spied some of her men standing the way to see her; whereupon she bade one about her to go to them, and to tell them, tanquam ovis, that she was led as a sheep to the slaughter.

From Windsor she was carried to Mr Dormers; and by the way some poor people presenting her with some small trifles, Sir Henry Benefield was exceeding angry, calling them rebels and traitors, &c.

As she passed through some towns, they rang the bells, which so angred Benefield, that he sent his soldiers for the ringers, and set them in the stocks.

The next night she went to the lord of Tames, where she was entertained in a very princely manner. At which Benefield grunted and grumbled, saying, that they could not answer it, &c. But the lord of Tame told him, that he knew what he did, and that her grace should be merry at his house.

The next day she went to Woodstock, where she was imprisoned closly, the soldiers guarding both within, and without the walls of the house day and night; at last she was allowed to walk into the garden, which much refreshed her, yet all the doors were strictly locked, Sir Henry himself keeping the keys, whereupon she called him her jailor, but he desired her not to call him so, but one of her officers, to whom she answered; 'From such officers good lord deliver me.' After a time she made suit to the council, that she might have leave to write to the queen, which at last was permitted, and Sir Henry Benefield brought her pen, ink, and paper, standing by whilst she wrote, and then requested that he might be the messenger to carry it; but she told him, she would send one of her own servants with it; whereupon he replied, that he thought none of them durst be so bold as to carry it, she being in that case; yea, said she, I have none so dishonest as not to go at my request.

Well, said he, my commission is to the contrary, and I may not suffer it. Her grace replied; you tell me oft of your commission, I pray God you may justly answer the cruel dealing that you use towards me. Yet he stopt her letters four or five days, but at length sent for one of her gentlemen, and asked him, if he durst be so bold as to carry her letter. Yea, said he, that I dare, and will with all my heart; so with an ill will he gave him her letter.

She being ſickly the queen ſent two of her phyſicians to her, who ſtaid four or five days, till ſhe began to amend, and then returned, reporting well of her mild behaviour, and humbleneſs towards the queen. About which time ſhe was requeſted to ſubmit herſelf to the queen's majeſty; but ſhe anſwered, that ſhe would never ſubmit to them, whom ſhe had never offended, for ſaid ſhe, if I have offended, I have no mercy but the law, which had I been guilty of the breach of, I am ſure I ſhould have had it before this; about this time a conſultation being held what ſhould be done with her; one of the lords ſaid, that it would never be quiet with England, except her head were ſtricken off; whereunto the Spaniards anſwered: God forbid, that their king and maſter ſhould have a mind to conſent to that miſchief; and accordingly they perſuaded their king, that he ſhould never get ſo much honour as by delivering the lady Elizabeth out of priſon, which at length he effected.

Whilſt ſhe was at Woodſtock, her life was oft in danger, firſt by fire kindling under her chamber boards. which was verily ſuppoſed to be done on purpoſe, yet through God's mercy it was quenched; alſo a ruffian, that was one of the keepers, was ſuborned to murder her, which the lady alſo diſcovered, and prevented; alſo a darling of Steven Gardiner's was ſent to murder her, which was prevented by Sir Henry Bucfield's abſence, who had commanded his brother to let no man whatſoever to come to her till his return, Alſo whilſt ſhe was in the Tower, by Steven Gardiner's procurment, a writ was ſent for her execution, but the lieutenant preſently going to to the queen with it, the Lord was pleaſed in mercy thereby to prevent the execution of it. At her departure out of Woodſtock ſhe wrote with a diamond in the window.

Much ſuſpected of me,
Nothing proved can be,
Quoth Elizabeth priſoner.

Whilſt ſhe was there, hearing a milk maid in the park ſinging merrily, ſhe wiſhed herſelf a milk maid, ſaying, that her caſe was better, and life more merry than hers in that ſtate as ſhe was. When ſhe was ſent for from Woodſtock, ſhe was by Sir Henry Benefield carried in a tempeſtuous day to Ricot, by the way her hood was thrice blown off, and ſhe deſiring to go to a gentleman's houſe hard by, Benefield would not ſuffer her, ſo that ſhe was conſtrained under an hedge to trim her head as well as ſhe could; from thence ſhe was carried to Colebrook, and by the way ſome of her ſervants meeting of her, which had not ſeen her of a long time, they were not ſuffered to ſpeak with her, but were charged in the queen's name preſently to depart, to their mutual ſorrow; ſhe was ſtill ſurrounded and guarded with ſoldiers, and cloſe ſhut up in her chamber, as in a priſon.

From thence ſhe went to Hampton court, where for a fortnight ſhe was ſhut up, and guarded with ſoldiers as before. Then came to her the lord William Howard, who uſed her very honourably; whereupon ſhe requeſted him to be a means that ſhe might ſpeak with ſome of the privy council; and ſhortly after Steven Gardiner with ſome others of them came to her, to whom ſhe ſaid, 'My lords I am glad to ſee you, methinks I have been deſolately alone a great while: wherefore I deſire you to mediate to the king, and queen, that I may be delivered from priſon, &c.

Then Steven Gardiner requeſted her to ſubmit herſelf to the queen, and then he doubted not but ſhe would be good to her, to whom ſhe anſwered, that rather than ſhe would do ſo, ſhe would lie in priſon all the days of her life; for ſhe craved no mercy, but rather the law, in caſe ſhe had offended; for, 'ſaid ſhe, If I ſhould yield to this, I ſhould confeſs my ſelf to be an offender, and might give the king and queen occaſion to judge evil of me ever hereafter; and ſo the lords departed. The next day came Gardiner again, and told her, that the queen marvelled that ſhe carried herſelf ſo ſtoutly, not confeſſing that ſhe had offended; and therefore the queen had impriſoned her wrongfully; nay, ſaid ſhe, it may pleaſe her to puniſh me as ſhe ſees good; well, ſaid Gardiner, you muſt tell another tale before you be ſet at liberty; the good lady anſwered, that ſhe had as lieve be in priſon with truth and honeſty, as abroad and ſuſpected of her majeſty.

A week after the queen ſent for her at ten o'clock at night, whom ſhe had not ſeen of two years before, and ſo ſhe was conducted to the queen's bedchamber; when ſhe came in, ſhe kneeled down, and prayed God to preſerve her majeſty, not doubting but ſhe ſhould prove as true a ſubject to her as ever any did, deſiring her majeſty ſo to eſteem of her, for ſhe ſhould not find her otherwiſe, whatſoever report ſhe heard to the contrary: the queen anſwered, you will not confeſs your offence, but ſtand ſtoutly to your truth; I pray God it may ſo fall out, if it do not, ſaid the lady Elizabeth, I neither deſire favour, nor pardon, &c. and ſo after ſuch like diſcourſe, ſhe was ſent away with little comfort from the queen; yet a week after ſhe was freed from Sir Henry Benefield her keeper, and his ſoldiers; whereupon ſhe went to refreſh her ſelf in the country; but the queen ſent with her Sir Thomas Pope, one of her councellors, who watched her narrowly all queen Mary's days; ſhortly after came ſome of the queen's ſervants, and carried one of her gentlewomen to the Fleet, and three others to the Tower, which much troubled her grace.

But it pleaſed God about this time to take away by a remarkable judgment that cruel perſecutor Steven Gardiner, whereby the life of this excellent princeſs was preſerved: and ſhortly after dropped away by degrees divers other of her enemies, whereby her danger decreaſed, and ſafety and comfort began to appear, as light out of a dark cloud.

At laſt alſo queen Mary died, at which time the parliament was ſitting at Weſtminſter; and the lords being informed of it, they communicated it to the commons, and ſo both joined together preſently in proclaiming Elizabeth queen of England, &c.

She was now about twenty-five years old, and by experience and adverſity had gotten wiſdom above her age. The next day after ſhe was proclaimed queen, ſhe came from Hatfield to London, and lodged at the charter-houſe; the next day ſhe went to the tower, and in her paſſage had divers ſpeeches made to her, and other expreſſions of her ſubjects joy, and if ever a perſon had the gift, or ſtill to win the hearts of the people, it was this queen; ſhe coupled mildneſs with majeſty, and ſtooped, yet in a ſtately manner, to the meaneſt ſort. All her faculties were in motion, and every motion ſeemed a well guided action. Her eye was ſet upon one, her ear liſtened to another, her judgment ran upon a third, to a fourth ſhe addreſſed her ſpeech. Her ſpirit ſeemed to be every where, and yet ſo intire in herſelf, that it ſeemed to be no where elſe. Some ſhe commended, ſome ſhe pitied, ſome ſhe thanked, contemning none, neglecting none; and generally calling forth ſuch courteous countenances, geſtures, and ſpeeches, that thereupon the people redoubled the teſtimonies of their joy, promiſing themſelves much happineſs under the government of ſuch a queen.

She was of ſtature tall, ſlender, ſtraight, and of an amiable countenance; her hair inclined to a pale yellow, her fore-head large and fair, a ſeemly ſeat for princely grace; her eyes lively, her noſe ſomewhat riſing in the midſt; the whole compaſs of her countenance ſomewhat long, but yet of admirable beauty.

In life ſhe was moſt innocent, in deſires moderate, in purpoſe juſt, of ſpirit above credit, and almoſt above the capacity of her ſex; of a divine wit, as well for depth of judgment, as for quick conceit and ſpeedy expedition, very eloquent, of wonderful knowlege both in learning and affairs; ſkilful in Greek, Latin, and divers other foreign languages.

She was very religious, magnanimous, merciful, and juſt. She maintained juſtice at home, and armies abroad, with great wiſdom and authority. She deſired thoſe that repaired to her, if they would not be deceived in her, that they would not be the firſt to deceive themſelves; that they would not prejudice her by immoderate expectations and hopes, promiſing to themſelves out of a ſudden liking, more than was fit, or peradventure poſſible to be performed. And laſtly, that they would not raſhly judge of of her actions, as being privy either to the occaſions or ends of them.

After ſome ſtay at the tower, ſhe removed to Somerſet-houſe. She continued all the counſellors left by the deceaſed queen; and to ballance them equally, being papiſts, ſhe choſe divers proteſtants to join with them; and knowing that ſudden alterations are dangerous, ſhe did by degrees aboliſh popery, and eſtabliſhed the reformed religion; then ſhe ſummoned a parliament. When ſhe took a coach in the tower, ſhe made a ſolemn thankſgiving unto God, who had delivered her no leſs mercifully, and mightily, from her impriſonment in that place, than Daniel from the lion's den, that had delivered her from thoſe dangers wherewith ſhe was environed and overwhelmed, to bring her to the joy and honour of that day.

As ſhe paſſed through the city, the recorder preſented her with a curious purſe, wherein were a thouſand merks in gold, deſiring that ſhe would be a gracious miſtreſs to the city: ſhe anſwered, That ſhe was bound ſo to be; not for their gold, but for their good wills: and that as they had expended treaſure to honour her, ſo ſhe would be ready not only to ſpend her treaſure, but the deareſt drops of her blood to maintain and increaſe their flouriſhing eſtate.

A child from a pageant let down in a ſilken lace, an Engliſh Bible richly covered to her; ſhe kiſſed her hands, took it, kiſt it, laid it to her breaſt, then held it up, thanking the city, eſpecially for that gift, and promiſing to be a diligent reader of it. She chearfully received roſegays, flowers, roſemary, from mean perſons.

The Sabbath following ſhe was crowned at Weſtminſter; then ſhe appointed a public diſputation there, about matters of religion: but the popiſh diſputants ſhewed themſelves ſo croſs and froward in it, that it came to nothing.

King Philip hearing of the death of his wife queen Mary, he ſent an ambaſſador to propoſe his marriage with her, promiſing to get a diſpenſation from the pope. This much troubled her, conſidering his quality, and how much he had deſerved of her, and yet now ſhe muſt reject his ſuit: wherefore ſhe reſolved publicly to make profeſſion of her religion, and to haſten the reformation, as the only means to take him off.

In the parliament was enacted, That the lady Elizabeth was, and ought, both by the law of God, the common law of England, and the ſtatute law, to be the lawful and undoubted queen of England, &c. The ſacrament was appointed to be uſed in both kinds, and divers ſuch like laws for eſtabliſhing the proteſtant religion. Then ſhe concluded a peace with the French king.

The commons, by their ſpeaker, endeavoured to perſuade her to marriage, from many politic grounds: to whom ſhe anſwered, That at her coronation ſhe had ſolemnly, with a ring, eſpouſed herſelf to the kingdom: 'And (ſaid ſhe) every one of you, and every true Engliſhman, are my children and kinſmen: but if God ſhall diſpoſe, that I ſhall enter into another courſe of life, I promiſe you, that I will do nothing that ſhall be prejudicial to the common-wealth, &c. And to me it ſhall be full ſatisfaction, if when I have left my laſt breath, it be engraven on my tomb, 'Here lies ELIZABETH, which reigned a virgin, and died a virgin.'

By means of the alteration of religion this kingdom became the moſt free of all the kingdoms in Chriſtendom, the ſcepter being freed from ſervitude to the pope, and more wealthy than formerly, an infinite maſs of money being ſtaid at home, which was wont to be exported to Rome.

She oft uſed to ſay, That the common wealth might be in ſafety, ſhe was never without care. Her motto was, SEMPER EADEM, 'Always the ſame.' Her ſtudy was, as to reform, ſo to eſtabliſh the reformed religion. When foreign princes interceeded to her in the behalf of the papiſts, ſhe anſwered, That they muſt not expect from her ſuch things as ſhe could not grant with the ſafety of her kingdom, and without wrong to her own honour and conſcience.

The king of France, notwithſtanding his late made peace with her, yet levied great forces of horſe and foot, to be tranſported into Scotland; but whilſt he breathed out nothing but blood and ſlaughter againſt the proteſtants, by God's juſt hand his own blood was ſpilt, at the nuptial ſolemnities of his daughter and ſiſter.

About this time religion was reformed in Scotland, which the queen regent much impugned; and for that end made uſe of French ſoldiers to ſuppreſs the proteſtant nobility and others. Whereupon they ſued to queen Elizabeth for aid, and ſhe enquired into their ends which they propoſed, which they profeſſed were to advance the glory of Chriſt, and ſincere preaching of God's word, the rooting out of ſuperſtition and idolatry, and to preſerve their antient liberty againſt the oppreſſion of ſtrangers. After the queen had ſeriouſly conſidered all things, it was reſolved, That the profeſſors of the ſame religion were to be relieved, and the French to be driven out of Scotland. Hereupon the queen ſent Mr Winter with a fleet into Edinburgh Frith, who ſet upon the French ſhips of war, and upon one of their garriſons. And the duke of Norfolk was ſent to Berwick, unto whom reſorted many of the Scottiſh nobility, where many articles were agreed upon betwixt them. After which the queen ſent an army into Scotland, conſiſting of one thouſand two hundred horſe, and ſix thouſand foot, under the Lord Gray, a brave ſoldier. They firſt beſieged Leith; the French iſſued forth and ſkirmiſhed with them, but were beaten in again. The ſiege continuing, the king of France ſent to queen Elizabeth to treat of a peace, which at laſt was concluded, and proclaimed in the camp and town. Hereby the antient liberty of Scotland was retained, the dignity of England preſerved, and the Scottiſh proteſtants acknowleged our queen defendreſs of their happineſs.

Shortly after, the queen ſet forth a proclamation, whereby ſhe commanded the Anabaptiſts, and ſuch like heretics, which had flocked to the coaſt-towns of England from the parts beyond the ſea, (under colour of ſhunning perſecution, and thereby had ſpread their poiſonous opinions in England) to depart the realm within twenty days, upon pain of impriſonment, and loſs of goods.

The abby of Weſtminſter ſhe converted to a collegiate church, inſtituting, to God's glory, and the increaſe of good learning, a dean, twelve prebends, a ſchoolmaſter, uſher, and forty ſcholars, ſix whereof at leaſt are preferred to the univerſities yearly, twelve almſ-men, &c. Money which king Henry the eight had imbaſed ſhe reſtored to its juſt value.

In the year 1561, the Scottiſh queen deferred the confirmation of the above mentioned treaty; whereupon the queen ſent into Scotland, to exhort the nobility to mutual amity, which is firmly founded in the unity of religion.

Shortly after, the Scottiſh queen being now a widow, and in France, ſent to queen Elizabeth for leave to paſs into Scotland upon a ſafe conduct; which ſhe refuſed to grant, becauſe ſhe had not, according to her faith given, confirmed the afore-named treaty; but yet, in a great fogg, ſhe paſſed by the Engliſh ſhips, and ſo got into Scotland.

About this time the pope endeavoured to perſuade her to ſend ſome to the council of Trent, for the taking away of diſſentions in religion, &c. Whereunto ſhe anſwered, That ſhe heartily wiſhed for an œcumenical council, but to a popiſh council ſhe would not ſend; with the biſhop of Rome ſhe had nothing to do, whoſe authority was expelled out of England by conſent of her eſtates; neither belonged it to him, but to the emperor, to call councils, nor would ſhe acknowlege any greater authority in him, than in any other biſhop.

About this time the ſpire of Paul's ſteeple, which was five hundred and twenty foot from the ground, and two hundred and ſixty from the ſquare ſteeple, being framed of timber, and covered with lead, was ſet on fire by lightning; and in five hours ſpace it was quite conſumed, together with the roof of the church: but by the queen's bounty, and other large contributions, the roof was ſoon repaired again.

In the year 1562, the proteſtants in France being perſecuted, and oppreſſed by the popiſh party, ſent to the queen of England, deſiring aid from her: and after mature deliberation, ſhe took into her protection the French king's ſubjects in Normandy, contracting with the prince of Conde, and other noblemen, to pay them an hundred thouſand thouſand angels, and to ſend them over into France ſix thouſand men. And the ſame day ſhe publiſhed a declaration, That ſhe ſent not her army into Normandy to recover the country which anciently belonged to the kings of England, but to preſerve it for the French king, being not yet of age, and to defend it againſt the Guiſes, who had exerciſed barbarous cruelties againſt the proteſtants, whom ſhe could not neglect, without betraying her own religion, ſecurity, and ſafety.

And ſhortly after ſhe ſent over forces under the earl of Warwick to New-haven; and the queen's ſhips ſcouring the ſeas, brought in many rich prizes.

In the year 1563, another parliament was holden at Weſtminſter; where, amongſt other good laws, it was ordained, that the Bible and ſervice ſhould be tranſlated into the Welſh tongue.

The year after, the queen in her progreſs went to Cambridge, where ſhe was entertained with all kinds of honour, and with comedies, tragedies, and ſcholaſtical diſputations: She ſurveyed every college, and in a Latin oration ſhe acknowleged their love and kindneſs, commending their multiplicity of learning, exhorting them to bend their whole minds and ſtudies to the improvement thereof, promiſing to be a patroneſs to them therein.

In the year 1566, ſhe went to Oxford alſo, where ſhe was magnificently entertained; there ſhe ſtaid ſeven days, being much delighted with the pleaſantneſs of the place, the beautifulneſs of the colleges, and the wits and excellent learning of the ſtudents. She gave them large thanks in a Latin oration, with ſingular ſweetneſs of ſpeech, and ſo bade them heartily farewel.

In the year 1568, ſome godly miniſters fought earneſtly for a reformation of our church, for aboliſhing of epiſcopacy, and for the ſettling of the preſbyterial government in this kingdom; but, by the power of the biſhops with the queen, they were impriſoned: yet had they many that concurred with them in that judgment, which, by the prelatical party, were branded with the odious name of Puritans.

About this time the queen of Scots fled into England, and, by the advice of the privy council, was here detained.

Alſo pope Pius Quintus ſuborned one Robert Ridolph, a Florentine, who had lived a factor in London a long time, to ſtir up the papiſts in England againſt queen Elizabeth, which he moſt zealouſly and cloſely perſecuted; yet the Lord prevented him. Alſo there was much underhand dealing, that the duke of Norfolk might marry the queen of Scots, and ſet her at liberty, whereupon ſhe was removed out of the north, being a popiſh country, to Tidbury caſtle, under the cuſtody of George earl of Shrewſbury.

Queen Elizabeth uſed great care for the ſafety of religion both at home and abroad: and whereas in France edicts were publiſhed, contrary to the former agreement, whereby the exerciſe of the reformed religion was utterly forbidden, the profeſſors of it removed from all public offices, and the miniſters of the word commanded to depart the realm by a day prefixed, our queen, by her ambaſſador Norris, earneſtly ſolicited the king of France, that a ſound and ſincere peace might be made, adviſing the king, that he would not by unſeaſonable remedies, increaſe his ſubjects minds; and that, above all things, he would beware of thoſe which, by rooting out his faithful ſubjects, ſought to weaken his kingdom, that it might become a prey to others: but when he would not hearken to her council, leaſt ſhe ſhould fail thoſe that were joined with her in one common cauſe, ſhe ſent one hundred thouſand angels, and ammunition for war to the proteſtants: ſhe alſo entertained courteouſly ſuch French proteſtants as fled into England, as alſo the Netherlanders, many of whom came hither alſo to withdraw themſelves from the cruelty of the duke de Alva, who breathed forth nothing but blood and death againſt them; and ſhortly after, picking a quarrel with our queen, he prohibited all commerce with the Engliſh, and commanded that nothing ſhould be brought in, or carried forth of the Netherlands by the Engliſh. He alſo appointed ſearchers, amongſt whom there was none ſo active as John ſtory an Engliſh fugitive, who had before conſulted with a magician againſt the queen's life, and had provoked the duke de Alva to invade England; but being allured with a wile into a ſhip, they preſently hoiſed ſail, and brought him hither, where he was afterwards executed for his treaſon.

About this time many rumors brake forth, that the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland (zealous papiſts) were raiſing a rebellion in the north; whereupon the queen ſent to them, to come up to London, and Northumberland was partly minded ſo to do, but his friends and followers beſeeched him, that he would not fail them, nor the religion of his fathers; telling him, that the catholics were prepared all over England to aſſiſt him; that ſome were coming out of Scotland, others out of the Netherlands, from the duke de Alva, to join with him: whereupon, he going to the earl of Weſtmoreland, they broke out into open rebellion, publiſhing theſe pretences: That they took arms with no other intent, but that the religion of their fore fathers might be reſtored, corrupt counſellors removed from the queen, the duke of Norfolk, and other knights that were put from their ranks, might be reſtored to liberty and grace; and that they attempted nothing againſt the queen, to whom they vowed themſelves now and ever dutiful and obedient ſubjects.

Their firſt march was to Durham, where they rent and trampled under feet Engliſh Bibles, in as great a contempt as Jehoiakim did Jeremiah's roll. At Darrington they beſprinkled the army with holy water, and at Rippon they heard maſs to forward their treaſon. Their enſign was the croſs, and five wounds of Chriſt. At Brampton-muir they muſtered a thouſand ſix hundred horſe, and four thouſand foot, with which they fell upon Barnard's caſtle, which after eleven days ſiege was yielded to them; hereupon they were proclaimed traitors. The pope promiſed a hundred thouſand crowns to advance this deſign, but before they received the money, the earl of Suſſex, lieutenant general of the north, gathered ſome forces, and purſued them; whereupon the chief of them fled to Scotland, to the popiſh party there, not bidding their deluded followers farewel, who were preſently ſurprized without reſiſtance, and the ring leaders of them were executed by marſhal law. Yet preſently after Leonard Dacres began a new rebellion, and raiſed many to revenge their friends death; but the lord Hunſdon haſting againſt them, after a long and deſperate fight, put them to flight: Dacres eſcaped into Scotland, and left his followers to the law. Northumberland in Scotland was taken by the regent, impriſoned, and afterwards ſent into England, where (being attained by the parliament) he was beheaded at York. The earl of Weſtmoreland, by God's revenging hand, in the very time of his rebellion, was deprived of his children; and afterwards, wandering himſelf in ſtrange countries, had his body conſumed with venemous ulcers, whereof he died.

About that time, pope Pius Quintus, at the inſtance of Nicholas Morton, an Engliſh prieſt, ſent forth his bull againſt the queen, whereby he deprived her of all princely authority, as one uncapable of the crown or government. Then were his emiſſaries ſent forth, ſome plotters of invaſions, to lay our land waſte; others, conſpirators againſt her ſacred perſon. And the pope's bull was brought to London, and in the night time hung upon the gates of the biſhop's palace by Paul's.

Yet in the midſt of theſe broils at home, ſhe failed not to relieve the proteſtants of France, who were in a moſt diſtreſſed ſtate; and ſhe exhorted all the princes of the ſame profeſſion, to take upon them the defence of the common cauſe. The queen of Navarre ſhe ſupplied with money, taking jewels in pawn for it. She permitted Henry Champernoon to lead into France an hundred voluntary gentlemen upon horſe back, who were very ſerviceable to the proteſtant party. Not long after were executed Sherwin, Champion, and Kirby, for diſperſing and promoting the pope's bull againſt the queen. And Sanders, the pope's legate in Ireland to raiſe rebellion, fell mad, and wandered ſuccourleſs in the waſte mountains, whereby he miſerably died.

Then John Summervile of Ederſton, in Warwickſhire, came to the court, (provoked thereto by one Hall, a ſeminary prieſt) with a purpoſe to murder the queen; but God diſcovering diſcovering his treaſon, he was committed to Newgate, where he deſperately hanged himſelf.

Many prieſts and Jeſuites repaired into England, in the guiſe of gallants, diſperſing themſelves, and endeavouring to withdraw the ſubjects from their allegiance; ſome of which were taken and executed, as Campion, &c.

Then Francis Throgmorton, ſolicited thereto by Mendoza the Spaniſh ambaſſador, undertook to ſound the haven for the enemy's entrance; to get a cataloge of all the popiſh gentlemen in every county, that would aſſiſt; but God diſcovering his treaſon, he was apprehended, and in his ſtudy the catalogue was found, and the haveas for landing, &c. for which he was worthily executed.

Then one William Parry (whoſe life the queen had formerly ſpared, when he was juſtly condemned for Burglary) vowed her death; and for this end he went to the queen, deſiring to ſpeak with her, and oft-times, after having weapon, place, preſence, and opportunity, intending reſolutely to kill her, was ever daunted when he beheld the glory of her preſence, and majeſty in her face. Yet afterwards, reading Allen's book, he was ſo fired with zeal, that he poſted to a gentleman whom he thought as diſcontented as himſelf, opening his treaſon for the bringing in of foreign invaders, and threatening with dag and dagger to kill the queen; but the gentleman revealing it to two privy counſellors, he was apprehended, and confeſſing his treaſon, was worthily executed. Hereupon her majeſty, in a parliament, openly profeſſed, that ſhe knew no creature breathing, whoſe life ſtood hourly in more peril than her own. And that even at her firſt entrance into her eſtate, ſhe entered into infinite dangers of life, as one that had to wreſtle with many and mighty enemies; yet was ſhe confident of her heavenly Father's protection &c.

Shortly after, as ſhe was upon the Thames, in her barge, with the French ambaſſador, and ſome others, a ſerving man, with his caleiver, ſhot a bullet, which pierced both the arms of one of the watermen, within ſix foot of the queen, with which all in the barge were aſtoniſhed; but ſhe being undaunted, and ſeeing the man bleed, threw him her ſcarf, and, with words of comfort, bid him be of good cheer, he ſhould never want; for the bullet was aimed at her, though it hit him. Yet, afterwards, knowing that it was done caſually, ſhe both pardoned the party, and commanded his maſter to keep him ſtill in his ſervice.

She was of ſuch ſingular clemency, that ſhe never heard of the capital puniſhment of offenders, even of ſuch as had ſought her own death, but it bred horror and ſorrow in her; ſo that had not her counſellors earneſtly inculcated the neceſſity of ſuch exemplary juſtice, many dangerous attempts had eſcaped their due puniſhment, which moved her to ſay, that her reading of Seneca de clementia had done her much good; but ſome would perſuade her, it had done her ſtate as much harm.

Her love to her people in general, and tender care over the poorer ſort, and oppreſſed, was incomparable; her ears were always open to their complaints, and her hands open to receive their petitions; and her manner was, always to commend their cauſes to her council and judges, to whom ſhe uſed to ſay: 'Have care of my people, you have my place, do you to them that which I ought to do. They are my people, yet every one oppreſſeth and ſpoileth them without mercy; they can neither help themſelves, nor revenge their quarrel. See to them, I pray you, ſee to them; for they are my charge; them therefore I charge you with, as God hath committed them to me. I care not for myſelf, my life is not dear unto me; my care is for my people: you might diſcern that I take no great joy in wearing the crown,' &c.

In the year 1585, Henry Piercy earl of Northumberland was gone ſo far in diſloyal practices againſt her, that he was committed to the tower; whereby diſcharging a dagg, with three bullets, under his left pap, he pierced his heart, and preſently died.

Alſo, Philip earl of Arundel, and Sir John Perat, late deputy of Ireland, for plotting with Spain againſt the queen, were impriſoned in the tower; where, by courſe of nature, they ended their lives.

Then Anthony Babington, eſq; and thirteen more, whereof one was a ſeminary prieſt, conſpired againſt her, whereof ſeven of them undertook to murder her. They held intelligence alſo with foreign powers to invade the realm; and with many papiſts, in moſt parts of the kingdom. But the prieſt going to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, Mendoza, to ſignify that all things were now ready, was ſuddenly apprehended and impriſoned: whereupon Babington and two others of them reſolved immediately to kill the queen; but (God protecting her) he was intercepted and impriſoned, from whence he eſcaped; and intending to fly the land, diſguiſed himſelf by diſcolouring his face and hands with walnut tree leaves; yet, through God's mercy, he was diſcovered, apprehended, and brought to the tower. The other conſpirators hereupon diſperſed themſelves, yet were met with, and examined, who confeſſed their treaſons, and were deſervedly condemned, and executed.

Then Stanley, an Engliſh fugitive, ſuborned Patrick Cullen, for thirty pounds to kill the queen; yet God diſcovering his treaſon, he was apprehended and executed. Then Roderick Lopez, a phyſician about her majeſty, was corrupted to give her poiſon in her phyſic, and for that end had a jewel of gold, garnithed with a great diamond, and large ruby given him, and fifty thouſand crowns promiſed when he ſhould effect it; but God's mercy brought to light the conſpiracy. So that Lopez coming with his poiſonous phyſic to the queen, ſhe told him, he muſt go to the lord treaſurer Cecil, who had more need of phyſic than ſhe; whereupon he went to him with all diligence, to whom the old man ſaid, what is your phyſic, Mr Doctor? a purge, ſaid Lopez. I think, ſaid the lord Cecil, I muſt be a phyſician to purge you; and ſo apprehended him for a traitor. Then other doctors examining the ingredients, eaſily found that the potion was poiſon; for which he ſuffered death at Tyburn, as he deſerved.

Then two other Engliſh fugitives, York and Williams, ſoldiers by profeſſion, and deſperate papiſts, were ſuborned to kill her, oaths of ſecrecy adminiſtred to them by a prieſt, who ſent them away with his bleſſing; they came unto England with a purpoſe to get entertainment with ſome great courtier to further their deſign, but their treaſon being found out, they were condemned, and died like traitors; then one Squire, who belonged to the queen's ſtable, was hired to poiſon the pummel of her ſaddle; and by a Jeſuit he was thus encouraged; 'God bleſs thee, and give thee ſtrength, my ſon, be of good courage, I pawn my ſoul for thine, and thou ſhalt have my prayers dead and alive:' and thereupon he delivered him the poiſon, directed him how to apply it; and afterwards the queen being to ride abroad, he preſſed out the poiſon upon the pummel of her ſadle a little before ſhe gat up, yet God's wonted and wonderful protection appeared; for though the ſeaſon was hot, and her veins and pores open to receive any malignant tainture, yet her body felt no diſtemper, nor her hand more hurt than Paul's did when he ſhaked off the venemous viper; then with the ſame poiſon he anointed the pummels of a wooden chair wherein the earl of Eſſex ſat, purpoſing to deſtroy him alſo; but the Lord prevented the operation, as he did to the queen. Hereupon the Jeſuit ſuſpecting Squire's falſehood, becauſe the act was not done, ſent information againſt him into England; whereupon he was committed to priſon, and examined, who confeſſing all, was worthily executed.

The duke of Norfolk, who was priſoner in the tower, about the queen of Scots, was, after trial, condemned and executed.

In the year 1572, the regent of Scotland ſent to her to crave aid, for the defence of the young king and country, endangered by civil broils; whereupon the queen ſent him a thouſand five hundred men, under Sir William Drury, who beſieged the caſtle of Edinburgh, held by ſome rebels, took it in; and ſo returned into England. The ſame year Sir Thomas Greſham built the royal exchange, for the commerce of merchants.

In the year 1577, Sir Francis Drake ſailed about the world, returning in the year 1580, to the great honour of the queen, and the Engliſh nation; being the firſt that ever attempted and performed ſuch an enterprize.

In the year 1583, the pope and king of Spain joined together, together, to ſend men and money, under Thomas Stukely, into Ireland, to ſtir up rebellions there; but the Lord Gray, deputy of Ireland, quickly ſlew and took them priſoners. And Stukely, haunted with the furies of his own conſcience, died miſerably. Alſo, the earl of Deſmond, that had joined in the rebellion, wandering about in the woods, was at laſt ſlain by a common ſoldier.

About this time the ſtates of the low countries joining together to free themſelves from the Spaniſh tyranny, ſought to our queen to be their protectreſs. She permitted them to carry over many Engliſh volunteers, and promiſed to mediate peace betwixt them and the king of Spain, and ſo diſmiſſed them well ſatisfied; but preſently after Don John of Auſtria oppreſſing them, they ſued again to the queen, that by her means they might enjoy the ancient privileges of their provinces, and freedom of conſcience from the Spaniſh inquiſition; and by their lamentable complaints, they ſo prevailed with the pitiful queen, that ſhe ſent into Spain, to intreat the king to redreſs their grievances: but he, being deaf to that requeſt, and planting his garriſons very ſuſpitiouſly, ſhe agreed with the ſtates, and lent them an hundred thouſand pound for their relief.

In the year 1581, Francis Valois, the king of France's brother, came into England to woo our queen; but ſhe deſiring to do nothing that might grieve her ſubjects, after princely entertainment diſmiſſed him.

Shortly after, the prince of Orange being murdered, the ſtates ſued to her again for relief and protection, and her council, upon debate, reſolved, That for defence of the goſpel, and the profeſſors of it, her majeſty ought to accept of the offer, and thereupon ſhe undertook to be their defender, but would not take the title of ſovereign lady thereof, which they would have ſettled upon her and her heirs. Then was Sir John Norris ſent over with five thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, at her majeſty's pay; for ſecurity whereof Fluſhing, Brill, and the Rame kins, were delivered to her majeſty's uſe.

In the year 1585, this king Philip of Spain took very ill, and publiſhed two falſe libels againſt her, whereunto ſhe returned a printed anſwer. Then Mendoza, the Spaniſh lieger ambaſſador, practiſed to bring in foreign forces for the invaſion of this land, but the Lord prevented him. Then the queen ſent Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter, with a brave train, into the low countries, where he was joyfully and honourably entertained, and the ſtates took their oath to the queen. Leiceſter preſently attempted the taking in of Zutphen, where happened a fierce encounter between the Engliſh and Spaniards, in which the brave Sir Philip Sidney, as he changed his horſe, was ſhot with a muſket bullet above the knee, which ſo ſhattered the bone of his thigh, that he died thereof twenty five days after; yet the Engliſh took in a ſconſe near Zutphen, whereof Leiceſter made Rowland York governor, as alſo Sir William Stantley governor of Deventer, contrary to the mind of the ſtates; and theſe two men traiterouſly ſold the places to the Spaniards preſently after, which made the ſtates very jealous of the Engliſh.

Then was the earl of Lieceſter ſent for back into England; and about that time the queen of Scots was beheaded at Fotheringhay caſtle.

In Leiceſter's abſence, his officers and ſoldiers grew very unruly, whereupon the ſtates choſe Maurice of Naſſau their governor; yet Leiceſter returned into Holland; but the difference betwixt him and the ſtates growing higher, the queen cauſed him to reſign his government, and return for England.

In 1588, the Spaniard prepared for to invade England, yet held a treaty for peace, the better to make the queen ſecure. His preparations were extraordinary, as may appear by this liſt of his navy.

They had in all 130 ſhips, of 57808 tun, 8450 mariners, 19295 ſoldiers, 2088 ſlaves, 2630 cannon, 7000 muſkets, 10000 halberts and partizans, 100000 quintals of biſcuits, 147000 pipes of wine, 6500 quintals of bacon, 3000 quintals of cheeſe; beſides fiſh, rice, beans, peaſe, oil, vinegar, &c. 12000 pipes of freſh water. The army coſt every day 30000 ducats. The general was the duke of Mdina Sidonia. There were in it 100 friars, phyſicians, chirurgeons, apothecaries, and 24 noblemen volunteers.

This navy was by them ſtiled, The invincible Armado, and had the bleſſing of the pope along with it. The queen firſt appointed general faſting and prayer publicly through the land: then to encounter with it, ſhe ſent forth, under Charles Howard lord admiral, and under Sir Francis Drake, vice admiral, a hundred ſhips; as alſo forty little ſhips, under Henry lord Seymer, lay about Dover, as the former lay at Plymouth. In all our fleet were but three and twenty of the queen's great ſhips, the reſt were little ones.

The prince of Parma, in the Netherlands, was to join with the Spaniſh navy, and had prepared for that end two hundred and ten bands of old ſoldiers, a hundred in each band, and four thouſand nine hundred horſe for land ſervice.

In the Engliſh fleet were but twelve thouſand mariners and ſoldiers.

July 20. 1588, the Spaniſh navy came within ſight of England; and they were ſo confident of ſucceſs, that they ſpared for no coſt, intending that England ſhould pay the reckoning. Beſides what was mentioned before, they had 220000 great ſhot; of powder 4200 quintals, every quintal containing an hundred weight; of lead for bullets, 1000 quintals; of match, 1200 quintals; with murdering pieces, double cannons for battery, field-pieces for the camp, with ſtore of furniture for carriages, mules, and horſes. They had ſtore of torches, hides, and lead, to ſtop leakes, whips, and butchering knives. The army in all was thirty-two thouſand ſtrong. The prince of Parma provided ſeventy flat-bottomed boats, every one able to bear thirty horſes for tranſportation, with bridges ready made to ſhip and unſhip them; ſtore of piles, ſharpened at the end, with iron pikes, to pile up the mouths of rivers; twenty thouſand empty caſks, with cords and other furniture, fit to make floating-bridges, to ſtop up havens, &c.

Towards

Towards this expedition the pope ſent out his Cruſado, and contributed a million of gold. Our queen, beſides her navy, prepared a land army under the earl of Leiceſter lieutenant general, which met at Till burry in Eſſex, conſiſting of twenty two thouſand foot, and one thouſand five hundred horſe. Herſelf, like another Deborah, was general of the army.

The firſt of the Spaniſh ships which fell into our hands was a great galleon, which having loſt her foremaſt, lagged behind the reſt; whereupon Drake ſent to command them to yield, otherwiſe his bullets ſhould force them to it; but Valdez anſwered, that they were 450 ſtrong, and himſelf Don Pedro, and therefore expected honourable conditions. Drake replied, That he had no leiſure to parly; if they would yield preſently, do it; otherwiſe they ſhould prove that Drake was no daſtard. As ſoon as they heard that terrible name of Drake, they preſently yielded; in the ſhip they found fifty-five thouſand ducats, which they ſhared merrily amongſt them.

Whilſt the Armado lay at anchor near Cailis, the Engliſh emptied eight ſhips, filled them with gun-powder, pitch, brimſtone, &c. which in the night they let drive with the wind towards the Spaniſh fleet, which ſo frighted them with horrible fear, leſt their ſhips ſhould be fired, that they cut their cables, and fled in ſuch haſte and confuſion, that their greateſt Galliaſſe fell foul on another ſhip, whereby ſhe was taken by the Engliſh, and in her a rich booty.

In brief, God fighting from Heaven by the winds againſt them, and proſpering the Engliſh in their little nimble ſhips, this invincible Armado was ſo ſhattered, torn, diſperſed, &c. that there came ſhort home eighty one of their ſhips, and thirteen thouſand five hundred and odd of their men. So that there was no famous and great family in all Spain, which in this expedition loſt not a ſon, brother or kinſman; hereupon this religious queen cauſed public thankſgiving to be celebrated to the Lord of hoſts.

Concerning this wonderful deliverance, Mr Samuel Ward made theſe verſes.

Octogeſimus, Octavus, Mirabilis annus,
Clande Papiſſarum, fauſtus ubique piis.

'In Eighty-eight, Spain arm'd with potent might,
Againſt our peaceful land came on to fight.
The winds, and waves, and fire in one conſpire
To help the Engliſh, fruſtrate Spain's deſire.'

Queen Elizabeth's fame was ſo advanced hereby, that Don Antonio, the expulſed king of Portugal, came to her for relief, who granted it to him.

Shorty after the king of France, Henry the third, being murdered by a Jacobin frier, the Guiſian faction leagued together to keep out Henry of Bourbon, king of Navar, and next heir to the crown of France, from ſucceeding in that kingdom, becauſe he was a proteſtant: hereupon he craved aid of our queen to ſettle him in his throne, which ſhe granted in reſpect of the common cauſe of religion, and firſt ſent him over two thouſand pounds in money, arms, ammunition, &c. Then ſhe ſent him ſome ſhips: then a brave army under the Lord Willoughby, then three thouſand foot under Sir John Norris: then another army under the Earl of Eſſex; all which ſtood him in great ſtead, and much forwarded his advancement to the crown.

Afterwards ſhe prepared, and ſent forth a gallant fleet under the command of the Lord Admiral Howard for the ſea, and the Earl of Eſſex for the land ſervice: ſhe alſo publiſhed a declaration of the occaſion, viz. becauſe ſhe heard of the great preparation which the king of Spain made for a ſecond invaſion of her land. and when it was ready to ſet ſail, ſhe made this prayer. "Moſt omnipotent maker and guider of the world's maſs, that only ſearcheſt and fathomeſt the bottom of our hearts, &c. and in them ſeeſt the true originals of all our actions intended: thou, that by thy foreſight doſt truly diſcern how no malice of revenge, nor requital of injury, nor deſire of bloodſhed, nor greedineſs of gain, hath bred that reſolution of our ſetting forth this army, but a heedful care and wary watch, that no neglect of foes, nor over-ſurety of Heaven, might breed either danger to us or glory to them: thoſe being our true grounds, we humbly beſeech thee with bended knees, proſper the work, and with beſt fore-winds guide the journey, ſpeed the victory, and make the return the advancement of thy glory, the triumph of their fame and ſurety to the realm with the leaſt loſs of the Engliſh blood. to theſe devout petitions, Lord give thou thy bleſſed grant, &c."

The fleet, according to her prayer, ſailed with a proſperous wind to Cadiz, in whoſe haven lay ninety ſail of ſhips, and twenty gallies: five of them of thoſe which they called the King's twelve apoſtles: theſe were richly laden with ammunition, money, oil, wax, ſilk, cloth of gold, quickſilver, &c. with theſe our navy fought, beat them, then landed, aſſaulted the city, and took it: then the general made a proclamation, that none on pain of death, ſhould offer violence to any religious perſon, woman, or child: the ladies and gentlewomen were ſent away with their richeſt jewels and apparel: the ſpoil was given to the ſoldiers, and the citizens paid one hundred and twenty thouſand ducates for their ranſom. The navy of the Spaniards valued by themſelves at twelve millions of ducates, was ſunk, burden or taken: our Engliſh ſoldiers were much enriched by this enterprize: then they marched up into the country without reſiſtance, took many booties, and then returned to their ſhips, and ſo through God's mercy in ſafety to Plimouth.

Anno 1497, the Earl Eſſex was again ſent forth with a brave fleet, with which he went to the Spaniſh iſlands, where he did great ſpoil, took rich prizes, and returned laden with honour and treaſure.

After this, the king of Denmark ſent ambaſſadors to mediate peace between England and Spain, whom ſhe anſwered, and concluded thus; 'I would have the king of Denmark, and all princes, Chriſtian and Heathen, know, that England hath no need to crave peace; nor myſelf endured one hour's fear ſince I attained the crown thereof, being (through God's mercy) guarded with ſo valiant and faithful ſubjects.'

In the year 1600, Tir-Owen and others rebelling in Ireland, were much encouraged by the pope; and the king of Spain ſent John de Aquila into Ireland, with two thouſand old trained ſoldiers to join with them, who landed at Kinſale in Munſter; and after came a new ſupply under Don Alphonſe, who was himſelf taken priſoner, and many of his Spaniards ſlain at his firſt landing, and Don John ſo cloſely beſieged, that he was glad to ſue for peace, and, upon articles, to ſurrender all he had, and ſo to return home again.

Finally, God intending to advance this nation under her government, as ſhe had been careful to advance his glory, and the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, ſhe proſpered in every thing both at home and abroad. The great affairs of Europe chiefly depended upon her directions, who, ſitting at the helm, arbitrated and guided their eſtates, both in peace and war.

Spain, ſeeking to overflow all, was by her beaten back, and ſcarcely able to maintain his own banks. In France, the houſe of Valois was underpropped by her council; and that of Bourbon advanced by her countenance, forces, and treaſure. Scotland relieved by her love; Netherlands by her power; Portugal's king by her bounty; Poland by her commiſſeration: and Germany, Denmark, Swedeland, often took up and laid down arms at her beck.

She extended her trade and fame into Ruſſia, Aſia, Africa, America; was highly honoured by the Great Turk, Perſians, Barbarians, Indians. She had wariors like to the worthies of David, renowned captains for ſea and land. By a powerful navy ſhe attained the ſovereignty of the ſea.

Her temperance was ſuch, that her brother king Edward uſually called her, his ſiſter temperance. She was famous for piety, juſtice, and clemency. Her court was an academy of honourable counſellors, illuſtrious peers, gallant courtiers, learned profeſſors, intelligent ſtatiſts, and a ſanctuary where the meaneſt might find refuge. As ſhe was learned, ſo ſhe took much pains to improve her learning, by reading over authors in their originals, whereby ſhe was able to anſwer the ambaſſadors of moſt nations in their their own language; she (with Titus) thought that day loſt wherein ſhe either did not, or received not ſome good; ſo that laying aſide her great affairs, ſhe ſpent ſome hours every day in reading, or hearing learned readers.

But above all, her piety was moſt remarkable; for the ſacred Scriptures were her greateſt delight, wherein ſhe read often and heard them frequently preached, to which ſhe attended with much reverence, and the pious fruits thereof ſhined brightly in the whole courſe, as well of her private life, as of her public actions: prayer, ſobriety, purity charity and chaſtity, were her inſeparable companions, never ſuffering any lady to approach her preſence, of whoſe ſtain ſhe had but the leaſt ſuſpicion. The diſtreſſed ſhe relieved, the oppreſſed ſhe ſuccoured, the over-born princes ſhe aided, the proud ſhe amated, and always over-maſtered, through God's aſſiſtance, to her laſting memory, and England's glory.

Her zeal to God appeared in preſerving his true church and worſhip from the pollutions of idolatry: her kingdom and court was a ſanctuary to baniſhed proteſtants and perſecuted Chriſtians, ſo that by foreign churches her loſe was much lamented, and ſhe was ſtiled the nurſing mother of the French, Dutch, and Italian exiles for Chriſt's name, and the unconquered defendreſs of the whole true Chriſtian religion.

Her laſt ſickneſs was accompanied with a deep melancholy; wherein as ſhe gave ſigns of death to her phyſicians, ſo great aſſurance of eternal life to thoſe godly divines that were about her, manifeſting by her fervent prayers, and by lively ſigns at their prayers and ſpeeches, how ſhe rejoiced with the apoſtle, 'That ſhe had fought a good fight, finiſhed her courſe, and kept the faith, hoping for the crown of righteouſneſs, which the Lord the righteous judge had laid up for her againſt that day.' And ſo ſhe reſigned up her bleſſed ſoul into the hands of her faithful Creator, and merciful Redeemer, March 24. Anno Chriſti 1602. of her age threeſcore and nine, ſix months and ſeventeen days, and of her reign four and forty. She was as well beloved, and her death as much lamented, as ever any prince was.

King James erected for her a princely monument, whereon he cauſed to be inſcribed this Epitaph.

Sacred unto Memory.

'REligion to its primitive ſincerity reſtored, peace throughly ſettled; coin to the true value refined; rebellion at home extinguiſh; France near ruin by inteſtine miſchiefs, relieved; Netherlands ſupported; Spain's armado vanquiſhed: Ireland with Spaniards expulſion, and traitors coercion quieted; both univerſities revenues by a law of proviſion, exceedingly augmented; finally all England enriched; and five and forty years moſt prudently governed. Elizabeth, a Queen, a conqueroſs; a triumpher; the moſt devoted to piety; the moſt happy after ſeventy years of her life, quietly by death departed, hath left here (in this moſt famous Collegiate church, which by her was eſtabliſhed, and refounded) theſe remains of her mortality, until at Chriſt's call they ſhall again ariſe immortal, &c.'

By her abſtinence from wine, and moſt temperate diet, ſhe had preſerved her health till her very latter end. A little before her death, ſhe cauſed that ring wherewith at her inauguration ſhe was, as it were, married to her kingdom, and which ſhe had never after taken off, to be filed of her finger, ſhe had a good vein in poetry. In the time of her ſiſters reign, when a popiſh prieſt preſſed her hard to declare her opinion of Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament, ſhe truly and warily anſwered him thus.

'Twas God the word that ſpake it,
He took the bread and brake it;
And what the word did make it,
That I believe, and take it.

And at another time, a little before the Spaniſh invaſion in eighty eight, the Spaniſh ambaſſador ſumming up his maſter's demands thus in verſe;

Te veto ne pergas bello defendere Belgas;
Quæ Dracus eripuit nunc reſtituentur oportet;
Quas Pater evertit jubeo te condere cellas,
Religio Papæ fac reſtituatur ad unguem.
Theſe to you are our commands
Send no help to the Netherlands.
Of the treaſure took by Drake
Reſtitution you muſt make.
And thoſe abbies built anew
Which your father overthrew,
If for any peace you hope,
In all points reſtore the Pope.

Our Queen ex tempore returned him this anſwer,

Ad Græcas, bone rex, fient mandata Calendas:

Know, O great king that this your will
At latter Lammas we'll fulfill.

Concerning that wonderful deliverance that God gave to our queen and kingdom from the Spaniſh invaſion in eighty eight, the learned and acute Beza made theſe verſes.

Straverat innumiris Hiſpanus claſſibus æquor,
Regnis juncturus ſceptra Britannia ſuis.
Tanti hujus rogitas quæ motus cauſa? ſuperbos
Impulit ambitio, vexit avaritia.
Quam bene te ambitio, merſit, veniſſima, ventis,
Et tumidæ tumidos vos ſuperaſtis aquæ!
Quam bene raptores orbis totius iheros
Merſit inexhauſti juſta vorago maris!
At tu, cui venti, cui totum militat æquor,
Regina, O mundi totius una decus.
Sic regnare deo perge ambitione remota,
Prodiga ſic opibus perge juvare pios:
Ut te Angli longum longum Anglis ipſa fruarit
Quam dilecta bonis, tam me tuenda malis.

Spain with his fleet the ſeas did cover o're
Thinking to Spain to join the Britiſh ſhore:
If you aſk, why? ambition of riſe
Forc'd the proud fools, vexed with avarice:
How well, ambition, did the winds thee drown
And tumid waves, thy tumid mind bring down?
How well the all devouring ſeas did curb
The Spaniards, raviſhers of the earth's whole orb?
But thou, for whom the winds and ſea do fight,
Great queen; the world's ſole glory and delight.
Still mayſt thou reign from ſoul ambition freed,
Still with thy bounty to help them that need.
Long mayſt thou England; ſhe long thee poſſeſs.
Belov'd of good men, fear'd of wickedneſs

The lineage and deſcent of queen Elizabeth was by her fathers ſide truly royal. For ſhe was daughter to king Henry the eight; grand-daughter to king Henry the ſeventh; and great grand-daughter to king Edward the fourth. By the mother's ſide her deſcent was not ſo high, yet was it noble, and ſpread abroad by many and great alliances throughout England and Ireland.

Her great grandfather's father was Jeffrey Bullen, a man of noble birth in Northfolk, and lord mayor of London in the year 1457 and at the ſame time honoured with the dignity of knighthood. An upright, and honeſt man, and of ſuch eſtimation, that Thomas lord Hoo and Haſtings knight of the order of St. George, gave him his daughter and one of his heirs to wife: and he was of ſuch wealth, that he matched his daughter into the noble houſes of the Chieneys, Heydons, and Forteſcues; he left his ſon alſo a goodly inheritance, and bequeathed a thouſand pounds to be diſtributed among the poor in London, and two hundred pounds in Norfolk. This man's ſon, William Bullen was choſen among eighteen moſt choice knights of the Bath at the coronation of king Richard the third, to whom Thomas earl of Ormond who was in ſuch favour with the kings of England, that he alone of all the noblemen of Ireland, had his place twice in the parliaments of England, and that about the Engliſh barons alſo) gave his daughter and one of his heirs in marriage. By her (beſides daughters married to Shelton, Calthorp, Clere, and Sackvile, men of great wealth and noble deſcent, and other children) he begat Thomas Bullen, who being a young man, Thomas Howard earl of Surry, who was afterwards duke of Norfolk, a man much renowned for his worthy ſervices and atchievments in the wars (of whom ſee in my deſcription of Norfolk, choſe to be his ſon in law, giving unto him his daughter Elizabeth in marriage; and after he had performed one or two very honourable ambaſſies, king Henry the eight made him firſt treaſurer of his houſhold, knight of the order of St George, and viſcount Rochford, and afterwards earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond, and alſo made him lord keeper of the privy ſeal.

This Thomas (among other children) begat Ann Bullen, who in her tender years being ſent into France, attended on the lady Mary of England, wife to Lewis the twelfth; and then on Claudia of Britain, wife to king Francis the firſt; and after ſhe was dead, on Margaret of Alenzon, who, with the firſt, favoured the proteſtant religion then ſpringing up in France. When ſhe was returned into England, ſhe was admitted among the queen's maids of honour, and being twenty two years of age, king Henry in the thirtieth year of his age, did for her modeſty, tempered with French pleaſantneſs, fall deeply in love, and took her to wife, by whom he had iſſue, Elizabeth, the aforeſaid queen of England.

Queen Elizabeth ſpake ſo many languages, that Du Bartas ſaid without flattery;

That Rome, Rhine, Rhone, Greece Spain, and Italy,
Plead all for rights in her nativity.

The Life of GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS King of Sweden, who died, Anno Chriſti, 1632.

GUSTAVUS ERICUS, the firſt of that name, and blood, was one of thoſe ſix hoſtages ſent to that force to be paralelled tyrant Chriſtierne king of Denmark, Anno 1518, which hoſtages he having gotten into his power, moſt perfidiouſly retained as his priſoners, carrying them away with them into Denmark: but Guſtavus finding favour and liberty one day to go a hunting, diſguiſed himſelf and eſcaped, and after many dangers arrived in his own country anno 1520.

About which time the ſaid king Chriſtierne, contrary to his promiſe made to the Swedes of remitting all offences upon their ſubmiſſion beyond all examples of Chriſtianity, within four days after his coronation, cauſed all the nobility, gentry, biſhops, councillors and prime citizens of the kingdom of Sweden either to be hanged, or beheaded: ſo that the ſtreets of Stockholm, where he was crowned, ran with blood; and their carcaſes were kept unburied three days, and then he cauſed them to be buried.

Among theſe thus maſſacred, the father of Guſtavus was one; but when Guſtavus heard this doleful news, being that winter gathered a ſmall company of ſoldiers together, he excited the Swedes to vindicate their country's liberty; in the valiant proſecution whereof, he having been a chief author by the conſent of all the ſtates of the kingdom, was choſen king anno 1527. but he refuſed to be crowned, contenting himſelf with the title of governor; by authority whereof anno 1523. he ſummoned a parliament, where he propounded the reformation of religion, but finding much oppoſition, he reſigned the kingdom into the ſtates again.

But ſhortly after the country being in danger, they humbly beſeech Guſtavus once again to accept the king dom, and ſo he was crowned the firſt proteſtant king that ever was, anno 1527. He reigned three and thirty years, he left his kingdom to Ericus his eldeſt ſon anno 1560. who reigned eight years and died without iſſue: after the ſecond ſon of Guſtavus ſucceeded anno 1568. reigned four and twenty years; his only iſſue was Sigiſmund, who was choſen king of Poland in his father's lifetime; and ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Sweden anno 1593.

He took an oath to maintain the privileges of the kingdom, to continue the reformed religion according to the Auguſtan confeſſion, to bring in no ſtrangers, &c. which oath he palpably violating, by attempting to alter religion, to enſlave Sweden, by making it a province of Poland, &c. thereupon anno 1599. in a full aſſembly of the ſtates of Sweden he was depoſed, and his ſon Guſtavus choſen in his room, provided that his father Sigiſmund within three months ſent him into Sweden, which he refuſing to do, the ſtates choſe Charles the youngeſt ſon of Guſtavus, for their king, anno 1600. who valiantly delivered his country from the oppreſſions of the Pollocks: his ſon was this Guſtavus Adolphus, who was born anno 1594. and carefully brought up by his father in the knowlege both of arts and arms, and in ſuch other exerciſes, as ſeaſoned him both with virtue and religion, and prepared him for great buſineſſes; his ſpirit by his education was ſo elevated, as to eſteem no good deſign too hard for him: his courage ſo fortified, that he knew not how to ſtoop beneath a king. So ſoon as he was fit for it, he travelled into France, Italy, Netherlands and Germany.

His father dying whilſt he was abroad, he continued his travels under the name of Mr Gars, the four initial letters of his name and title.

In his travels he gained much experience, ſtudying the mathematics, and learning the French, Dutch and Italian languages; he was but ſeventeen years old at his father's death, after which haſtening home into his own country, he found himſelf environed with enemies: the emperor of Ruſſia, and the king of Denmark laying claim to ſome parts of his kingdom, and the king of Poland claimed all; but he ſo bravely and valiantly behaved himſelf, that he beat them in ſeveral battels, and at laſt enforced them to make peace with him.

About the year 1614. upon refuſal made unto him of the reimburſment of large ſums of money, laid out by the ſtates, and ſubjects of his kingdom, and lent to the emperor of Muſcovy, he undertook upon the juſt quarrel, to make an inroad upon the adjacent dominions of that potent emperor; and taking his march from Finland, with proper ſucceſs, he in a ſhort time conquered the mighty province of Ingerland; and among the reſt, he took the famous ſtrong fort of Kekholm; and ſhortly after by the mediation of our ſovereign king James, a peace was concluded between him and the emperor of Muſcovy upon very good and honourable conditions, whereby he not only held that country which he had ſeized on, but alſo received of the Muſcovite a great ſum of money for his expences in that war; and the footing and ground which he gained here, may well be accounted the firſt ſtep to his greatneſs, and the foundation of his other conqueſts, not only in order of time, but alſo in the enabling him, and fleſhing his hardy Finlanders for further undertakings.

Anno Chriſti 1618, he entered Lifeland againſt the Polonian and proceeded in that invaſion ſo proſperouſly by ſeveral conqueſts in divers places, that by the year 1624. that whole country was made ſubject to him.

Anno Chriſti 1626. he entered Pruſſia, and ſurprized the fort of Pelavia, and thereby at once made himſelf maſter of all the trade of the rich cities of Koningſberg, and Elbin; which enterprize he undertook with his own native Swedes and Finlanders (who in that employment did not exceed the number of nine thouſand men) but with ſo wonderful ſucceſs, that this atchievment may well be accounted another ſtept to the growth of his greatneſs.

With theſe ſmall forces he marched towards Elbing, and whilſt the burgers of that town were treating about a neutrality with his commiſſioners in the tents, he with ſome few muſketeers attending him, boldly entered the city, which with fear and amazement admitted him in upon the only command of his word, and confident majeſty of his countenance, though the walls thereof were at that inſtant loaden with armed men, well appointed for defence againſt him, who beholding his bold entrance, durſt not diſcharge one bullet, or make the leaſt reſiſtance againſt him.

This city he made his magazine for the war, and departing from thence he took the great caſtle of Mariburg, being the ſeat of the Teutonique order of knighthood; where (not having eight thouſand foot) he entrenched himſelf fighting in the face of forty thouſand Polonians, and ten thouſand Imperialiſts; and ſo tired and wore out that great army, that they not only (by the mediation of our late dread ſovereign king Charles the firſt, anno 1629.) ſubmitted unto his conditions of peace very honourable on his part, but alſo yielded to him a great part of that country of Pruſſia.

About this time the emperor of Germany had greatly oppreſſed many princes and free cities of the empire, eſpecially the proteſtant party, ſome of whom he had caſt out of their inheritances; Stralſund and Stetin, Mecklenburg and Pomerland were ſo heavily oppreſſed, ſo ſorely overlaid with taxes, and free quarter, that they were no longer able to endure it, whereupon they pitifully complained, and petitioned the emperor for redreſs; but he, ſlighting their requeſts, continues the oppreſſions; then they complain to the king of Sweden, who pitying the complaints of his allies, confederates and neighbours, ſends an ambaſſador to the emperor in their behalf, who was returned with ſcorn and contempt.

Hereupon the king, conſidering that his own ſafety did much depend upon theirs, he reſolves to undertake their protection, but withal that he might not be miſinterpreted, he publiſhes a declaration, wherein he proteſts, that he would not have ſtirred, if the emperor had not put many inſufferable affronts upon him, who in the late wars of Pruſſia between Sweden and Poland, had forbidden him to make any levies of men, victuals or ammunition in Germany, yet granting liberty to his enemy the king of Poland to do it; that the emperor himſelf had ſent two armies unto Pruſſia to the aid of his enemy the Pole: that his currier riding poſt with letters to Bethlem Gabor, had been ſtaid, his letters opened, and falſe copies publiſhed of them; that his ambaſſadors had been ſlighted, denied audience, and forbidden to ſtay in Germany; that when he ſought peace by the mediation of the king of Denmark, he obtained nothing but affronts and delays: that the poor town of Stralſund (though it had promiſe of protection from the emperor) yet was it blocked up by the duke of Fredland, who alſo had taken the iſle of Rugen, lying near to it: that both thoſe places had ſought to him for protection, and that it much concerned him, not to ſuffer them to be poſſeſſed by his enemies: that the emperor had hindred the Swediſh trade upon the Baltick ſea; taken his ſhips, laying embargos upon them, &c. that his coming with an army into the empire was, to relieve his couſin and confederate, the duke of Stetin and Pomeren, miſerably oppreſſed, and to ſecure his own dominions, not to offer hoſtility to the emperor or empire.

His declaration he ſent in a fair, and reſpectful manner to the emperor, who wholly ſlighted it, but it much ſatisfied the world.

It was rumoured abroad, that divers potent princes, as England, France, Ruſſia, Venice and Holland, were intereſted with him in this action; the emperor made great reparation to withſtand his coming, filling the towns of Pomerland and Brandenburg with garriſons. In Mecklenburg were Walſteine's forces, who was newly made duke thereof: all the bridges and paſſes upon the river Oder were ſtopped up, manned and fortified, &c. the king of Sweden had no town to be his friend, but the diſtreſſed Stralſund only, where he might land his forces: he therefore intending to land in the iſle of Rugen, within half a league of Stralſund, ſends to Sir Alexander Leſly governor of Stralſund, who with eighteen Swediſh ſhips, fell upon the iſland, and in a ſhort time cleared it of the imperialiſts.

Preſently after, his majeſty of Sweden in a hundred and thirty ſhips, embarks his army of about twelve thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, ſome ſay not ſo many, and lands in the iſle of Rugen; his enemies in all thoſe parts aſſembled together, to bid him battle at his firſt landing, but God ſtruck them with ſuch a terror, that they durſt not do it; the king was the firſt that landed himſelf, who immediately kneeled down and prayed thus:

"O moſt great God, that commandeſt whatever thou pleaſeſt both in heaven and earth, and in the ſurging ſeas, what thankfulneſs am I bound to render unto thee for that thou haſt preſerved me thus ſafely in this ſo perilous a voyage? Again, and again, do I, from the very bottom of my heart and ſoul, give thanks unto thee. And here, I humbly beſeech thee, that ſeeing, as thou very well knoweſt, I have not undertaken this expedition for any private ends of my own, but only for thine honour's ſake, and to be ſome comfort and aſſiſtance to thine afflicted church: ſo (if ſo be the time which thyſelf haſt appointed be already come) thou wouldeſt now be pleaſed to favour and bleſs me hereafter alſo; and that eſpecially thou wouldeſt ſend me a fair wind, and a proſperous, that the army yet left behind, which out of ſo many people and nations I have gathered together, I may with joyful eyes ſhortly here behold; and, with an happy beginning, promote with them the glory of thy holy name. Amen."

This devotion of the king wrought ſo with his counſellors and commanders, that it wrung tears out of their eyes; to whom he ſaid, 'Forbear to weep, but heartily conjoin your prayers with me; for the greater the army of prayer is, the greater and more aſſured ſhall be the victory. He that prays diligently, hath in part already overthrown the enemy.' Then took he a ſhovel, and fell to digging of a trench, and all the reſt of the army followed in their turns; the one half digging, the other half ſtanding to their arms, ſo that before night they had ſtrongly entrenched themſelves.

After two days reſt, he took a party of horſe and foot, marching three miles into the country, where he ſaw divers troops of the enemies, but they all ran away: then he aſſaulted and took in divers ſconces, which were ſtrongly built, but weakly defended; ſo that in twelve days ſpace he cleared the iſles of Vſedom and Wollin, and ſo marched to the city of Stetin, the ſeat of the duke of Pomeren and Stetin.

All the ladies and gentlewomen gat upon the leads, and into windows, to look at the king's army: the king ſent a trumpet to demand entrance; the duke returned anſwer, that he was reſolved to ſtand neuter: the king not ſatisfied, tells him, that he came into Germany to relieve the oppreſſed princes, and therefore expects to be admitted into the city, which if it was refuſed him, he would force it. Hereupon the duke iſſues out of the port, and goes to the king, deſiring to ſtand neuter, but the king would not hear of it; and looking up to the ladies, 'Couſin, ſaith he, if you mean to keep me out of the town, you muſt ſet others to guard it, then theſe ladies,' &c. Then the duke deſired leave to go into the town, the king conſented, and ordered the lord Reay (a brave Scotchman) to guard him, who, when the draw-bridge was let down for the duke, entered upon it with him, and pell mell, entered the gate with the town garriſon, whereupon the king, with his whole army, marches into the city, and ſo became maſter of it without bloodſhed.

Not long after, the king commanded a ſolemn faſt to be kept through his army, and leaguer at Stetin; the ſame day the Imperialiſts fell upon their out guards, but the leaguer taking the alarm, ſoon beat them off: then were two ſoldiers ſubborned by Tilly to murder the king, but it pleaſed God to diſcover the treaſon, whereupon one of them ran away, the other was deſervedly executed. Afterwards the king marching againſt Grippenhagen, deſiring to ſatisfy himſelf in viewing of a paſs, with four and twenty horſe only in his company, fell into an ambuſh of ſixty horſe, where he valiantly defended himſelf, till ſome of his troops, hearing the piſtols go off, fetched him off in ſafety.

Before he began his battery, he ordered another faſt to be kept in his camp, and the Lord was pleaſed to give him ſucceſs anſwerable to his deſires: Yea, which is admirable, in eight days ſpace he took in many cities, defeated many enemies, gat many priſoners; ſo that he wholly cleared Pomeran and Markland.

He was very ſparing of blood, putting few to the ſword, even in thoſe towns and caſtles that he took in by ſtorm.

Then came the French ambaſſador to his head quarters, where a league was concluded betwixt the king of France and him, upon theſe conditions; Firſt, That for the defence of their friends, clearing of the ocean, and Baltick ſeas, reſtoring of the oppreſſed ſtates of the empire, and demolishing of new built forts upon the ports and coasts of either sea. And secondly, seeing the adverse party refused to repair injuries, and rejected all intercessions, therefore the king of Sweden was to maintain thirty thousand foot, and six thousand horse in Germany; and the king of France was to pay his share toward the maintenance of the same. These, with divers others, were the conditions of the league, whereof the king of Sweden gave present notice to the protestant princes, met in a diet at Leipswich, assuring them that his intentions were no other, but to defend and restore the German princes, and their liberties, &c.

Whereas some of the king's forces were left in Prussia, since his late wars there, order was given unto them with in three days to take shipping, and go to the king in Pomerania; and for their transportation nine ships were appointed: but a storm arising, the fleet was scattered, seven of them, with much ado, made their port; one other, wherein was Monro, a brave Scotchman, with three companies, run a-ground near to Rugenwald, a strong place, held by the Imperialists. Here a double fear seized on them, either of drowning in the sea, or having their throats cut on shore; the latter they put unto the venture, and upon a float of boards got safe to the land; but, through God's good providence, most of the garrison were gone abroad to fetch in their weekly contribution. The lango master, or major of the town, seeing the Scots thus gotten a-shore, went to them; and understanding that they were the king of Sweden's men, invited them into the town, and in the night-time letting them in, and furnishing them with arms, Monro sent captain Bullion, with a dozen party of musketeers, to fall upon the Imperialists that remained in the city, who quickly cried for quarter, and had it granted.

The town being thus miraculously taken, God brought in the ninth ship that was driven away by the storm, to anchor before the town, whereby Monro was strengthened, and enabled to do some feats of arms abroad in the country. The king perceiving that God himself had been fought for him, commands Monro to continue there, and sends gallant Baunitzen, with some more horse and foot to join with him.

A while after came an imperial currier to the king; his letter contained an admiration of the emperor's, why the king should come armed into the empire; offering him a treaty of peace, if he would first lay down arms. To this he answers, That his imperial Majesty would cease to wonder, if he pleased to remember the two armies sent against him into Prussia; the wronging of his friends, and the endangering of his kingdoms; and as for the proffer of peace, he could not believe that it was sincerely meant, seeing that before it was scorned: but to lay down arms, he utterly refused, unless Germany were restored to liberty, &c.

A wonderful thing it is, that in eight months space, between July and February, he took in eighty cities, castles, and fences, in Pomerland and Mecklenburg.

Tilly, the imperial general, having about this time gotten together a brave army of twenty one thousand horse and foot, advances towards the king, who strongly entrenched himself, out of which he would not be drawn. Tilly passed and re-passed by, yet he durst not venture upon him in his trenches. The king had no reason to prefer him battle, his army having been so wearied out, and his necessity forcing him to fight. Therefore Tilly goes back, and lays siege to Magdeburg, which at last he took; and, like a bloody villain, put to the sword twenty thousand persons at least, of all ranks, ages, and sexes; that great city also he burned down, utterly turning it into cinders, excepting a hundred and thirty-nine houses. His soldiers committed all manner of ravages all the country over. Ladies, gentlewomen, and others, like beasts and dogs, they yoked and coupled together, leading them into the woods to ravish them, and such as resisted they stripped naked, whipped them, cropped their ears, and so sent them home again.

In the mean time, the king taking with him eight thousand men, advanceth toward Frankfort upon Oder. Count Schomberg was governor there, who suspecting the king's purpose, took in seven thousand more into the garrison, and burnt down the suburbs. The same day came the king, then he entrenched in the vineyards near the city. In the approaches the valiant baron Dyvell was wounded, which much troubled the king. In the evening the imperialists sallied out, but were soon beaten back with loss. The next day being Sabbath, the king had prayers and sermons in his camp. All things being quiet, the soldiers in the town began to revile the Swedes, asking them if they had eaten up their leather guns: they hung out also a goose upon a pike, jeering the Swedes with it. The great officers within the town thought that the king had no purpose to set upon them, his numbers were so small, and their own strength so great. Both sermons being ended, he commanded Sir John Banier to give order for the assault: and when he saw his commanders and officers in a bravery ready to fight unarmed, he commanded them to put on their armour, saying, 'If my officers be killed, who shall command my soldiers?' The Swedish soldiers wanting ladders, ran to the boor houses, and stretched their racks, with which, and some hatches, they got to a mighty strong palisadoe near the walls, which they fell to hewing down; then the enemies and they fell to it, bullets and smoke darkening the very air. The Imperialists being beaten, retire through a sally-port into the town: the king calling Sir John Hepburn and colonel Lumisdel, said, 'Now, my brave Scots, remember your countrymen slain at New-Brandenburgh.' They thereupon, with their English and Scots regiments, press upon the sally-port, bullets flying as thick as hail. Lumisdel, with his drawn sword, presses on, saying, 'Let's enter, my hearts;' and so thrusting in amongst the thickest of his enemies, his men follow, knocking down their enemies most piteously. Then breaking open the greater gate, they entered the city, making a pitiful slaughter, crying, 'New Brandenburg! knock him down.' One Scotchman killed eighteen men with his own hands; and Lumisdel took eighteen colours; yea, he shewed such valour, that the king afterwards bid him ask what he would, and he would give it him. By this time the Swedes got over the walls: Schomberg valiantly opposed himself, but was quickly forced to retire. The Swedes, running into danger, like flies into the candle, as if they had not seen it. The Imperialists having brought all the riches which they had gotten by plundering the whole country, into this city, were now leading it away upon mules, waggons, &c. but the Swedes saved them that labour, and the flying soldiers were so stopped and wedged in with these carts, that many of them were stifled, slain, or thrust into the Oder. Divers of the imperial colonels were here slain, with fifty captains and officers, and above seven thousand soldiers, three and twenty ensigns; and eight cornets were presented to the king, many prisoners taken, and sent to Stetin. Of the Swedes were slain but one hundred, and as many more hurt.

The next day, the king, by entreaties and threats, restrained his men from plunder. Here he found much riches, a hundred thousand pound of powder, eighteen pieces of great ordinance, besides little ones, and a great quantity of arms and ammunition: there was no woman ravished in all this city, nor any burgher killed. The king caused solemn thanks to be returned to almighty God for this great victory.

Shortly after he restored the duke of Mecklenburg to his antient and paternal inheritance, out of which he had been unjustly cast by the emperor, who had given it to Walstein: after which he clears Brandenburg of the Imperialists, and takes in Gripswald, and many other places. Then he advanced towards Magdeburg, from which Tilly was departed, having fortified and garrisoned it: by the way he took in many towns and castles, which Tilly hearing of, sent back four regiments under Pappenheime to resist him, who joining with the garrisons that were expulsed by the king, fell upon a party of the Swedes, which the king hearing of, with all his horse, and two thousand musketeers, he comes time enough to make one in the medley. Pappenheim's foot are almost all slain on the place; his horse played the poultrons, and ran away; himself escaped by the swiftness of his horse. Hereupon divers garrisons were quitted to the king. Then the king proceeding further, formed a strong camp at Werben, upon on the river Elbe, hearing that Tilly was coming back towards him, and called off his garriſons that were not trouble.

Tilly ſent, as his avant curriers, four regiments of horſe, excellent old ſoldiers, and moſt of them curraſſiers, to ſee if they could tempt out the king to fight: theſe were confident that the king would not fight, and ſo marched to a town within a league of him, not ſeeing one Swede all the way, and ſo there they took up their quarters. Bernſteyn, that commanded in chief, with ſix hundred curraſſiers, ſet the watch, the other betook themſelves to their reſt. The king of Sweden privily ſends out a party of two thouſand muſketeers, and five hundred dragooners againſt them, which in the break of day fell upon them, ſlew a thouſand five hundred, and Bernſtyne amongſt them, took twenty nine cornets, and great ſtore of plate and money.

Tilly reſolving revenge, marches towards the king with twenty ſix thouſand brave men, all like himſelf, full of anger and reſolution; but before he aſſaulted his trenches, he endeavoured ſecretly to hire ſome traitors, with large promiſes, to nail up the king's ordinance, that it might be made unſerviceable againſt him; but by remorſe of conſcience in one of the undertakers, the plot was diſcovered: yet the king gave not Tilly one cannon ſhot, though he came near his ordinance, which made him very confident that his plot had taken, and his men preſſed on in great multitudes, but on a ſudden there was ſuch a tempeſt of chain ſhot, murdering ſhot, and whatever was cruelleſt to do execution, ſhowered in amongſt them, that there was made a miſerable ſlaughter. Immediately ſallied out Baudiſſen, with three regiments of horſe, and ſo cruelly charged his curraſſiers, that had the king ſeconded him, Tilly had had a great defeat; but a retreat was founded for that night.

Then Tilly hired ſome boors to fire the town of Warben, about which the king's leaguer was; but through God's mercy they were diſcovered and executed. Tilly made ſome other attempts, but ſeeing he could make nothing of it, he retreated; after whom the king followed, charging the crabbats (light horſemen) ſo furiouſly, that they were driven upon their own foot, who were fain to charge their pikes againſt them. Hereupon Tilly made an halt, ordered his men, and a ſkirmiſh was begun, which by the night's approach was broken off, and ſo both ſides retired to their quarters.

Tilly had a great mind to be revenged, ſent out divers parties to watch their opportunity; but ſeeing that moſt of them came ſhort home, and victuals grew very dear, he diſlodges with his army, and marches quite away into the duke of Saxony's country: he left behind him 500 ſtarved horſes, 800 waggons for want of draught horſes, beſides about 7000 of his men loſt in this expedition. Then the king divided his army into ſeveral quarters. At this time the queen of Sweden arrived at Wolgoſt, with eight thouſand men; and Marquis Hamilton brought ſix thouſand more out of England at the ſame time. With theſe men the king re-inforced his ſeveral armies. Tilly was buſily employed in taking in towns in Saxony, and afterwards beſieges Lipſwich. Hereupon the duke of Saxony ſends importunately to the king, to haſten to his relief; who accordingly uniting his forces again, marches thitherward; by the way they met with hard lodging, and worſe commons: Whereupon, the army being drawn up into battalia, the king thus ſpake to them;

'Lords and Gentlemen,

'I am much grieved for this your hard lodging and entertainment: But, courage my hearts, we are now almoſt in the dukedom of Saxony, his country; there things will mend; there we ſhall have victuals and proviſion enough; there ſhall you be paid your arrears: only I deſire you to behave yourſelves civilly amongſt the inhabitants,' &c.

'It nothing, I know, daunts your valiant hearts, that you are going to fight with an army that call themſelves invincible, ſince you have found it not to be ſo. On therefore, my hearts, in God's name: We daily pray to the Lord of Hoſts for you, and we deſire you to do the ſame for us, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to go along with us, to aſſiſt us, and to give us good ſucceſs in whatſoever juſt and religious enterprize we undertake.'

The army, much encouraged with this ſpeech, marches courageouſly that night near Wittenberg; and hither the duke of Saxony ſent ambaſſadors to the king, to conclude upon what terms he ſhould aſſiſt him; which were theſe;

Firſt, That the king might freely paſs and repaſs thro' Saxony. Secondly, That the duke, at his own charge, ſhould find the king's army with powder, ſhot, and proviſions. Thirdly, That the duke's army ſhould be under the command of the king. Fourthly, That the duke ſhould conclude no peace with the emperor without the king's conſent.

When the two armies met, the duke's horſe and foot vailed their cornets and enſigns as they paſſed by the king's army. The next day news came that Tilly had gotten Lipſwich. Then did Tilly, out of a bravery, ſend a trumpet to the king, with this meſſage, That as he was a brave cavalier, he ſhould come and give him battle. The king ſcorning the term of cavalier, replied thus; What! doth your general think me worthy of no better a term than a cavalier? I am a king; and tell him ere long I ſhall find him out.

Hereupon Tilly prepares his army, as for a victory aſſured, rather than to fight much for it; and his men, who counted themſelves invincible, were very glad of the news of a pitched battle. Pappenheim, when he ſaw the blood prodigiouſly dropping from the houſe at Halle where he was, ſaid, 'What! muſt we bleed? will the king of Sweden beat us? that's impoſſible!'

September 7. Tilly, with forty four thouſand brave men, advances into the field: the place was a goodly plain, called God's acre, a mile from Lipſwich: the ſame place where Charles the fifth overthrew prince Mauris formerly: there was in this place a little riſing hill, and a wood; here Tilly, careful of all advantages, placed his army: the hill was fit to plant his cannon on, and eaſy for him to deſcend, but hard for the Swedes to climb up: the wood ſerved him to hide his men at the firſt, and for a retreating place, if need were. His word was, St Mary; the token to be known by, was white ſtrings and ribbons. The king, the day before the battle, kept a faſt with his army, to ſeek unto God for ſucceſs. In the evening he marched forward, within three or four miles of the enemy, where they reſted that night. The king that night dreamed, that he had Tilly faſt by the hair of the head, and for all his ſtruggling would not let him go, till he bit him on the left ſide; which, upon the ſucceſs, was thus interpreted, That the king ſhould have the upper hand of his enemy, and that Tilly ſhould defeat the duke of Saxony, who had the left ſide of the king in the battle. Before daylight he was upon his march; and coming within view of the enemy, he ſaw them upon the higher grounds. Tilly knowing that they were to meet with a troubleſome paſſage, through buſhes and dirty ways, ſent out ſome to trouble them, who alſo, by ſetting fire to trains of gunpowder, ſcattered for that purpoſe, fought, by the ſmoke thereof, the wind blowing it juſt into the proteſtants faces, to blind and trouble their putting of themſelves into order; but neither force nor ſtratagem could ſerve the turn: for in deſpite of both the paſs was gained, where the proteſtants immediately began to put themſelves into order of battle: and ſeeing Tilly preſent his men in a mighty large front, which, with his wings extended full two miles in length, to prevent hemming in, they divided themſelves into two armies, the duke of Saxony towards the left, the king towards the right hand. Tilly ſeeing their march, ſaid, 'Now, fellow ſoldiers, we muſt look for blows. His men deeming themſelves invincible, expreſſed much deſire to be at it.

The king of Sweden rode from regiment to regiment, ſaying, with a loud voice, 'Come on, comrades; will you fight to-day for the name of Jeſus Chriſt?' they all cheerfully cried out, Vivat Guſtavus Adolphus, vivat, vivat, vivat.

Thereupon the king preſently ſent a trumpet to Tilly, with a letter, that he deſired to ſee him in the field, and to that purpoſe he now attended for him: to which Tilly returned anſwer, that he, for his part, never refuſed to fight fight with him; that he would now meet him half way; and that the king knew well where to find him. The king had in his army about twenty thouſand, amongſt whom were many Engliſh and Scots: the duke of Saxony's army conſiſted of fourteen thouſand, led by the valiant lord Arnheim. The word for both the proteſtant's armies was, 'God with us;' their tokens, green branches in their hats and helmets. Some few days before, two flocks of birds had fought in this place, the one killing and beating away the other; the victorious birds remained on the place, which being ſprung by the king's vaunt curriers, took their flight to Tilly's army, and there fetching a circle about, returned towards the king's army; as they would ſay, we went to fetch you victory; at leaſt ſome thus thought of it.

Being now ready to come to the ſhock, ſome ſtruggling there was for the wind, which was full in the proteſtants face; the king, by wheeling about, ſought to alter it, the other as much to keep their advantage: the fight began with great ordinance, Tilly himſelf gave fire to the firſt three great guns; and the king, as his manner was, to the two firſt: the hideous roaring of the cannons on both ſides made the very earth to tremble; and continuing ſo two hours, made many a brave man breath his laſt.

About two o'clock the cannon gave over, and both horſe and foot charged. Pappenheim, with his horſe, charging the king's right wing, which was lined with muſketeers, was ſo pelted, that traverſing their ground, they thruſt in between the king's right wing and main battle, where Bannier commanded, after whom the king immediately ſent ſome able troops, who, hemming them in, cut them utterly to pieces. Pappenheim's foot being thus left naked, were eaſily defeated; he himſelf was wounded, forſook the field, and left all his ordinance behind him.

The king, in the beginning of the fight, ſeeing his men hardly charged, alighting from his horſe, with bended knees, prayed to the God of heaven for victory. Tilly ſeeing it go hard with his left wing, advanceth down the hill with his battle, conſiſting of ſixteen regiments of tried old ſoldiers, the horſemen alſo proudly prancing up on their flanks. Oppoſite to him was Guſtavus Horn, with his left wing. Tilly twice or thrice charges him with great bravery, which charges Horn with as much reſolution endures and returns. Tilly finding himſelf much galled there with the Swediſh horſe lined with drakes, and ſmall field pieces, leaving part of his horſe and foot to hold Horn play, ſuddenly, with the reſt converts all his fury upon the duke of Saxony: two or three charges the duke endured well enough; but the wind carrying the ſmoke and duſt full into their eyes, and Tilly's men falling too heavily upon them, they not able any longer to endure the fury of the old Wallons, Germans, and Burgundians, at firſt began to give ground, and to run quite away a little after. Some were ſlain, and many were taken priſoners; the reſt fled, leaving all their fair ordinance to the enemy, who preſently turned them upon the Swediſh; but theſe cowardly Saxons, as ſoon as they were out of ſight of the enemy, fell to pillage their own waggons, that they might carry home the ſpoils of the wars, though not of their enemies.

The Imperialiſts ſeeing the Saxons flying, cry, "Victoria, Victoria." Follow, follow, follow. But the old wary general ſaid, 'Let them go, we ſhall overtake them time enough; let us beat the Swedes too, and then all Germany is our own.'

Some poſts were preſently diſpatched away to the emperor at Vienna, with welcome tidings of victory; but valiant Arnheym, with the beſt of the duke's horſe, and his own guard, edging towards the Swedes, kept the field. An imperial cavalier ſeeing a Saxon captain of horſe behave himſelf bravely in the head of his troop, preſently riding up to him, bent his piſtol upon him, engaging him in a ſingle combat, which the Saxon refuſed not; and both their horſes being ſhot, to it on foot they go with ſword and piſtol; both are ſlain, and both fell down dead together upon one another: yet death gave the honour to the Saxon champion, laying him uppermoſt. But that party which Tilly had left engaged with Horn, came not ſo victoriouſly off from the Swedes, as their general had done from the Saxons, but were diſperſed and put to flight. The earl of Fruſtenberg, which commanded the left-wing of the Tillians, having pieced in with Tilly's body that charged the Saxons, ſeeing them fly, he, with his regiment, flies amain upon the Swedes again, charging the rear of the left wing, where colonel Hall, a brave gentleman, commanded. After a while Fruſtenberg was himſelf dangerouſly wounded, and carried off. Hall alſo, whoſe breaſt plate was not full proof, was ſlain with a muſket-bullet upon the place.

But no ſooner were Furſtenberg's foot defeated, but eight thouſand of thoſe Imperialiſts which had diſcomfited the Saxons, came upon the place where the Saxons were lately marſhalled: the duſt and ſmoke were ſo great, that they were on Colenbach ere he was aware: the Imperialiſts turning two pieces of ordinance, which they had taken from the Saxons, let fly amongſt the Swedes. Juſt at that time came the king, riding up to his men, crying to Collenbach, 'Charge, man, on God's name;' and withal himſelf led them up againſt the enemy. Collenbach advancing, (and the king going away to look to other places) was preſently charged with ten cornets of horſe, who, at the firſt or ſecond charge, killed all his officers that commanded four of his troops; yea, Collenbach himſelf was there ſlain; his four troops flying thereupon, which yet the Imperialiſts, by reaſon of the ſmoke, diſcerned not; then did a party of the king's muſketeers give fire upon them, that they drave them to the gates of Lipſwich: the king, when he went from Collenbach's regiment, rode to his three brigades of reſerves, under the command of valiant Hepbron, carrying with him many priſoners, which he had taken with his right wing, ſhewing them to his men, and crying, 'Luſtily, valiantly:' the ſoldiers anſwering, VIVE: the king ſeeing their alacrity, led them on againſt thoſe eight thouſand which had defeated the Saxons, mentioned before; and, withal, he ſent baron Dyvel to Sir John Hepbron, to bid him fall on. Scarcely had this brave baron Dyvel done his meſſage, but he was ſhot ſtark dead upon the place.

Hepbron moved forward, with whom was the valiant Scots, colonel Lumiſdel, and Sir James Ramſay, with Muſchamp, a brave Engliſhman; our muſketeers gave not fire till they came within piſtol ſhot, and then the three firſt ranks diſcharged together, and after them the other three; which done, they fell pell mell into their ranks, knocking them down with the but-ends of their muſkets; yet four gallant troops of the enemies curriaſſiers came up to the Swedes, and with their piſtols ſhot all the Scottiſh antients dead upon the place; yet did the Scots bravely ſtand to it, maintaing the fight about an hour together, in which time many of the Imperialiſts were ſlain, and the reſt fled; ſo that there was not a greater fall of men any where that day than in this place, nor any piece of ſervice better on both ſides maintained: and here it was that Tilly himſelf received his wounds.

The king having ſet on Hepborn upon Tilly, returned to his right wing, preſently advancing forward with it towards the wood upon the hill, where ſome of Tilly's regiments ſtood as reſerves, and others that had been routed were reſorted thither: the king in perſon ſet upon theſe with ſuch courage, that at the firſt onſet he cut in pieces thoſe which guarded the ordinance, which he turned immediately upon the enemy; but there were four regiments of old ſoldiers that ſtood to their arms bravely, ſuch as feared no enemy; theſe made good the wood for a long time againſt the king, killed many a brave fellow, nor would they budge a foot, though they ſaw no hope of relief, but fought it out to the laſt man; only ſome few of them, when they had done as much as then could do, retired under the benefit of the night which was come on; by which time all the imperial army was wholly beaten.

Thus, after five hours hard fight, the victory, through God's mercy, fell to the king, whoſe horſe-men continued chaſe, till darkneſs made it dangerous to purſue the enemy any further.

The king's army remaining maſters of the field, lay all night upon the bare ground, yet none but the wounded complained of the want of a feather-bed: the next morning they purſued the flying enemies, killing many, and taking taking many priſoners: thus that formidable army of the catholic leaguers, which had for eleven years together given laws to all Germany, and made the name of Tilly ſo renowned, was in one day, through the power and goodneſs of God, broken in pieces, about ten thouſand of them ſlain, many thouſands wounded, and ſix thouſand forſaking that ſide, took oath and pay for the king's ſervice, many more running away, and never returning to their colours: then did the king ſeize upon the enemy's ſtanding camp, where he found three thouſand waggons, with all their baggage, tents, and pavilions, many cattle, oxen, ſheep, horſes, aſſes, poultry, bread, wine, meat upon the ſpits, &c. much coſtly ſtuff, money, and plate: he took one hundred enſigns and cornets, fourteen demi-cannons, ſixteen field pieces, &c. The king of Sweden loſt but ſeven hundred men, and the duke of Saxony two thouſand. The king loſt but four colonels, but Tilly many more; all advantages were on the enemy's ſide; the wind, the wood, the higher ground. Tilly's army was the greater, his ſoldiers the older, and their army by themſelves counted invincible; beſides the king's army was much diſcouraged by the flight of the Saxons; yet the Lord of hoſts gave him the victory, that he might give him the praiſe.

Tilly's manly heart could not refrain from tears, when he thus ſaw his old ſoldiers go to ruin: and this old conqueror, that uſed ſtill to ſee the backs of his enemies, is now glad to ſhew them his own heels; and, wounded as he was, fled twenty miles that night. Fuſtenberg and Pappenheim alſo ſorely wounded, came thither to him, and having their wounds dreſſed, they fled in an hackney coach, and Tilly in an horſe litter.

The king of Sweden, as he began with prayer, ſo he ended with thankſgiving, appointing (together with the duke of Saxony) a public day of thankſgiving to be celebrated both in the army, and through all Saxony, unto God, for this ſo glorious a victory.

Tilly, after this overthrow, flies from place to place, partly to ſecure himſelf, and partly to glean up as many of his diſperſed ſoldiers as poſſibly he could, ſo that in ten days ſpace he had gone an hundred and forty miles; he wrote alſo to Altringer to join his army with him, and then begins to form an army again, and Altringer brings to him about ten thouſand men, ſo that in all he had about eighteen thouſand men, but ill clothed and armed. Afterwards he joins with the Lorrain army; and coming before the great city of Norimberg, he demanded ſupply of bread, &c. promiſing, that if they yielded to him, he would pay them honeſtly, otherwiſe he would force them to it; but the count of Solmes ſent thither, as governor by the king of Sweden, made a reſolute ſally the next day, before Tilly's trenches, where, with his Swediſh horſe, he took the young prince of Anhalt, with divers more priſoners. Tilly thereupon leaving behind him two thouſand dead, wounded, and ſick men, diſlodged with his army.

About this time he had twelve thouſand five hundred weight of powder blown up by an accident, whereupon he ſaid, with a deep ſigh, 'I do evidently ſee all my good fortunes begin to fail me, and every thing goes backwardly with me.' He ſhould have ſaid, Now doth the Lord revenge upon me all that innocent blood which I ſhed at Magdeburg, together with all other my wicked practices.

After this he marches into the Palatinate, after whom the king of Sweden follows, with about twenty-four thouſand men; but firſt he went to Norimberg, and was there with wonderful joy entertained, and preſented with four great pieces of braſs ordinance; two globes of ſilver, filled with ſilver and gold; oats, fiſh, wine, &c. and an oration made to him, to which (being an excellent ſpeaker) he preſently returned anſwer, thanking them for their preſents, but eſpecially for their conſtancy in religion, and defence of it; promiſing, for his part, that as he had undertaken the defence of it, ſo, through God's grace and aſſiſtance, he would protect them, and all the reſt of his friends, to the uttermoſt of his power. Alſo, hearing that Tilly were further and further from him, to join with Wallſtein's army, he reſolved to march into Bavaria, a rich and fertile country; and ſo thereby to remove the ſeat of war from the Palatinate: and for that end he marched into Donawert, which was the key to open his paſſage into Bavaria: this was a ſtrong city, and had in it a garriſon of one thouſand ſeven hundred foot, and five hundred horſe, under the valiant Rodulph Maximilian, duke of Saxen Lawenburg: by the city ran the river of Danubius, over which the king muſt paſs into Bavaria. The king raiſed a battery, on which he mounted twenty pieces of ordinance, wherewith he annoyed the town, and hindered the paſſage over the bridge: he alſo ſent colonel Hepbron, with his brigade, over a bridge five miles about, who, about midnight, ſilently diſpoſed his men in a covert all along in gardens under the wall, ſo diſpoſing the matter, that none could paſs over the bridge, or out at the weſtern port, but he fell within his reach; which they in the town perceiving, and deſpairing of relief, intended, under the covert of the night, to have marched over the bridge into Bavaria; but Hepbron ſo galled them in their paſſage, that though Saxen Lawenburg, and ſome few with him, got ſafely over, yet the reſt were ſo cut down, that their dead bodies covered the bridge, and thereby encumbered the whole paſſage; the reſt ſeeing that, ſallied out at the port upon Hepbron, but were ſoon repulſed. The king all this while thundering with his cannon on the other port, and they within, ſtill fearing his entrance, boldly ſallied out again upon Hepbron, who ſo entertained them, that he ſlew about four hundred, and took as many priſoners; and, in the height of his valour, entered the port, with my lord Craven, and ſome other Engliſh gentlemen, where they cut in pieces all that reſiſted, and the ſoldiers fell to plundering, where many a gold chain, plate, and other treaſure of the enemy's, were made prizes. By this time the king was entered at his port alſo, who immediately commanded, that none of the burghers houſes ſhould be plundered.

The king gave Hepbron the honour of this action; then he reſtored the free exerciſe of the proteſtant religion, garriſoned the place, and alſo advanced forwards.

Tilly having notice of the king's marching towards Bavaria, preſently haſted thither by an other way; and, the better to keep out the king, he brake down the bridges over Danubius, and the river Lech; and to keep him from paſſing over the Lech, he lays his army all along upon the Bavarian ſhore of it, ſixteen miles in length; yet the king prepares to lay a bridge over the river, and in two ſmall boats ſends over the Swedes and Finns, his pioneers and carpenters, to the other ſide of the river, to caſt up an half moon to ſecure the paſſage of the bridge, which Tilly, with all his art and power, endeavoured to reſiſt; yet they performed their taſk, making good the place till they were relieved: the ſmall and great ſhot go off inceſſantly on both ſides, with extreme hot execution one upon another; in which time general Altringer was near ſlain, and carried off in the duke of Bavaria's own coach. The Bavarian captains found this ſuch hot ſervice, that Tilly himſelf was fain to come up to the point, and in the very face of danger to give directions, where he received a muſket ſhot in the thigh, whereof he ſhortly after died: this accident ſo aſtoniſhed the duke of Bavaria, that he preſently poſted away to Ingolſtat, his chief city, and moſt of his army retreated from their charge; ſo that the king with his army got over the river, and ſending out parties, cut off many of the Bavarian ſtragglers.

Afterwards, the king took in divers ſtrong places and cities, and amongſt them, the great city of Ausburg, into which when he was entered, he went ſtraight to church, where Dr Fabricius, the king's chaplain, preached on Pſalm xii. 5. 'For the oppreſſion of the poor, for the ſighing of the needy, now will I ariſe, ſaith the Lord,' &c. After ſermon was a ſolemn thankſgiving for the victory: then he fortified the city, and reſtored the proteſtant religion in it again; and ſo marches to Ingolſtat, in which ſiege the king's horſe was ſlain under him, and the marquis of Baden, a gallant man, was ſlain hard by, with whoſe death the king was exceedingly grieved; and, in a ſpeech before his commanders, he told them, that hereby he was put in mind of his own mortality, knowing that the bullet made no diſtinction between a king and his meaneſt ſoldier; and that it was God's decree, that no privileges could exempt him from death; therefore, ſaith he, 'I wholly reſign up myſelf to the providence of the Almighty, Almighty, who, though he may take me away, yet, I know he will not abandon this ſo juſt cauſe, which I have undertaken for reſtoring the Germans liberties. He doubtleſs will raiſe up ſome other, more wiſe, couragious, and worthy than myſelf, who ſhall put a period to this war,' &c.

The duke of Bavaria lying with his army on the other ſide of the river, and the king finding that the city was not eaſy to be taken, raiſes his ſiege, and taking in divers towns, and reſtoring the proteſtant religion in them, he at laſt came before Munchen, where was the curious palace of the duke of Bavaria; whereupon the deputies of the town came forth to him, preſented him with the keys, and a promiſe of three hundred thouſand dollars: the king enters, ſuffers the garriſon to march out ſafely, viewed the magazine, where were great ſtore of arms and ammunition: he found buried alſo one hundred and forty fair pieces of braſs ordinance, and in one of them thirty thouſand pieces of gold: but the chamber of rarities afforded him moſt entertainment, in which were incomparable curioſities both of art and nature.

About this time Commiſſary Offa, with an army of ſeven thouſand men, came into thoſe parts, againſt whom the king ſent a party; and leaving colonel Hepbron gover nor of Munchen, himſelf follows after; which news coming to Offa, he retreated ſo ſpeedily, that he left his great ordinance behind him; ſo that about this time the king had either conquered or drawn to his party all the middle parts of Germany; yea, from the Baltick-ſea to the Alps, near to Italy, for five hundred miles together he had gone on with victorious ſucceſs; and ſhortly after the great city of Ulm accorded with the king, to whom he ſent Sir Patrick Ruthven, a gallant Scotchman, to be their governor, and ſo a while after he returns, and encamps by Norimberg; and this he did the rather, becauſe the duke of Bavaria had now joined with Walſtein's army who by command of the emperor had gotten together a great army, wherewith they threatened the ruin of Norimberg.

The king therefore round about this town entrenched himſelf, his army being but about fifteen thouſand five hundred men; and therefore he ſends for his other armies to come to him. Walſtein had in his army twenty thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot, beſides five thouſand volont.

About four miles diſtant from the king's leaguer, Walſtein forms his, who as Imperial Generaliſſimo commanded in chief over the Bavarian army alſo; and having fortified his camp, he gave order to his ſoldiers to make more ſhow of their trenches, than of their weapons, intending by delays to force the king to diſlodge from before Norimberg, and to abandon it up to his mercy.

The two armies being quartered ſo near together, there paſſed many ſkirmiſhes betwixt them, ſometimes one getting away with the loſs, ſometimes the other: having lain thus a while, Walſtein ſends home to the king colonel Dubattell, whom he had taken priſoner, without ranſom, and with this meſſage; That he had no other ambition than once to ſee his majeſty in good terms with the emperor, his maſter; and himſelf to have the honour to be the inſtrument of it.

After a while the duke of Bavaria moved Walſtein to break up the king's quarters, before his other armies came up to him; to whom he anſwered, that he would not venture, for if his army were beaten, all Germany and Italy were both endangered; yet if Bavaria would fall on firſt, he would ſecond him with all his forces. During the king's abode here, the Norimbergers complained to him, that their lands and territories had been as bad plundered by the army, as by the enemies; whereupon the king calling the officers together, ſpake thus unto them;

'Ye princes, earls, lords, and gentlemen, you are ſome of thoſe that are unfaithful and diſloyal to your own country, and do help to ruin it. I confeſs you are gallant men, and have done brave ſervice in the wars; but when I hear of your ravages, robberies, and plunderings; my hair ſtands at the very horror of it. Judge yourſelves; is it not a doleful caſe, That one Chriſtian, of the ſame profeſſion in religion ſhould pillage another? One friend ſhould ſpoil, and ruin another. The very devils in hell are more truſty one to another than you are. My bowels yern within me, when I hear complaints that the Swediſh ſoldiers are more inſolent than the enemies: but they are not the Swedes, they are the Germans that commit theſe inſolencies. Had I known that you Germans had been a people of this temper, to bear no more affection to your natural country, &c. I would never have ſaddled horſe for your ſakes, much leſs have hazarded my life, kingdom, and eſtate in your behalf, &c. But, it may be, you will ſay, you want money; but is not the fault in yourſelves, who hinder me from having means to pay you, by your robbings and pillages? For my own part, I proteſt before God, that I have not by all this war enriched myſelf ſo much as a pair of boots comes to: yea, I had rather ride without boots, than in the leaſt degree to enrich myſelf by the damnage of theſe poor people. Since my coming into Germany, I have received out of my own country forty tuns of gold, which I have ſpent for the reeſtabliſhment of thoſe oppreſſed princes, which are of the ſame true religion with me, &c.

'That which I deſire of you for the time to come, is, that you ſpoil not others of their goods, but leave every man to his own poſſeſſions. The choller and manhood that you have, ſtore it (in God's name) on the front of your enemies; but ſtain not the honour of a ſoldier, by inſulting over unarmed innocents. Live upon your means like ſoldiers, and not upon pilferring and ſpoiling, like thieves and robbers. This if you do not, you ſhall ever be infamous; and I, by ſuch helpers, ſhall never be victorious.'

This ſpeech was delivered with that efficacy and life, that it extracted tears of compunction from theſe military hearers, who had rather bleed than weep. He alſo ſeconded it with a proclamation, That he would henceforth pardon no man of what rank ſoever, that ſhould in this kind be again complained of. Adding, that if to avoid puniſhment, they ſhould all conſpire upon a mutiny, himſelf, with his Swedes and Finlanders, would undertake ſo to rattle them, that the ſhivers of their ſtaves ſhould fly about their ears for it.

About this time, the ſeveral armies that the king had ſent for, to releaſe him, began to draw near; which the king hearing of, appointed a ſolemn day of faſting and prayer in his leaguer, to ſeek unto God for the happy joining, and good ſucceſs of his armies: and then quitting his trenches, he went forth and joined with them; whereupon he drew up into battalia before the enemies trenches, and ſtood there all day to make a brave upon them. The king was now forty-ſix thouſand ſtrong, and therefore reſolved, if he could, to join battle with the enemy; but becauſe Walſtein kept himſelf in his trenches, and would not ſtir, the king raiſed batteries, planted ordinance, with which he played into his camp: and when that prevailed not, he ſought to force his trenches, whereupon enſued a very deſperate fight, wherein many a brave man loſt his life: a piece of the ſole of the king's boot was carried away with a ſhot, and duke Bernard of Saxen Weymar had a horſe ſlain under him, and yet it pleaſed God to preſerve them both from any further hurt. Then the king ſent out parties to cut off Walſtein's victuals, whereupon enſued divers bickerings.

The crabats fled out as far as Altroffe, an univerſity belonging to Norimberg, where they light upon the poor ſcholars, (they might as well have robbed the Spittle) Agricola, Neſter, and Bruno, profeſſors there; they carried away, and put poor Genus and Species to their ranſom.

But the king perceiving that the enemies would not be drawn out to fight, reſolved upon a remove, marching by, and almoſt round about the imperial leaguer, with colours flying, drums beating, &c. and ſo dividing his army, he took in divers places. Then did Walſtein march into Voitland, to undo the duke of Saxony, which the king hearing of, preſently turned his courſe thitherward; and not long after having re-united his forces, he intended to ſet upon Walſtein, who perceiving the king's purpoſe, called together his forces alſo: then did the king conſult, whether he ſhould fight the enemy or not. Duke Bernard was for the valiant affirmative; Major Knipbauſon for the ſober negative, his reaſons were,

1. No

1. No man is to fight, but when he is apparently ſtronger than the enemy, which the king is not.

2. None is to attack a ſtronger enemy, but when compelled by a preſſing and unavoidable neceſſity, viz. to force his paſſage when he is hemmed in, and when hunger and want of proviſion enforceth, which are not the king's caſe: hereupon the king reſolved to go and join with the Duke of Saxony, but by the way, hearing that the Imperialiſts lay ſcattering in ſeveral dorps and villages about Lutzen, without any intelligence of the king's motion, his majeſty then put on a reſolution to fight, ſaying, that he now verily believed that God had given his enemies into his hands: then did he, and all his army advance ſtoutly againſt the enemies, doubling their march, but their legs found it a longer way than their eyes, and beſides there was a filthy paſs by the way at a bridge over a river, which hindered the army full two hours, ſo that it was night when he came within two miles of Lutzen, where he was forced by the darkneſs to quarter in the open field with all his army; then did the Imperialiſts take the alarm, and order was ſent to all the quarters of their army upon pain of death to repair immediately to Lutzen, ſo that by ten o'clock the next morning they were all come up together, and Walſtein had planted his ordnance advantagiouſly, entrenched about it, caſt up breaſt works for his men, &c.

The king having thus brought himſelf into a neceſſity of fighting very early in the morning, he cauſed the drums to beat, then had Dr. Fabricius to pray with him, and other miniſters in the head of other regiments; it was a very miſty morning, which was a great advantage to the enemy to prepare his works, from which he was reſolved not to ſtir, and about ten 'clock, November the ſixth, the fog cleared up, and the king going firſt to his own ſubjects, ſpake to this purpoſe; 'My dear brethren, carry yourſelves bravely this day; fight valiantly in God's name for your religion, and for your king; this if you do, God's bleſſing and the peoples, praiſes ſhall be your guardian, and you for ever ſhall be laden with an honourable memorial, nor will I forget to reward you nobly. If you play the Poultrons, I here call God to witneſs, that not a bone of you ſhall ever return again to Sweden.' To the Germans he ſaid, 'O my brethren, officers and fellow ſoldiers, I moſt earneſtly entreat and beſeech you to make full trial of your valour this one day; fight manfully againſt your enemies this day both with me and for me; be not faint hearted in the battle, nor for any thing diſcouraged; ſet me before your eyes, even me, who dreadleſly for your cauſe, am here ready to adventure both life and blood; if you do this, God no doubt himſelf will from Heaven reward you with a moſt glorious victory, of which yourſelves and poſterity ſhall have the benefit; if you do not, farewel for ever to your religion, and yourſelves muſt for ever remain enſlaved.'

The ſoldiers of both nations with joyful acclamations anſwering the king, he further ſaid, 'And now my hearts, let us go on bravely againſt our enemies, and the God of Heaven proſper our endeavours': And ſo caſting up his eyes to Heaven, with a loud voice he ſaid, 'Jeſus, vouchſafe this day to be my ſtrong helper, and give me courage to fight for thy glory, and for the honour of thy name.' Then drawing his ſword, he waved it over his head, and advanced the foremoſt of all his army; amongſt the king's own guard were the Engliſh and Scotiſh gentlemen; he himſelf was attired in a plain buff-coat without armour; and being requeſted to put on his corſlet, he ſaid, 'The Lord God is my armour,' his watch-word was, 'God with us;' Walſtein's was, Jeſus Maria; the king ſaid, 'I thank God I have both wind and ſun to favour me.'

The field where the battle was fought, was a plain champion country, yet had many ditches which ſerved Walſtein's men for breaſt works, and the king's horſe in paſſing over them, were ſome of them overthrown; there were alſo two little hills, upon which Walſtein had planted his great guns; and ſo great was his army, that the front of it extended two miles in length; the armies coming within reach, the great guns began to play on both ſides; but the Imperial cannon being planted upon ſteady and fixt batteries, (where, as the kings gave fire in motion), did the greater execution, ſo that the king not liking that ſport, cauſed his army to advance upon the very mouth of the cannon; the Imperialiſts kept their ground, expecting that the Swedes fury would be over, and themſelves out of breath, ere they could get over the ditches, and beat out the muſketeers; yet they overcame thoſe difficulties, and ſo the left wing engaged with the right of Walſtein's; then the king advancing with his wing, and obſerving where the Crabats ſtood, and where the Curriſſires, which were armed Cap. a pied, calling Col. Stalhanſh to him, he ſaid, as for thoſe fellows [the Crabats] I care not for them; but charge me thoſe black-fellows ſoundly, for they are the men that will undo us; the king fought at the head of his ſquadron, himſelf being foremoſt with his piſtol in one hand, and his ſword in the other; and thus charging upon the Curriaſſiers, he was there overlaid with numbers, inſomuch as his men, in danger of being hemm'd in, were feign to give ground, and to retire towards their body; there did the king receive a ſhot into the left arm, which he not feeling at firſt, would have led on ſtill, but, by and by, perceving his blood to guſh out abundantly, and that part of his bone was broken, he called to Duke Albert of Saxen-Lawenburg, ſaying, 'Couſin, I am ſore wounded, help me to make my retreat.' This, whilſt the duke and thoſe that were with the king were about to do, his ſquadron alſo being now upon the retreat, there comes up an officer of the Curriſſiers, that too well knew the king and ſaid, 'This is the right bird,' and ſo diſcharging his piſtol, ſhot him through the body, and himſelf was preſently ſhot dead upon the place; the king was held up in his ſaddle a while, but preſently fell; his horſe alſo was ſhot, and ſo ran away without his maſter.

Juſt now fell a great miſt, the ſun, which before ſhined very brightly, on a ſudden muffling up his face in a mourning cloud, as if not able to look upon the fall of the king of Sweden; the Imperialiſts being now maſters of the king's body, fell to ſtripping of it; one getting his ſpurs, another his ſword, another his ring, another his buffcoat, &c. every one being greedy to get ſome part of his ſpoils; but before they could carry away his body, the Swedes returning, ſo charged the enemies, that they were forced to retreat, whereupon Stalhanſh recovering the body, carried it away in an ammunition waggon privately, ſo that few in his own army knew of his death.

All this while were the four foot brigades of the Swedes pell mell at it, and gat ground apace of the Imperialiſts, the horſe alſo after an hour's fight, drave them back, and got poſſeſſion of ſeven pieces of their ordinance; but by this time the miſt was ſo extraordinarily thickned by the ſmoke, that the Swedes could not ſee to purſue their advantage; yet is pleaſed God, to ſtrike part of the Imperial army with ſuch a pannic fear, that above one thouſand Dutch horſe ran all away together, one amongſt them crying out, 'Oh, I know the king of Sweden well enough, he is beſt at the latter end of the day!'

But the chiefeſt fright was amongſt the ladies and captains wives, and other women behind the army, many of them getting out of their coaches, cut aſunder the harneſs, and mounted, ſtradling upon the bare horſe backs, and ſo ſcudded away amongſt the ſoldiers: divers women and children were there troden to death, nor did the horſemen ſtay till they had fled divers miles; but in the heat of the battle, count Pappenheim (who was before ſent for) came in with his horſe and dragooners, by whoſe coming the charge was again renewed: but juſt as he was ordering his horſe, he was ſhot with a falconet bullet, whereof he preſently died; his officers flocking about him, cried out, 'O our general is ſlain, our general is ſlain,' and thereupon turning their horſe heads, they all out of the battle without ſtroke ſtriking; but the Imperialiſts that were ſet on by his coming, maintained the fight with admirable reſolution; yet the charge was ſuſtained by the Swedes with much gallantry; full two hours were they thus in hot battle; but the greateſt loſs fell upon two brigades of the old Swediſh ſoldiers, whom the king had moſt relied on; theſe old blads ſtood to their arms ſtoutly till the ground was covered with their bodies, yet they did not unrevenged, for they ſlew many of the Imperialiſts, and amongſt them divers of great account.

Duke Bernard had as hard a chapter of it, as any man againſt the imperial right wing commanded by count Colalto; yet never did man beheave himſelf more gallantly than duke Bernard did that day, charging his enemies twelve ſeveral times one after another; a little before ſun ſet, the miſt cleared up, and then did duke Bernard overview the poſture and countenance of the army, which he could not do, ſince he heard of the king's death, till now; he ſpake cheerfully to the officers and ſoldiers, encouraging of them to a new onſet: He found the whole army (except Kniphauſen's part) in no good order, yet he took much pains to rally them, and draw them on to a new charge; alas comrade, ſaith the poor ſoldier, 'muſt we fall on again!' come ſaith the other, 'if we muſt, let us do it bravely, and make a day of it.'

The Imperialiſts hearts quaked within them, when they ſaw the Swedes thus advancing in good order againſt them again; whereupon the horſe began to retreat, which the Swedes perceiving, they with their great ordinance gave them ſuch a rouſing Salve, and then charged them ſo home, that they put them into diſorder; but then again fell there ſuch a miſt, that the Swedes could not ſee to purſue their enemies; and now was all the ſervice turned to the wind mills, where Coloredo was, who ſtrugled hard at the laſt caſt for life; a cruel fight was here maintained till about ſix o'clock at night, about which time the Imperialiſts quite gave it over: this cruel and bloody fight had laſted about nine hours; and now Walſtein marched away towards Lipſwich, leaving the field and victory to the Swedes, who lodged upon the ground all night, where was a pitiful groaning of the dying and wounded of both ſides; it was a frolly cold night, in which many a brave man died of his wounds, that with help might have been cured; the next morning the Swedes found all the Imperial cannons left behind them; there were ſlain of the Swedes about three thouſand, and of the Imperialiſts about four thouſand upon the place, beſides whom, the Boors knocked down near three thouſand that fled away ſtragling; the wounded were as many more as the ſlain; on the Swedes ſide were ſlain, the king himſelf, whoſe death is never ſufficiently lamented; the enemies themſelves giving him this teſtimony, that he was the braveſt enemy, and the beſt captain that ever was in Chriſtendome: and beſide him, Grave Neeles: Nicholas Count of Weſenburg, with ſome other colonels and officers: on the Imperial party were ſlain, the abbot of Fulda, count Pappenheim, young count Walſtein and divers colonels and officers.

Walſtein at firſt intended only to make a retreat to Lipſich, but his ſoldiers, ſo ſoon as they heard the drums beat a retreat, fell to running preſently: and the fright was ſo great that moſt of them never came in order again: his chief officers confeſt, that if the Swedes had but ſent out one thouſand horſe after them, they might have cut off the whole army.

The king of Sweden bore a port and preſence full of majeſty; was of a gallant ſtature, above ſix foot high; fair faced; had an hawks eye; of yellowiſh hair: he was broad limb'd, ſtrong, active and hardy; of an undaunted courage; a ſtrong judgment; an admirable quickneſs of wit; of a natural vigilancy, and indefatigableneſs: had a marvellous forecaſt, to apprehend and diſpoſe of his affairs to the beſt advantage: he had an excellent dexterity to unperplicate, and entagle the gordian knottineſs of a buſineſs: he knew how to take advantage of men's humours: and had a native attraction in him to win hearts, as well as reaſons: he was a great ſtudent upon any buſineſs of importance: a diligent diſputer, and conveſſer of the ſubject which he was to give to ambaſſadors. A ſudden thing ſeldom aſtoniſhed his judgment; but the more imminent the peril was, the nimbler was he in his deviſes; ſtill ſhewing moſt vigour, where there was moſt need of it; he was exceeding temperate in his diet; his delight was upon ſtrong and ſoldiery diſhes; but that which was moſt commendable in him, was his religion both public and private; he was frequent in prayer and thankſgivings, upon any emergent occaſion; he would pray a ſhipboard, a ſhore, in the field, in the midſt of a battle, as if prayer alone were the ſureſt piece of his whole armour: he was a ſtrict obſerver of martial diſcipline: and a ſtrict puniſher of miſdemeanours in his camp.

When he firſt came into Germany, he ſaw that many women followed his army, whereupon coming to a great river, his men and waggons being paſſed over, he cauſed the bridge to be broken down, hoping thereby to be rid of this lumber, but they on a ſudden ſhriking out grievouſly, the ſoldiers on the other ſide, vowed not to ſtir a foot till the women were fetched over; whereupon the king finding that this ill humour was ſo generally diſperſed amongſt his men, that it was dangerous to purge it all at once, ſmiled out his anger for the preſent, permitting what he could not amend: yet this abuſe he afterwards reformed by degrees; his army won the day, though they loſt their king, which made one ſay,

> Upon this place, the great Guſtavus di'd,
> Whil'ſt victory lay bleeding by his ſide.

A little before his death, being in diſcourſe with doctor Fabricus his chaplain; he told him, that he thought God would ere long take him away, becauſe the people did ſo overvalue and deify him; he was ſlain in the battle at Lutzen, November the 16. anno Chriſti 1632. and of his age thirty eight.

At his firſt coming into Germany, having a deſign upon Stetin, and his army now ready upon the ſhore, and his boats ready upon the river to embark them; the wind was contrary, and ſo had continued for ſeveral days before: the king obſerving this, before his army with bended knees, and hands lifted up to heaven, he ſaid; 'O thou moſt juſt God, full well thou knoweſt, that I did not at firſt undertake this enterprize out of any raſhneſs, or ambition, but for the glory of thy moſt holy name, and the defence of the truth of thy word: here now therefore I call upon thee O God, and moſt humbly do beſeech thee, that with the air of thy favour, and with a proſperous wind, thou wouldeſt be pleaſed to breath upon this my undertakings for Chriſt's ſake, amen.

No ſooner was his prayer ended, but through God's mercy, the wind turned about with ſo full a gale, that the whole fleet paſſing up the river Oder, in two hours pace, ran up twenty miles, and unlooked for, came to an anchor within a mile of Stetin, to the great defeat of the purpoſes of the Imperialiſts, who had an intent within two days after to have laid ſiege to the city, had not God thus miraculouſly prevented them.

Alſo when he came firſt to his crown, he would needs lay ſiege to Notteburg caſtle, which the Muſcovite had given to his father for ſome aſſiſtance that he had afforded him. The caſtle ſtood in an Iſland in the mouth of the moſt raging and ſwift river of Nerva, his colonels deſpairing of taking it, and loth that their young king ſhould receive a check in his firſt attempts, labour to diſuade him from the action; yet he continued reſolute to purſue it; and ſee how almighty God wrought for him; the beſieged Muſcovites were ſtricken with ſuch thruſhes, warts, and bliſters in their throats and mouths, that they could neither chew their meat, nor ſwallow, it down whereupon they parlied, and yielded up that impregnable caſtle to him, wherein he found a whole years victuals, beſides abundance of ammunition.

Not long after this, he had a difference with the Dantzickers, who prepared twenty or thirty good ſhips of war, with the firſt opening of the ſpring, to have burnt up his navy in the harbour; but towards the end of winter, when this narrow Swediſh ſea was frozen a yard or two deep, this young king cauſed his boors to cut open this ice for ten or twelve miles together, which done, he came in a night with his fleet upon the Dantzickers, and burnt ſunk, and took moſt of them: alſo in his wars with the king of Poland, he conquered ſo many towns from him in Pruſia and Livonia, that he enforced him, by the mediation of our king Charles, to make peace with him.

In theſe wars with the Polanders, his army was never great: he had but five thouſand men for the moſt part, and never above ſeven thouſand: and yet with them he fought ſeveral battles: beat out, or wearied out two imperial armies; took in the great and ſtrong city of Elbin, with divers others: and finally obtained his end upon his enemy, who was able at once to have come down with ſuch a number of horſe, as had been ſufficient to have carried him away: and five ſuch armies as his was.

When he came firſt into Germany, he had many brave generals: the lord Oxenſtern, a Swede born, and lord chancellor of that kingdom; the lord Faulkenburg, a german born, and lord chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold; the lord Guſtavus Horn, a Finlander, with whom the lord marquiſs Hamilton was aſſociated; the lord Achatius Todt, a Swede, general of the infantry; the valiant Maximilian Dyvel, or Teufel, baron of Ginderſdorf and Weyerſburg, colonel of the life guard: the gallant Bauditzen, lieutenant general of the horſe; Sir John Hepburn, Sir Alexander Leſly, and colonel Lumſdel, all brave Scots, &c.

The Life of GASPER COLINIUS great Admiral of France, who was ſlain in the Pariſian Maſſacre, Auguſt 24. Anno Chriſti 1572.

GASPAR COLINIUS or Coligni, was deſcended of a very antient and honourable family; his predeceſſors had kingly privileges in their own country; as the power of life and death, of coining money, impoſing taxes and tributes, &c. His father was Gaſpar de Colinis or Colinius, who lived under king Francis the firſt; and had to wife Ludovica Monmorancy, the ſiſter of Annas Monmorancy, great conſtable of France.

When in the year 1512. the admiral Bonivet had taken Fontaraby in the confines of Spain, as ſoon as he was returned unto France, the Spaniards came and beſieged it with a great army; the ſiege laſted twelve months, whereby the inhabitants ſuffered much extremity by reaſon of famine.

King Francis hearing of it, commanded this Gaſpar to raiſe an army; and relieve Fontaraby, which army he preſently levied; but in his march he fell ſick, and died at Ax, Auguſt 4. anno Chriſti 1522. leaving three ſons behind him, Odet, Gaſpar, and Francis.

Ludovica his widow, was made one of the ladies of honour to the queen of France, and was very careful of the education of her ſons, and lived a moſt chaſte and virtuous life all the remainder of her days, dying in Paris, anno Chriſti 1547.

Pope Clement the ſeventh, ſeeking to encreaſe his authority in France, made the elder brother (Odet) a Cardinal, knowing that by reaſon of the eminency of his family, he might be very uſeful to him. By which means the inheritance fell to this our Gaſpar, the ſecond brother, who was born Feb. 16. anno Chriſti 1517. whoſe ingenuity and towardlineſs appearing in his child-hood, his mother was very careful of his education; and for his inſtruction in learning, ſhe made choice of Nicholas Bereldus to be his ſchoolmaſter, a man famous in thoſe days in France. She alſo provided him tutors to inſtruct him in military arts, of ſuch as were moſt skilful therein.

This Gaſpar being thus furniſhed both for peace and war, when he came to the age of 24. the Dauphin of France, the king's eldeſt ſon, beſieging Eticn at that time, Gaſpar went to ſerve under him, and to put in practice what he had gotten before in the theory: in which ſervice he ſhewed much alacrity and courage, and advancing near to the enemies trenches, he was wounded with a bullet in his throat. The ſame year alſo the king having intelligence that his, and the emperor's army were ready to join battle in Infubria, Gaſpar deſiring leave, haſtened thither, and in that battle gave great proof of his valour and prudence; ſo that ſhortly after king Francis dying, and his ſon Henry ſucceeding to the crown, he advanced him to great honour; and whereas his uncle Annas Monmorancy was general of the horſe, he made this Gaſpar colonel of a regiment of foot: in which office he carried himſelf ſo well, that in a little ſpace he got much repute for his juſtice, valour and prudence, and thereby became very grateful to the common people: for, whereas the ſoldiers formerly by their inſolence and pounderings uſed much to oppreſs them, this new colonel kept them in awe by military diſcipline, eſpecially he ſeverely puniſhed them for incontinency, ſwearing and blaſphemy; and his orders were ſo generally approved of, that ſhortly after the king put them among his military laws.

The ſame king alſo advanced him to greater honour, taking a great liking to him, making him one of his own horſemen, which vulgarly are called of the king's order. And whereas contention aroſe about that time between the king of France, and king Henry the eight of England about the town of Boulloine, which a little before upon conditions of peace had been pawned to the Engliſh; the king of France diſtruſting the Engliſh, made this Gaſpar governor of all that country; who preſently going into Picardy, whither king Henry of France had ſent an army to beſiege Boulloine: he with admirable art and diligence built a caſtle near to it, which was ſuch a ſhelter to the French, and did ſo hinder the ſallies of the Engliſh, that in a ſhort time they were forced to treat about ſurrendering of the city. For the finiſhing of which treaty, the whole buſineſs was referred by the king of France to our Gaſpar, and his uncle Rappiponius; which being ended, and the town ſurrendred, Gaſpar returned to the king, and was ſhortly after made the great admiral of France, which amongſt the French is counted the greateſt honour in the kingdom, having the command of the ſea, and the king's navy. He was alſo made governor of Picardy and of the iſle of France, and captain of a troop of men at arms, and one of the king's council.

Anno Chriſti 1554. Charles the fifth, emperor of Germany and queen Mary of England, raiſed great armies againſt the king of France, and to reſiſt ſuch potent adverſaries, none was thought ſo fit by the ſuffrage of all, as our Gaſpar; and therefore he was choſen by the king to that place, who preſently raiſing forces, haſted to the confines of France, towards the Belgick provinces to ſecure them againſt the approach of their enemies. At this time France was in great fear, conſidering the conjunction of ſuch potent adverſaries, and the king of France his want, both of money and arms to reſiſt them, ſo that many thought that the ruin of France was approaching. Whereupon our admiral perſuaded the king to treat of peace; which counſel was ſo grateful both to the king and his nobles, that the charge of it was preſently committed to the admiral, which within few days he effected, to the incredible joy and rejoicing of all the orders of France; and he was looked upon as an inſtrument of ſaving his country, eſpecially conſidering upon what honeſt, honourable and profitable conditions he had concluded the peace.

About this time it fell out that the Guiſes, (who were Lorrainers by extraction, and pretended a title to Sicily and Naples, which they ſaid the ſaid king of Spain had injuriouſly taken from their anceſtors) perſuaded king Henry of France, that for divers years they had held correſpondency with a great part of the Neapolitan nobility, ſo that if the king would aſſiſt them with ſome competent forces they doubted not to make an eaſy conqueſt of the kingdom. By this their council they violated the peace which was made a little before with Spain, and ſolemnly ſworn to on both ſides, which was a great grief to our admiral, who ſticked not to ſay, that ſuch perjury proved always as diſhonourable, ſo fatal to kingdoms; and that God in all ages had been a ſever revenger of it: yet the king would not hearken to him, but commanded him to raiſe forces in his province. This was the firſt cauſe of that deadly feud which aroſe between the Guiſes and him; there were ſome other ſmaller cauſes which father kindled that fire, which for brevity ſake I omit.

The emperor hearing of theſe preparations in France, thought to be before hand with them, and therefore raiſed an army in the low countries to invade France, which the king being informed of, and knowing that the firſt ſtorm would fall upon Picardy, he preſently diſpatched away the admiral for the ſecuring of it; and before he had marched two days journey, he was informed by his ſcouts that the Spaniards intended to beſiege San Quintin in Picardy; he alſo received letters from one captain Bullin, that as ſoon as the citizens of San Quintin heard of the Spaniards intention, they were ſeized with ſuch a panick fear, that many of them left their houſes, and fled fled into the woods with their wives and children. Our admiral hearing theſe things, diſſembled the matter before his ſoldiers, as well as he could, and ſhewing much activity, by great journeys haſtened to San Quintans. Whereupon two of his captains (Gernacus and Lutaricius) endeavoured by all means to diſſuade him from it, telling him that the city was not fortified, neither provided with food and other neceſſaries to ſuſtain a ſiege, and that the enemies would beleaguer it before he could furniſh it with ſuch things, and therefore they told him that it was better for him, and more for his honour, to diſturb the enemy in the open fields, than, by ſhutting himſelf up within the walls, to expoſe himſelf to ſuch danger. But he conſidering of what conſequence that place was, and what advantage the getting of it would be to the Spaniards, adhered to his firſt reſolutions; and having by the way adjoined unto himſelf about two hundred and forty ſoldiers, he haſtily flies to the city, and ſets all hands on work for the fortifying of it.

The Spaniards being informed hereof, preſently beſiege the city with a ſiege, and began to draw their trenches about it, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſuburbs, from, by rolling trenches they approached the walls. The our admiral taking notice of, ſallied out upon them, and fring the ſuburbs, drave the enemies further off; but when he had throughly viewed the city, and found the weakneſs of it, he began to ſuſpect that he could not hold out long againſt ſo potent an adverſary. Yet conſidering that God's providence had caſt him upon theſe ſtraits, he reſolved rather valiantly to die, than to give his enemy ſo great an advantage againſt France, by forſaking that town to them. And therefore he laid out all his care, labour and induſtry, for the defending of it; and for the greater encouragement of the citizens and ſoldiers, he laid his own hands to every work that was to be done.

Whilſt he was thus buſily employed, a meſſenger brought him word, that his brother Andelot was got ſafe into the city, with about five hundred ſoldiers; the remains of a greater army which the king had ſent under the conduct for the victualling and relieving the city, which army was encountered by a great party of German horſe and foot, who in the encounter had routed the French, ſlain many, and diſperſed the reſt; only in the time of the medly, Andelot with his five hundred men had ſlipped into the city.

As ſoon as this defeat of the French was known to the ſoldiers and citizens, they were poſſeſſed with ſo great a fear, that the encouragements of the admiral were little regarded. Hereupon he calls them all together, makes a ſpeech to them, and ſhewed them that the ſafety of their enemy ſhould be preferred before their lives; and thereupon cauſed them all to take an oath, that if any one ſpoke that the ſurrender of the city, he ſhould loſe his head for it, himſelf alſo took the ſame oath.

In the mean time the Spaniards being elated with their late victory, preſs upon the city harder than before; and for twenty days together continue their battery againſt the walls, whereby they beat down a great part of them. The admiral ſeeing this, and perceiving that they were preparing to give a general ſtorm, he encouraged his ſoldiers ſtoutly to make reſiſtance; telling them, that if they did but withſtand the firſt ſtroke, the enemy would not be forward to attempt a ſecond. Where the greateſt breach and danger was, there himſelf ſtood armed to reſiſt in the very face of danger. Other places he committed to his brother, and his other captains. But while he was valiantly fighting in the breach, word was brought him, that the enemy was entered in two other parts of the city: Whereupon taking ſome of his truſty friends with him, he ran thitherward to oppoſe them, but before he came, he found that that part of the city was filled with his armed enemies, againſt whom, whilſt he oppoſed himſelf, he was environed by his adverſaries, and taken priſoner, who preſently carried him away to Amiens.

Whilſt he was priſoner there, he fell dangerouſly ſick, and lay forty days tormented with a fever; and as ſoon as he began to recover, he called for a Bible, by reading whereof he much eaſed and refreſhed his mind and body; and by the diligent ſtudy thereof he began to embrace the reformed religion, and to have a taſte of true piety, and the right manner of calling upon God.

Not long after he payed his ranſom, which was fifty thouſand crowns, and ſo returned home; and being weary of the factions and affairs at court, and ſeriouſly thinking of his change of religion, he got leave of the king to turn over his regiment of foot to his brother Andelot, and his government of the iſle of France to his brother-in-law, Marſhal Monmorancy; and ſhortly after he ſent one of his intimate friends to the king, humbly to ſignify to him, that he intended alſo to lay down his government of Picardy, and therefore deſired him to think of one to ſucceed him therein: the king anſwered, That he wondered at his reſolution, and ſcarce thought him wiſe to diveſt himſelf ſo ſuddenly of ſo many places of honour and profit; and from that time he began generally to be ſuſpected of his change in religion, ſhewing a mind ſo free from ambition and deſire of rule.

Monſieur Andelot alſo diſcovering his reſolution in religion, the cardinal of Lorrain (who hated the family of Coligni with a deadly hatred, as the greateſt enemies to the greatneſs of his family) watched his opportunity, and ſuggeſted to the king, That all men took notice, that many great men of France were infected with the poiſon of Calviniſm, which they ſcattered amongſt the inferior ſort of people: and in particular, That Monſieur Andelot had blabbed out many things to the diſhonour of the ſolemn ſacrifice of the maſs, &c. The king being incenſed hereby, commanded the cardinal of Chattillion his brother, and Monmorancy his choſen, to ſend for Andelot, and to admoniſh him to anſwer modeſtly to the queſtions which ſhould be propoſed to him.

When he came before the king, he profeſſed his great good will toward him, and ſpake many things of his great merits; and then told him that he was ſorry to hear that which was reported, viz. That he thought ill of religion, and therefore he required him to tell him what he thought of the maſs, which the Calviniſts ſpake ſo much againſt? Andelot being a man of great courage, anſwered confidently, according to the truth; which the king being offended at, exhorted him to look to himſelf, and to prevent the danger before it were too late. Whereunto Andelot, with great courage anſwered, That he had hitherto ſhewed himſelf obedient in all things to his majeſty, whom he had found always bountiful to himſelf and his family; but in the cauſe of religion, he would neither daub nor diſſemble with God. That his body, wealth, and dignity, were in the king's power, of which he might diſpoſe as he pleaſed: but his ſoul was ſubject to God only that gave it; to whom therefore, in this cauſe, he muſt needs be obedient, as to his greater Lord.

At this the king was ſo enraged, that ſnatching up a diſh, he therewith hurt his ſon the dauphin, that ſat next him; and then he commanded one of his privy chamber to carry Andelot to the city of Meaux, where he remained a priſoner in the biſhop's houſe, till he was removed to the caſtle of Melodune.

Not long after king Henry the ſecond dying, his ſon Francis ſucceeded him, who was married to Mary queen of Scotland, the daughter of the duke of Guiſe's ſiſter, by which means the Guiſes ruled all at court; and they alſo boaſted often of the kingdom of England, to which this Mary was heir apparent, as they ſaid.

The admiral knowing their cruel, barbarous, and bloody diſpoſitions, who would never be free from turbulent councils, and eſpecially from perſecuting thoſe of the religion, he was now, without further delay, reſolved to lay down his government of Picardy; and for that end acquainted Lewis of Bourbon, prince of Conde, concerning his intention; wiſhing him to beg that place of the king, which accordingly he obtained.

Our admiral being thus eaſed of theſe public burdens, and the troubles of them which withdrew his mind from religion, he kept at home in his own caſtle; and the rather becauſe of his wife Carola Lavollia, born of an illuſtrious and antient family, which was wonderfully given to the ſtudy of religion, exhorting her huſband alſo, that caſting off the remainder of idolatry and ſuperſtition, he ſhould wholly betake himſelf to the true ſervice of Chriſt. The admiral having often heard her preſs this upon him, dealt ſeriouſly with her, telling her, that he never knew any, either in France or Germany, which embraced in truth this reformed religion, but that they were overwhelmed with manifold afflictions, under which they almoſt periſhed. He told her alſo, that by the laws of France, which were confirmed by all the parliaments, Whoſoever made profeſſion of this religion, was to be burnt alive, and all his eſtate to be forfeited to the king. Yet, ſaith he, if you be ſo prepared with faith and courage, that you can be content to undergo the ſame lot with others, you ſhall ſee that I will not be wanting to do my duty. To this ſhe anſwered, That the condition of the church at this day was no other than what it had been in former ages, even from the beginning; and ſhe perſuaded herſelf, that it would be the ſame to the end of the world. And thus each of them encouraging other, the admiral began to inſtruct his family in the true knowlege and worſhip of God, and gave them Bibles and other good books to read, for their further edification. Withal, he ſtoutly forbade them thoſe oaths and blaſphemies which were common in France, eſpecially in the court. He provided alſo godly governors and ſchoolmaſters for his children; ſo that in a ſhort time there was a wonderful change in his family: yea, by this example, his two brethren, Odet the cardinal, and Andelot, were exceedingly ſtirred up to the ſtudy of religion.

The admiral from his childhood had been bred in the court, which did in thoſe days exceedingly abound with luxury and other vices, from which he was not altogether free; but ſo ſoon as he embraced the true religion, there was ſuch a ſtrange alteration in his life and deportment, that the powerful work of God's ſpirit did wonderfully appear therein.

Before he durſt come to the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, he conferred with divers godly miniſters, both about Tranſubſtantiation and Conſubſtantiation, for the ſettling of his judgment in the truth. And once being preſent in the town of Vatevil, at a private meeting of the godly, where there was a ſermon, and the ſacrament to be adminiſtered; after ſermon he requeſted thoſe that were preſent, that they would not be offended at his weakneſs, but that they would pray to the Lord for him; and then requeſted the miniſter, that he would a little more explain himſelf about the ſacrament, which he willingly did; and having, by ſundry texts of ſcripture, ſhewed that Chriſt is received only ſpiritually and ſacramentally therein, he concluded with that of St Auguſtine, "Manducare "cibum qui non perit ſed permanet ad vitam, eſt credere "in Chriſtum. Et quid paras dentem, et ventrem? "credi et manducaſti." Item, "Nolite parare fauces, "ſed cor." Chriſt is to be fed upon not with our mouths, but with our faith, &c.

Our admiral being much ſatisfied with this diſcourſe, gave thanks, firſt to God, then to that miniſter and congregation; and ſhortly after was himſelf partaker of that holy ſacrament: the fame whereof, when it was once ſpread abroad in France, it cannot be believed what joy and conſolation it brought the churches of Chriſt; for though till that time the true worſhippers of God had many laws made againſt them by the kings and parliaments, though they were daily dragged to priſons, torments, and death, ſo that they were forced to hold all their meetings in ſecret: yet was the true religion, after a wonderful manner, diſperſed through all the provinces of France, and the popiſh party found, by experience, that the more they ſought to ſupreſs and extinguiſh the light of God's word, and the profeſſors of it, the more it daily encreaſed.

Not long after fell out the tumult at Amboiſe, and the conſpiracy of the nobility againſt the Guiſes, whoſe pride and inſolence the princes of France could no longer bear with. Of this number was the prince of Conde, and the king of Navarre, his brother. Whereupon the Guiſes procured an edict from the king, whereby a meeting of the nobility was appointed at Fontainbleau, eſpecially to treat about matters of religion: and when the day came, which was Auguſt 24. 1560. the king requeſted thoſe that were preſent to deliver their opinions; whereupon the admiral riſing out of his ſeat, humbly preſented the king with two ſupplications, under this title, "The humble ſupplications of thoſe who in ſeveral parts of your majeſty's kingdom, do truly and purely ſerve God." Theſe ſupplications were delivered to Albeſpine, the king's ſecretary, who publicly read them. This bold fact of the admiral was much wondered at, conſidering the king's bitter enmity againſt that religion, and the great power of the Guiſes. The ſum of thoſe petitions was this:

"They which purely and ſincerely ſerve God, taking this fit opportunity, do humbly beſeech your majeſty, that of your clemency you will be pleaſed to pity a great number of your ſubjects, who unto this day are miſerably afflicted, tormented, and waſted, for the cauſe of religion in all your provinces: We humbly beg of you, that you will not be grieved to take cognizance of our cauſe, and to appoint that the ſcripture may be the judge in theſe great controverſies, whereby it will eaſily appear how much we do abhor hereſy, which hitherto hath been laid to our charge: As alſo, how falſely we have been charged with ſedition, when we never uſed force or arms to defend ourſelves, but ever thought it our duty, in our greateſt extremities, only to have recourſe to your majeſty's clemency. Our humble requeſt therefore to your majeſty is, that you would be pleaſed to reſtrain our perſecutors, by whoſe means there is no part of your majeſty's kingdom which, in theſe late years, hath not been defiled with the blood of your innocent ſubjects.

"Our caſe hath been miſerable, when we have been forced to plead our cauſe before the pope's clients and penſioners, rather than before equal and indifferent judges. Our humble requeſt therefore is, that you would be pleaſed favourably to look upon ſo many families who have always acknowleged you for our gracious lord and king; and, according to God's command, have honoured and obeyed you, and ſhall be ready, if occaſion be offered, to ſpend our lives for your dignity and ſervice; and therefore we think it but equal, that our lives and welfare ſhould be protected againſt the rage of our cruel and bloody adverſaries.

"We further pray, That ſome public place may be allowed us, where our miniſters may preach the word of God ſincerely, and adminiſter the ſacraments truly, that our religion be no longer concealed, we may be freed from thoſe falſe calumnies which our adverſaries have hitherto caſt upon us: And we ſhall ever pray," &c.

After theſe ſuplications were read, there were great debates, but little about religion, great complaints being made of the king's debts, and conſideration had how the ſame might be diſcharged. Hereupon our admiral ſpoke freely and boldly againſt the forces raiſed by the Guiſes, under the pretence of a guard for the king, as if he needed ſuch a guard in the heart of his own kingdom; whereas the authority of the king's name in France is ſo ſacred and powerful, that thereby the meaneſt conſtable is able to ſupreſs any tumult whatſoever. This free ſpeech of his extremely vexed the Guiſes, who hated him ſo much the more for it.

Some others propounded that there might be a public convention of the ſtates called, as the only means to cure the diſtempers of France; which though ſome had labored to diſcredit, and ſo had cauſed an intermiſſion of it for eighty ſeven years, yet it had been always exceeding advantageous to the kingdom, as the parliaments in England, conſiſting of three ſtates, had always been there, whereby the Engliſh kings had been enabled to make ſuch powerful invaſions of France.

Shortly after king Francis the ſecond dying, his younger brother, Charles the ninth, ſucceeded, and thereupon the former requeſt was renewed, for calling a convention of all the ſtates.

At this time Catherine of Medices was the queen-mother, a Florentine by birth, to whom the education of the young king, and the care of his perſon was committed, according to the antient cuſtom of France; but ſhe was not ſuffered to have any thing to do with the government of the kingdom. And hereupon the Guiſes, who for a long time had been powerful at court, intruded themſelves into that office. And at that time many of the nobility proceeded cruelly to torment and afflict thoſe of the reformed formed religion; whereupon there was great fear, leſt ſome new commotions ſhould be raiſed in the kingdom; but the queen mother pretended favour towards them, for which cauſe our admiral endeavoured, and at laſt affected, that ſhe ſhould be joined in commiſſion with Anthony king of Navarre, who was made protector during the king's minority. This many wiſe men diſliked and oppoſed, ſaying, That in the ſtories of former times it did appear, that the government was never committed to the queen mother, eſpecially if ſhe were a ſtranger, but it redounded to the great hurt of France, and was the cauſe of many civil broils.

When the day of the public convention of the ſtates came, he which made the ſpeech in the behalf of the nobility, about the end of his oration, preſented the king with a ſupplication, that they of the reformed religion might have public places allowed them for the exerciſe of the ſervice of God in.

To this one Quintin, a doctor of the civil law, and profeſſor of Paris, oppoſed himſelf, and made a long oration in the name of the clergy, which he rather read than pronounced by heart, wherein he took the boldneſs to affirm, That all they that moved for public places for thoſe of the religion were guilty of treaſon againſt the king and kingdom, the authors of ſedition, and bringers in of a new religion, and therefore ought ſeverely to be puniſhed. Of which, when the admiral, in the king's council, afterwards complained, Quintin, to excuſe himſelf, profeſſed that he ſpake nothing of his own head, but only had pronounced that oration, which was penned and put into his hand by the clergy, and that he was ready again, in the aſſembly of ſtates, before the king and all the company, to ſhow, that in all that he had ſaid, he had no thoughts of hurt to the admiral.

In concluſion, there was an edict ſent forth, in the king's name, commanding and requiring all the judges and magiſtrates through France, to releaſe all thoſe of the religion that were in priſon; and it was forbidden them, upon great penalties, hereafter to meddle with, or trouble any for their religion's ſake. As for the buſineſs of allowing them public places for worſhip, that was put off to the next general meeting of the ſtates, which was appointed, but held not, to be at Pontholſe in Piccardy.

January following, there was a meeting of all the princes and nobles of France, appointed to be held at St Germans, whither alſo repaired the deputies from all the parliaments, and there it was decreed, that churches ſhould be allowed to the proteſtants, in the ſubburbs belonging to each city. Upon the publiſhing of which edict, the face of the kingdom ſeemed to be ſettled, and in the ſuburbs of all the greater cities, yea, of Paris itſelf, thoſe of the religion met publicly, and had ſermons preached without the leaſt diſturbance. But preſently after was news brought, that the duke of Guiſe, in Campania, had baſely murdered about two hundred perſons, who were met together at Vaſſiac to hear a ſermon, according to the power given them by the king's edict, in a barn; and it was conceived that the duke of Guiſe took this boldneſs, relying upon the friendſhip of the king of Navarr, whoſe mind he had bowed and bound to himſelf, by promiſing him the kingdom of Sardinia, and other favours; and, upon this confidence, adjoining his other brethren to him, with a great army, he went to the court, and there called upon the king and queen mother, (who ſeemed with many tears to bewail the violence proffered to them,) and carried them away to Paris.

Hereupon the queen mother ſent divers meſſages to the admiral, and writ with her own hand to the prince of Conde, requeſting them to help her, and to deliver the king out of this captivity.

This cauſed the prince of Conde, with many of the nobility, upon deliberation, to reſolve to raiſe an army for the reſcue of the king, and to curb the inſolency of the Guiſes, often ſaying, That he ought not to be deterred with reports, as if he intended to propagate his religion by arms, or to offer violence to the perſon of the young king. For, ſaid he, after ſuch a public decree made by the king, and all the ſtates, in favour of thoſe of the reformed religion, what had the duke of Guiſe, who is a Lorrainer by birth, to do in France? Or by what confidence doth he exerciſe ſuch cruelty againſt the king's faithful ſubjects? And therefore he ſaw that there was no way left but to repel force with force; and that he was not the author of the war, but by war defended thoſe that were unjuſtly oppreſſed by war.

There was alſo a public report that the duke of Nemours had endeavoured, by flatteries, to perſuade the young prince Henry, the king's brother (who was afterwards choſen king of Poland) to go with him out of the bounds of France, which the young youth had declared to his mother. There was much ſpeech alſo of the maſſacre at Vaſſiac, and of their leading the king and queen-mother as their captives to Paris, where they had a powerful faction.

They had alſo ſent to the German princes, deſiring to be admitted into the league of the proteſtants. The cardinal of Lorrain had alſo ſent to Chriſtopher duke of Witzburge, a prudent and valiant prince, pretending that both he and his brethren would embrace the proteſtant religion, and deſired to be inrolled in the number of the proteſtant princes.

Theſe things being publicly divulged, the reſolution of the prince of Conde to take arms was generally approved of, and in a few days many cities ſided with, and aſſiſted him, as Orleans, Biturg, Roan, Lions, Vienna, Valentia, Montalban, &c.

And whereas, by the common conſent of all the proteſtants in France, the prince of Conde was choſen general, he prevailed ſo far with them, that the managing of the war was conferred upon our admiral, to whom he alſo delegated his own power and intereſt, for the opinion which he had of his excellent juſtice, gravity, and prudence.

This being generally taken notice of, the queen mother interpoſeth, as a mediatrix for peace, and ſends for the prince of Conde to come to their tents, intreating him, that for the convenient ſituation of it, he would deliver up into their hands, for a few days, as the fitteſt place for the treaty, the city of Boience, where there is a bridge that paſſeth over the river Loir, which bridge ſhe affirmed to be the fitteſt of all other places for the parley. The prince of Conde, upon the perſuaſions of his brother, the king of Navarr, and of the queen mother, and upon their faithful promiſe, that the town ſhould be delivered back to him again, and that his perſon ſhould be in ſafety during the treaty, without taking any further pledges, delivers up Boience to them; only deſiring, that, whilſt the treaty laſted, the conſtable, Guiſe, and St Andrew, (who were called the triumvirate for the ruin of France) might be commanded to withdraw from the camp.

When theſe things were done, the queen-mother and the Guiſes put a garriſon into the town of Boience, to fortify it ſtrongly, and keep the prince of Conde priſoner.

The admiral being juſtly incenſed by this perfidiouſneſs, and reſolving not to be wanting in his aid to the prince of Conde, he preſently, with all his cavalry, ſets upon the enemies camp, which brought ſuch a terror amongſt them, that thereupon the queen mother commanded the prince of Conde to be ſet at liberty. And a few days after the admiral aſſaulted Boience, and at laſt took the town, though with much loſs of his men.

About this very time, the admiral's eldeſt ſon, called Gaſpar, being a youth of nine years old, but of admirable towardneſs, fell ſick, and died at Orleance, which was an exceeding great grief to his father.

In the mean time, the Guiſes perceiving that they were forſaken by the greateſt part of France, which now adhered to, and aſſiſted Conde, they reſolved to call in foreign helps; and thereupon, ſending much money into Switzerland and Germany, they hired from the former foot, and from the latter horſe, to come into their aid, which the admiral uſed often to ſay, was a plain demonſtration of their treacherous and hoſtile minds againſt France: and therefore, that he might not be wanting to himſelf and friends, who had committed ſo great a truſt to him, he reſolved to oppoſe foreign, by foreign forces; and for this end he ſent his brother Andelot to the proteſtant princes in Germany, of whoſe good will to the French churches he had good aſſurance, requeſting aid from them, who accordingly, within three months ſpace, ſent him 3000 horſe, and 6000 foot into France.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, intelligence was given to the admiral, that ſome cannons, and a great quantity of gun-powder was carrying to the duke of Guiſe, who now beſieged Bitarg, guarded with ſix troops of horſe, and ſome foot. Hereupon the admiral taking ſome horſe with him, by long journeys, haſtened to meet the convoy; and coming up to them, they ſcarce ſtood the firſt ſhock, but throwing away their arms, fled, and left the booty to the admiral, who wanting horſes to draw them away, by over-charging the guns, brake them, and blew up the gun-powder, and ſo returned to his camp.

Andelot returning out of Germany, brought with him three thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot; ſo that the prince of Conde having a good army of French and Germans, haſted to Paris; which the Guiſes hearing of, intended to meet him, having gotten a regiment of Swiſſers, in whom they put moſt confidence; and ſo the two armies meeting, a battle was fought, but with a doubtful event; for on the one ſide was the conſtable taken priſoner by one William Stewart, a valiant Scotchman; and on the other ſide the prince of Conde was taken priſoner, which made many of his foot to throw away their arms and fly: but the admiral rallying the horſe, and encouraging them to prefer their religion, country, and honour, before their lives, he valiantly charged the Guiſians, in which medley he ſlew marſhal St Andrew, a potent man at court, and Proſſæus, colonel to the duke of Guiſe, and divers other noblemen.

The fight being ended, the admiral carried the conſtable to Orleance, where he made his abode for a while; but ſhortly after came the duke of Guiſe to beſiege the city, whereupon the admiral leaving his brother Andelot for the defence of it, flies into Normany, and there beſieged the caſtle of Cadonius, where the marquis of Elbœve, one of the duke of Lorrain's brothers, was, and within a few days had it, with all the arms and ammunition, ſurrendered to him.

About this time there was one John Poltrot, a young man, of a noble family, in the army of the duke of Guiſe, who having embraced the reformed religion, and ſerved for ſome months under the prince of Conde, took up privately with himſelf, a reſolution to kill the duke of Guiſe, as a public enemy to his country, and a cauſe of all the preſent calamities: and, ſaid he, 'If I had been bound to him by any oaths, I muſt not have been perfidious; but being free, why ſhould I not venture, as Scævola did, for my country's ſafety?' With this reſolution he went to the duke of Guiſe's camp, and watching his opportunity, ſhot him into the ſhoulder, of which wound he died, within a few days after.

The very ſame day, in the morning, the duke of Guiſe being ready to give an aſſault to Orleance, wrote to the queen-mother, that within twenty four hours he would ſend her word of the taking of that city, and that he would make the day very memorable, by ſparing neither ſex nor age; and that after he had kept his ſhrove-tide there, he would extinguiſh the memory of the town, by utterly ſubverting of it. But man knows not his deſtiny, nor what ſhall happen to him; for that ſame evening he was ſlain, as you heard before.

Preſently after a peace was concluded, and the edict renewed for the free exerciſe of the reformed religion thro' all France, as formerly.

Not many months after, the admiral being ſent for to court by the queen-mother, the widow of the duke of Guiſe comes in, and falls down at the king's feet, crying out, with many tears, for revenge of her huſband's death, charging the admiral as the contriver and author of it. The admiral apprehending that this was but the device of others, which ſet her on to ſeek his deſtruction by fraud, which they could not effect by war; before the king and all the council, he clears himſelf, ſhewing that Poltrot had at his death profeſſed, that he was ſet on by none but God; neither did he doubt, but that he had done God good ſervice in it, and freed his country from a tyrant that raged and thirſted after Chriſtian blood, and therefore he was not ſorry for what he had done, &c.

He alſo deſired, that if they queſtioned the death of the duke of Guiſe, he might have leave alſo to put in a charge againſt him, for that he doubted not but that he could eaſily prove the duke of Guiſe guilty of murdering wickedly the king's ſubjects, and of violating all the ſacred laws and decrees of the king; of taking up arms of his own head without authority, and thereby making himſelf guilty of treaſon, and of kindling thoſe flames in France, which had continued about thirteen months.

Notwithſtanding this reſolute ſpeech of the admiral, his enemies ceaſed not, for ſome years, ſtill to call upon the king for juſtice againſt him; whereupon the king at laſt appointed a convention of all the peers of the kingdom, at the city of Molineum, whither alſo he called his cheifeſt ſenators and counſellors, commanding the cardinal of Lorrain, and the widow of the duke of Guiſe, to produce what proofs they could, and the admiral to defend himſelf againſt them. When both parties had pleaded their cauſe, the king told them that he had referred the judgment to his counſellors, and therefore aſked them, if they had any exceptions againſt any of them; they anſwered, No. Then he aſked them, if they would refer the determination of their cauſe to him, and would ſtand to his judgment, they anſwered that they would willingly do ſo.

Whereupon, Jan. 29. in the year 1566, the king paſſed this ſentence, That having heard both parties, and conſulted with his nobles and counſellors, who were all unanimouſly agreed in the ſame ſentence, he pronounced the admiral clear and innocent from the murder of the duke of Guiſe, and therefore abſolved him from that crime, commanding this proctor, and all others, that they ſhould never dare hereafter to accuſe him for the ſame. He commanded alſo, That neither his preſent accuſers, nor any other of his ſubjects, ſhould dare hereafter to make any mention of it. Nor that any of his judges or parliaments, ſhould ever admit any plea againſt him for it. He declared alſo, that ſeeing both parties had freely referred themſelves to him, his will was, that they ſhould live lovingly and peaceably together, never contriving any thing againſt each other; and that if any of them, their friends, kindreds, or partakers, ſhould violate this decree, that they ſhould be held contemners of the king's majeſty, as guilty of treaſon, as diſturbers of the public peace: And laſtly, That this his definite ſentence ſhould be recorded in all the parliaments of his kingdom.

But to return to ſomething that happened before this, the admiral had in his family one Hambervilleries, born of a noble houſe, whom he made uſe of in his moſt weighty and honeſt affairs; and it pleaſed God, that ſome letters of his being intercepted, came to the admiral's hands, wherein he wrote to ſome great courtiers, that he was ready to obey their commands, in giving the admiral a ſalutiferous potion. Our admiral having read theſe letters, called the man to him, commanding him to write ſome verſes in a paper that lay by, which when he had done, comparing both the writings together, he aſked him whether he would acknowlege his hand in thoſe letters; which he looking upon, being ſtricken with guilt for his wickedneſs, he preſently fell upon the ground, and begged his maſter's pardon. The admiral told him, that he was willing to pardon him, but upon conditions that he ſhould preſently depart out of his houſe, nor ſhould ever come into his ſight again.

Not long after the aforementioned edict of peace was publiſhed, the queen mother took council to go to Baion, to meet her ſon-in law the king of Spain, and to take her children with her. This afterwards proved the cauſe of many tragical events, though for the preſent things were kept very ſecret.

And firſt ſhe ordered her journey to Lions, which hitherto had been in poſſeſſion of thoſe of the religion, becauſe of the great number of them there; and as ſoon as ſhe came thither, ſhe preſently ſet her Italian artificers to work, to build a cindel upon a neighbouring hill, which commanded all the city.

A litle before this, the plague began to be very hot, and now it had ſeized upon the court itſelf, yet could not the queen mother be perſuaded to remove herſelf and children from the danger till ſhe had ſeen the foundation of the caſtle laid. At laſt, making Loſſius governor of that city, a cruel and barbarous man, and an implacable enemy by to thoſe of the religion, and adjoining to him ſome ſeditious ſoldiers that might daily vex the godly inhabitants to departed. But this is very remarkable, that whitherſoever he removed the court, in cities, towns, caſtles, &c. the plague ſtill followed her, ſo that for three months together the king was in continual danger, and was ſtill forced to remove from place to place by reaſon of the infection. At laſt they came to Baion, where the queen mother met her daughter the queen of Spain, and ambaſſadors for the king, with whom ſhe communicated her counſels.

In the mean time the marſhal Monmorancy, whom the king had made governor of Paris in his abſence, had certain intelligence brought him, that the Guiſes had employed their agents to the common people of Paris, to ſtir them up againſt thoſe of the religion in that city; he heard alſo, that the cardinal of Lorrain, intended ſuddenly to be there with a great number of armed attendants, though the king by ſeveral edicts had commanded, that none in their journies ſhould carry harquebuſhes or piſtols about them. Therefore ſo ſoon as Monſieur Monmorancy heard that the cardinal was entred Paris, with his followers thus armed, he preſently taking his guard, went to them, commanding them to deliver up their arms: this the cardinal and his nephew, the young duke of Guiſes, took as an intolerable affront to them, and were often heard to ſay, that this fact ſhould coſt Monmorancy his life. The cardinal was very potent in this city, and could eaſily have raiſed fifty thouſand armed men to have ſlain the governor; whereupon he reſolved to call in ſome of his friends to his aid, and in the firſt place, he wrote to the admiral to haſten to him who accompanied with three hundred horſe, entred Paris, January 22d. which did ſo terrify the multitude, eſpecially the prieſts, monks and canons of the great church, that they began to think of flying hence.

The day after, Monſieur Monmorancy ſent for the preſidents of the parliament and the chief magiſtrates of the city to come to his houſe, to whom he complained before the admiral, of the audacioufneſs, and factious counſels of the cardinal of Lorrain, as alſo of the ſeditious ſpeeches caſt abroad in the city, as if the admiral taking advantage of the king's abſence at ſo great a diſtance, conſulted about plundering that rich city; and therefore he thought fit to call the admiral before them, that ſo he might clear himſelf from that aſperſion. Then ſaid the admiral, I have long ſince found out what my malicious and implacable adverſaries have aſperſed me withal, as if I intended to ſeize upon this city, which is the bull-wark and eye of France. But ſuch counſels as theſe are fit for thoſe that claim an intereſt, (I know not how it comes in) the ſucceſſion of the kingdom, and contend to have certain dukedoms and countries reſtored to them. For my own part, I neither challenge any right to the kingdom, nor to any part of it; which yet if I ſhould do, I think there hath not been a nobleman in France theſe ſix hundred years, which had the like opportunity to diſturb the public peace as I. Ye remember after the duke of Guiſe was ſlain, that I had the conſtable priſoner in Melun, and what a great occaſion I had thereby of doing great things if I would have embraced it: but, on the contrary, I was never more earneſt with the king and queen mother for peace, than at that time when our affairs proſpered beſt. Who can be ignorant how ſolicitous and importunate I was for peace, at that very time when many great and flouriſhing cities had delivered up themſelves into my hands? and divers other great cities, both of Normandy and Britany ſought my favour and protection? Who knows not that after peace was concluded, inſtead of begging honours and offices ambitiouſly of the king, which eaſily I might have obtained, I retired myſelf to my houſe, and there even to this time have lived a quiet and private life? Being ſent for by Monmorancy, I am come hither, not to diſturb the peace of the city, or to innovate any thing, but rather to preſerve peace againſt the audacioufneſs of ſome that would diſturb it. It is not unknown unto you how much confidence thoſe of the religion do put in me. Theſe being ſtirred up with new tumults, and terrified with the counſels and factions of the Guiſes, do daily flock to me; bring me intercepted letters of the meetings of certain captains, who command their old ſoldiers to be ready in arms, that when they have occaſion to uſe them when they may be at hand. What needs more words? Letters are intercepted written into Normandy, the orignal whereof is ſent to the queen mother, and I will ſhew you a copy of them, wherein amongſt others there is this paſſage: "There is no readier means of reſtoring the crown of France to thoſe to whom it doth belong of old, than by rooting out the houſe of Valois, and by maſſacring all the Hugonots, which are the chief upholders of it; for this end their woods are to be ſold, that with the price thereof we may arm ourſelves and get money; and if the Hugonots ſue for them, the buſineſs being once adjudged againſt them, they will never move for their charge of the ſuit."

Now alſo, what ſhould I ſpeak of the daily plunderings and murders? It is ſufficiently known, that after the peace was publiſhed, more than five hundred of thoſe of the religion were baſely murdered in ſeveral places, and yet not one of the murderers were ever yet puniſhed by the magiſtrates; and they which have complained of theſe things to the king or queen mother, have carried away either only words, or ſome empty paper or parchment inſtead of ſatisfaction. Who knows not that in the city of Turon, lately and openly, many of the religion were cruelly maſſacred even under the enſign, and by the ſoldiers of him, who was ſent thither by the duke of Monpenſier to ſettle the peace? Theſe things being ſo, yet I hear that there are many of your prieſts, who are ſo terrified by my coming hither, that they conſult about leaving the city, and yet there is no place in all France, no city, town or caſtle where the prieſts live, and attend their ſervices with more freedom and ſafety than in my town of Caſtelon.

The admiral having ended his ſpeech, the company was diſmiſſed; and two days after, there came to Monmorancy about thirty delegates from the Pariſian merchants, and with them the biſhop and divers prieſts, to all whom the admiral ſpake very friendly, bidding them be of good cheer, and fear nothing: and within few days after, going to the court of parliament, he made a ſpeech to them, and told them that nothing was more deſirable to him than the peace and welfare of the city, neither did he come to them with any other mind than to advance it; and therefore he exhorted them, that they would alſo do their endeavours that the citizens might behave themſelves peaceably and quietly; and ſo ſhortly after he returned home.

At his return, he was informed, that there was one Maius, who lived not far from him, a famous thief that was hired by the duke of Aumale, the brother of Guiſe, to lie in wait for him when he ſhould ride forth on hunting; for which end, he had given him an hundred pieces of gold and an excellent horſe; many alſo complained to the admiral againſt him for his thefts and robberies; whereupon having gotten ſufficient witneſſes, he complained of him to the parliament at Paris, and a few days after having apprehended him, he cauſed him to be carried to Paris, but when he came before the parliament, this villain accuſed the admiral, as if he had dealt with him about killing the queen mother, and had promiſed him a great reward for the ſame; the parliament after examination, finding this to be but a calumny, and proving him guilty of many thefts, condemned him to be broken upon the wheel, which accordingly was effected.

Shortly after the prince of Conde had a ſon born, to whom the king would be god-father, but becauſe he could not himſelf be preſent by reaſon of his religion, he ſubſtituted the admiral to ſupply his room, which buſineſs was celebrated with very great pomp; for at the feaſt a table was prepared as if it had been for the king himſelf, at which the admiral ſat alone, and was attended like a viceroy, which every one interpreted as a pledge of the king's ſingular love and favour to him.

Not many days after, news were brought that the duke de Alva, had by the command of the king of Spain, brought a great army into the low countries to ſuppreſs and root out the Proteſtants, and this army being to paſs by the borders of France, the admiral moved in the king's council, that Burgundy might be looked to; and leſt any tumults might ariſe about the difference in religion, he adviſed that a guard might either be appointed of the Swiſſers than of the French men; and it was commonly reported that ſix thouſand Swiſſers ſhould be ready to oppoſe the duke de Alva, in caſe he attempted any thing againſt Burgundy. But a few days after the prince of Rupefurias, of the royal blood, wrote to the admiral, to ſend him ſome truſty perſon, to whom he might communicate a ſecret which would much conduce to his ſafety: he alſo being a friend to the prince of Conde, by reaſon of their propinquity in blood, told him, that there was ſecret counſel taken at Baion, for the utter extirpation of the Proteſtant religion, and all the profeſſors of it, and for that end thoſe ſix thouſand Swiſſers were hired and brought into France, under the pretence of oppoſing the duke de Alva: the admiral alſo was informed of the ſame by many letters and meſſengers from ſeveral of his friends.

Theſe things coming forth, firſt the prince of Conde, and preſently after him the admiral went to the court, and told the king, the queen mother, and all the council, that they ſaw no ſufficient reaſon why ſo many Swiſſers ſhould be brought into France; except it were to oppreſs them and many other honeſt families which embraced the reformed religion; but they ſhould find more that had devoted themſelves to that religion, than commonly was thought of, an experience whereof they had in the late wars. They told them alſo, that if their adverſaries attempted any innovations, they would not be wanting to themſelves, nor like ſheep would ſuffer their throats to be cut by murderers. They therefore earneſtly entreat and beſeech the king's majeſty, that he would be moved to pity ſo many honeſt families, and the afflicted condition of his country, and of the common people who ſuffer much in ſuch wars. But they could get nothing at court but ſcoffs and ſcorns, whereby they perceived their lives to be in great danger, which cauſed them to withdraw, and to conſult about the preſervation of themſelves and the reformed churches: and hereunto they were earneſtly ſolicited by many of the nobility, and by multitudes of honeſt citizens, who complained that they could no longer bear the manifold injuries wherewith they were daily oppreſſed by the magiſtrates in every place.

Theſe things being ſo, the prince of Conde and the admiral, knowing of how great authority the king's name was through all France, which cauſed the Guiſes in the former wars to get him into their power; communicating their counſels but with a few, they reſolved to go privately to the court, to ſee if by any means they could get the king away from the Guiſes and queen mother, that ſo by removing him from his evil counſellors, they might the better eſtabliſh peace; but being betrayed by one of their ſociety, this deſign was wholly fruſtrated, whereby they were forced openly to prepare for war.

The prince with five hundred horſe went to St Denis, where ſome others arriving, in few days after made up the number of two thouſand horſe, and four thouſand ſhot; and the prince conſidering, that the Pariſians were not accuſtomed to faſt, hoped, that if he could take the victuals from them, he ſhould either force them to fight, or draw his enemies to a more aſſured peace: whereupon he ſent Andelot with five hundred horſe to Poiſſy and Pontois, to ſeize upon the paſſages of the Seine beneath Paris, and other troops to ſeize upon ſuch paſſages as were above the town. Some others he ſent to join with the forces that were coming out of Guienne, himſelf and the admiral with about eight hundred horſe, and a thouſand two hundred harquebuſhiers kept St Denis, to curb Paris on that ſide. But the conſtable, who was the king's lieutenant general, hearing, that the prince had thus divided his forces, iſſued out of Paris, with about a thouſand ſix hundred foot, and two thouſand lances, and well furniſhed with artillery, and having choſen a commodious place for the battle, the next day he gives the prince battle, wherein the conſtable was wounded, of which he died within a few days after.

In this battle the admiral had wonderful experience of God's goodneſs in his preſervation: for riding upon a very fierce and head ſtrong horſe, the curb of his bridle being broken, his horſe ran away with him, and carried him twice through his enemies army, yet did not the admiral receive any one wound, though many piſtols were diſcharged at him; but when as his horſe had one bullet ſhot into him, he ſuffered himſelf to be eaſily reduced into his own troop.

In this battle many fell on both ſides, eſpecially on the prince of Conde's, yet was the king's army routed and driven into Paris, whereupon the prince and admiral thought beſt to retreat into Lorrain, to meet thoſe horſe which were ſent for their aſſiſtance from divers of the German princes; for they again thought fit to oppoſe foreigners againſt foreigners.

In their march thitherwards, they were eagerly purſued by their adverſaries, eſpecially by Henry duke of Anjoy, the king's brother, afterwards king, firſt of Poland then of France, who taking all advantages to preſs upon their rear, put them to many inconveniencies.

When they came into Lorrain and met the Germans, who were commanded by Duke Caſſimire, the ſon of the Elector Palatine, they met with new troubles, for the Germans began to mutiny for their arrears, and to cry gelt, gelt, according to their uſual cuſtom; but how to ſatisfy them, or to raiſe the leaſt part of that money, the prince and admiral knew not; yet in this ſtrait our admiral found out this remedy; he adviſed, that a certain tax ſhould be impoſed upon every man in their own army, according to the rank and place which he held; and for example, himſelf diſburſed five hundred crowns; and the treaſurers going through all the regiments, collected the tribute; beſides whatſoever monies the prince, admiral, Andelot, or others had, was all put into the treaſurer's hands; ſo that in all, they collected eighty thouſand pounds, which was given to the Lanſknets, by which prudent advice of our admiral, they were extricated out of that great ſtrait.

Theſe forces being thus united, their adverſaries haſtily retired, and by long journies returned to Paris, which the duke of Anjoy looked upon as a great diſhonour to him.

But the prince of Conde's army being much encouraged hereby, went preſently and beſieged Caen, and having battered the walls, and made a ſufficient breach, juſt as Monſieur Andelot was ready with his brigade to have given the aſſault, the king's trumpeters came upon the ſpur and proclaimed, that peace was concluded, for the effecting whereof, commiſſioners had been ſent from both parties a few days before to Paris, whereupon the ſiege was raiſed, and the prince of Conde diſmiſſed his army.

But ſome days before this, word was brought to the admiral, that his wife, who together with her children in the beginning of the war had betaken themſelves to Orleance, was taken with a violent diſeaſe; whereupon he preſently poſted to Orleance, and ſending for the beſt phyſician he could get, he performed the office of a dear and loving huſband to her, yet it pleaſed God that ſhe died. This was a very great affliction to him, and when many of his friends came to comfort him, being overwhelmed with ſighs and tears, he ſaid, 'Oh my God, wherein have I ſinned and offended thee, that thou correcteſt me ſo bitterly, and loadeſt me with ſo many calamities! O that I could live more holily, and be more exemplary in my life than I have been! moſt holy Father, look upon me with the eyes of tender mercy, and eaſe me of theſe preſſures.

Then being comforted by his friends, he commanded his children to be called to him, and told them, that by this loſs of their dear mother, they might ſee the inſtability of all earthly comforts, and that there was nothing here below which they could confide in; and that houſes and caſtles, though never ſo ſtrong, were not given them for habitations, but as inns; and that therefore they ought not to truſt in any of theſe frail and fading things, but only in the mercy and goodneſs of God, and then they need not doubt but that they ſhould find him always ready at hand for their comfort; and ſo two days after, calling Monſieur Grelleus his ſon's tutor, he told him, that he muſt needs return back to the camp, where he knew not what might befall him, and therefore he required him to have a ſpecial care of his ſons, and as he had often requeſted him, to be careful to bring them up in true religion and the fear of God, as well as to inſtruct them in other arts and learning. His wife had been always very ſtudious of the reformed religion, of an admirable courage and conſtancy in bearing the manifold afflictions which befel ſel both herſelf and huſband; and amongſt her other excellent qualities and virtues, ſhe was always very pitiful towards poor people and ſick perſons, to whom ſhe was very liberal in relieving and aſſiſting of them: and whereas many ſick and wounded ſoldiers were daily ſent from the camp to Orleance, ſhe frequently viſited them, ſo that the phyſicians judged her diſeaſe to proceed from the ſtench of them.

Peace being proclaimed (as is before ſpecified) in many places by the king's trumpeters, the admiral had ſcarce been three days at his own houſe, before letters and meſſengers came to him from many of his friends, ſignifying, that inſtead of peace, his enemies made great preparations for a more dangerous war; for they obſerved, that in every place ſuch proviſion of war was made, that if the prince of Conde himſelf, and the other aſſociates did not timely prevent it, they would be circumvented by their cruel enemies, before they were aware; and this they gathered from the garriſons put into Orleance, Altiſſiodore, Bleſa, and other cities ſurrendered unto them, as alſo by the adverſaries poſſeſſing themſelves of all the bridges and paſſes over the rivers, keeping the horſe together in the heart of France, and continuing two regiments near Paris, under a pretence of a guard for the king.

Our admiral finding theſe things to be true, thought it moſt for his ſafety to retire into Tantelian to his brother Andelot, and from thence he ſhortly after removed to Nuceria, a ſtrong city under the prince of Conde's government, whether formerly upon the like occaſion he had carried his wife and family.

In his paſſage thither, there fell out this memorable accident; near to the town of Molinius, there is a great lake in the paſſage to Altiſſiodore; when our admiral came near it, there was in his company an old man called Gripperius, that had been a great traveller by ſea, and one that loved the admiral very dearly; this man obſerving a black cloud coming towards them carried with a violent wind, he called to the admiral, deſiring him to gallop to the next town ſo faſt as he could, leſt he ſhould be oppreſſed with the violence of the ſtorm approaching; the admiral hearkening to his counſel, ſpurred on his horſe, but before he had paſſed the narrow paſſages of the lake, there ſuddenly came ſuch a violent tempeſt, accompanied with a whirlwind, that many horſes and men were quite overthrown, many were wounded with the great hailſtones, and almoſt quite ſlain; the wind took off the admiral's hat, which afterwards could never be found, and one of his followers loſt him his hat: but herein the great mercy of God did appear, that the admiral eſcaped unhurt by the hail, only one hailſtone hit and hurt him about the ankle: and had this ſtorm taken him and his company a little ſooner, whilſt they were upon the lake's bank, in all probability it had made an utter end of them.

The tempeſt being over, our admiral comforted his attendants, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, he ſaid, 'O almighty God, I thank thee, from whom I know this ſtorm proceeds, to warn us of the tempeſt of danger that is approaching, by which we ſhall be ſorly preſſed, but not oppreſſed.'

When they were met together at Nuceria, they ſent divers meſſengers with letters to the king, ſignifying that they had daily intelligence of the ſnares that were laid for their lives, and therefore they beſeeched his majeſty to ſpy his kingdom waſted already with two civil wars; and that he would not ruin his kingdom, but rather by his clemency and wiſdom quench that fire that is kindled by the Guiſes.

Our admiral alſo wrote to Margaret, daughter of king Francis, and now dutcheſs of Savoy, whom he believed to have great power with the queen mother, entreating her to improve all her authority and intereſt for the diverting of the ſtorm that was approaching to the ruin of her native country. But when he perceived that no arguments nor intreaty could prevail for peace, and underſtood that Tavannes, who was a little after made marſhal of the kingdom, was ſecretly drawing his forces toward Nuceria, thinking to compaſs them in, he adviſed the prince of Conde, that they ſhould preſently depart from thence, and make all the haſte that poſſibly they could to Rochel, which city by reaſon of their antient privileges, had never hitherto admitted of any garriſon.

By the way they were to paſs over the river Liger, and in their train there was the prince of Conde's wife, and ſix little children, whereof one was but a year old; and two days after followed the admiral's, and Monſieur Andelot's children, whom the admiral had ſent for to come to them; at which time this ſtrange providence fell out; when the prince of Conde thought to tranſport his company in two or three little ſhips privately over the river near unto Sancerra, it pleaſed God that a foard was found, whereby fifty horſemen that were of the prince's train rode over, and in the mean time the ladies, women and children were ferried over in boats, and no ſooner were they gotten all over, but, though the day was fair, the river ſuddenly roſe ſo high, that the inhabitants of Sancerra took notice of the wonderful providence of God, praying heartily for the ſafety and welfare of thoſe little ones who had eſcaped ſuch a danger.

The king hearing of this their going to Rochel, by the advice of his courtiers, preſently commanded all his horſe, eſpecially thoſe that were in the countries of Xantone and Poictiers, to haſten to Rochel. He ſent alſo his brother Henry, the duke of Anjou, to raiſe all the forces he could, and preſently to march thitherwards. In the mean time thoſe of the religion, who relying upon the king's promiſe and proclamation of peace, ſtayed in their own cities, were every where baſely murdered.

About this time Joan queen of Navarr, who inthe former troubles had kept her own houſe, abhorring ſuch abominable treachery and perfidiouſneſs after peace ſo often renewed, getting what forces ſhe could together, advanced with them to Rochel, carrying with her, her ſon Henry who after her death was king of Navarr, and her only daughter.

Theſe things being thus ſettled, the admiral drew ſome great guns out of Rochel, intending to beſiege Niort, and within a few days had it ſurrendred to him. Then he led his forces to Engoliſme, which ſtands upon an high and ſteep hill, having only one paſſage to it, and therefore the enemies had a little before ſtrongly fortified it, but the admiral planting his ordinance on that ſide where it was ſuitable, within a few days ſpace had it ſurrendered to him.

Preſently after the van of each army met at Jaſenullius, and fought together, the admiral commanded that of the proteſtants; who charged the enemy ſo gallantly, that they were preſently broken and ſcattered, flying to Luſinian for ſafety, leaving all their bag and baggage behind them, ſo that the booty which the admiral gat, was eſtimated to be more worth than fifty thouſand crowns. Two days after they intercepted letters from Fizius, the king's ſecretary, to the queen mother, much bewailing that loſe.

Preſently after the admiral going to the town of Jarnac, fell into great danger, and without a ſpecial providence had become a prey to his enemies. For the enemy underſtanding that he purpoſed to tranſport his forces over the river in that place by a bridge of boats, they ſecretly laid an ambuſh on the other ſide, and obſerving the admiral where he was, they let fly all their harquebuſhes at him, and others endeavoured to break the bridge; of the admiral's ſide there was one Harquebuſhier that had often ſhot at the enemies, and at laſt was by a bullet ſlain, whereupon twelve more ran to his aid, ſo that a tumult ariſing, the admiral ran with his naked ſword, not having time to put on his arms, and endeavoured to cut in ſunder the cords wherewith the boats were faſtened; all which time the enemies ceaſed not continually to ſhoot at him, yet God wonderfully preſerved him; and from that time forwards he reſolved never to be without a life-guard for his aſſiſtance in ſuch ſudden accidents.

Two days after, the enemies having paſſed over the river Charenton, the prince of Conde feared leſt they would compaſs him about, having lately joined to them three thouſand German horſe, and ſix thouſand Swiſſers, yet being of a very reſolute and courageous mind, he reſolved to ſtop their courſe, yet withal, if poſſible, to avoid a ſet battle. In the mean time word was brought to the admiral, that ſome of his forces which were quartered in a neighbour village, were circumvented by their enemies, and yet valiantly defended themſelves; our admiral haſtened therefore upon the ſpur to their ſuccour with ſome horſe, whom as ſoon as the enemies eſpied, they compaſſed round about, which being told to the prince of Conde, being more valiant than adviſed, he brake into the midſt of them, where being oppreſſed with the multitude, and his horſe killed under him, which alſo fell upon him, he lifting up his beaver, rendered himſelf to ſome of the king's captains, who gave him their faith for his ſafety; but preſently after came Montiſquius, captain of the duke of Guiſe his guard, not without the ſecret command of his maſter (as it was believed) and ſetting upon Conde behind his back, as he was talking with the captains, diſpatched him with a dagg ſhot into his neck. He was a prince inferior to none that lived in that age for courage and courteſy; he was eloquent in ſpeech, liberal, affable to all, and a moſt excellent commander in war. After his death his body was baſely abuſed, and at the laſt in ſcorn laid upon a ſhee aſs, and carried to Jernac.

The admiral being exceeding grieved with this great loſs, and ſuſpecting the iſſue, made a retreat, together with his brother Andelot, into the town of St. Jan de Angeli; and whereas he might have revenged the indignities done to the body of the prince, by ſhewing the like to the bodies of many of his great adverſaries whom he had ſlain, yet he would not do it, but afforded them decent burial, which thing he alſo did during all the time of the wars.

The queen of Navarr being at Rochell, and hearing of this great loſs, haſtend to the camp, comforted the captains, and exhorted all the ſoldiers not to be diſheartned, nor to forget the former valour, telling them that ſhe had brought her only ſon Henry, that was to ſucceed her in the kingdom, to be their general, profeſſing that ſhe preferred the ſafety of the army before the life of her ſon. To him was alſo Henry prince of Conde, brother to Lewis that was lately ſlain, adjoined in this honour; but the whole care for managing the war, by the joint conſent of all the commanders and officers, was wholly divolved upon the admiral, none having the like credit or authority amongſt thoſe of the religion as he: for it was well known, that, beſides his ſingular ſkill in military affairs, his juſtice and temprance, there was none amongſt all the peers of France that had ſo openly embraced and profeſſed the religion as he. He was the firſt that reformed his family according to the rule of God's word: He was the man that preſumed to prefer their petition to king Francis the ſecond, that was nearly allied to the Guiſes by affinity. He gave the firſt example to the nobility of France of piety, who were grown extreme looſe by reaſon of the diſſoluteneſs of the court; and after he had once embraced the reformed religion, he never gave the leaſt occaſion of ſcandal to the churches. And whereas many delegates repaired often to him from the churches, he always gave them wholſome and prudent counſel. He firſt took up arms, not to fight againſt the king, as ſome miſreported, but at the requeſt and prayers of the queen mother; neither yet did he it, either by his own private counſel or of the queen mother, but by the authority of the parliament of Orleance, the king being not yet twelve years old; as alſo after the king's edict for peace, eſtabliſhed and promulgated by the advice and conſent of all the ſtates of France, becauſe it was ſo notoriouſly violated by the Guiſes, to the utter undoing of many honeſt families, and almoſt the ruin of many flouriſhing cities, and to the great loſe of the lives of many famous captains, to the prejudice of the whole kingdom, and to the oppreſſion of many flouriſhing churches diſperſed almoſt in every town of France. By all which the poor kingdom was laid open to be a prey to any foreign prince that ſhould invade it.

After theſe things a grievous affliction befel the admiral by the death of his brother Andelot, who in the city of Xantone died of a violent diſeaſe ſuddenly, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon; and the rather, becauſe it was an uſual ſaying of Biraguus, ſhortly after made chancellor, that the war was not to be finiſhed with ſo much hazard by armed men, but rather by cooks and kitchin boys.

Upon this occaſion the admiral wrote a letter to his own and his brother Andelot's ſons, who were with their tutor at Rochel, for comforting of them, the tenor whereof was this.

'Although I belive, that the death of my brother Andelot is very grievous unto you, yet I thought fit to admoniſh you, that you have great cauſe to rejoice that you had ſo good a father and uncle, of whom I dare affirm, that he was truly religious and eminent for his valour and ſkill in military affairs, the remembrance of which virtues ought to be dear unto you, that as much as may be, you may be imitators of them; yea, I believe I may boldly affirm this of him, that there is none in all France more ſkilful in warlike affairs than was he; and I doubt not but even foreign nations will ſubſcribe to the truth hereof, eſpecially thoſe which have had experience of his virtues; and this credit he got to himſelf, not by idleneſs and ſlaggiſhneſs, but by undergoing the greateſt labours for his country's ſake; truly, I knew no man that was more devout to God ward, nor more juſt to men than he. Neither am I ignorant that it were unfit for me thus to boaſt of him to ſtrangers; but I mention them more freely to you, becauſe I would have you to be imitators of his virtues; for I even propoſe him for my own imitation; and I pray God from my heart, that when I come to die, I may with the like piety and aſſurance reſign up my ſpirit to God, as I ſaw him do; and that my grief for him may be the more extenuated, I earneſtly deſire, that I may ſee his graces and virtues to live in you; which that it may be ſo, I exhort you with all your hearts to embrace piety and true religion, and wholly to apply yourſelves to your Books, that thereby you may (through God's grace) be led the way of virtue; and though I willingly allow you to recreate yourſelves in thoſe hours which your maſter allots you, yet I charge you, take heed that in your play you neither ſpeak nor do any thing whereby you may offend God; be very careful to reverence your maſter, and obey him no otherwiſe than you would obey me; for I am perſuaded, that he would give you no other counſel than what may be for your honour and profit. In ſhort, ſee that you love me, or rather that you love yourſelves, ſo that I may hear nothing of you but what I may rejoice in; and as you grow in years and body, ſo you may grow in piety and virtue. The Lord bleſs you all, and the holy Spirit preſerve you for ever. From Xantone, May 18. 1569. Caſtellonius.

The courage and magnanimity of our admiral did exceedingly appear in this; for that, though he had loſt ſuch a brother as was ſecond to none in piety, juſtice, virtue, and the glory of his military actions, inſomuch that the admiral called him his right arm; and yet he told his friends often, that he wholly relied on the divine providence, and knew aſſuredly that the church of God was not adminiſtered by human counſels, nor this Chriſtian army led by the providence and valour of its commanders, but by God. And ſpeaking concerning his brother to his friends, he brake out into this expreſſion, 'O bleſſed Andelot, who haſt finiſhed the courſe of thy life ſo holily and happily!'

About this time news were brought him that Wolfgang duke of Bipont, had brought a ſtrong army out of Germany into France, for the aid of the proteſtants, and that he had already paſſed the Loir, and had taken Charity where was a bridge over that river; and when he understood that they were advanced as far as Chalons, he intended to join his forces with them: and that very day on which he came to them, duke Wolfgang died of a violent diſeaſe, whereupon the German army unanimouſly choſe Wolradus, count Mansfield, to be their general. This conjunction of theirs exceedingly troubled their adverſaries, and every one deemed that the king's army would not be able to ſtand before them, but that the courtiers would hereby be brought to ſtoop to them. Yet all good patriots that ſtudied the public peace, did abominate the perfidious authors of theſe wars, publicly ſaying that God never ſuffered ſuch perjury to eſcape long unpuniſhed; and it was verily believed, that if the admiral had led this gallant army ſtraight to Paris, many great cities would willingly have yielded and put themſelves into the admiral's protection; which opinion was much confirmed hereby, for that the duke of Anjou pitching his tents near to them, and adventuring a battle, he was eaſily overthrown, moſt of his foot being either ſlain or taken, together with their commander in chief, Stroſſius, couſin german to the queen mother.

The admiral having ſo brave an army, hoping that now at laſt the king's heart would be inclined to peace, he ſent an humble ſupplication to him (the duke of Anjou not ſuffering him to ſend ambaſſadors) in his own and the army's name, intreating and beſeeching him no longer to harden his heart, but to pity the afflicted condition of the common people, and alſo to conſider, that if the war ſhould be protracted, it would turn to the great prejudice of all the ſtates of France; there being twenty thouſand auxiliary ſoldiers of both parts: and that things were brought to this paſs, that by theſe civil wars mens minds were ſo far from union and love to their country, that every one ſought the blood, ruin, and deſtruction of each other. They therefore humbly intreated, that he would ſpare his poor ſubjects that had ſo long groaned under theſe heavy preſſures, and that he would no longer be led away by the cardinals and Italians, who had too much power over him, and could not have the like fellow-feeling of the miſeries of France as the French men themſelves.

They ſuggeſted alſo, that this was now the fitteſt time for a treaty, when both parties were ſo confident of their own ſtrength; and that the conditions which he and his army would propoſe were very eaſy, viz. That they might enjoy that peace and liberty for the exerciſe of their religion, which was often confirmed to them by the decrees of all the ſtates, and by the king's own proclamations: That it was extreme madneſs in thoſe Italians and ſtrangers to think that thoſe of the religion, whereof they were at leaſt two hundred thouſand men, could ſo eaſily be rooted out, the truth whereof the experience of the former wars might eaſily demonſtrate.

The duke of Anjou having received that diſgrace which we ſpake of before, by the advice of his council, diſmiſſed a great part of his army, eſpecially of his horſe, for a month or two, bidding them go home and refreſh their bodies.

Things ſtanding thus, the admiral called a council, wherein it was determined, That ſeeing Rochel, and divers other maritime cities and places, were wholly in the power of the proteſtants, that therefore they ſhould take care for the fortifying of them, and then ſhould attempt the taking in of the city of Poictiers, which would be as a bulwark to all that country; but to this there ſeemed a main impediment, which was, the taking in of the caſtle of Lodunac, the ſtrongeſt piece in all France; yet, after they had beſieged it a few days, it was ſurrendered to them; and ſo alſo was Caſtelheraut about the ſame time. Then they proceeded to beſiege and batter Poictiers; but within a few days, the admiral, being quite tired with watching and labours, fell ſick of a flux, which held him ſo violently for thirty days together, that he could neither viſit them with his councils nor preſence; ſo that by this means the city was relieved with much proviſion, and three hundred freſh ſoldiers, which encouraged them to make divers ſallies. The king alſo wrote to them to hold out, promiſing ſpeedy aid, which animated them valiantly to defend themſelves: but it was evident, that if the Lord had not laid that affliction upon the admiral, the city had been theirs.

About this time there was one of the admiral's ſervants called Dominicus Albio, who having been taken priſoner by the king's party, and ſtayed ſome months with them, returned to his maſter, where, after a while, he was ſuſpected, by reaſon of ſome words that fell from him; and therefore being ſtrictly examined, he brought forth a box of poiſon, which one Riverius, a chief man about the duke of Anjou, had given him, together with one of his ſecretaries, both of them promiſing him two thouſand crowns, if he would poiſon his maſter. Upon this his confeſſion he was condemned to death; and though ſome would have had him tormented, yet the admiral cauſed him only to be hanged, for the terror of others.

The admiral being not yet fully recovered of his diſeaſe, news were brought him that Caſtelheraut, being about ſeven miles off, was beſieged by the enemy; whereupon, in his horſe-litter, he preſently advanced thitherward, and having relieved the place with freſh men, he eaſily raiſed the ſiege, and drave away his enemies, killed many, eſpecially of the Italians; neither gave he over the purſuit till they had paſſed the river, which for the depth of it is called Creuſa.

In the mean time, the young duke of Guiſe, who was governor of Poictiers, in the night time removed out of the city with a great company, putting a freſh garriſon into it; and the duke of Anjou having recruited his army with many French, Germans, and Swiſſers, came to Chinon; whereas the admiral's army was tired out with the long ſiege of Poictiers, and much waſted with want of proviſion, and with great tempeſts; and of thoſe which remained there were very many ſick, eſpecially of the Germans, and moſt of thoſe of Xantone were gone home to refreſh themſelves. Many alſo were gone to La Charity and Sancere, which were in the proteſtants hands; for which cauſes the admiral thought it beſt to protract time, reſtrained the eager minds of his ſoldiers from fighting: yet both captains and common ſoldiers would not be ſatisfied, threatening to go home and provide for their own ſafety, if he would not fight. They alſo judged it far more fit to fight there in their own country, where they might be ſupplied with neceſſaries, than in their enemies; eſpecially conſidering that they had divers ſtrong towns in Aquitain, the Delphinate, and Liege, into which they might retreat, and from whence they might make excurſions for the depopulating of their enemy's countries. The Germans alſo cried out, that having wanted their pay for divers months, it were better for them to fight, than to be ſo long from their own country and relations.

Thus it being reſolved that they ſhould come to a battle, both armies advanced to Moncontour ſtriving which ſhould poſſeſs the place; and the van being led by the admiral, was ſuddenly ſet upon by the enemy; the admiral ſeeking for his armour-bearer could not find him, yet unarmed as he was, he ruſhed into the midſt of his enemies, count Mansfield ſeconded him, ſo that they forced them to give ground. Hard by there was a rivulet which the enemies contended earneſtly to paſs over; whereupon the admiral taking ſome harquebuſhiers with him, haſtened to the river's bank to oppoſe them, where he continued all that evening. In the mean time the enemy continually ſhot at him, both with great and ſmall ſhot, who if they could have gotten the paſſage, might have brought great detriment to the army; for the enemies exceeded the proteſtant army by a third part, beſides they were freſh and in good plight, the other were weary and harraſſed out; but this helped them only for two days ſpace, for on the third day ſix hundred Germans ſet upon the admiral, who had only two hundred French horſe with him, and in the fight, the admiral being often ſhot at, at laſt received a wound on his face, by the right ſide of his noſe, the bullet piercing into his mouth, which wound bled ſo faſt that he could not ſpit out the blood: his ſword alſo by many blows fell out of his hand, and the bucklers of his breaſt-plate were ſo broken that it hung by very little: but in this extremity, by the aſſiſtance and faithful help of one Plorinerius, a young Norman, whom he had brought up from a child in his family, he was reſcued and conveyed out of the crowd, and his forces being overthrown, he was by his friends conveyed to Parthenæus. Here we might wonder at his conſtancy and magnanimity; for whereas, in this great calamity, moſt men gave way to deſpondency, he laboured to comfort and confirm each of them. He alſo cauſed his ſecretaries preſently to write into all the parts of France to the proteſtants that were in arms, not to be diſcouraged, or to think that he had received ſo great a blow which might not be repaired within a few days.

The very next day he removed to Niort, where, having ſettled his affairs, he went into Xantone, and there ſtayed ſeven days for the cure of his wound, which could not be be perfectly healed in leſs than twenty-five days ſpace.

Being thus toſſed up and down with various afflictions word was brought him that the parliament of Paris, September 13. 1569. had made a decree, wherein they had declared him guilty of treaſon, and had propoſed a reward of fifty thouſand crowns to any one that would bring him alive to the king. At the ſame time he had intelligence, that one Martinengus, an Italian, baniſhed his own country for treaſon, being made by the king commander of ſome troops of horſe, had been at Caſtellion, and ſurprized his caſtle, and plundered it of all his rich furniture, which for divers ages had remained there, the value whereof was not leſs worth than one hundred thouſand crowns; beſides, he had ſo burned the whole town adjoining to the caſtle, that there was ſcarce any footſteps remaining of it; which ſad tidings were ſo far from cauſing any dejectedneſs in him, or diſſitting him for his employments, that he did not ſo much as ſhew the leaſt change in his countenance: and when his friends and kindred flocked to him to comfort him, he told them, That, through God's grace, he had this frame of ſpirit given him, that for thoſe things which are uſually called goods, he poſſeſſed them, and not they him; and that his fortunes were ſubjected to him, not he to them. And whereas, in thoſe civil wars, princes, peers, nobles, knights, horſemen and footmen, had large allowances from the king, whereby they maintained themſelves, he, on the contrary, was always careful to diſcharge his quarters, both for himſelf and family, whereby he contracted great debts, taking up money upon uſe to enable him to it; yea, he pawned his very wife's jewels, bracelets, rings, and other rich furniture, thereby to furniſh himſelf with money; by which means he did ſo weaken his eſtate, that in the end of this third civil war, he was forced, in a council of the princes, to move for ſome allowance wherewith to maintain his family.

About this time he wrote another letter to his ſons, and the ſons of his brother Andelot, who were ſtill at Rochel, under the ſame tutor, the tenor whereof was this;

"Truly it would be very grateful unto me if I had opportunity to ſee you, and to ſpeak face to face; but ſeeing I am deprived of that happineſs, I thought fit, by this epiſtle, to admoniſh you always to ſet piety and the fear of God before your faces, eſpecially at this time, when you find by experience, that there is no truſting to thoſe things which are called goods: our hope muſt be placed elſewhere than in this world, and other things muſt be ſought after than thoſe which we ſee with our eyes, and handle with our hands: but becauſe to do that is not in our own powers, we muſt earneſtly pray unto God, that he would lead us in that way which is moſt ſure and ſafe; neither yet muſt you expect that that way will prove pleaſant and delicate, and abounding with worldly felicity, for Chriſt himſelf, who hath gone before us, and is our captain and enſign bearer, muſt be imitated by us. Men indeed have deſpoiled us of thoſe things which are fading and tranſitory; but if we be willing and careful to ſubmit to the will of God, we ſhall be happy, and it ſhall be well with us at the laſt; for thoſe men have wronged you, not for any injury you ever did them, but out of a hatred againſt me, which alſo proceeds from hence, becauſe the Lord is pleaſed to honour me, by being an inſtrument of aſſiſting his afflicted church; and therefore, if for this cauſe we ſuffer loſs and inconveniencies, we have no reaſon to grieve for it, but rather to aſſure ourſelves that he will give us ſuch a reward as men ſhall not be able to take from us.

"I have many other things to write to you of, if I had leiſure; but for the preſent I have ſaid enough, if I may admoniſh and requeſt you for God's ſake, that you go on valiantly in the ſtudy of virtue, and that in all your words and actions, you ſhew an abhorrency of all vices; be obedient to your maſter, and your other governors, that though I ſeldom ſee you, yet I may hear that you increaſe in piety and good manners.

"To conclude, I pray, if it be the will of God, that whatſoever further befals us, either in our eſtates or perſons, we may have it ſanctified to us for our ſpiritual good: And I heartily pray to God, that he will be a refuge and help unto you, and a defence in this your minority. Fare you well. From Xantone, Oct. 16. 1568. Caſtellonius."

The admiral, and all the commanders of his army, having often conſulted about their future proceedings, reſolved to ſtrengthen all their garriſons, and ſo, with their light-horſe, to go into Tholouſe, where they of the religion held Montalban, a place very ſtrong both by nature and art, who alſo had gotten together a good ſum of money for paying the German auxiliaries; beſides, they hoped by paſſing over the two rivers of Garone and Lotters, to join to themſelves thoſe forces which were under the command of Montgomery, a man of great authority by reaſon of his ſkill and experience in military affairs, who alſo had lately, by the aſſiſtance of his forces, quieted Berne, that belonged to the prince of Navarr.

This journey, by reaſon of the roughneſs of the way, proved very difficult and painful, eſpecially conſidering that the enemies had garriſoned all the cities, and broken down all the bridges where they were to paſs; yet, at length, with much difficulty, they came to Montalban, from whence the admiral ſent to the king and queen mother, in his own, and in the names of all that were with him, humbly entreating them, that they would not ſuffer ſo many valiant and gallant men as were in both armies, mutually to ſhed the blood of each other, but that rather, out of their clemency, they would put an end to thoſe miſchiefs; that the contrary was the counſel of ſome cardinals and biſhops, that never came into the field to try the miſeries of war, or elſe of certain Italians that rejoiced in the ruins of France; and that it was extreme madneſs to ſuppoſe that two hundred thouſand proteſtants, to whom ſo many of the nobility had joined themſelves, could ſo eaſily be ſuppreſſed and deſtroyed. Beſides alſo, it could not be, but in thoſe wars many papiſts muſt be great ſufferers as well as the proteſtants; ſome in their perſons, and others in their eſtates and families. That the ſpeeches of the courtiers were unworthy the king's majeſty, who uſed commonly to ſay, That the king would not ſpare his popiſh ſubjects, ſo that he might deſtroy his adverſaries; for it was the voice of a tyrant, not of a king, to ſay, Pereant amici, dum una inimici intereidant. 'Let my friends periſh, whilſt mine enemies fall together with them.' That the conditions of peace were only viz. That the decrees made by the ſtates of Orleance, and the edicts of Paris, might be renewed and eſtabliſhed, whereby the proteſtants were allowed certain places for public worſhip.

Theſe meſſengers being diſpatched away, they preſently reſolved to paſs the river Garonna, which was between theirs and Montgomery's forces, but the paſſage ſeemed very difficult, by reaſon of the breadth, depth, and ſwiftneſs of the river; whereupon the admiral reſolved to take in the town of Marian, which ſtands upon the river's bank, which he alſo did, and Montgomery coming to the other bank, the admiral intended to make a bridge, which alſo, with admirable art and induſtry he affected, and ſo in two days ſpace, paſſed the German horſe over it. But the night after, a ſhip coming ſwiftly along the ſtream, brake down the bridge, ſo that they were forced to make a new one of boats, whereby Montgomery's army came over ſafe to them, and the German horſe alſo, which brought up his rear; and ſo having ſtaid there two days for the refreſhing of his men, he led his army to Tholouſe, and took in all the neighbouring towns, either by ſtorm or ſurrender, though he had only two great guns in his train, which he brought with him from Montalban. And the proteſtant army was the more incenſed againſt them of Tholouſe, becauſe (ſay they) they have been violent to burn them of our religion: they beheaded captain Rapin, who carried them the edict of peace from the king; they have alſo committed many other inſolencies which now cry for vengeance, and God hath put an opportunity into our hands, which we muſt not neglect, &c.

Having diſpatched theſe things, he reſolved to march to Vivaret, and to the bank of Rhodanus, and underſtanding that ſome were up in arms for him in the Delphinate, who alſo had taken ſome towns, he ſent part of his forces to them, to aſſiſt them in taking in ſome cities of greater conſequence, committing the government of them to count Lodwick of Naſſaw, who arriving in the Delphi-

nate, ſtruck ſuch a terror into the inhabitants, as cauſed them to fly into the cities; but he, having no guns for battery, only waſted the enemy's country, and ſo with honour returned within a few days to the admiral.

Shortly after the admiral, worn out with cares, watchings, and inceſſant labours, fell ſick; and though he was greatly afflicted with his diſeaſe, yet conceiving that was of great concernment for him to get to the river Liger, he made no ſtay, but in his horſe-litter marched with his army thitherward; for he was informed that about La Charity and Sancerra, there were about two hundred riſen in arms for him, whom he thought to be of great concernment to adjoin to his army, the rather becauſe Coſſeus, marſhal of the kingdom, after the battle in Xantone, by the king made general of the army, in the room of the duke of Anjou, as he underſtood, advanced with his army that way, and began to approach near him. And whereas there came a trumpet from him to the admiral, about exchange of priſoners, the admiral ſent him word by his trumpet, that he ſhould not need to be at ſo much pains to ſeek him, for that he himſelf was haſting towards him, ſo faſt as he could.

When he was advanced ſo far as the forreſt, behold new ambaſſadors met him from the king about a peace; for when the courtiers heard that the admiral, whom they thought to be utterly broken by his former overthrow, had in ſo ſhort a time gotten ſo gallant an army together again, they were extremely terrified, leſt he ſhould march directly towards Paris, and there ſhould plunder and deſtroy the brave country houſes of the courtiers, ſenators, and rich citizens of Paris, the like whereunto they had heard that the ſenators and citizens of Tholouſe had already felt.

The admiral by his march (though in his horſe litter) had his diſeaſe much encreaſed upon him, and the phyſicians gave their judgment, that if he continued ſtill to be preſſed with ſo great cares, and multiplicity of buſineſſes, he could not hold out long, whereupon the treaty with the king's ambaſſadors broke off for a time; but ſome nobles that were weary of the wars, complained, that there was no reaſon that the treaty ſhould ceaſe, becauſe the admiral could not be preſent at it, affirming, that though he ſhould die, yet there were men of honour and intereſt enough that could carry on the treaty, to the eſtabliſhing of peace. The ambaſſadors anſwered them, We wonder that you do not conſider of how great authority the admiral is amongſt you, who if he ſhould die to day, we would not offer to any of you to-morrow ſo much as a cup of cold water. What! do you not yet know, that the only name of the admiral can prevail more for you, than a great army without him?

Within a few days, the admiral being refreſhed, and in a good meaſure recovered, the treaty began again, and at laſt it was concluded, That certain commiſſioners ſhould go along with the king's ambaſſadors, to ſignify to his majeſty, in the name of them all, That they of the religion deſired nothing more than peace, neither was any thing more grievous to them than war; yet was there none of them but would undergo greater miſeries, yea, and death itſelf, rather than to deny the truth which they had embraced: That if the king pleaſed to grant them peace, and the exerciſe of their religion, upon the former conditions, and to put ſome cautionary towns into their power, for their ſecurity, they would willingly, and for ever, lay down their arms.

Theſe meſſengers being diſpatched, the admiral advanced forward, and in his way took in the town of Reneducium, to which ſome of the vantcurriers of Coſſæus were come, and from that day forwards there was no day paſſed without ſome ſkirmiſhes between the two armies; and one day the minds of the ſoldiers on both parts were ſo far inflamed, that it had near come to a general battle, there being only a little brook between the two armies, Monſieur Mongomery having already broken the firſt battle of the adverſaries, wherein were Valetius and Vaſco, men of great authority amongſt the royaliſts: but preſently came new meſſengers from the king, deſiring a ceſſation from arms till the treaty was finiſhed; and, after great debate, an edict was ſent from the king, by which certain places were allotted to the proteſtants, for the exerciſe of their religion in, for the performance whereof they had for two years four cautionary towns put into their hands, viz. Rochel, Montalban, Cognac, and Charity. And the king's proclamations hereof were ſent all over the kingdom; and ſo an end was put to the third civil war.

The admiral bringing the German forces to the borders of their country, diſmiſſed them courteouſly, and ſo taking the two young princes of Navarr and Conde, he went with them to Rochel, where the queen of Navarr was, purpoſing to ſtay there, till the peace was fully ſettled in every place. And, after a few months, truſting to the king's promiſes, and to the oaths of the king's brethren and parliaments, having been tired out with ſo many and great labours, he betook himſelf to reſt; and at the entreaties and perſuaſions of his friends, inclined to diſpoſe of himſelf again in marriage, the rather becauſe he was earneſtly ſolicited thereto by the kindred of Jacoba Monbella, who was daughter of count Intermontanus, of whoſe modeſty, piety, and holy life he had heard much formerly. She therefore being brought honourably to him to Rochel, he ſolemnly married her; and not long after he diſpoſed his own daughter Ludovica in marriage to Monſieur Teligni, a young man of great nobility and virtue. Of all the nobility in France none ſeemed more acceptable and dearer to the king than this Teligni, by reaſon of his admirable ingenuity; and therefore being much about the king, it was he that did afterwards perſuade the admiral of the great eſteem and hearty good will of the king towards him.

But God quickly mixed ſorrow with the joy of theſe marriages, news being brought about that time, of the death of Odet Coligni, cardinal of Chattillion, who had been ſome time in the court of England, as the procurator for the cauſe of the proteſtants with queen Elizabeth, who much favoured him for the amplitude of his family, and the opinion of his virtue and integrity. But the proteſtants affairs being compoſed in France, his brother Gaſpar ſent for him. Whereupon, coming to Queen Elizabeth, he obtained leave for his departure; but being taken with a ſudden diſeaſe, he died Feb. 14. 1571. not without the ſuſpicion of poiſon, and was buried at Canterbury, being about fifty years old. He was a man of rare courage, candour, and faithfulneſs, of a ſharp judgment, ſo that few were to be compared with him in managing great affairs. Guillin his chamberlain poiſoned him with an apple, at the inſtigation of the queen-mother, as he confeſſed at the time of his death, when afterwards he was taken as a ſpy at Rochel, for which he was hanged.

But all this while the duke of Anjou was a great enemy to the proteſtants, and boaſted every where of his victories againſt them, yet the king did what he could to perſuade the king of Navarr and the admiral, of his great good will towards them, that they might be induced the more to confide in him. Notwithſtanding which the Papiſts in ſome places made ſlaughter of the Proteſtants. As in Orenge, whither all the inhabitants returned, who had been driven away in the time of the late wars, the popiſh ſoldiers made an aſſault upon them, and ſlew them without regard of age or ſex. Alſo in Roan, and other places they were ſlain in great numbers by the popiſh rabble. Whereupon the queen of Navarr, the princes and other proteſtant nobles ſent to the king to complain of the violation of the edict, and to require ſatisfaction for the ſame. The king entertained them kindly, proteſted that theſe things were done to his great grief, and that he would ſo puniſh the authors of theſe miſchiefs, as ſhould be for the terror of others.

Not long after, viz. Anno Chriſti. 1571. the king wrote very flattering letters to the admiral, giving him very honourable terms, inviting him to his court at Bleſa, entreating him that he would be an inſtrument of concluding a marriage between Henry prince of Navarr, and his ſiſter Margaret: and to prevail the more with him, he ſent him word by his meſſengers, that no furer way could be found out for eſtabliſhing the public peace of the kingdom, and for uniting all ſorts of perſons, than by this marriage.

And the better to delude him, the Guiſes ſeemed to be every day to leſs welcome to him than any other, and Monmorency (the admiral's ſiſters ſon) was uſed very familiarly by the king, who often proteſted to him his good will towards the admiral; communicated to him the counſels of his greateſt affairs, for the managing whereof he told him, that he had need of the admiral for to be his captain and miniſter. The queen mother alſo, according to her manner, proteſted that ſhe liked nothing better than that a certain peace ſhould be confirmed upon equal conditions, the memory of former matters being blotted out.

By theſe means the admiral was drawn to the court, where he was entertained extraordinary lovingly, even beyond expectation; ſo that when he fell down on his knees to do reverence, the king took him up, calling him his father, ſaying often and openly, that a more deſired day never ſhone upon him than that, wherein he ſaw an end put to the war, and a firm peace ſettled in the whole kingdom by his preſence; adding with a ſmiling countenance, 'Now we have you with us, you ſhall never depart from our ſide hereafter.'

He was entertained with the ſame ſerenity of countenance by the queen-mother, the duke of Anjou, but eſpecially by the duke of Alanſon, who much favoured him. The king alſo ſeconded his words with deeds, cauſing one hundred thouſand crowns to be paid him out of his treaſury for his private loſſes in the laſt wars; he gave him alſo his revenues of the cardinal his brother, which were very great, for one year, and alſo the furniture and houſhold ſtuff of the ſaid cardinal.

A few days after the admiral's return from the court, the young duke of Guiſe, by the inſtigation of the cardinal of Lorraine, his uncle, would have put in a new complaint againſt the admiral for the death of his father, but the king interpoſing his authority, drew up a form of agreement which he made both of them ſet their ſeals to, and to take their oaths for the keeping of it; notwithſtanding which, the duke of Guiſe ſhortly after entered Paris, accompanied with many armed men, which the admiral hearing of, being then at his houſe at Caſtellion, he moved the king by his ſon in law monſieur Teligni, that he might have leave to keep a ſmall guard for his own ſafety: whereupon the king wrote to him with his own hand, and ſent his letter by Bricmald, a man of great eſteem for his virtue; the tenor whereof was this.

'That it was moſt acceptable to him, that the admiral ſhould be exceeding cautious and careful of his own ſafety and therefore he gave him power to fortify his caſtle, and to raiſe as great a guard as he pleaſed, deſiring him to be confident without doubting of his good will towards him; and that he would be as careful of his ſafety, as a father of his child's.' Theſe letters with many ſuch expreſſions of love being written with the king's own hand, many read with great delight, and were now throughly perſuaded that they ought no longer to doubt of the king's good will and ſincere affection to the admiral.

Hereupon count Lodwick of Naſſaw (whom we mentioned before) thinking this a fit time (and being ſecretly invited to the court) moved the king in the name of his brother the prince of Orange, for aſſiſtance; telling him that there were many cities in the low countries, that being oppreſſed and tired out with the luſt, covetouſneſs, and cruelty of the Spaniards, would willingly ſurrender themſelves unto his hands; and after a few days ſpent in debate about this buſineſs, the king faithfully promiſed count Lodwick, that very ſhortly he would ſend a great army under the command of the admiral thither; and it was further agreed on betwixt them, that if they ſucceeded in that war, the king of France ſhould have all the country from Antwerp to Picardy, and that the prince of Orange ſhould have Holland, Zeland and Friſland.

About this very time letters, were intercepted and ſent to the admiral, written from the cardinal Pelcus to the cardinal of Lorrain to this purpoſe.

That the king was never better affected than now; and therefore becauſe of his good affections, together with the queen mother's, and the duke of Anjou's, he hoped there would be a good iſſue of thoſe affairs which were reſolved on in the private council; that the king at the admiral's coming to court, had carried himſelf more politicly than they could have expected; whereupon the king believed that he had taken away all ſuſpicion from the admiral, and had left him no occaſion of doubting of his love and good will towards him, which Lorrain knew to be the baſis, by their joint conſent, upon which their future proceedings did depend. That ſome ſpeech was indeed raiſed about warring upon the king of Spain, which the king made ſuch uſe of, that the admiral thence collected arguments of his greater good will towards him. That they muſt uſe ſuch artifices whilſt they expected an opportunity to effect what was reſolved on. That the king of Spain was throughly acquainted with all theſe proceedings, that ſo he might ſuſpect nothing by reaſon of theſe great preparations which were made for war; for he was aſſured that this was done upon good grounds, as ſubſervient to the principal end That therefore he deſired the cardinal that whatſoever he had heard, or ſhould hear hereafter, yet he ſhould aſſure himſelf, that the king would never depart from his firſt purpoſe, and that whatſoever he did, did but conduce to haſten the end of their counſels, and that both the king, queen-mother, and duke of Anjou, were all very ſollicitous for this thing, and that as ſoon as ever the buſineſs ſhould be effected, they would inſtantly ſend away meſſengers to acquaint Lorraine with it. And as for the buſineſs of the prince of Navarr's marriage, they hoped that it would quickly be effected, for this was to begin all their future deſigns, &c.

He that ſent theſe letters to the admiral, hoped that he would have been warned by them to look to himſelf and his affairs, but he had ſuch a ſtrong confidence of the king's love and good will towards him, which alſo was daily nouriſhed in him by his ſon-in law Teligni, that he which was moſt provident and ſharp ſighted in all other buſineſs, was fatally blind in this.

In the beginning of May 1571. the king deſired the queen of Navarr to go to Paris, to provide all things neceſſary for the marriage, where ſhe arrived the fifteenth day of the ſame month: and the fourth day of June ſhe fell ſick of a fever, whereof ſhe died five days after, to the extreme grief and ſorrow of all her ſervants and friends. Two days before her death, being in perfect memory, ſhe made a moſt Chriſtian teſtament and laſt will, finiſhing her courſe with ſingular piety and joy in God.

She was a princeſs of great experience by reaſon of her manifold adverſities, in all which ſhe ſhewed an invincible conſtancy, and heroical greatneſs of courage, moſt affectionate to her religion, very careful of the education of her children, training them up in the fear of God. In her words moſt grave and full of motherly affections to them. She had a ready and well adviſed wit, was pitiful and eaſy to be entreated, conſtantly maintained that which ſhe judged to be good, and agreeable to the will and good pleaſure of God. She had a great vivacity of ſpirit, whereby ſhe was able to comprehend all her affairs, and had a lively grace in repreſenting them, either by word or writing. She died Jan 9. 1572. and of her age 44.

It was believed that ſhe was poiſoned by the ſmell of certain perfumes; the doctors and chirurgeons which opened her, were commanded not to open her brain where the miſchief lay, and therefore could not determine about the cauſe of her death.

The admiral in this time, was at his houſe at Caſtillion, where he received many letters and meſſages from the king to come to him; and becauſe he ſtirred not, the king ſent Cavagnes and Briquemand to fetch him, that they might come to a concluſion about the wars in Flanders; and ſpecial commandment was given to the provoſt of merchants and other chief men, that at the admiral's coming to Paris, there ſhould be no affronts done him.

About the ſame time the admiral had many adverti-ſements from his friends, both within and without the realm: that though he could not conceive any ſiniſter opinion of the king, his mother, or brother, that yet at leaſt he would conſider into what place he was about to truſt himſelf, among ſo many implacable enemies. But he, reſting upon the teſtimony of a good conſcience, and the providence of God, rejected all thoſe counſels as proceeding from men's covetouſneſs, or deſire of new troubles which he abhorred worſe than death; and therefore taking a ſmall train with him, he went to Paris, and was very honourably entertained by the king, queen mother, the king's brethren and others, to the great aſtoniſhment of the whole city.

At the admiral's coming to Paris, among other letters that were brought to him, there was one that gave him theſe warnings. Remember the Popiſh maxim, confirmed by the authority of councils, 'That faith is not to be kept with heretics,' in which number the proteſtants are accounted. Remember the implacable ſpirits of the Papiſts at this time, irritated by the laſt wars. There is no doubt but it is the fixed purpoſe of the queen mother to deſtroy the proteſtants by any means whatſoever. Conſider that ſhe is an Italian, of a moſt crafty wit, born of the progeny of popes, who contrives all extreme things againſt her enemies. Remember in what ſchool the king hath been brought up from his childhood; how he hath been taught to ſwear and forſwear: to pollute himſelf with whoredoms and adulteries: to compoſe his countenance: to counterfit faith and religion: how he hath been accuſtomed to cruelty and blood ſhed: how he hath been taught not to ſuffer above one religion in his kingdom: how it hath been whiſpered into his ears, that the proteſtants ſeek to diſpoil him of his life and kingdom: that he is not bound to keep covenants made with armed ſubjects: that he is taught the myſteries of ſtate policy. Remember that Commodus cauſed Julianus to be ſlain, whom he pretended to honour and embrace as a father. That Antoninus Caracalla under the pretence of a maſſer, cauſed all the chief youths of the city to be ſlain. That Lyſander, under the pretence of friendſhip, commanded the throats of four hundred Mileſians to be cut. That lady Antonius Spinola invited all the chief men of Corſica to a banquet, where they were all ſlain. That Chriſtian king of Denmark, uſed the ſame art to commit that horrid maſſacre at Stockholme, &c.

That the king's ſpeech to his mother at Blois was no ſmall, when ſwearing fearfully, he aſked her whether he had not carried himſelf well at the coming of the queen of Navarr? to whom ſhe anſwered, that he had begun well, but that would profit little, unleſs he went on; But I (ſaith he ſwearing often) 'will bring them all into the net.' Wherefore if you be wiſe, haſte both out of the court and city with all ſpeed, as out of a moſt impure ſink.

The admiral having read this letter, though he were diſſuaded, yet leaſt he ſhould ſeem to neglect the prayers, and warnings of his friends, he returned this anſwer; that there was no place left any longer for theſe ſuſpicions; that he was verily perſuaded, that ſo great perfidiouſneſs could not enter the heart of a good king; that indeed the duke of Anjoy was more eſtranged from the Proteſtants; but that hatred would by degrees ceaſe by reaſon of the affinity contracted with the king of Navarr: that the king had entred into a league with the queen of England, and endeavoured to do the ſame with the Proteſtant princes in Germany, which ſufficiently ſhews how he ſtands affected to the Proteſtants. Moreover, that faith was given to the prince of Orange, and to Adolph earl of Naſſau his brother to aid them againſt the Spaniards. That the king's embaſſadors did daily ſearch into the counſels of the duke de Alva, and acquainted the king therewith, as the king daily informed him; that the army under Stroſſius at Brouage, is rigged for no other end but to diſturb the Spaniſh fleet, and to aſſiſt the prince of Orange. That for himſelf they need not fear, the king having made friendſhip betwixt the Guiſes and him, faith being mutually that neither ſhould injure other. To conclude, that the king doth all he can to have peace at home and war abroad: and to tranſlate it into the low countries againſt the Spaniards; wherefore he prayeth his friends, not to trouble his mind any more with ſuſpicions, which is now buſied with weightier matters, and to join with him in prayer to God, that he would bring thoſe things to a good iſſue, which are well begun for his glory, and the good both of church and kingdom.

A little before, Count Lodwick with ſome others, had commiſſions from the king to ſurprize ſome frontier town in Flanders. On the other ſide the duke de Alva had intelligence of every ſtep that Count Lodwick took, yet ſuch was his diligence, that he ſurprized Monts in Henault, wherewith the duke was ſo netled, that he ſaid, the queen mother had ſent him the flowers of Florence, but he would for them return her Spaniſh thiſtles; but upon ſome farther intelligence he was ſoon pacified.

Many lords and gentlemen of the religion, accompanied the king of Navarr and prince of Conde to Paris, and the king drew many of them thither, who otherwiſe would have kept their houſes under pretence of his wars in Flanders.

Count Lodwick was preſently beſieged in Monts by de Alva, whereupon the king gave commiſſion to Monſieur Jealis, to raiſe horſe and foot for his ſuccour; but de Alva being acquainted with all his proceedings, ſurprized him, which the king ſeemed to be much grieved at, and preſently wrote to his embaſſadors in the low countries to procure the deliverance of the priſoners. He alſo encouraged the admiral to ſend all the help he could to the Rutters, whom the prince of Orange had levied for the relief of his brother, cauſing monies to be delivered to him for their pay.

The embaſſadors of Spain alſo ſeemed to be very malecontent, becauſe the king began war in Flanders; and the king's mother played her part in this tragedy, pretending, that ſhe knew nothing of the king's proceedings, and now ſhe did know them, ſhe would leave the court. Theſe juglings were carried ſo handſomly, that the admiral, Teligni his ſon-in-law, and other lords were confidently perſuaded, that the king was wholly guided by the admiral's advice.

July, the laſt, the Rochelers wrote to the admiral, that the king's army approached near them, that from Xantone and Gaſcoine, it daily waſted the country about them, uſing terrible threatnings againſt their town, and menacing to plunder it; whereupon they intreated his advice, eſpecially about receiving eight hundred men, which they ſought to put as a garriſon into the town. The admiral made them an honourable anſwer, Auguſt 7. aſſuring them of the care he had over them, adding, that he found the king ſo well diſpoſed for peace, that all men had cauſe to commend him. Yet the Rochelers neglected not to look to themſelves and to fortify their town. In other towns many were the threats of the papiſts againſt the Proteſtants, which much terrified ſome: others relied upon the admiral's preſence and favour at court; and to ſuch as ſuggeſted doubts to him, he ſaid, that the king had reconciled the differences betwixt the Guiſes and him, cauſing both parties to ſwear friendſhip. That the king gave his ſiſter in marriage, not ſo much to the king of Navarr, as to the whole church of the Proteſtants to join with them thereby in an inviolable union, and therefore he beſought all of them, that either by writing, or words adviſed him of the hatred of the king, queen mother, the duke of Anjoy, or the houſe of Guiſe, no more to trouble him with thoſe things, but rather to commend all in their daily prayers to God, and to give him thanks who of his infinite mercy had brought things to ſo good an end.

Auguſt 17. Henry, king of Navarr, and the Lady Margaret of France, ſiſter to the king, in the evening were conducted to the Louvre, and the next day were married by the cardinal of Bourbon, in the ſight of all the people upon a great ſcaffold made before the gate of the great church in Paris, which day was paſſed over in Banquets, dances and maſks; and that very day the admiral wrote a Letter to his wife great with child in this tenor.

MOST DEAR AND DESIRED WIFE,

"This day was celebrated the marriage between the king of Navarr and the king's ſiſter, and theſe three or four enſuing days will be ſpent in feaſtings, maſkings and dancings. The king hath promiſed me, that after a few days he will ſet a time apart to hear the complaints which are brought from ſeveral parts of the kingdom for violating the edict of peace; for the proſecution whereof, its very neceſſary that I ſhould improve all my intereſt with the king: for, though I have an earneſt deſire to ſee thee, yet it would be grievous to me, and I ſuppoſe to thee alſo, if I ſhould be any ways deficient in a buſineſs of ſo great concernconcerment; neither will my ſtay here about it be ſuch, but that I hope to come to thee this next week. If I ſhould only reſpect my own content, it would be much more pleaſing to me to be with thee, than to ſtay any longer at court, for ſundry reaſons which I may hereafter impart to thee; but I muſt have more reſpect to the public good than either to my own pleaſure or profit. I have ſome other things to impart to thee ſo ſoon as God ſhall bring us together, which I much long for both day and night. All that I have for the preſent to write to thee is only thus much; at four o'clock this afternoon was celebrated the maſs for the marriage, during which time the king of Navarr walked without the church, with ſome other noblemen of our religion. Some other matters of ſmaller concerment I ſhall reſerve till we have an opportunity to ſpeak together; in the mean time, (moſt dear and loving wife), I pray for thee, that God will protect and keep thee; farewel. Auguſt 18. 1572."

"Three days ſince I was much tormented with the ſtone and cholic but through God's mercy, they held me not above eight or ten hours, and now by the ſame mercy I am wholly freed from them. I promiſe thee, that in theſe great feaſts and paſtimes I will trouble none. Once again, farewel. Thy moſt loving huſband, Chattillion".

About the ſame time, their counſels for the maſſacre being not yet ripened, the king with the greateſt demonſtrations of good will that might be, thus accoſts the admiral; "My father, remember what you have undertaken to me, that you will be injurious to none of the Guiſes whilſt you are in the court, they alſo have interchangeably given their faith, that they will carry themſelves honourably and modeſtly towards you. And truly I put as great truſt as may be in your words, but I have not the ſame confidence in their promiſes. For, beſides that, I know that the Guiſes ſeek occaſion of revenge, I know their diſpoſition to be bold and haughty, and with what great favour and affection the people of Paris do follow them. It would be a great grief to me, if they who have brought into the city many men of war notably furniſhed with arms, under colour of coming to the marriage ſolemnity, ſhould go about any thing for your deſtruction, which would extremely reflect upon me; and therefore I think it fit, if you be of the ſame mind, to bring a regiment of Prætorian ſoldiers into the city, under the command of ſuch men, (meaning ſome that were leaſt ſuſpected) who may not only be ready for the public ſecurity, but upon all emergencies, if turbulent ſpirits ſhould attempt any thing againſt you." This friendly ſpeech ſo prevailed with the admiral, that he gave his conſent, and ſo a regiment was brought in without the ſuſpicion of the Proteſtants, which afterwards helped to cut their throats.

Five days after, as the admiral came from the court as he had been all that morning, accompanied with twelve or fifteen gentlemen, being on foot about an hundred paces from the Louure, walking ſoftly, and reading a petition, juſt over againſt the houſe of one Villemure, a canon and tutor to the young duke of Guiſe, one ſhot with an harquebuſh at him through a lattice window, the gun was loaded with three braſs bullets, one whereof brake the fore finger of his right hand, the other two pierced his left arm; he that ſhot it had a horſe ready at the back door, whereon being mounted, he eſcaped through St Anthony's gate, where, finding the Spaniſh Jennet held ready for him, he poſted away to the place appointed for his retreat. The door of the houſe being burſt open, the harquebuſh was found with a laquey, and another ſervant who belonged to Challey the ſteward of the king's houſe, and a great dealer in the duke of Guiſe's affairs, who alſo the day before had brought this harquibuſhier to that houſe, deſiring that he might be well entertained. The laquey alſo was ſent that morning by this harquebuſhier whoſe name was Maurevel, to the duke of Guiſe's groom of his ſtable, requiring that the horſe ſhould be ready that was promiſed him.

The admiral being brought to his lodging, ſhewed ſingular piety and patience; Chirurgeons were ſent for, and among the reſt, Ambroſe Pareus, the king's chirurgeon, who began firſt with his finger which he cut off, but his pinchers not being keen, he opened and preſſed them three times before he could cut it off. Then he lanced both thoſe places in his arm which the bullets had pierced; all which the admiral bore, not only with a courageous heart, but with a conſtant countenance, inſomuch as ſeeing his friends to weep which held his arm whilſt the inciſions were made, he ſaid unto them, 'My friends, why do ye weep? I judge my ſelf happy that bear theſe wounds for the cauſe of my God.' And withal looking upon monſieur Merlin his miniſter, he ſaid, 'theſe wounds my friends, are God's bleſſings, the ſmart indeed of them is troubleſome, but I acknowledge the will of my Lord God therein, and I bleſs his Majeſty who hath been thus pleaſed to honour me, and to lay any pain upon me for his holy name's ſake; let us beg of him that he will enable me to perſevere unto the end.'

And ſeeing monſieur Merlin to weep and lament, he ſaid to him, 'my Merlin, you ſhould rather comfort me:' to whom he anſwered, indeed there can be no greater comfort than to think upon the honour which God hath done you, in judging you worthy for his name and religion's ſake to ſuffer theſe pains. My Merlin, anſwered the admiral, 'If God ſhould have dealt with me according to my deſerts, or have uſed his power over me, he muſt have dealt far more ſeverely with me; but bleſſed be his name, who hath dealt ſo mildly and lovingly with me his unworthy ſervant.'

Then ſaid another that ſtood by, go on with this your piety, for God ought to be prailed by you who hath left the greateſt part ſafe and untouched, for which cauſe you have greater reaſon to admire his mercy in theſe wounds, than to complain of his juſtice, eſpecially conſidering that neither your head nor your mind are wounded. Then ſaid Merlin, you do very well, Sir, that you turn your thoughts from theſe murderers to God, for truly it was his hand that inflicted theſe wounds, neither ought you at all to think upon the bloody mindedneſs of your adverſaries. Truly, ſaid the admiral, 'I freely and from my heart forgive both him that ſhot at me, and theſe alſo that ſet him on. For I know aſſuredly that it is not in their power to hurt me, no though they ſhould kill me, for my death is a moſt certain paſſage to eternal life.' The ſame words he ſhortly after ſpake to marſhal Danvill who he came to viſit him.

And whereas monſieur Merlin told him that the afflictions and calamities which happen to God's children ule to quicken them more in prayer: the admiral thereupon with an audible voice and fervent ſoul, poured out this prayer unto God.

'O Lord God, and my heavenly Father, have mercy upon me for thy tender mercies ſake; remember not againſt me my former iniquities, neither charge me with the ſins of my youth. If thou Lord ſhouldſt ſtrictly mark what is done amiſs, or ſhouldſt impute to us our breach of covenant, what fleſh could ſtand before thee, or endure thine anger? as for me, diſclaiming all falſe gods and worſhip, I only call upon thee the eternal Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and worſhip thee alone; for Chriſt his ſake, I beſeech thee to beſtow thy holy ſpirit upon me, and give me the grace of patience. I only truſt in thy mercies, all my hope and confidence is placed on thee alone, whether thou pleaſeſt to inflict preſent death on me or to ſpare my life to do thee further ſervice. Behold Lord, I am prepared to ſubmit to thy will in either, nothing doubting, but if thou pleaſeſt to inflict death upon me, thou wilt preſently admit me into thine everlaſting kingdom. But if, Lord thou ſuffereſt me to live longer here, grant, O moſt heavenly Father, that I may ſpend all the remainder of my days in advancing thy glory, and in obſerving and ſticking cloſe to thy true religion.' Amen.

His prayer being ended, Monſieur Merlin asked him if he pleaſed that they alſo ſhould go to prayer with him: yea, ſaid he, with all my heart; and whilſt Merlin was praying, the admiral with his eyes fixed upon heaven joined with great devotion. And after prayer, when Merlin minded him of the example of the antient martyrs, telling him that there was not any man from the beginning of the world, that laid out all his labour and intereſt for God and his true religion, but that he met with manifold afflicafflictions; the admiral interrupted him, ſaying, 'I am refreſhed and confirmed with this ſpeech, and the examples of the holy fathers and martyrs do much comfort me, and mitigate my pain.

Preſently after the two marſhals of the kingdom, Monſieur de Coſſe and Danvil came to viſit him, telling him that they were extremely grieved for his miſhap, and that nothing could have happned more bitter to them; yet withal, ſay they, we judge it equal and agreeable to your former valour to recollect and ſhew yourſelf a man, for your virtue hath given you far more than this ill chance can take from you. Then the admiral turning to de Coſſe, ſaid, do you not remember, Sir, what I told you of late? truly ſo much attends you alſo. But ſaid Danvil, my admiral, I purpoſe neither to comfort you, nor exhort you to courage and conſtancy, for yourſelf is the man from whom ſuch conſolations and exhortations uſe to proceed, only I requeſt you to conſider wherein I may be ſerviceable unto you; I wonder from whence this miſchief did proceed! then ſaid the admiral, truly I can ſuſpect none but the duke of Guiſe, yet dare I not affirm that it was he; however, through God's mercy, I have learned neither to fear mine enemies, nor death itſelf, which I am ſure can do me no hurt, but may forward my eternal peace and happineſs: for I know that my God in whom I have put all my confidence, can neither deceive nor lie unto me. Only herein I am ſorrowful, for that by this accident I am diſabled to ſhew the king how much I could have done for his ſervice (meaning in the war of Flanders;) would to God I had an opportunity to ſpeak with his majeſty, for I have ſome things to impart to him, which much concern his intereſt, and I believe there is none that dare tell it him but myſelf.

In the mean time the king of Navarr, and the prince of Conde complained grievouſly of this vile and treacherous fact to the king, curſing and ſwearing grievouſly, called God to witneſs, that he would ſo ſeverly puniſh this wickedneſs towards the admiral, that he would leave the example to all future ages to take heed of ſuch villany; and thereupon the lacquy and woman that were found in the houſe, were apprehended and caſt into priſon.

At two o'clock in the afternoon, the king hearing of the admiral's deſire to ſpeak with him, went to him accompanied with the queen mother, his two brethren, the duke of Montpenſier, the cardinal of Bourbon, marſhall Danvill, Tavanne, de Coſſe, &c. When the king came firſt into the admirals chamber, he cauſed all his ſervants go forth, except Monſieur Teligni, his wife, and Merlin; then going to the bed's ſide, the admiral ſaid to him, I humbly thank you, Sir, that you have been pleaſed to put your ſelf to ſo much trouble for my ſake. Then did the king with flattering words congratulate his valiant mind, and bad him be of good courage, and hope well of the iſſue. To whom the admiral replied.

'Sir, there are three things wherewith I was deſirous to acquaint your majeſty; Firſt, to profeſs my fidelity and obedience to your majeſty; and I pray God ſo to be merciful unto me, before whoſe throne I may be brought ſhortly to appear by theſe my wounds, as I was always ſtudious and careful of your honour and dignity. Neither yet am I ignorant how often mine adverſaries have calumniated me to your majeſty, and accuſed me for a diſturber of the public peace, but through God's mercy, though I ſhould hold my peace, yet my actions will ſufficiently clear me from this charge. Indeed this hath been the fountain of all theſe calamities, becauſe I reſiſted their fury, and impudency; and becauſe I aſſerted the authority of your edicts againſt their turbulent and violent proceedings; neither could I endure to ſuffer them ſo often to violate thoſe edicts confirmed by your oaths to your ſubjects. God is witneſs of the ſincerity of my mind herein, who alſo only knows the difference between me and my adverſaries, and will righteouſly judge the ſame. Furthermore alſo conſidering the great honours and offices conferred upon me by your father, and grandfather, and confirmed by yourſelf; I ſhould be ungrateful and unfaithful if I ſhould not humbly requeſt your majeſty to provide a remedy againſt all thoſe maladies and perturbations which already diſturb the peace of your kingdom. And now to proceed to the buſineſs of Flanders, never any of your predeceſſors had the like opportunity of getting honour to yourſelf. You know that many cities in the low countries deſire your favour, and to throw themſelves into your protection. This occaſion I perceive is in your court laught and ſcoffed at, and through the default of ſome few men, the opportunity is like to be overſlipt. Thoſe forces which were lately led by Genliſſe thitherward, were circumvented, and deſtroyed by de Alva; you know what a great number of catholics were in that army; of what religion then I pray you are thoſe that make a jeſt at the ſlaughter of ſo many of their country men, and of their own religion? There is ſcarce any ſecret word ſpoken in your privy council, but preſently the duke de Alva knows of it. I pray you, Sir, what good can we expect when thoſe that ſit in your privy council, and ſhould aſſiſt your majeſty and your brethren, do betray your moſt ſecret counſels to your public and profeſſed enemies? I beſeech you, Sir, that you take care of a buſineſs of ſuch concernment as this is, yea, again and again I entreat it of you. And laſtly, I beg with the like earneſtneſs, that you will not ſuffer your edict of pacification to be ſo ordinarly broken. You know how often you have ſworn to keep it: you know that foreign nations, and all your neighbour princes have taken notice of it. What an unworthy thing is it, Sir, that an oath ſo ſolemnly ſworn, ſhould be ſo much ſlighted and neglected? do you think that foreign princes will hereafter make any account of your oath? But the other day in Champaigne, as the nurſe carried a child home from baptiſm, and from a ſermon which was held in a place by your authority, certain ſeditious perſons lying in wait by the way, baſely murdered the nurſe infant, and ſome other of the company with it. Conſider I pray you, how great the wickedneſs was, and how hodourable, yea, how glorious it will be to your name not to ſuffer ſuch cruelty to eſcape with impunity.'

Unto this ſpeech of the admiral the king returned this anſwer; That he had never called his loyalty into queſtion; that he reputed him a good common-wealths man, and a valiant and excellent captain, before whom he preferred no man in his kingdom. And, ſaid he, if I had any other opinion of you, I had never done as I have heretofore. About the Flemiſh buſineſs he anſwered never a word. But for the third thing he anſwered, that he liked nothing better than that his edicts for pacification ſhould be holily and inviolably obſerved, for which end he had ſent his deputies into all the provinces of his kingdom; for the confirmation whereof he called the queen-mother to witneſs, who turning to the admiral, ſaid, my admiral, there is nothing more true, commiſſaries and deputies are ſent unto all parts; yea, forſooth, ſaid the admiral, 'of thoſe men who have impoſed fifty thouſand crowns as the price of my head.

Then ſaid the king, my admiral, there is danger leſt your earneſtneſs may hinder your health, it is better that you take your reſt; the harm hath befallen you, but the diſhonour reflects upon me; but I ſwear by God's death, that I will ſo ſeverely puniſh this wicked deed, that the memory thereof ſhall continue to all poſterities: the woman and lacquy that were found in the houſe we have committed to ſafe cuſtody, whom further do you require to be examined, or whom would you have to exerciſe judgment? To this the admiral anſwered, I leave this buſineſs to your wiſdom and fidelity, yet becauſe you aſk my judgment, I humbly deſire that Cavannenes and Maſparrot may be employed therein, for I think that the author of this deed is not far off. The king and queen mother coming nearer to the admiral's pillow, ſpake a while ſoftly, and at laſt the queen mother ſaid, although I am but a woman, yet I perceive we muſt provide betimes.

The king at his departure adviſed the admiral to be tranſported into King's-caſtle, and the earl Rhetius preſſed the ſame divers times, ſaying, that he feared leſt ſuch a commotion ſhould be raiſed amongſt the common people of Paris, as the king with all his authority ſhould not be able to quell.

To this it was anſwered, that the phyſicians and chirurgeons would not allow of his removal, leſt the ſtirring of his body ſhould inflame his wounds; that if the king pleaſed to manifeſt his love and favour to the admiral, there was no more fear of the people of Paris, than of a com-company of women; that the authority of the king's name was ſo great in France, eſpecially in Paris, that were the common people never ſo mad and furious, yet the mention of that alone would eaſily ſuppreſs them.

Then did the king call for the brazen bullet wherewith the admiral was wounded, and asked him if he felt not very great pain when his finger and arm were cut? To which receiving an anſwer, he replied, that there could not be a more conſtant and valiant man found this day in the world; and ſo reſtoring the bullet, the queen-mother looking on it ſaid, I am glad that the bullet is got out, for I remember, that when the duke of Guiſe was ſhot in his camp, the phyſicians often told me, that though it were poiſoned, yet there was no danger when the bullet was out; but, ſaid a by-ſtander, madam, we reſted not upon that, but we gave the admiral phyſic to prevent the danger if there were any poiſon.

After the king's departure, came in John Ferrers, vidam of Chartres, who comforted the admiral with many words, concluding that the enemies had betrayed their great cowardlineſs, in that they durſt not encounter the admiral but through a grated window; but that the admiral was an happy man, who had lengthned out the praiſe of his virtue to ſo great an age, yea, ſaid the admiral, in this I account my ſelf happy, that the Lord hath been pleaſed to ſhew me mercy, for they are truly bleſſed 'whoſe ſins are forgiven, and whoſe tranſgreſſions are covered.'

The king of Navarr, prince of Conde, and ſome other chieftains of the proteſtants being preſent, they reſolved to go down into a lower chamber, to conſult what courſe to take for their preſent ſecurity. At this debate, Ferrers was very earneſt that they ſhould with all ſpeed depart out of Paris, aſſuring them, that this was the firſt act of a more dangerous tragedy that would ſuddenly enſue. Others on the contrary argued, that it was enough for the preſent to require juſtice of the king, deſiring that judgement might be ſpeedily executed; in this opinion Teligni ſtood ſtiff, affirming that he knew the kings mind throughly, and that they ought not to ſuſpect his faith and good will. Yet it was alledged again, that many ſeditious reports were ſcattered about; that many papiſts on the wedding day, when the proteſtants came out of the church, that they might not be preſent at maſs, ſpake publicly, that within a few days they ſhould hear maſs.

Alſo ſome of the chief citizens ſaid, that there ſhould be more blood than wine ſhed at that marriage. Alſo the preſident of the ſenate adviſed a nobleman of the proteſtants to go into the country with his family for a few days. Alſo John Monluc, biſhop of Valentia, when he was going ambaſſador into Poland, adviſed the earl of Rochfaucand, not to ſuffer himſelf to be blinded with the ſmoke of the court and its unuſual favours, which are deſervedly ſuſpected by wiſe and wary men; therefore, ſaid he, be not too ſecure, caſt not yourſelf into dangers, but withdraw yourſelf and other noblemen betimes out of the court. But theſe things could not be heard by reaſon of Monſieur Teligni's confidence.

In the mean time, the woman and lacquy, who were found in the houſe of Villemur, were examined by the preſident of the parliament. The woman confeſſed, that a few days before, Villerius Challius, a retainer to the Guiſes, brought a ſoldier to that houſe, commending him to her as if he had been the maſter of the houſe, but his name was concealed. The boy confeſſed, that he had ſerved this man a few days, who called himſelf one Bolland, and another while Bondol, and that he was ſent that morning to Challius to entreat him, that the horſe might be ready as he had promiſed. Hereupon Challius was ſent for, the more to delude the Proteſtants.

The king alſo wrote to the governors of the provinces, wherein he deteſted the wrong done to the admiral, and required them to do their endeavour, that all might underſtand how greatly it grieved him, and that he would moſt ſeverely puniſh it to the terror of all others.

The day after, ſome of the admiral's friends being certified, that many things were done tumultuouſly in the city, and that weapons were brought together in many places; they thought fit that counſel ſhould be taken betimes, for that no good could be expected from thoſe proceedings; hereupon, one was ſent to the king to certify him of the commotion of the people, and of their carrying of arms, and therefore to requeſt him to charge certain of his guard to ſtand before the admiral's door for his better ſecurity. The king ſeeming to be moved with this news, began to demand of the meſſenger, who had told it him? And whether the admiral knew of it? and withal he ſent for the queen-mother, who was ſcarce entred, when the king with a diſquiet mind, as he ſeemed, ſaid, What a miſchief? what is the matter? He tells me, that the common people are in a tumult, and take arms. She anſwered, They are not in any tumult, neither do they take arms; but you know, that early in the morning you commanded that all ſhould contain themſelves in their own quarters, leaſt any tumult might ariſe. That is true, ſaid the king, but I forbad them to take arms.

Then the meſſenger again requeſted, that he would ſend ſome of his guard to the admiral's lodging. The duke of Anjoy being by; ſaid, takeCoſſen to you with fifty harquibuſhiers; the other anſwered, we deſire only ſix of the king's guard, for their authority will prevail with the people than many armed men. Yea, quoth the king and the duke of Anjoy, take Coſſen's to you, for you cannot have a fitter man: which words were pronounced very imperiouſly. The meſſenger knowing Coſſen to be a great enemy to the admiral, yet held his peace; and not far from the king's chamber he met with Monſieur Thore, brother to Marſhal Monmorency, who whiſpering in his ear, ſaid, no greater enemy could be given us for our keeper; to whom the other anſwered, did you not obſerve how imperiouſly the king decreed it? But pray you remember what I anſwered to the king when he firſt commanded it.

A few hours after came Coſſen with his fifty harquibuſhiers to the admiral's houſe, and choſe two ſhops by to place his guard in. A little after Rambulet, the king's camp-maſter followed, who by the advice of the duke of Anjoy, commanded all the popiſh nobility, that lodged in that ſtreet to remove their quarters elſewhere, that he might diſpoſe of their lodgings to the friends and familiars of the admiral; than which no more crafty counſel could be deviſed for thoſe matters which afterwards fell out.

Towards evening this happened, which gave to many no ſmall occaſion of ſuſpicion; a boy by the command of Teligni, brought two hunting poles to the admiral's houſe; but Coſſen put him back, and would not ſuffer them to be carried in. This being told to the king of Navarr, who was now the admiral, he went down, and aſked Coſſen upon what confidence he did it? Coſſen anſwered, that he had done it at the command of the king; but, ſaid he, ſince you will have it ſo, let them be brought in. That day the king ſent to all the admiral's familiar friends, admoniſhing them to go near to the admiral's houſe, and take up all thoſe quarters.

But upon the former occurrences another council was called, under the admiral's lodging, wherein the Vidam of Chartes again urged his former opinion, that the admiral ſhould preſently be carried out of Paris, and that his friends ſhould go along with him: That every hour they obſerved many things that juſtly encreaſed their ſuſpicion; but were of the contrary opinion, viz. That they were only to require juſtice of the king, and to deſire that the Guiſes and their faction might be commanded out of the city, as being too powerful with the people of Paris; and of this opinion was the king of Navarr, the prince of Conde, and many others; and the rather becauſe Teligni urged that it would be a great injury to the king, if any ſhould call his faith and ſincerity into queſtion, and that it would be ſufficient if juſtice were meekly required of him. At this debate there was one Bucananus, a Pict, who never ſpake a word, he was a profeſſor indeed of the true religion, but very gracious with the queen-mother and very frequent with her familiars, who probably betrayed all to her.

About three o'clock in the night, there fell out another thing which encreaſed the ſuſpicion, for one carrying to the admiral's houſe the coats of mail of Teligni and Guercius, Coſſen turned him back again, which man complaining to Guercius, who was a ſtout and gallant man, he went to Coſſen, and ſharply taxed him for it, ſo that they had well nigh fallen to blows; but Teligni, who was of a meek and quiet ſpirit, with gentle words pacified them, himſelf being ſo deluded with the fair and flattering words of the king, that he never thought that he ſpake enough in his commendation.

In the mean time a council was held at court, where were preſent the king, queen mother, duke of Anjou, duke of Nevers, the baſtard of Angoliſme, Briage, Tavannes, and Radeſianus; and it was concluded, That ſeeing by the death of one, the miſchief diffuſed amongſt ſo many could not be extinguiſhed, therefore all ſhould be deſtroyed: and that the wrath which God would not have fulfilled with the blood of Coligne alone, ſhould be poured out againſt all the ſectaries: Therefore, ſay they, the bridle is to be let looſe to the common people, who are ſtirred up enough of themſelves; and when the buſineſs is accompliſhed, reaſons will not be wanting whereby the deed may be excuſed, the blame being laid upon the Guiſes, who will willingly undergo the ſame. So they all concluded that all the proteſtants were to be deſtroyed, even every mother's child of them.

Concerning the king of Navarr, and the prince of Conde, it was debated, Whether they were to be exempted from the number of the reſt: and it was alleged, that the king of Navarr was to be ſpared, becauſe of his royal dignity, and his affinity newly contracted; for it would be without all excuſe, if ſo great a prince, next to the king in blood, conjoined in freſh affinity, ſhould be ſlain in the king's caſtle, between the arms, as it were, of the king his brother-in law, and his wife's embraces. Concerning the prince of Conde, the contention was greater; he was much envied for his father's ſake, yet the dignity of his perſon, and the authority of the duke of Nevers, who became ſurety for him, prevailed that he ſhould be ſpared.

After this, the king calling the king of Navarr, told him, that by reaſon of the violence and boldneſs of the Guiſes, and the common people inclining to them, he would adviſe him to command thoſe of his houſhold, whom he knew moſt faithful to him, to come to him to the Louvre, to be at hand upon all occaſions. This the king of Navarr took in very good part, ſending for thoſe that were ſtout of hand to lodge about him.

Now it was obſerved, that armed men rambled up and down in the city every where, and about the Louvre alſo: that the common people grumbled, and gave forth threatning ſpeeches. The admiral being informed of theſe things, ſent one to the king to tell him of it. The king anſwered, That there was no cauſe why Coligni ſhould be afraid, for that theſe things were done by his command, to repreſs the motions of the people, who were ſtirred up by the Guiſes, and therefore bade him to be aſſured.

It was alſo told Coligni, that porters were ſeen carrying arms into the Louvre; but he ſlighted it, ſaying, that thoſe were unneceſſary ſuſpicions, the arms being carried for the winning of a caſtle in the Louvre, that was built for ſport.

Preſently the duke of Guiſe, to whom the charge was chiefly committed to ſee the buſineſs executed, calling together the captains of the popiſh Swiſſers, and the tribunes of the French bands, late in the night, he diſcovered to them what the will of the king was, that the hour was come, wherein, by the king's commandment, puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on the head, and, by conſequence, upon the whole faction of the rebels: That the beaſt was caught, and entangled in the net, and therefore they muſt uſe their endeavour that he might not eſcape. Be not afraid, ſaid he, wanting to ſo fit an occaſion of carrying home a moſt glorious triumph over the enemies of the Goſpel: The victory is eaſy, the ſpoils will be rich and great, which you may obtain as the rewards of your good ſervice, without ſhedding your own blood.

Then were the Swiſſers placed about the Louvre, unto whom certain bands of Frenchmen were added, and charge was given them that they ſhould ſuffer none of the king of Navarr's, nor of the prince of Conde's men, to come forth. Coſſen alſo was charged with his harquibuſhiers, to ſuffer none to come out of the admiral's houſe.

That evening Guercius, with ſome others, had proffered Teligni to keep guard in the admiral's houſe, ſuſpecting danger, but he told them, that there was no need for them to trouble themſelves; and ſo with gracious words diſmiſſed them: by which means it came to paſs that none lodged in the admiral's houſe but Cornaton, Labonnius, Yolett the maſter of his horſe, Merlin his chaplain, Paræus the king's chirurgeon, and ſome four or five ſervants. Teligni was gone to the next houſe, where he lay with his wife. In the admiral's court were the five Swiſſers, whom the king of Navarr had ſent him.

Then did the duke of Guiſe ſend for John Caronius, lately made proveſt of merchants, whom he commanded to ſignify to the aldermen, that they ſhould bid thoſe in their ſeveral wards, to appear in arms at the town-houſe, about midnight, to underſtand the king's pleaſure. He commanded alſo Macellus, who was very gracious with the people, to ſignify to them, that liberty was given them from the king to take arms to deſtroy Coligni, and all the other rebels; that therefore they ſhould ſee diligently that they ſpared none, nor ſuffered them any where to be concealed: That order ſhould be taken to do the like in all other cities of the kingdom, who would follow the example of Paris: That the ſign for the beginning the aſſault ſhould be the ringing of the little bell in the palace: That the ſign whereby they ſhould know one another, ſhould be a white handkerchief about their left arm, or a white croſs in their hats: That therefore they ſhould come armed in good numbers, and with good courages, taking care to have candles lighted in their windows, that no tumult might ariſe before the ſign was given. And thus the duke of Guiſe, and the baſtard of Engoliſme, did all they could that things might be effected according to the agreement.

At midnight, the queen-mother fearing the king's wavering, who was ſomewhat ſtartled at the horridneſs of the fact, reproved him for it, ſaying, that by his delays he would ſlip ſo fair an occaſion offered by God, for the utter vanquiſhing of his enemies. The king being nettled with this, which ſeemed to charge him with cowardlineſs, commanded the matter to be put in execution, which word the queen-mother ſpeedily taking hold of, cauſed the little bell to be rung in St Germanes-church, about an hour before day, Aug. 24. being St Bartholomew's day, and on a Sabbath.

Preſently the duke of Guiſe, with Engoliſme, and d'Aumal, went to the admiral's houſe, where Coſſen watched; and a noiſe being raiſed the admiral was awakened with it, and heard of a ſedition, yet reſted ſecure, relying upon the king's word and favour: but the tumult growing greater, when he perceived a gun to be diſcharged in his court, he then conjectured, though too late, that which was the truth; and ſo riſing out of his bed, and putting on his night-gown, he ſtood and prayed againſt the wall. Then came a ſervant to Labonius, and told him, that there was one at the door, who, by the command of the king, deſired to be brought to the admiral; Labonnius therefore taking the keys, ran down and opened the door, then did Coſſen catch at him, and ſtabbed him with his dagger, and ſo, with his harquebuſhiers, he ſet upon the reſt, killing ſome, and chaſing away others: Thus all things were filled with noiſe, and another door at the ſtair-foot was eaſily broke open, and one of the five Swiſſers, ſent by the king of Navarr, was ſlain; yet were the ſtairs ſo barricado'd with cheſts, that he could not preſently enter. In the mean time Monſieur Merlin went to prayer with the admiral, and the reſt; and, at the end thereof, a ſervant coming in, ſaid to the admiral, 'Maſter, it is God who calleth us to himſelf, they have broken into the houſe, neither is there any ability to reſiſt.' Then ſaid the admiral, 'I have prepared myſelf for death a good while ago; ſhift you for yourſelves, if poſſibly you can; for your endeavour to help me would be in vain. I commend myſelf into God's hands.' It was obſerved, that the admiral's countenance was no more troubled than if no danger were at hand.

Thuanus relates his words thus: I perceive what is in doing, I was never afraid of death, and I am ready to undergo it patiently, for which I have long ſince prepared myſelf: I bleſs God that I ſhall die in the Lord, through whoſe whoſe grace I am elected to an hope of everlaſting life. I now need no longer any help of man. You therefore, my friends, get ye hence ſo ſoon as you can, leſt ye be involved in my calamity, and your wives hereafter ſay, that I was the cauſe of your deſtruction. The preſence of God, to whoſe goodneſs I commend my ſoul, which will preſently fly out of my body, is abundantly ſufficient for me.' Then all his company gat up into an upper room, and crept out at a window upon the tiles, and, by the benefit of night, ſome eſcaped

By this time Coſſen, with ſome Swiſſers of the duke of Anjou's guard, had removed the cheſts, and were come up the ſtairs. One Beheme, a German, was the firſt that entered the chamber, who ſeeing the admiral ſitting there ſaid, Are not you the admiral? I am, quoth he; but you, young man, ſhould have regard to my hoary head and old age. But Beheme exchanging no more words, ſtruck him with his ſword and firſt embrued himſelf in the admiral's blood; then Coſſen, Atinius and the reſt, followed, and ſlew him with many wounds. This Atinius reported afterwards, that he never ſaw a man in ſo preſent a danger, to have born out death with ſo great a conſtancy.

Then did the duke of Guiſe from below, aſk if the buſineſs were done? anſwer was made, that it was: But, ſaid he, the duke of Engoliſme will not believe it, except he ſee him himſelf, therefore caſt down his body out at the window; with that they hurled it down headlong into the court, all defiled with gore blood; whereupon the baſtard of Engoliſme, wiping the blood from his face with his handkerchief, and thereby knowing him, kicked him in a ſcornful manner. Some ſay, it was the duke of Guiſe that did it. Then one of the duke of Never's ſervants cut off his head, and carried it to the king and queen mother, who cauſed it to be embalmed, and ſent it as a preſent to the pope, and the cardinal of Lorrain, to aſſure them of the death of their capital enemy.

The people fell upon his corps as mad men, one cuts off his hands, another his feet, another his privy-members; and, for three days ſpace, drag his poor carcaſe about the ſtreets, with all indignity. Then ſome boys would have thrown it into the river Seine, but others dragged it to the gallows at Mountfaucon, where they hung it up by the thighs, and the ſhoulders downwards: but within few days, Francis Monmorency, who had ſeaſonably withdrawn himſelf from the danger, cauſed ſome truſty perſons to take it down by night, and bury it in the chappel at Contilia.

This was the end of that brave man, who was the very firſt nobleman in all France, that durſt profeſs himſelf a proteſtant, and a helper of them.

He was marvellous zealous in performance of the exerciſe of religion: he uſed to riſe very early, and then putting on his night gown, and calling his ſervants about him, he went to prayer with them; then he ſet time apart to hear the deputies of the churches which were ſent to him, or for ſuch like public buſineſſes.

Each other day, in the forenoon, he had a ſermon preached before him, after which he returned to his buſineſs till dinner; which being ready, his ſervants came in, and there the admiral ſtanding by the table, and his wife by his ſide, one of David's pſalms were ſung, and a bleſſing craved upon the meat; which courſe he did not only obſerve at his own houſe, but every day in his camp, without intermiſſion. When the cloth was taken away, he preſently aroſe, and ſtanding, with his wife by him, either himſelf or his chaplain, returned thanks.

At ſupper-time the ſame was done, both with prayers and pſalms: And becauſe he found it difficult to get all his ſervants together at bed time, in regard of their various employments, he cauſed them all to come in preſently after ſupper, where, after a pſalm, he went to prayer with them.

By this his excellent example, very many of the French nobility were enduced and encouraged to uſe the ſame diſcipline in their families; the admiral often admoniſhing them, that if they would embrace godlineſs, in the life and power of it, it was not enough for the maſter of the family to hear ſermons, and to order his life in an holy and religious manner, unleſs, by his authority and example, he brought all his houſhold to join with him in the ſame.

When the time for receiving the Lord's ſupper approached, he uſed to call his friends, and all his family to him, and ſhewed them, that he muſt render an account to God for them, as well as for himſelf. If any diſcord was between them, he reconciled it. If any were ignorant, he took care that they ſhould be better inſtructed. If any were obſtinate, he plainly gave them notice, that it was better for them to remain at their own homes, than for him to maintain ſuch ungodly perſons in his retinue.

He always eſteemed the careful education of children in good ſchools a ſingular benefit of God, and he called it the ſeminary of the church, ſaying that ignorance of good letters was the cauſe of error both in church and ſtate; and that popery crept in, and was kept in by that means. Hereupon he erected a fair ſchool at Chatillon under his caſtle, in a pleaſant and wholeſome place, and beſtowed great coſt on it, where he maintained learned interpreters of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues; he maintained alſo many poor boys, and young men in that ſchool.

He was modeſt, and moderate in his deſires after the world; for though he had great honours and offices conferred upon him, whereby he might have enriched himſelf, yet he added not ſo much as one lordſhip, or plough of land, to the inheritance left him by his fathers. He huſbanded his eſtate and houſhold affairs frugally: yet, having very many noblemen and gentlemen that reſorted to him upon public buſineſs, he gave them free and hearty entertainment, whereby he ſpent all that he ſaved at other times by his frugality. Yea, his extraordinary expences were ſo great, that he left his heir in debt no leſs than forty thouſand crowns, paying to his creditors yearly uſe-money, no leſs than ſix thouſand crowns.

There was ſuch incredible love and concord betwixt him and his two brethren, that all three ſeemed but to have one mind betwixt them.

He lived fifty three years, ſix months, and eight days, was ſlain Aug. 24 1572.

He was of a middle ſtature, of a ruddy colour, his members equal and well compacted; of a mild and cheerful countenance, of a ſmall and pleaſant voice, yet ſomewhat ſlow and gentle; of a healthy conſtitution, of a comely gait and geſture; abſtemious in the uſe of wine; of a moderate diet and ſleep, for he never uſed to ſleep above ſeven hours at the moſt.

After the edict for pacification, he ſuffered no day to paſs, but before he went to bed, he ſet down the things in his journal which fell out in the civil wars, that were of any moment; which being found after his death, was carried to the king and admired by his very adverſaries, who thereby ſaw his quiet, conſtant, and compoſed mind, in the midſt of his greateſt buſineſſes.

When the war was finiſhed and he was retired to Rochel, no day paſſed over his head, wherein he did not, morning and evening, read over one of Calvin's ſermons upon Job, which hiſtory he uſed to call his Pantreſtus, or phyſic for all diſeaſes, which greatly comforted his heart in all his afflictions.

By his firſt wife he had five children: He left alive Lewis his eldeſt daughter married to Monſieur Teligni, who was murdered the ſame night with his father in law. Then Francis, Odet, and Charles, the two elder, ſurvived that furious maſſacre; the third, being not eight years old, in whom he took much delight for his prettineſs, was taken by his enemies, and taught to bear the croſs of Chriſt in his tender years.

He left his ſecond wife great with child, who was brought to bed four months after of a girl; and returning to her native country, in the borders of Savoy, was, not long after, committed to priſon, by the command of prince Philibert, duke of Savoy, for marrying againſt his conſent.

The Life of JOAN, Queen of Navarr, who was poiſoned at Paris, a few Days before the bloody Maſſacre, Anno Chriſti 1572.

JOAN of Albert was daughter to Henry II. king of Navarr, and to Margaret of Orleance, ſiſter to Francis, the firſt of that name, king of France, and by her parents was carefully trained up in the proteſtant religion from her childhood, which ſhe conſtantly adherred to all the days of her life.

She was married to Anthony of Bourbon, ſon to Charles duke of Vendoſme, by whom ſhe had Henry, the fourth of that name, king of France, by his father's right, and the ſecond of that name, king of Navarr, by his mother's.

This Anthony, king of Navarr, in the minority of Charles the ninth, being the firſt prince of the blood, was to be his protector; but the queen-mother, and the Guiſes, ſeeking to draw all the power and management of affairs into their own hands, laboured, by all means, to withdraw the king of Navarr from the proteſtants, that is, by weakening them thereby, they might rule the roſt as they liſted, for which end they employed the ambaſſador of Spain, the cardinal of Tournon, Eſcars, and ſome other houſhold flatterers to him, who perſuaded him, that carrying himſelf a neuter, and cauſing the prince his ſon to go once to the maſs, the king of Spain would give him the realm of Sardinia, in recompence for that of Navarr, which he had lately taken from him. The pope likewiſe confirms him in this hope, which indeed was but to take from him all means of recovering his kingdom of Navarr, when he ſhould attempt it. Yet, he being drawn by theſe Spaniſh and Lorrain practices, eſtrangeth himſelf by little and little from the proteſtants, ſolicited the queen his wife to return into the boſom of the Romiſh church, and to draw her children thereunto: but ſhe, being better grounded in the truth, than ſo eaſily to forſake it, refuſeth; whereupon a breach grew betwixt them, and the king her huſband falls in love with one of the queen-mother's maids.

The forenamed Guiſian inſtruments ſeeing this, perſuade him that hereſy is a ſufficient cauſe of diſſolving marriage, and that therefore he might be divorced from Joan Albert his wife, as being infected with the poiſon of hereſy. They tell him alſo, that, notwithſtanding his divorce, he ſhould retain to himſelf the poſſeſſion of, and intereſt in all the dominions and kingdoms belonging to her, of which ſhe ſhould be deprived as unworthy of them, by reaſon of her hereſy: and, inſtead of her, he ſhould marry Mary queen of Scots, whoſe dowry, ſay they, is the kingdom of England; and as ſoon as the marriage is contracted, the pope would ſtrip Elizabeth of it, as unworthy thereof, for the ſame cauſe, and ſettle it upon them, &c.

But the king of Navarr abhoring to be divorced from his wife, it remained, that he ſhould accept the condition about the kingdom of Sardinia, for the effecting whereof, they left no means unaſſayed; and at laſt prevailed ſo far, that they gulled the king of Navarr, and ſet him at odds with his brother, the prince of Conde, Coligni the admiral, and the other proteſtants.

The queen his wife diſtaſting his change of religion, and his adhering to the popiſh party, retired into Podium, in the country of Bearne, where ſhe kept her court. But it pleaſed God, that, ſhortly after, in the ſiege of Orleans, the king of Navarr was ſhot into the ſhoulder, whereof he died about three weeks after.

The next deſign was to ſeize upon the queen, together with her ſon Henry, and her daughter Katherine, and to bring them before the inquiſition of Spain; and the contrivers doubted not, but that Philip king of Spain would moſt willingly hearken to this counſel, for that this exploit would make for the advantage of his religion, the reſcuer whereof he proudly boaſted himſelf to be: as alſo the buſineſs about the kingdom of Navarr, which he unjuſtly detained, would be hereby diſpatched, by the taking away of the lawful heirs thereof. They conceived alſo, that the buſineſs might eaſily be effected by the means of the king of Spain's ſoldiers, that lay at Barcelona, ready to be tranſported into Africk; who, by the ways of the mountains, might come upon, and ſurprize the queen of Navarr, and her children, at Podium, before they were aware.

One Dominick, a captain, born in the territories of Bearne, was ſingled out to go to the court of Spain, to communicate theſe counſels with the king, and to receive further inſtructions from him. But it pleaſed God, that this Dominick falling ſick by the way, Annas Heſpins, an honeſt man that tended on him, ſmelt out the occaſion of his journey, and, by giving timely notice, prevented the effecting of it; by which deliverance God ſhewed his watchful providence over his handmaid, this religious queen of Navarr.

Not long after, in the time of the third civil war for religion, this queen having raiſed great troops, led them to Rochel, together with her ſon Henry, and her daughter Katherine, from whence ſhe wrote letters to the king, the queen-mother, the duke of Anjou, and the cardinal of Bourbon.

To the king ſhe wrote, That in the common cauſe of religion, in regard of the duty which ſhe owed to the king, and the neceſſity of blood whereby ſhe was joined to the prince of Conde, ſhe could not be wanting to him upon ſuch an occaſion, having always rejected the bloody counſels of the Guiſian faction, and eſpecially the ambition of the cardinal of Lorrain, from whoſe friendſhip ſhe earneſtly exhorted the duke of Anjou, beſeeching him that he would not yield up himſelf a miniſter of his wicked will, in cutting up the royal ſtock by the roots.

In her letter to the cardinal of Bourbon, ſhe ſharply chideth him for not being warned by his former danger. For, how long, ſaith ſhe, will you be the ſuffragan of the cardinal of Lorrain? Have you forgotten the treacherous plots that were laid by him for your head? And, are you ſo credulous as to believe his oaths, when he ſweareth that he mindeth no treachery? &c.

But theſe letters prevailing nothing, the war went on, and in the battle of Baſſac, the proteſtants were worſted, and the prince of Conde ſlain; which news being carried to Rochel, the queen of Navarr poſted to the proteſtant army, where, before a great aſſembly of nobles and ſoldiers, ſhe made an oration to confirm their minds, praiſing the virtue and conſtancy of the prince of Conde, who had employed his faithful endeavours, even unto death, in the defence of ſo juſt a cauſe; and thereupon ſhe exhorted the reſt to imitate his example, and to perſevere in maintaining the truth of Chriſt, and the liberty of their country: For, ſaith ſhe, the good cauſe is not dead with the prince of Conde, neither ought good men to give way to deſpondency in ſuch caſes, God having ſo provided for his cauſe, that he gave Conde companions whilſt he lived, that may ſucceed him now when he is dead. I have brought with me mine only ſon Henry, and Conde's own ſon, who, as he is heir of his name, ſo is he of his virtues. Theſe with other nobles beſides, I truſt, will never be wanting to ſo good a cauſe. And having thus ſpoken to the nobles and army, and many things privately to her ſon, whetting his youthful ſpirit, ſhe returned again to Rochel to provide new ſuccours.

In the mean time a commiſſion was granted to Terride, governor of Quercy, to ſummon the queen of Navarr, and the prince her ſon, to leave the party of the proteſtants; and, in caſe of refuſal, to invade the countries of Berne, Foix, and Navarr, in which he ſo prevailed, that he reduced all to the king's obedience, but only Navaren, which he beſieged, as the only ſtrong place that remained to the queen.

Hereupon the queen and the princes ſent the earl of Montgomery to encounter him, who with a ſmall army of five hundred horſe, and four thouſand foot, forced Terride to raiſe his ſiege, and retire himſelf to Ortheze. His men were diſperſed, and to prevent his gathering them together again, the earl beſieged him, forced the town, and to beat Terride with his own weapons, he turned his cannons which he found in the town againſt the caſtle, whereupon it was ſurrendered to him: after which all other places were ſuddenly reduced to the obedience of the queen; and the earl having garriſoned the towns of his new conqueſt, ſpeedily returned to the princes.

Not long after, peace being concluded betwixt the king and the proteſtants, the king publiſhed an edict, wherein, amongſt other things, he hath this paſſage.

"Let it be lawful for the queen of Navarr, the king's aunt, besides the benefit which is common to all those which have the highest jurisdiction, to enjoy the free exercise of their religion in the dukedom of Albert, in the earldoms of Armignac, Foix, and Bigorre, in one place of all those dominions which she holdeth in her own possession, or which may be assigned to her by the king; so that all that will come to that place (though she herself be absent) may enjoy it without danger. Moreover, lest any doubt should arise, concerning the right meaning of the queen of Navarr, the king's aunt; as also of the princes of Conde, both father and son; the king doth declare, That he acknowlegeth them all for his faithful cousins and subjects; and that they, and all that have managed the wars under them, shall be free, and not bound to render an account for monies received or taken," &c.

The peace being concluded, the malice of the popish party was no whit abated; whereupon they sought by policy to effect that which they could not by power; and for this end Biron was sent to Rochel, in the king's name, to treat with the queen of Navarr, about the marriage between her son Henry, and the king's sister, the lady Margaret; for which end he invited them to come to the court, where business might be fully debated and concluded: he added also, that hereby a fair occasion was offered from God to settle their affairs in peace, &c.

The queen of Navarr having returned thanks in a set oration, answered, That the matter was of that importance that she would take time to herself in deliberating of it; and albeit she did profess and acknowlege that that affinity would be a great ornament and profit to her, yet she was, for the present, doubtful what to do, in regard of the near kindred betwixt her son and the lady, and the difference in their religions: Wherefore, saith she, I will consult with my divines, and what I shall find to make for God's glory, and the good of the kingdom, and that may stand with a good conscience, that I will readily and willingly embrace, being desirous, in all that I may, to satisfy the pleasure of the king and queen, to whom I owe all due observance.

Yet there remained two scruples which troubled the king and the queen of Navarr, in respect of the place and manner of celebrating the marriage, for the queen would not have it done at Paris, which city being extremely addicted to the popish religion, she feared was long since an enemy to the family of Navarr, and therefore she judged it not safe to have it celebrated there. The king, on the contrary, said, That it would make for a certain sign of sure peace to have the celebrity of the marriage seen in the metropolis of the kingdom, as it were on a public theatre. The other doubt was about the manner of the celebration, for the queen of Navarr being most addicted to the reformed religion, would never endure that it should be contracted after the popish manner, nor the queen-mother after the fashion of the protestants. But the king prayed the queen of Navarr to pardon him in that matter, for that it would tend to his great dishonour if he should suffer the marriage of his sister to be solemnized in any other form, than according to that antient religion which he had received from his fore fathers; therefore to resolve this doubt, there was time taken on both sides.

In the mean time, the queen of Navarr consulted with the ministers of the reformed religion, what might be done in this matter. Some of them insisting upon the simplicity of God's word, said, That it was utterly unlawful for such marriages to be contracted, especially by illustrious personages, in whom it is more dangerous, because of more public concernment. Others judging that this marriage would be a sure, and, as it were, an everlasting foundation of a most happy peace, assented to it.

The queen of Navarr, and the protestant nobles, striving to find out remedies, both for the kingdom, which was grievously afflicted, and for their own bruised estates, lifted these mens judgments best; and so the business proceeded, and the conditions of marriage were agreed upon betwixt the parties. The king was to give his sister for her dowry three hundred thousand crowns, each crown being valued at fifty-four shillings.

About this time, the queen of Navarr, being zealously careful to propagate the protestant religion in Cantabria, a province of the jurisdiction of Navarr, the first pastors, who had learned the country language, which is understood by almost none of the neighbours, and was before believed that it could not be written. She took care also that the New Testament, the Catechism, and the prayers used in the church of Geneva, should be translated into the Gascoine or Cantabrian tongue; which she caused to be printed at Rochel, on a most fine letter, and sent to them.

And so, upon the earnest solicitation of the king she went, the march following, in the year 1572, from Rochel to the court, which was then at Blois, with great attendance, where it is incredible to think what welcome she had on all sides, especially from the king and his brethren, who yet, when all was done, could boastingly say to his mother, 'Now, Madam, have not I acquit myself well? Let me alone, and I will bring them all into the net.'

In April following were the articles concluded concerning the marriage of the prince of Navarr with the king's sister. And, in the beginning of May, the king wooed the queen of Navarr again, to come to Paris, for preparing things fitting for the marriage, which she at last consented to: and so, May 6. she took her journey from Blois, and came to Paris, May 15. After which she went from place to place in the city, into sundry houses and shops, to find out such things as might tend to the adorning of the day of so great a solemnity.

The queen mother, in the mean time, who could not endure this good queen, and yet not finding with what colour she could dispatch her with the rest; though she feared the greatness of her spirit, in case she should survive them, and judged it impossible to work upon the flexibility of the young prince her son whilst she lived. She therefore consulted with one Rene, an Italian, whose practice was to impoison things; by whose devilish help she brought her accursed purpose to pass. This Rene sold the queen of Navarr certain perfumes, whereby he found out the way to poison her therewith; and afterwards he was heard to make brags of it, saying also, that he had the like in store for two or three more, who suspected no such matter.

By this means, June 4. this good queen fell sick of a continued fever, and (though others slighted it, yet) she perceiving, by the strength of her disease, that she could not long continue, prepared herself to receive from the hand of God, her merciful Father, that which he had appointed concerning her. And calling her son Henry, she commanded him, above all things, carefully to serve God, according to the confession of faith wherein he had been educated, and not suffer himself to be plucked or diverted from the same, by the smoky pleasures and delights of the world, and other incentives unto vices; and that he should take care that the constitutions concerning the same, which she had published in the principality of Berne, and the Lower Navarr, be inviolably kept: That he should throughly purge his family, and cause all bad counsellors to begone from thence, which thought ill concerning God; as also, all flatterers, the abusers of princes, and all other vicious persons: That he should retain with him all good men, as Bellovarius, Francutius, and Beraldus, who were men of an unblameable life: That he should have a special care of his sister Katharine, ruling her gently and lovingly, without bitterness, causing her to be brought up in the town of Berne, in the same school of godliness which himself had been trained up in; and when she should grow marriageable, that he should marry her to a prince of equal dignity, professing the same religion: That he should love Henry Bourbon his cousin germain as his brother; and also Francis marquis of Conteus, taking care that as great concord as may be, be cherished betwixt them and the admiral Coligni, for the advancement and propagation of God's glory. Lastly, she makes her son her heir: entreating the king, the queen-mother, the duke of Anjou, and the duke of Alençon, the king's brethren, to undertake the protection of the prince her son, and of Katharine his sister, and to permit them the free exercise of their religion.

Then she requested that she might have such nigh about her as might comfort her in her sickness out of the word of God; as also to pray with her and for her, according to that of Saint James, 'Is any sick amongst you? let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, life, knowing that the prayers of a righteous man prevail much with God.

According to her desire, a minister resorted to her, shewing out of the Scriptures, that Christians ought in all things to submit to the will of God, as to the 'Father of spirits, that they may live;' and albeit by reason of the severity of his chastisements, sometimes it may seem to our flesh as if they were sent for no other end but for our affliction; yet ought we to consider that the just God can do nothing but justly, and being withal a merciful father, he cannot but therein seek the welfare of his afflicted children.

To this she replied, I take all this as sent from the hand of God my most merciful Father. Nor have I during this extremity, feared to die, much less murmured against God for inflicting this chastisement upon me, knowing that whatsoever he doth, he doth so order the same, as that in the end it shall turn to my everlasting good.

Then said the minister, the causes of sickness and diseases must be sought beyond the course of physic, which always looks to the corruption of the humours, or of the distemper in the more noble parts of the body. And, though it be not amiss to have respect to these things as to secondary causes, yet ought we to ascend higher, namely, to the first, even to God himself, who disposeth of all his creatures, even as best pleaseth him. He it is that makes the wound, and heals; that kills and makes alive, Deut. xxxii. 39. and therefore to him we ought to direct our prayers, for our comfort in all our griefs and sufferings, and in the end to expect full deliverance, seeing it is only with him to restore our health, if it stand with his good pleasure.

To this she answered, That she depended wholly upon God's providence, knowing that all things are wisely disposed by him; and therefore she besought him to furnish her with all such graces as he saw to be necessary for her station. As for this life, said she, I am in a good measure weaned from it, in regard of the afflictions which have followed me from my youth hitherto; but especially because I cannot live without offending my God, with whom I desire to be with all my heart.

Then said the minister' Yet long life, how full of trouble soever it be, is to be esteemed amongst the blessings of God, seeing his promise implies so much; and not only so, but because our lives may many ways serve to his glory; and long life is not only an honour, but a pledge of his favour; even as it is to him whom a prince long employs in his service, having had experience of his fidelity many years together. Hereupon he earnestly requested her to pray, that if it was the will of God he would employ her yet longer in his service, for the further enlargement of his gospel; and that he would grant unto her such recovery of health, and such a good disposition of body, that, with renewed strength, she might be enabled to finish her course much more nobly than ever heretofore.

To this she replied, That in regard of her own particular, her life was not dear unto her, seeing so long as she lived in this frail flesh, she was still prone and apt to sin against God; only she said, her care was somewhat for her children which God had given her, in respect that they should be deprived of her in their young years; yet, said she, I doubt not, but though he should please to take me from them, himself will become a Father to them, and a protector over them, as he hath ever been to me in my greatest afflictions, and therefore I commit them wholly to his fatherly care.

Then the minister blessed God for working in her mind this assurance of faith, and ability to cast her care upon the providence of God, intreating her still to persevere therein, which would sufficiently seal unto her the truth of her faith. And thus, said he, did the patriarchs in their time, commit the care of their posterity into the hands of God, as may appear by the several blessings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: but yet he told her, that it was very requisite she should make choice of such, who, for their sincerity both in life and doctrine, might continue to water in these young princely plants, the seeds of piety that had been sown in them by her so great pains and industry; seeing, it was to be hoped, that the example of her faith and constancy in the service of God, wherein she had gone before them, would serve as a perpetual inducement to them to follow her noble virtues. And whereas she had declared, that death was not terrible to her, because it was the way by which she was to pass to her eternal rest, he told her, that Christians had little cause to fear death, in regard that they should not die at all, according to that of our Saviour, 'He that lives and believes in me, shall never die,' John viii. 21. For, saith he, to speak properly, death is no death to them, but a sweet sleep, being often so called in the scriptures: and therefore Christ, for their sakes, hath overcome and triumphed over it in his own person; so as now we may cry out with St Paul, 'O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

After this he admonished her to make confession of her sins before God, shewing that bodily diseases tend to the dissolution of nature, and that death was the wages of sin: Further declaring, That by this her chastisement she might discern what she had deserved, if God should enter into judgment with her, not only in regard of the fall of our first parents, in which guilt she was enwrapped as well as others; but also, by her own personal sins, seeing the best in the world are in themselves but poor, miserable, and wretched sinners: yea, if the Lord should punish us according to our demerits, we could expect nothing at his hand but eternal death and damnation.

At these words she began, with her eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, to acknowlege, that the sins which she had committed against the Lord were innumerable, and therefore more than she was able to reckon up; but yet she hoped, that God, for Christ's sake, in whom she put her whole trust, would be merciful to her.

From hence the minister took occasion to declare at large, upon what ground she was to expect the fruit of this mercy of God in Christ; adding, The whole have no need of a physician, but the sick. And Christ saith, 'He came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.' And, that he is ready to fill the hungry with good things; whereas, in the mean while, he sends the rich empty away. Of these things, saith he, you ought so much the rather to be persuaded in your conscience, by how much the more the holy spirit of God witnesseth to your spirit that you are the child of God, and enables you to cry Abba Father; for what is faith else, but a firm trust and assurance of the good will of God manifested towards us in his blessed son?

But the minister fearing, lest by his long discourse he might be troublesome, or cause her too much to spend her spirits, would have given over; which she taking notice of earnestly requested him not to forbear speaking to her, about these matters of life and eternal salvation; adding, that now she felt the want of it, in regard, that, since her coming to Paris, she had been somewhat remiss in hearing such exhortations out of the word of God; and therefore I am the more glad, saith she, to receive comfort out of it in this my great extremity.

Then did the minister endeavour to set before her the happiness of heaven, and what those joys were that the faithful possess in the presence of God, which the scriptures intending to discover, tell us, that 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what those things are which God hath prepared for them that love him.' For, saith he, it is as if a king, minding greatly to honour some noble personage, should bring him to his court, and there shew him his state and attendance, his treasures, with all his most precious jewels: Even so will the Lord one day reveal to all his elect, and faithful people, his magnificence and glory, with all the treasures of his kingdom, after he hath gathered them home to himself, decking and adorning them with light, incorruption, and immortality. Therefore, saith he, since this happiness is so great, your highness ought to be the less solicitous about leaving this transitory life, and know that you are to change this earthly kingdom for an heavenly inheritance; these temporal good things, which vanish and come to nothing in the using, to enjoy for ever those things which are eternal and everlasting. For your faith, being now firmly set upon our Lord Jesus Christ, you may be assured to obtain eternal salvation by him. Then did he proceed to propose to her this question; ſtion; Madam, Do you verily believe that Jeſus Chriſt came into the world to ſave you? And do you expect the full forgiveneſs of all your ſins, by the ſhedding of his blood for you? Yea; ſaid ſhe, I do; believing that he is my only Saviour and Mediator; and I look for ſalvation from none other, knowing that he hath abundantly ſatisfied for the ſins of all his people; and therefore I am aſſured that God, for his ſake, according to his gracious promiſe in him, will have mercy upon me.

During all the time of her ſickneſs ſhe ceaſed not to continue in ſuch fruitful and comfortable communications; ſometimes intermixing them with moſt affectionate ſighs to God, as a teſtimony of that hope and deſire ſhe had of enjoying his preſence, often uttering theſe words, 'O my God in thy good time, deliver me from this body of death, and from the miſeries of this preſent life, that I may no more offend thee; and that I may attain to the felicity which thou, in thy word, haſt promiſed to beſtow upon me.' Neither did ſhe manifeſt her pious affection by words only, but by her conſtant and cheerful countenance, ſo far forth as the vehemency of her diſeaſe would ſuffer; thereby giving a clear teſtimony to all that beheld her, that the fear of death could not drive her from the ſtedfaſtneſs of her faith. The miniſter alſo went often to prayer with her; the uſual tenor whereof was this which follows:

"O Lord our God, we confeſs here, before thy divine majeſty, that we are altogether unworthy of thine infinite mercies, by reaſon of our manifold iniquities; and that we are ſo far from deſerving to be heard of thee in our requeſts, that we are rather worthy that thou ſhouldeſt reject both our perſons and our prayers. But ſeeing it hath pleaſed thee to make us a gracious promiſe of hearing and granting our requeſts, we humbly beſeech thee freely to forgive all our offences, and to cover them under the obedience and righteouſneſs of thy dear ſon, that, through him, ourſelves and our ſervices may be well pleaſing unto thee. For, Lord, we acknowlege, that all our afflictions are meaſured out to us by thine hand, who art a moſt juſt Judge, in regard that we have every way provoked thee to wrath, by our infinite ſinnings againſt thee; yea, by our rebellions which now teſtify againſt us: for, alas, Lord! our life hath been no way anſwerable to that perfect obedience which thou, by thy holy law, doſt juſtly require at our hands, which we from day to day do tranſgreſs; and therefore do here caſt down ourſelves at this time before thy glorious preſence, unfeignedly acknowleging our miſery and wretchedneſs, from the very bottom of our hearts. Yet, Lord, mercy is with thee; and becauſe thou art our father, therefore thou deſireſt not the death of ſinners, but rather that they ſhould convert and live. For this cauſe we now fall down before the throne of thy grace, with confidence of obtaining thy wonted mercy, which thou haſt promiſed to ſuch as call upon thee in truth; beſeeching thee, who art the Father of mercies, to have compaſſion on all ſuch as thou haſt humbled under thy mighty hand; but more eſpecially on this thy ſervant the queen, who lieth here before thee ſick of a dangerous diſeaſe; that as thou haſt righteouſly afflicted her for her ſins, (which ſhe alſo doth with us acknowlege) ſo it would pleaſe thee in pardoning them all to her, for thy beloved ſon's ſake, to grant that ſhe may profit by this thy correcting hand for the time to come. Above all, O Lord! give her a ſweet ſenſe, yea, a full aſſurance of thy eternal joys, that ſo ſhe may, with the greater patience, take down this bitter potion miniſtered unto her from thy hand, and that the ſole deſire of enjoying thy preſence may cauſe her to forget all wordly greatneſs and magnificence, knowing that they are nothing in reſpect of thy glory which is now ſet before her. Endue her alſo with meekneſs of mind to bear the tedioufneſs of her affliction; for, 'though the ſpirit be willing, the fleſh is weak;' yea, full of reſiſting and unbelief; that ſo receiving all things from thee as a Father, ſhe may the more willingly ſubmit her will to thine. And becauſe, O good God, thou haſt made her hitherto an happy inſtrument for the advancement of thy glory, and defence of thy poor afflicted people, we pray thee, if it may ſtand with thy good pleaſure, reſtore her to health again, that ſo the excellent work that thou haſt by her means begun, may not be left unperfected; but by virtue of this her deliverance, ſhe may, with renewed ſtrength, undertake the ſame, in better ſort than ever heretofore, eſpecially for the well educating and training up the children that thou haſt given her. But, Lord, if thou haſt a purpoſe now to call her home to thyſelf, who are we that we ſhould contradict thy holy will? Only we pray thee that thou wouldeſt confirm her more and more in the knowlege of thy bleſſed goſpel, and thereby alſo in the certainty of her ſalvation, which thou haſt given her by faith in thy Son Jeſus Chriſt, that thus ſhe may not ceaſe to ſanctify and call upon thy holy name to her laſt breath. And as touching ourſelves, who are here by thy good providence gathered together about her, being in bodily health, give us to know the uncertainty and brevity of our life, that ſo, according to our duty, we may behold the ſame in this mirror that thou haſt ſet before us, as knowing that even the greateſt in the world are ſubject to the ſame calamities as well as the ſmall, that ſo our chief care may be to employ the remainder of our time to thine honour and ſervice. All which we crave of thee in the name of Jeſus Chriſt thy Son, our only Mediator and Advocate. Amen."

During the time of prayer, ſhe ceaſed not, with hands and eyes lift up to heaven, to fetch many deep ſighs, eſpecially when mention was made of the mercy of God in Chriſt, which he extended to poor ſinners; ſo that all preſent might evidently ſee, that her heart and affections were joined to the prayer that was made by and for her. And whilſt ſhe thus lay, ſhe ſtill continued in her holy deſires to depart hence, that ſhe might be with Chriſt, taking great delight in the holy and Chriſtian exhortations which were made to her by many godly and learned men, who came to viſit her, to whom alſo ſhe manifeſted no ſmall teſtimonies of that faith and hope which ſhe had in God, touching the ſalvation of her ſoul, by her holy and ſavoury ſpeeches, which for brevity's ſake are omitted. Yea, although the Lord exerciſed her with the ſenſe of her inward diſeaſe, yet could you not at any time diſcern any ſpeech, ſavouring of diſcontentment, or impatience, to proceed out of her mouth, nay ſcarcely ſo much as a groan. But if at any time ſhe found any refreſhings from the violence of her diſeaſe, (there being no malady ſo vehement which hath not ſome intermiſſions and breathing times) ſhe declared her willingneſs to obtain the recovery of her former health, and for that end ſhe refuſed no good means preſcribed for her by her learned phyſicians. Again, when ſhe perceived her ſickneſs to encreaſe upon her, and that ſhe grew worſe and worſe, ſhe was no whit appalled thereat, but ſhewed herſelf to be armed with an invincible conſtancy, to undergo the utmoſt that death could do againſt her, preparing herſelf willingly for that laſt conflict. And when ſhe ſaw her ladies and gentlewomen weeping about her bed, ſhe blamed them for it, ſaying, Weep not for me, I pray you; forasmuch as God doth, by this ſickneſs, call me hence to enjoy a better life, and now I may enter into the deſired haven, towards which this frail veſſel of mine hath been a long time ſteering. Yet ſhe ſhewed herſelf grieved that ſhe wanted opportunity to reward them, and many more of her family and train which had done her faithful ſervice, as ſhe could have wiſhed, excuſing herſelf to them, and profeſſing that it was not want of good will, but her being prevented by this her ſudden ſickneſs: But, ſaid ſhe, I will not fail to give order about the ſame, to the utmoſt of my ability.

In the end, perceiving her ſtrength to decay more and more, ſhe gave order to have her laſt will and teſtament made, and thereby ſettled her outward eſtate. And the eighth of June, which was the day before ſhe died, ſhe called for a miniſter; and finding that ſhe was drawing nigh unto her end, ſhe deſired him to ſpeak ſomewhat largely of the temptations which Satan is wont to aſſail God's elect with in their laſt conflict.

To this the miniſter anſwered, Indeed that is the hour wherein the ſworn enemy of all the faithful doth moſt buſily beſtir himſelf, if poſſible, to deprive them of the comfort of their ſalvation, not ſparing, eſpecially, at that time, to ſet upon them with might and ſlight; but yet, even then the Lord is not, nor will be wanting to his, filling their hearts with ſuch joy and comfort of the Holy Ghoſt, as ſhall make them in the end more than conquerers. His firſt engine wherewith he would drive them to diſpair, diſpair, is, by preſenting before their eyes the innumerable heaps of their ſins and pollutions, wherewith they have been any way defiled in their whole life: and then he preſents to them God's juſtice, before which no fleſh can be able to ſubſiſt, unleſs it were pure and ſpotleſs; whence he infers, that ſuch miſerable ſinners can expect and look for nothing but utter death and condemnation: but againſt theſe aſſaults we muſt, as David, Pſal. li. ſet the infinite multitudes of God's compaſſions, which do infinitely ſurpaſs the multitudes of our ſins. And as for the juſtice of God, we confeſs that no creature that is defiled by ſin can abide to be ſtrictly examined by it, if God ſhould call us to a ſevere account. But we know that God will never enter into judgment with thoſe that believe in his Son, but imputes unto them that righteouſneſs and obedience which was accompliſhed by him, which is ſufficient to oppoſe againſt the juſtice of God; therefore in it alone we muſt expect to ſtand before his face, and not by our own dignity and worthineſs. Indeed, if we were to appear before the ſeat of juſtice, to receive there what we have deſerved, we had good reaſon to be overwhelmed in utter diſpair; but turning our eyes upon him, who being the eternal Son of God, hath clothed himſelf with our human nature, to bear on him the ſame puniſhment that was due to our ſins, and thereby hath acquitted us; then God's juſtice doth no whit affright us, but rather yields us aſſured comfort, becauſe God being juſt, cannot require the ſame debt twice. Having therefore received full and perfect ſatisfaction from Chriſt, whom he hath ordained to be our ſurety, and who hath paid our debts for us, thence we gather aſſurance that he will no more require it at our hands. To which purpoſe theſe ſentences are to be well obſerved. 'It is Chriſt who hath born our grief, and carried our ſorrows. The chaſtiſement of our peace was upon him, and by his ſtripes we are healed. That we all like ſheep have gone aſtray, and have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all. Chriſt is our peace, and the propitiation for our ſins. The Lamb of God, which taketh away the ſins of the world.' Upon theſe conſiderations God's juſtice need not terrify ſuch as believe in Chriſt, of whoſe righteouſneſs and redemption they are made partakers, ſeeing that Jeſus Chriſt, 'who knew no ſin, was made ſin (that is an oblation for ſin) for us, that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him.'

I grant, ſaid he, that theſe things belong not to all indifferently, but only unto ſuch as, believing in the Son of God, do wholly caſt themſelves upon the merit of his death and paſſion, which, as St Peter ſaith, is ſufficient for their ſalvation, Acts iv. 12.

Then did he aſk her, Whether ſhe placed her whole truſt and confidence on Chriſt crucified, who died for her ſins, and roſe again for her juſtification? To this the godly queen anſwered, That ſhe neither expected ſalvation, righteouſneſs, nor life, from any elſe, but only from her Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, being aſſured that his merit alone did abundantly ſuffice for the full ſatisfaction for all her ſins, albeit they were innumerable.

This being your faith, Madam, quoth the miniſter, you cannot come into condemnation, but are paſſed from death to life, neither need you fear God's ſeat of juſtice, ſince it is turned into a throne of mercy and grace unto you, and therefore the hour of death will be exceeding welcome to you, being but a ſweet paſſage into a far better life; as alſo the time in which all tears ſhall be wiped from your eyes; therefore, I beſeech you, Madam, think often of that ſweet text, 'Bleſſed are the dead which die in the Lord, for they reſt from their labours, and their works follow them.' Now the time approaches wherein you ſhall enjoy the beatific viſion, the ſociety of your huſband Chriſt, the fellowſhip of the bleſſed angels and celeſtial ſpirits, with the holy patriarchs, prophets, apoſtles, and martyrs of Chriſt, partaking with them in the ſame felicity and glory. He alſo further ſaid, Madam, If it ſhould pleaſe God, by this your ſickneſs, to put an end to this weary pilgrimage of yours, and to call you home to himſelf, as by ſome evident ſigns it appears that he will, Are you willing to go unto him? to this ſhe anſwered with much Chriſtian courage, Yea, with all my heart.

After a ſhort prayer, the miniſter diſcerning in her the undoubted teſtimonies of unfeigned repentance, and of the ſorrow that ſhe conceived for the offences which ſhe had committed againſt God, together with the aſſured confidence which ſhe had in his mercies, as a miniſter of the goſpel, and ambaſſador of the Son of God, by the authority given to him, having the word of reconciliation committed to him; he aſſured her, in the name of Chriſt, that all her ſins were forgiven by God, and that they ſhould never come in account againſt her at his judgment-ſeat; yea, that ſhe ſhould no more doubt thereof, than if the Son of God from heaven ſhould ſay unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort, thy ſins are forgiven thee. And to the end, that troubled conſciences might the better be quieted, Chriſt hath uſed theſe words, ſpeaking to his miniſters, ſaying, 'Whoſe ſins ye remit, they are remitted,' &c. And the reaſon is, becauſe the word which they pronounce is not the word of a mortal man, but of the immortal God, being of no leſs weight than if himſelf had uttered the ſame. Then he aſked her majeſty if ſhe accepted of ſo gracious a meſſage, which aſſured her of the free pardon of all her ſins? Yes, ſaith ſhe; with all my heart, and make no doubt thereof.

Not long after came in the admiral Coligni, and with him another miniſter, to whom ſhe gave ear a good ſpace together, his ſpeech tending to prepare her for death; and when he had finiſhed his ſpeech, he alſo prayed with her, which ſhe attended to, with great affection. Then ſhe requeſted that thoſe two miniſters might ſtay all night with her in her chamber, and that they would in no wiſe leave her.

The greateſt part of this night was ſpent in holy admotions, which theſe miniſters gave to this gracious lady, one after another; beſides which, ſhe required them to read to her ſome chapters of the holy ſcriptures, which were pertinent to her condition, and ſo they read out of St John's goſpel, from the fourteenth to the end of the ſeventeenth chapter. After which they went to prayer with her, which being ended, the queen deſired to take ſome reſt; but it was not long 'ere ſhe commanded them to read again; whereupon one of them made choice of certain of David's pſalms, full of ardent and affectionate prayers, ſuiting to this princeſs's preſent condition, by reaſon of her affliction; and for a concluſion read pſalm xxxi. wherein the prophet, amongſt other things, doth commend his ſpirit into the hands of God, 'Becauſe,' ſaith he, 'thou haſt redeemed me, O Lord God of truth.' Then the queen willed them to pray with her again; and thus was the moſt part of that night ſpent in ſuch holy exerciſes, during all which time the miniſters never diſcerned in her the leaſt ſign of impatience, notwithſtanding the violence of her affliction. Yea, whereas immediately before her ſickneſs ſhe had ſhewed how affectionately ſhe was bent to provide things moſt magnificent for the day of her ſon's marriage, according as the ſtate of ſo great an alliance required; yet it was admirable to obſerve, that after this ſickneſs had ſeized on her, God wrought in her ſuch a neglect and forgetfulneſs of all ſuch matters, that ſhe never ſhewed to have ſo much as thought thereof. The night being thus ſpent, and paſt, by this noble queen, ſhe perſevering in the expreſſions of ſuch like affections, and ardency of faith, the next morning, between eight and nine o'clock, ſhe departed this life, to take poſſeſſion of a far better, ſweetly yielding up her ſpirit into the hands of God, June 9. in the year 1572, being the ſixth day after ſhe fell ſick, and of her age forty four.

She had her perfect ſpeech and memory, even to the hour of her death, ſhewing not only that ſtayedneſs and ſoundneſs of judgement, which ever in times paſt ſhe had, in the care about the ſalvation of her ſoul, but alſo in the well ſettlement of her worldly affairs.

The king made as if he had conceived great grief for her death, putting on mourning attire, wherein alſo the whole court followed his example, leſt by this ſudden accident their counſels and future deſperate deſigns might be prevented. Alſo, to avoid all jealouſies, and ſuſpicions of her being poiſoned, by reaſon of her ſudden ſickneſs and death, her body was opened by ſundry expert and learned doctors of phyſic and chirurgery, who found her heart and liver very ſound, only ſome ſcirrouſneſs on one ſide of her lungs; but her head they might not open, where the malady lay, by which means the diſcovery was prevented.

THE HISTORY OF THE STATE AND SUFFERINGS OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND,

From the Reformation to the Reſtoration.

With an INTRODUCTION, containing the moſt remarkable OCCURRENCES relating to that CHURCH from the Reformation to the Reſtoration.

By WILLIAM CROOKSHANK, A. M Miniſter of the Scots Congregation in Swallow-ſtreet, Weſtminſter.

TO THE

RIGHT HONOURABLE

ALEXANDER, EARL of LEVEN.

MY LORD,

I ESTEEM it no ſmall honour to have your Lordſhip's countenance in the deſign of the following performance, and permiſſion to put the ſame under your patronage. I wiſh it had been in my power to render it more worthy of your approbation and acceptance: but as your Lordſhip is able to ſpy out the failings in this work, ſo I doubt not of your candour to throw a vail over them.

HAD I been capable to preſent the world with a moſt exact, impartial and perfect hiſtory of the Church of Scotland, during this period, I know none who had a juſter claim to have it dedicated to them than your Lordſhip; for the great actions and ſufferings of your worthy progenitors, on account of the proteſtant religion and liberties of mankind are well known.

SIR Alexander Leſly, from whom your Lordſhip is deſcended in the maternal line, gained ſo much honour abroad, that the great Guſtavus Adolphus, King of Sweden promoted him firſt to be lieutenat general, and then feldt marſhal of his armies. And when the emperor had reduced all Germany except Stralſund, which was then inveſted by count Walſtein with a formidable and victorious army, General Leſly, to whom that heroic Prince gave the command of the place, obliged him to raiſe the ſiege 1628; and in the year 1630, drove the Imperialiſts out of the iſle of Rugen, and thereby opened a way for Guſtavus to march into Germany.

HAVING gained ſuch laurels abroad, he returned to his native country, and was choſen general of the Scots army, which was raiſed in defence of the Covenanters and the liberties of his country; and, in 1641, was created Earl of Leven. His Lordſhip performed many ſignal ſervices after this, too tedious to be related here. This Nobleman's grand-ſon dying without male iſſue, and his grand-daughter marrying George Earl of Melvil, the honours and eſtate of Leven came, in proceſs of time to David Melvil, Eſq; your Lordſhip's father.

AND nothing is better known, than that the family of Melvil, from which your Lordſhip is lineally deſcended, has been remarkable, ever ſince the dawn of the Reformation, for an uninterrupted and ſteady adherence to that glorious cauſe.

YOUR Lordſhip's grand-father, the ſaid George Lord Melvil, ſuffered not a little in the infamous period deſcribed in the following work, ſo that he was obliged to fly over to Holland for ſafety. But that great judge of men and things, the illuſtrious Prince of Orange, had ſuch a value for him, that, after the glorious revolution, he appointed him to be his high commiſſioner to the parliament 1690, in which the Confeſſion of Faith was ratified, Preſbyterian government eſtabliſhed, patronages were aboliſhed, and the church of Scotland reſtored to the freedom of all her judicatories. This noble Peer enjoyed many other high offices under the crown; he was not only made an Earl, but was ſucceſſively ſole Secretary of State for Scotland, Lord Privy-ſeal and Preſident of the privy council.

HIS ſon David your noble father, did great ſervice in the happy deliverance brought about, under God, by the great King William; for, when he was abroad, he raiſed a regiment of foot, and brought it over with that illuſtrious Prince. He likeways commanded thoſe brave people who guarded the convention of eſtates, which was an aſſembly of patriots, whoſe names will ever be dear to true Proteſtants. During all the reign of King William, and a great part of Queen Anne's, his Lordſhip was governor of the caſtle of Edinburgh; and held likeways, under that Princeſs, the offices of general of the ordnance for Scotland, and commander in chief of all the forces in that kingdom, till towards the end of her reign, he was by the influence of her Tory miniſtry, removed from all public employments: but his Lordſhip perſevered in a ſtedy attachment to the the intereſts of the preſent royal family, from the act of ſettlement 1701, to the day of his death.

AS your Lordſhip is thus deſcended from a race of patriots, who were always firm to the proteſtant cauſe, ſo it is well known, that you my Lord, maintain the ſame principles, and adhere to the ſame intereſt; ſo that, as your noble grand father was king William's high commiſſioner to that brave parliament who reſtored the church and kingdom of Scotland to their religions and civil privileges, vileges, & your Lordſhip has had the honour to repreſent the royal perſon of his majeſty King George the II. in the general aſſemblies of that church, ever ſince the year 1741, and to partake of ſeveral other marks of the royal favour; ſuch is the confidence his majeſty places in your Lordſhip, and ſuch the aſſurance he has of your loyalty to his royal perſon and government, attachment to the Proteſtant religion, and hearty affection to the church of Scotland. That God almighty may bleſs and long preſerve your Lordſhip and excellent Lady, and make your family always patrons of religion and liberty, according to the example of your noble progenitors, is the ſincere deſire of,

My LORD,
Your LORDSHIP'S moſt humble, moſt obedient, and much obliged ſervant,

WILL. CROOKSHANK.

PREFACE.

THE deſign of the following work is to give the Hiſtory of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland during the reigns of the royal brothers,—to preſerve the memory of the ſufferers, and ſhew the cauſe of their ſufferings,—to ſhew us what we have to expect, ſhould ever any of the pretended race of the Stuarts fill the Britiſh throne,—and, if poſſible, to convince us of the unſpeakable obligations a good and gracious God has laid us under, in delivering theſe nations from the tyranny of their oppreſſors.

It is but a general and imperfect account that is given of the ſufferings of the church of Scotland in this period by the Engliſh hiſtorians; for they had neither proper informations nor materials. The Rev. Mr Robert Wodrow, Miniſter at Eaſtwood is the only perſon who has given a large account of theſe things in his excellent hiſtory; but, as that work is contained in two large volumes in folio, ſo there are but few that have either time to peruſe it, or can afford to purchaſe it; and, ſince the reducing ſuch a performance into a more narrow compaſs was thought proper, for making the hiſtory of this period more univerſally known, I was prevailed with, by many of my friends to undertake this difficult taſk.

The worthy hiſtorian, juſt now mentioned, had excellent materials for his performance, having in his hands the records of the nation, beſides original papers and well atteſted narratives from thoſe who were immediately concerned, or were preſent at the facts he has recorded; and many gentlemen and miniſters, related to the ſufferers, favoured him with well atteſted accounts of the ſufferings of particular perſons, as his preface ſufficiently declares: ſo that it is eaſy to ſee what labour and pains he muſt have been at in compoſing a work from ſuch a multitude of papers he had to peruſe, there being no hiſtorian before him from whom he could have much aſſiſtance. As this, I think, is a ſufficient excuſe for the voluminouſneſs of his hiſtory, ſo it ſhews the expediency of this undertaking.

The account that is here given is indeed tragical, for it is the hiſtory of a moſt cruel and bloody perſecution, and opens a ſcene that may juſtly fill us with horror. The laws againſt the ſufferers were written in blood, and executed by a military force. All methods of cruelty were made uſe of by a prelatical faction, who not only invaded the properties of the ſubject, but even the prerogatives of the Mediator as the only head of the church. Many were exorbitantly fined, unjuſtly impriſoned, oppreſſed by ſoldiers, plundered by dragoons and a lawleſs highland hoſt. Multitudes were forced to wander about in dens and caves of the earth. Not a few were tortured by boots, thumbkins, fire-matches, &c. Some were beheaded, others were hanged and quartered; women, as well as men, ſuffered death; ſome of them were hanged, and others drowned: priſons were crouded, and ſhips were loaded with priſoners, who were baniſhed from their native country, of whom many periſhed, &c. &c. &c.

But what had they done? Were they murderers of fathers or murderers of mothers? were they thieves or robbers? quite the reverſe; for they were pious and religious perſons. Their enemies indeed have pretended that it was not ſo much for religion as rebellion that they ſuffered. Accordingly Sir George MacKenzie, in his Vindication of the reign of King Charles II. has the aſſurance to ſay, p. 17. 'That there did not die, upon any 'public account twelve in all that reign; and that not one 'died for any principle of religion, unleſs it be thought 'a religious principle to die for actual rebellion;' and elſewhere, p. 8. 'That no man in Scotland ever ſuffered 'for his religion;' than which nothing can be more falſe; and the following hiſtory will ſufficienty refute the many lies and malicious miſrepreſentations in the Advocate's vindication, and clearly ſhew, that whatever ſteps the ſufferers took were the effect of unparallelled cruelty and unſupportable oppreſſion. It is well known, that, though no people could be more attached to any prince, than the Scots Preſbyterians were to King Charles II. and no prince was ever under greater obligations to protect any ſubjects and maintain them in the inviolable poſſeſſion of their religious and civil liberties, than Charles was to protect them; yet he was no ſooner reſtored, but he and his wicked miniſtry proclaimed to all the world their horrid diſſimulation, ingratitude and perjury. For notwithſtanding the covenanted ties which lay upon the King and all the nation, they overturned the Preſbyterian ſettlement, which all, with uplifted hands, had ſworn to maintain, eſtabliſhed Prelacy, which, with the greateſt ſolemnity, they had ſworn to extirpate, and obliged all to make a declaration againſt the covenants, and perſecuted thoſe who could not comply; ſo that Preſbyterians were counted rebels, becauſe they could not perjure themſelves, according to the example of the King and his miniſters, nor ſubmit to Prelacy and the Supremacy; becauſe they eſteemed dioceſan biſhops as contrary to the word of God, and therefore could never own and acknowledge them without acting contrary to their conſciences. They likeways looked upon the eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy as an uſurpation of Chriſt's throne and dignity; eſpecially as it was aſſerted, in the preamble of act 1. ſeſſion 2. parl. 1. Charles II. 'That the ordering and diſpoſal of the external govern-'ment and policy of this church doth properly belong 'unto his Majeſty, as an inherent right of the crown. Their noncompliance with theſe things was the cauſe of their ſuffering in the manner related in the following work.

It is true, many of them took arms in their own defence, being conſtrained thereto by horrid oppreſſion and diſmal tyranny, and at laſt ſome renounced the authority of the two tyrants, but not till after they had been denounced, intercommuned, and put from under the protection of the laws of their country; and if that was rebellion, ſo was the revolution: but the accuſation of their enemies on this ſcore deſerves very little regard, ſince after the Revolution, the forfeitures paſſed in theſe two reigns were reverſed by act of parliament, and they who were moſt active, in the defence of themſelves and their religious and civil rights, are expreſſly mentioned, as Mr John King, Mr John Kid, Mr william and Alexander Gordons, elder and younger of Earlſtoun, Henry Hall of Haughhead, Mr Cargil, Mr Robert Baily of Jerviſwood, Archibald Earl of Argyll, George Earl of Melvil, nay, and Mr James Renwick, &c. &c. &c. The reader may ſee the act in the laſt number of Mr Wodrow's appendix to his ſecond volume.

Little regard, I conceive, is to be paid to what others have alledged, that many of them threw away their lives, and that they ſuffered only for trifles; nay, if that was the caſe, was it not baſe for the miniſters of ſtate, and others, in this diſmal period, to ſhed the blood of ſo many innocent people for trifles? But was it a trifling matter to act againſt their conſciences, to renounce their principles, to own the authority of a Prince who had uſurped the authority of Chriſt over his own church, and that in the very exerciſe of his uſurpation? But I ſhall not here anticipate what the reader will, I hope, find cleared up in the the hiſtory. In ſhort, they were brave martyrs for their religion and liberties, and a covenanted work of reformation, in oppoſition to Popery, Prelacy, Eraſtianiſm, &c. and it is well known, that whatever reſiſtance was made by any Preſbyterians during the ſway of tyranny and arbitrary power, yet they of that denomination have ever ſhewn themſelves ſtrict adherers and firm friends to legal government.

As the following hiſtory is intended to preſerve the memory of thoſe who ſuffered for their religion and liberties, ſo it gives us a view of what may be expected, ſhould ever the Pretender, or any of his race, aſcend the Britiſh throne; or ſhould ever Prelacy, not to ſpeak of Popery, be eſtabliſhed in Scotland. It is a juſt obſervation of the author of the Memoirs of the church of Scotland, p 194. 'That Epiſcopacy never got ground in 'that kingdom but by violence, and never failed to exer'ciſe what power it had there to oppreſs and deſtroy its 'oppoſers, being always animated with a ſpirit of perſecution in the church, and abſolute tyranny in the ſtate,' as will appear moſt evident from the following work; in which we have a view of the diſmal methods the Prelats and their abbetors were pleaſed to take to ſupport their power, and that they never ceaſed to vent a ſpirit of perſecution againſt their fellow Proteſtants while they were able; and there are not wanting proofs that the Epiſcopalians have ſhewen the ſame inclinations to this day, and only want an opportunity to give further demonſtrations of them. As they were inveterate enemies to the revolution, ſo they have made many attempts, ſince that time to overturn our preſent happy ſettlement, and bring us again under the intolerable yoke: but by the interpoſition of a kind providence, all their counſels have hitherto been defeated, and all their meaſures diſconcerted. And happy was it for thoſe nations that it was ſo, for, had they ſucceeded, we could have expected nothing but that the ſame bloody ſcene, that is here preſented, would have been opened again, and the ſame methods of oppreſſion and tyranny made uſe of. It has been alleged, that we had nothing to fear, becauſe their king, as they call him, would have come under the moſt ſolemn engagements to maintain the Proteſtant religion. But who will queſtion that? Is it poſſible for him to come under ſtronger engagements than King Charles II. or make fairer promiſes than his pretended father James VII? The Pope no doubt, would give him liberty to ſwear all the oaths that could be invented, and break them too whenever it ſhould be in his power. Popiſh princes may promiſe and ſwear whatever they have a mind, but they cannot perform what they pleaſe, becauſe their conſciences are in the keeping of others, to whom they ſtand ſolemnly engaged, as their infallible guides in matters of religion.

Had therefore the Jacobites been ſo numerous or powerful as to ſucceed in their deſigns, and raiſe the Pretender to the throne, to what dreadful circumſtances muſt the nation have been reduced? Would not the Pretender have reſented to the higheſt, the oppoſition made by the Preſbyterians to his pretended father and himſelf, or the inviolable attachment they have retained to the Revolution-ſettlement, and the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover.

As all firm Proteſtants in England appeared againſt every attempt made in favour of that abjured race, ſo the Preſbyterians in Scotland were exceeded by none in ſtanding up for the preſent happy eſtabliſhment. With what firmneſs and conſtancy, with what boldneſs, reſolution and courage, did they eſpouſe and plead for this cauſe, even in the preſence of the Rebels themſelves, when it was not in their power to oppoſe their ravages? How miniſters expoſed themſelves to the fury of the enemy, by praying for King George, preaching againſt Popery and Rebellion, &c. &c. is well known. What then muſt they, and all the other hearty friends of their King and country, expect, ſhould it ever be in the power of this emiſſary of Rome and France to revenge his quarrel? if their ſufferings were ſo great under Charles and James, what they muſt be under this bigotted tool is eaſy to conceive.

This work is alſo deſigned to convince all true Proteſtants, eſpecially thoſe of the church of Scotland, what obligations we are under to God, for the remarkable interpoſition of his providence, in delivering theſe nations from the intolerable yoke of a race of Tyrants, who did all they could to eſtabliſh arbitrary power, and ſubvert the conſtitution of the kingdom; a race who paid no regard to promiſes, oaths and laws; a race who ſtudied more to gratify the French King than how to conſult the happineſs of their own ſubjects: for who can read an account of the miſeries of the nation under their tyranny, and not ſee the greatneſs of that mercy in delivering us from them? eſpecially when we conſider, that the ſame providedce to which ſuch a deliverance was owing, has frequently ſince appeared in defeating all the attempts that have been made to enſlave us.

But have our returns of gratitude been anſwerable to the greatneſs of our mercies? What means then that deluge of atheiſm, blaſphemy and profaneneſs, that ſo much abounds? whence are the complaints of the more ſerious in all places of the nation, of a lamentable courſe of defection from our Reformation-principles? And, in a particular manner, whence is it that ſo many worthy perſons have ſeceded from the judicatories of the church of Scotland? And how comes it, that many of thoſe, who have not ſeceded, are ſo much diſſatisfied with the conduct of theſe judicatories? For my own part, though I look upon ſeceſſion to be a very tender point, yet I cannot in charity think that ſome of thoſe that have ſeceded, however they might have carried matters ſo far, have acted without any provocation; but, as I know not the ſprings of the conduct of the different parties now in Scotland, I ſhall only ſay, that, where diviſions prevail, matters are generally carried to extremeties on all hands, and, in order to a reconciliation, conceſſions ought to be made by all the parties, if it can be done without making truth a ſacrifice to peace. May God himſelf heal our diviſions, put a ſtop to our defections, unite the hearts of all who have a real concern for the advancement of his glory, and revive a work of reformation among all ranks and degrees of perſons.

I have heard it objected, that a hiſtory like this ſhould not be publiſhed, becauſe it may give offence to the Epiſcopal church of England. But what ground there is for this, is not eaſy to be imagined, unleſs we ſhould ſuppoſe the preſent biſhops of England, of the ſame perſecuting diſpoſition with the old Scots biſhops, or with ſeveral of their own predeceſſors; which is not the caſe; for though according to true Preſbyterian principles, Prelacy is bad in itſelf, and contrary to the word of God; yet the preſent Prelates, to their honour I ſpeak it, have not ſhewn the leaſt inclination to perſecute thoſe of different ſentiments from themſelves; ſo that it would be a reflection upon them to ſuppoſe that they would be offended at a hiſtory of the State and Sufferings of the Church of Scotland. And what if they ſhould be offended? muſt truth be concealed for fear of giving offence? There is no queſtion but it may offend the Scots Epiſcopalians, who are generally Jacobites, as they have ever been ſince the Revolution: however, I neither court their favour nor regard their reſentments, as they have always appeared, not only of a perſecuting ſpirit, but alſo enemies to their country and our preſent happy eſtabliſhment.

It has alſo been urged, that a hiſtory of this nature can only ſerve to revive old quarrels; but thoſe perſons do not conſider what attempts have been made to bring us under the old yoke of bondage, how the enemies of our preſent happy conſtitution have once more endeavoured to ſubvert it; and therefore, as the Rev. Mr Wodrow publiſhed his hiſtory a few years after the unnatural rebellion in 1715, to many of my friends, both in England and Scotland, have thought it both proper and ſeaſonable that this ſhould appear in the world after the rebellion in the year 1745. If was the Jacobites that revived old animoſities: and this hiſtory, as has been already obſerved, ſhews the miſeries in which we ſhould have been involved, had God, in judgment for our many defections, and the crying abominations of the land, permitted them to be ſucceſsful. If it be further conſidered what a degree of reformation the church of Scotland attained to, both with reſpect to doctrine, worſhip, diſcipline and government, and how zealouſly our worthies reſiſted even unto blood, a faithful account of theſe things has rather a tendency to excite to a holy a holy concern, for having a ſtop put to the defections of the preſent degenerate age, for a revival of a work of reformation, and for quickening our reſentments againſt popery, prelacy, and every thing that tends to reduce us to that ſtate of ſlavery and perſecution deſcribed in the following work.

When I firſt engaged in this undertaking, I only intended to abridge Mr Wodrow's hiſtory; but, at the advice of many friends, I was induced to bear other helps for making the hiſtory of this perſecuting period more clear and full. Accordingly, when I mention any thing not to be found in Wodrow, I generally tell my author; ſo that I though there is nothing thought material in that author which I have omitted, yet the author will find many things of conſequence in the following work, which the other takes no notice of.

But, inſtead of the great number of letters that paſſed between Sharp and Mr Douglas, and others, which make up the greateſt part of Mr Wodrow's introduction, I thought it would be more to the advantage of the curious reader, to give a ſhort account of the moſt remarkable tranſactions of the Church of Scotland from the Reformation; but I am ſorry that I have it to ſay, that, after the end of Calderwood's hiſtory, there is a chaſm in the hiſtory of the Church of Scotland, from the death of king James VI. to the Reſtoration, though it appears, from Mr Wodrow's Preface, that there are ſufficient materials, not only for rendering the hiſtory of that church, from the Reformation to the death of the ſaid prince, more perfect, but alſo for continuing the ſame down to the Reſtoration; and therefore I am of opinion, it would be of great ſervice, if they, in whoſe hands theſe materials are, would favour the world with them.

It is not for me to ſpeak much concerning my own performance, which muſt ſtand or fall according to the judgment of others; and indeed, it would be an unpardonable piece of vanity, ſhould I pretend to have given a perfect or faultleſs hiſtory. There will doubtleſs be found ſeveral miſtakes; and therefore I ſhall take it very kind in my friends, if they find any thing in this work, either miſtaken, or through inadvertency miſrepreſented, to let me know it, that, if I have another opportunity, I may rectify the ſame. However, I have endeavoured to ſet things in as clear a light as I could. And for this end have reduced the facts mentioned, as much as poſſible, in the order of time when they happened, and where my reader is at a loſs to underſtand the Scoticiſms which occur through the book, he will have recourſe to the gloſſary at the end thereof.

As to the unhappy differences that aroſe among the Preſbyterians, concerning the indulgence, the paying of ceſs, the toleration of king James, &c. I have given the reader an account of what was ſaid by both parties, in as fair and candid a manner as I could: and ſome, perhaps, will think it had been much to the advantage of the common cauſe, againſt popery and prelacy, had the contending parties ſhewn more Chriſtian forbearance than it appears they did. Many worthy and holy men thought it their duty to accept of the indulgence, &c. and the generality of the Preſbyterians embraced the toleration; and their conduct was, perhaps, too ſeverly cenſured by thoſe who could not comply, ſo thoſe non-complyers were too bitterly exclaimed againſt by others; but ſuch are the conſequences when diviſions prevail.

If I had been favoured with more materials than I could have recourſe to, as the manuſcript hiſtory of the Rev. Mr Ward, ſome things might poſſibly have appeared in a clearer light. The Rev. Mr Wodrow told my honourable friend Sir Thomas Gordon of Earlſtoun, that, had he ſeen that hiſtory, and the letters that paſſed between the ſocieties in Scotland and their correſpondents in England, his hiſtory would have had a different turn; I thought it therefore my duty to apply for the ſaid hiſtory, but could not obtain it. Upon the whole, I have given a full and diſtinct account of what happened, during thoſe two infamous reigns, as I could; and if the imperfections or miſtakes in this performance ſhall excite any better qualified for ſuch an undertaking, to favour the world with a more diſtinct account of theſe things, I ſhall be very well ſatisfied, and ſhall not be altogether diſappointed in my deſign of publiſhing this.

I ſhall only add, That I have, in this edition, corrected many literal miſtakes, which had ſome way been overlooked in the firſt, and made a few alterations and additions, which, I hope, will render this ſtill more uſeful.

To the AUTHOR of the HISTORY of the STATE and SUFFERINGS of the CHURCH of SCOTLAND.

By THOMAS GIBBONS.

THE ſcenes of diſtant æras to diſcloſe,
Paint o'er their bleſſings, and recal their woes,
To ſet each virtue in it's native light,
And from each vice to ſtrike the cloud of night;
To trace a country's genius, ſtrength and laws,
Their various workings, and their latent cauſe,
Is Hiſtory's great taſk; and thus thy page
Unfolds, O CROOKSHANK! the departed age.
Of late Rebellion, like ſome ſudden ſtorm,
That dares the boſom of the deep deform,
And ſtrives to mingle in one wreck of woe,
Earth, air, and ſkies, and ocean's gulph below,
With gloomy tempeſts our horizon ſpread,
And thunder'd inſtant ruin o'er our head;
But, thanks to Heav'n, the dreaded danger paſt
Britannia ſmiles triumphant from the blaſt.
Yet ſtill ſome minds (while raving frenzy ſings Of richer bleſſings under worthier kings)
Would fain renew the wild deſtructive rage,
Dethrone our monarch, o'er our golden age
The rayleſs glooms of Popiſh error caſt,
And bind us in eternal fetters faſt.
O may ſuch minds, for ev'n ſuch minds remain
In Britain's realms beneath a Brunſwick's reign!
Roll back the annals of preceding times.
The people's miſeries, and the monarch's crimes;
Then match the horrors with our happy days,
Enjoy the bliſs, and ſhout the thankful praiſe.
In Mary's reign, her guardian promiſe broke,
Our land received the Antichriſtian yoke;
Beat were our fathers with the iron load,
That gall'd their ſhoulders, and that drunk their blood
Whom ſee I there the murd'rer's chain partake,
Corded and burning at the ſocial ſtake?
Ridley and Latimer; illuſtrious pair!
This all their guilt.—to live divinely fair,
And reſolutely good;—nor theſe alone,
Hark, from the realm the univerſal groan!
Triumphant Pop'ry hurls the flaming brand,
And martyr'd victims blaze through all the land.
Mary no more; the bloody harpy flies
From Albion's cliffs, and ſeeks her Weſtern ſkies;
But ſtill it's genius half ſurvives behind,
And half infects the brave Eliza's mind:
On Puritans, averſe to modes and forms,
She bends her brow in unrelenting ſtorms:
The deep damp dungeon wails with pious breath,
And cords and gibbets ſhriek with guiltleſs death.
James mounts the throne; but proud of empty fame,
Extravagantly liſts the royal name;
Monarch's muſt ſhake an undiſputed rod,
And nations bow to their deſpotic nod:
He dies,—but, oh! the father's madneſs lays
The ground of woes for his ſucceſſor's days:
Then Prelacy, by regal pow'r ſuſtain'd,
The native freedom of our ſoul's reſtrain'd,
Then great in vengeance roſe pontific Laud,
Rear'd his tribunal, and the kingdom aw'd:
The ſcourge was crimſon'd with the Tyrant's rage,
And life long priſons mourn'd the iron age.
Next Charles the ſon aſſum'd imperial ſway,
And Britons hop'd a more propitious ray,

But hop'd in vain; for from its duſt aroſe,
Graſping ten thouſand thunders for its foes,
Prelatic pow'r. What numbers ſhall relate
Its headſtrong fury, and its iron weight?
The ſtars that blaz'd in Albion's hemiſphere,
And long diſpens'd, unclouded radiance there,
No more were ſuffer'd to indulge their light,
Torn from their orbs, and ſunk in endleſs night.
On all that durſt not to the mitre bow,
Harſh laws were yok'd, and edg'd with penal woe,
Charg'd from the throne, here all rapacious theft
Widows and orphans of their mites bereft.
Here cruelty the royal mandate pleads
For peace moleſted, and inhuman deeds:
Aſſembled ſaints, their paſtors at their head,
Theſe met to give, and thoſe to take the bread,
Were dragg'd by wolves, to ev'ry pity ſteel'd,
From the thick woodland or ſequeſter'd field,
To ſhare with thieves their half-defrauded cell,
And there in long and painful durance dwell.
But Albion bears the lighter lot of ills;
See the thick tempeſt burſts in Scotia's hills:
See, by that Prince, the ſacred compact torn,
Who late to guard th' uninjur'd rights had ſworn:
See at his nod Epiſcopacy ſpread,
Its ſov'reign mitre tow'ring on its head;
Pale famine, rage, and terror lead its way,
And death upholds the ſtandard of its ſway.
'Tis not enough felonious caves to fill,
'Tis not enough for cords and ſteel to kill;
But on the ancle the ſharp wedge deſcends,
The bone reluctant with the iron bends,
Cruſh'd is its frame, blood ſpouts from ev'ry pore,
And the whole marrow ſwims in purple gore.
Next James ſucceeds; and ſtill the ſlaughter ſpread,
And blacker woes impended o'er our head:
Pop'ry, before unwilling to be known,
Tempts a bold flight, and ſeats her on the throne;
'Triumphant wantons in the tyrant's ray,
Her talons whet, and dooms the world her prey.
Then Monmouth's ſtar, aſcending in the weſt,
Appears, but ſinks with crimſon clouds oppreſt;
While dogs of death, commiſſion'd to deſtroy,
Ruſh, rend, and havoc with remorſeleſs joy:
The weſtern vales unbounded murder fills,
And Scotia wails thro' her unnumber'd hills.
But ſee from Belgia's leſs'ning ſtrands advance,
While gales exulting in the ſtreamers dance,
The great Naſſau; to Albion's coaſt he bends,
The firſt of heroes, and the beſt of friends.
The ocean, proud the bleſſing to convey,
Wafts him with ſpeed along the wat'ry way.
See on our ſhores he brave Deliv'rer ſtand
Loud ſounds th' extatic welcome o'er the land,
While abject tyranny avoids the ſight,
As rav'ning wolves deteſt the riſing light;
And now his angels and his own renown
With peaceful olives leads him to the throne
Triumphant; recreant at his vital ſmile
Religion blooms, and Freedom o'er our Iſle
Shoots her glad array; and ſtill the bliſs divine
Full and unclouded ſhines in Brunſwick's line:
Oh! may it ſhine, till time has ſpent its ſtore,
Till Heav'ns revolving fire ſhall blaze no more,
Till that great day ſhall break upon our eyes,
That melts the ball, and takes us to the ſkies,
Where pure Religion o'er the bliſsful plains
Pour her eternal beam, and endleſs Freedom reigns.

To all into whoſe hands the following HISTORY ſhall come eſpecially the Succeſſors of thoſe whoſe ſufferings are therein related.

"THE righteous ſhall be in everlaſting remembrance *," ſaid the Pſalmiſt; and the ſacred hiſtory doth abundantly demonſtrate how dear unto the Lord the memory of thoſe are, who have had trial of cruel mockings and ſcourgings; yea moreover, of bonds and impriſonments; who were—tempted were ſlain with the ſword: —who wandered about in ſheep ſkins and goat ſkins in the deſarts and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth, being deſtitute, afflicted, tormented *." And tho' to ſuch of our anceſtors as have not only endured the like, but farther ſufferings, as 'quenching the violence of fire †', and facing the ox, the gibbet, and other engines of torture, not accepting deliverance, it will be infinitely more than a ſufficient reward, that they ſhall on that account be acknowledged before the Father, at the ſecond coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; yet gratitude, and the deference we owe unto their judgment and authority, oblige us to perpetuate the memory of their zeal, their courage, their faithfulneſs and patience, and to examine the principles and points of teſtimony for which they ſuffered, that, if agreeable to the divine pattern, (of which, for my own part, I have no doubt) we may tread in their ſteps, and, as opportunity is offered, imitate their example.

And, as this leſſon is taught us by revelation, ſo may it be inferred from the very dictates of reaſon. The practice of all nations doth give ſuffrage unto this, That what is tranſmitted by the parents, not only deſerves the preference in point of enquiry, but generally obtains the preeminence in reſpect of influence; a title, an eſtate, office, or whatever elſe hath been our father's, is more dearly accounted of by us than that of any other; yea, amongſt the rudeſt of the Heathen idolaters, the traditions, rites, and ceremonies of the fathers are held in reverend eſtimation with their children. And ſhall we be leſs zealous for our holy religion, than they are for their idolatry? 'Hath a nation changed their gods which yet are no gods: and ſhall we change our glory for that which doth not profit,' or forego a profeſſion of and adherence to our attained to reformation? Surely this were directly repugnant to 'a knowing the God of our fathers, and walking before him with a perfect heart.'

The grounds upon which our fathers ſuffered, viz. the alone headſhip and ſovereignty of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt over his church, as his free and independent kingdom, the ſpiritual and intrinſic power of the church, the divine right of preſbytery, as the only government thereof appointed in his word, and the covenant obligations which the nation hath come under unto God, are no novel tenets: they were not eſpouſed only by our martyrs, nor were peculiar unto the period wherein they ſuffered, but were introduced with our reformation from popery, and, when true religion and holineſs flouriſhed amongſt us, were accounted our glory. While we walked in theſe paths, the Lord was with us, and owned us remarkably both as a church and nation.

But, alas! it is both our ſin and our ſhame, that, being weighed in our own balance, we are found wanting: for, without reckoning upon the multitudes who are given up to a ſpirit of deiſm and infidelity, are not the practices of profeſſors diſagreeable to the rule of the Lord's word? Either a deteſtable neutrality and indifference, inconſiſtent with the belief of one Lord, one faith, and one rule of life, hath crept in amongſt us, or a ſtraitning of the door of church-communion and fellowſhip is like to be carried the length of eradicating love, the neceſſary cement of union amongſt the brethren. Becauſe our ſins againſt the Lord are encreaſed; he hath 'mingled a perverſe ſpirit in the midſt of us, which cauſeth us to err in every work,—as a drunken man ſtaggereth in his vomit, and we eat every man the fleſh of his own arm. The yoke of our tranſgreſſion is bound by his hand, it is wreathed and come up upon our neck; and in the day of our calamity he hath covered us with a cloud in his anger, that, like the blind, we grope for the wall, and cannot find either our ſin or our duty. Some cry, that there be many of our prophets who have not diſcovered our iniquity to turn away our captivity; and others complain, that not a few of them have ſeen for us falſe burdens and cauſes of baniſhment: and, for all this, the Lord's anger is not turned away, but his hand is ſtretched out ſtill. When thus it is with us, have we not reaſon to cry out, Alas! who ſhall live when God doth this? Or, with the men of Bethſhemiſh, who ſhall ſhall ſtand before this holy Lord God? Surely it is meet to be ſaid unto God, ſhew me wherefore thou contendeſt with me; I have born chaſtiſement, I will not offend any more; that which I ſee not, teach thou me —until the Lord ſhall reveal it unto us, and in the mean time, as far as preſent circumſtances will permit, let us walk by the ſame rule, and mind the ſame thing.'

It remains to be noticed, that though it was propoſed to have prefixed recommendations to this edition, and though part of theſe were obtained, and others could eaſily have been procured from ſeverals who were ſuppoſed moſt acceptable; yet ſome, nearly concerned in, and encouragers of this edition, having ſignified a diſlike of any recommendations, as unneceſſary, conſidering the good acceptation the former editions met with, and that laudable deſign ſupport themſelves, I have therefore been prevailed with to leave out all recommendations whatever.

The Reader will alſo obſerve, that the author's marginal explication of Scots words in the former impreſſion, are, for eviting repetitions, ſubjoined by way of gloſſary at the end of the ſecond volume of this, and that wherever there is a reference in this, by an aſterriſm, thus [*] it is to former pages of the Hiſtory itſelf, that whoever wants to ſee the connection of things may have the more eaſy recourſe unto them.

I have ſaid nothing to the advantages this edition muſt have of the firſt, from the firſt corrections thereon, and even additions made thereto, theſe being acknowleged by the reverend Author in the end of his preface, and will be obvious to any who will take the trouble to compare this with the former edition.

That the preſent republication may be of uſe, and have a due effect upon you all, is the earneſt deſire of,

Your much obliged, and moſt obedient humble ſervant,

INTRODUCTION, containing the moſt remarkable Occurrences of the Church of Scotland from the Reformation.

OUR hiſtorians generally agree, that Chriſtianity was planted in Scotland, a few years after the aſcenſion of our Saviour, by ſome of the diſciples of the apoſtle John, who fled thither to avoid the perſecution of the bloody tyrant Domitian, though it was not publicly profeſſed till the beginning of the third century, when Donald I. his Queen, and ſeveral of the nobles were ſolemnly baptized. That Prince did his utmoſt to extirpate idolatry, and ſettle a goſpel miniſtry, but was not able to accompliſh his pious deſign, by reaſon of the continual wars in which he was engaged with the Romans.

But afterwards Chriſtianity was much promoted by ſeveral miniſters and private Chriſtians, who were obliged to come from the ſouth parts of Britain, on account of the perſecutions under Aurelius and Dioclefian. And theſe, for their ſingle and retired life, were called Monachi, or Monks by abbreviation; and, for their diligence in the worſhip and ſervice of God, Colidei, or Culdees. The overſeers of them were commonly termed, by the writers of that time, Scotorum Epiſcopi, the biſhops of the Scots, though without any definition of place, or pre-eminence of one above another.

For many years the Scots had nothing to do with the biſhop of Rome; for as the goſpel was planted among them without his help, ſo they retained it in its purity, till, in proceſs of time, they became infected with the Pelagian herſy. Caleſtine, then biſhop of Rome, is ſaid to have ſent Palladius into Britain, to aid the orthodox inhabitants againſt this ſpreading contagion. Eugenius II. hearing of his ſucceſs in the ſouthern parts, ſent for him to Scotland. He came; and, having been of great ſervice in ſuppreſſing this herſy, at laſt ſo far inſinuated himſelf into the hearts of the people, that he obtained their conſent to have the government of the church changed into prelacy. Boëtius, John Mair, John Leſlie, John of Fordon, Baleus of the Britiſh writers, Baronius, Proſper, &c. as my author evinces, all maintain, that the Scots, before Palladius, had no biſhops at all, or at leaſt their biſhops were not of any diſtinct order from other prieſts or Culdees, by whom they were ordained.

Thus matters continued, for near 1000 years after Chriſt; but, after that time, Satan being let looſe from his chains and priſon of darkneſs, as the General Aſſembly 1690 expreſſes it, began to trouble and almoſt ruin the church, and, by his arts, brought matters to that paſs, that for the ſpace of 500 years, a perpetual and almoſt univerſal night of errors ſat down upon her. Notwithſtanding, the Lord had his witneſſes in Scotland, who, even during the above time of groſs darkneſs, bore an honourable teſtimony to his truth, in oppoſition to the errors and idolatries of popery; and, about the year 1494, the reformation began to dawn, and the light of the goſpel to ſhine again in ſeveral parts of the country, and particularly in the ſhire of Ayr; which ſo enraged the Romiſh prelates, and our rulers then influenced by them, that with fire and faggot they endeavoured to deſtroy all that profeſſed the true religion *. Howbeit, the bleſſed Bible having got in amongſt the people in ſeveral parts of the country, and being ſeconded with the powerful teaching of the Holy Spirit, prevailed ſo far, that, about the year 1535, a farther work of reformation began to be carried on by ſome eminent perſons whom God raiſed up, particularly Mr John Knox whom both our own, and other reformed churches, have accounted a man truly worthy of great eſtimation; and the Lord's hand was ſo ſtrong upon theſe poliſhed ſhafts, that in the year 1557, not only the common people, but alſo the nobility and gentry, began to abhor the tyranny of the biſhops, and to doubt whether they could, without ſin, give their bodily preſence to the maſs, or offer their children to the Papiſtical baptiſm: whether thoſe that were in any public truſt could, with a

* Though it may ſeem inconſiſtent with our purpoſe to deſcend to particulars here, yet, conſidering that the burning of two of theſe, viz. Mr Patrick Hamilton, brother's ſon to the earl of Arran, in the 1527, and Mr George Wiſheart in the 1546, tended greatly to the ſpreading of the truth, through the enquiry made by many into the grounds of their ſufferings, we will take the liberty to hint at the honourable mention made of them by the famous hiſtorian Knox.

Of the former he relates, That, having returned to his own country from the univerſity of Wittemberg, the bright beams of the true light, which, by God's grace, was planted in his heart, began moſt abundantly to burſt forth, as well in public as in private, and the fame of his doctrine, a ſummary whereof is afforded us by that hiſtorian, ſo troubled the clergy, (though like life from the dead to many others) that they ſoon brought him to the end you have heard, which he endured with great patience, and admirable courage, and ended his days in the midſt of the devouring flame, ſaying, 'Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit. How long will darkneſs overwhelm this realm? and how long wilt thou ſuffer this tyranny of men?' And

Of Mr Wiſheart the ſame hiſtorian ſaith, He was a man of ſuch graces, as before him was never heard within this realm. He was not only ſingularly learned, as well in all godly knowlege, as in all honeſt human ſciences, but alſo he was ſo clearly illuminated with the ſpirit of prophec, (inſtances whereof are by that author condeſcended on) that he foreſaw ſeveral things pertaining to himſelf and others, to ſundry towns, and to the whole realm, as they afterwards felt, and which he foretold in the audience of many: but what more particularly calls for a thankful remembrance, eſpecially conſidering the time of it, was the great power and remarkable efficacy that accompanied and followed his miniſtry. The author of The fulfilling of the Scriptures, ſpeaking of the large meaſure of the Spirit which did convincingly follow the preaching of the goſpel in theſe laſt times, inſtanceth the great ſucceſs which did attend the miniſtry of Mr Wiſheart in Scotland---whence ſo great a change did quickly follow in theſe places where he preached, through Angus, Lothian, and the weſtern parts, and how much the ſpirits of the people were then raiſed and affected with the word. And Mr Knox relates, That Mr Wiſheart made ſo notable a ſermon at Ayr, as enemies themſelves were confounded.---Again, of another at Mauchlin, where ſome of the moſt wicked were converted: and that he having returned to Dundee, while the plague, of which he foretold them, raged there, he ſtood betwixt the whole and the diſeaſed, and preached from Pſalm cvii. 20. 'He ſent his word and healed them;' whereby the hearts of moſt that heard him were ſo elevated, that they regarded no death, but judged them more happy who ſhould depart, than ſuch as ſhould remain behind, conſidering that they knew not if they ſhould have ſuch a comforter with them at all times.

safe conscience, serve the higher powers, in maintaining of idolatry, persecuting their brethren, and suppressing Christ's truth: or whether they might suffer their brethren to be executed for religion, without any declaration that such tyranny displeased them. And, from the scriptures, they were resolved, that a lively faith requires a plain confession when Christ's truth is impugned; and that not only they be guilty who do evil, but also they that consent to evil; and this they should do, if seeing such things openly committed they should be silent, and so allow whatever was done. From doubts they came to determinations, to endeavour that the glorious gospel should be preached, the holy sacraments truly ministred, and superstition, idolatry, and tyranny suppressed. For this end, having calculated both their right and their strength, they sent eminent persons to the remote parts of the kingdom, to incite the gentlemen and boroughs, to adhere to the mutual defence of religion, and of one another in the profession thereof. Accordingly, upon the 3d of December 1557, several of the nobility and others met at Edinburgh, where they entered into a bond, covenant, or association, wherein they promised, before God and his congregation, "That, by his grace, they would, with all diligence, apply their whole power, substance, and their very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the blessed word of God, and his congregation; and would labour, according to their power, to have faithful ministers, truly and purely to minister Christ's gospel and sacraments to his people; that they would maintain, nourish, and defend them, the whole congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, with their whole power, and hazard of their lives; and declare themselves manifest enemies to all superstitious abominations and idolatry." This was subscribed by the earls of Argyll, Glencairn, and Morton, Archibald Lord of Lorn, John Erskine of Dun, &c. who, after this, were called The Lords of the Congregation, and the people who adhered to them were called The Congregation.

And though in all this they proceeded with that moderation which became wise subjects, attempting nothing of themselves, without first supplicating the Queen regent for her concurrence, yet, at last, she appeared openly against the Reformers, and made preparations to suppress them openly by force; and in order to this, she summoned all the ministers in Scotland, to appear at Stirling, on the 10th of May 1559, which being understood, and endeavours for appeasing her proving abortive, it was agreed, That the gentlemen should accompany their preachers to the day and place appointed. Accordingly the town of Dundee, with the gentlemen of Angus and Mearns, came unarmed with theirs to Perth, and sent the Laird of Dun before, to assure the Queen that they came in a peaceable manner, only to give confession with their preachers; but they being numerous, she desired him, being one to whom they gave great ear, to intreat them to disperse; with which he readily complied, and by a letter to them, shewed what promise and hope he had of the Queen's favour, whereupon they resolved not to go forward: but she, like a true Papist, paying no regard to her promises, held the meeting intended, called over the names, and outlawed those that were absent for contempt.

The Lords of the Congregation, observing the storm that was coming upon them, assembled at Perth, May 31. and entered into another covenant, or association, for the defence of themselves and their religion; and, on the first of August that same year, they entered into another; and God so favoured their designs, that, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Queen regent and her French auxiliaries, they made their way, got possession of Edinburgh on the 17th of October 1559, and at last the whole government of the kingdom into their hands. And what contributed greatly to this remarkable æra, was the death of the Queen-regent upon the 10th of June 1560, and of Francis II. King of France, the same year, within a few months thereafter, whereby Mary, our Queen, having become a widow, and the popish party therewith much confounded, both she and they were, in a great measure, at the mercy of the Reformers.

In the mean time the privy council met, and, on the 29th of April that same year, gave orders to the ministers to assemble, and draw up in writing, and in a book, a common order for reformation and uniformity to be observed in the discipline and policy of the church: whereupon the first book of discipline was drawn up, and presented to the council on the 20th of May following. In this book the government of the church by prelates is overthrown, church-sessions are established, the thrusting ministers into reclaiming congregations is condemned, the way of the trial of ministers, contrary to the Episcopal method, is appointed, the superstitious observation of fast-days, or days dedicated to saints, is likewise condemned; and several other things tending to the right government of the church are determined. This was afterwards approved of by the council, who engaged to promote it to the utmost of their power, provided that the bishops, abbots, &c. should possess the revenues of their benifices during life.

It is true, Superintendents were allowed for a short space, because of the paucity of settled ministers, and void of literature in some, which the necessity of these times required a bearing with; yet so zealous were our first Reformers against Popery, that they would not acknowledge them to be Bishops, nor suffer any who had formerly born that character in the time of Popery, to enjoy the place and power of superintendents, lest those might be abused, and at last degenerate into the old power of the prelates. They were chosen by consent of the whole bounds where they were to visit, were tried and examined by the ministers in these bounds, and had neither the sole power of ordination nor excommunication. They were subject to the censure and excommunication of the province, who might, in some cases, depose them, or lay them aside. Their main work was preaching, for they were to preach at least thrice every week; and they had their own particular flocks besides, where they were to reside, except when they were visiting the bounds committed to their care: neither did they ever moderate, or preside, in general assemblies, unless they had been chosen by a majority of votes.

The book of policy being thus far settled, affairs rested for the present, until the meeting of a convention or parliament, the calling whereof was, by the treaty of peace concluded by the ambassadors of England and France, with the estates of Scotland, in Summer 1560, committed to a council of twelve.

In this parliament, which met in August 1560, the Reformers, by their order, drew up a large confession of their faith, which was read in the house, and then openly avowed, professed, and ratified by them; for hitherto they had only the Geneva confession, which was reckoned too brief and general. Further, this parliament made several acts against Popery, and in behalf of the Reformers, ordaining, that the Bishop of Rome, called the Pope, have no jurisdiction nor authority within this realm in any time coming; and that no bishop, or other prelate within this realm, use any jurisdiction for the time coming, by the said Bishop of Rome's authority, under pain, &c. And thus the reformed religion was established by law, and church government by prelates virtually discharged, because prelates then had no power but what they derived from Rome.

Popery and prelacy being thus discarded, the first General Assembly was held at Edinburgh, the 20th of December 1560, in which ministers and readers were appointed unto several parishes through the country; and it was ordered, that the election of ministers and elders should be in the public church; that intimation should be made the Lord's day preceding; and that a petition should be presented to the estates of the realm and lords of the privy council, craving, that all judges, magistrates, &c. should be professors of the truth according to the word of God.

A covention of estates met in January 1561, at which the book of discipline was subscribed by many of the nobility and gentry. But Queen Mary having arrived in Scotland from France, in the month of August following, had the mass said on the next Lord's day, which gave great offence to many; and particularly Mr Knox openly rebuked some of the courtiers, who, though professors, suffered this without opposition.

The

The ſecond national aſſembly met in December, when ſome debates aroſe concerning their meeting without the Queen's authority, and concerning the book of diſcipline; but matters were amicably adjuſted. At the next aſſembly in June 1562, it was ordained, That, at every aſſembly, ſuperintendents, miniſters, and elders, be tried concerning their life, doctrine, and the diſcharge of their office. And it is remarkable, that this aſſembly would not acknowledge Mr Alexander Gordon, Biſhop of Galloway, for a ſuperintendent, nor admit him to that charge, till they underſtood that the churches in Galloway had elected him, and till he had ſubſcribed the book of diſcipline.

The Queen's marriage with Henry Stuart, Lord Darnly, in July 1565, gave a general diſguſt. On the 19th of June next year, ſhe was brought to bed of a prince, afterwards James VI. The general aſſembly, ſitting at that time, ſent ſome of their number to congratulate her Majeſty, and to deſire the prince might be baptized in the Proteſtant church. But the Queen, diſregarding their reaſonable requeſt, ordered the Prince to be baptized after the Popiſh manner, at Stirling caſtle, by the Archbiſhop of St Andrews. Soon after King Henry was murdered by the Earl of Bothwel, who afterwards married the Queen, on the 15th of May 1567. This horrid ſcene, and many other acts of miſconduct, iſſued in the Queen's being obliged to reſign the government in favours of her ſon, who was proclaimed King of Scotland, and crowned the 29th of July. Mr Knox preached the coronation ſermon, and the Earl of Murray was made Regent, who next year, on the 13th of May 1568, defeated the Queen's forces in the battle of Langſide. Whereupon the Queen fled to England, where ſhe was afterwards beheaded.

In the midſt of theſe troubles the judicatories of the church convened, pariſhes had miniſters ſettled among them, and the diſcipline of the church was in a great meaſure eſtabliſhed. In this agreeable poſture matters continued for a few years; but Satan envying the proſperity of this infant church, excited ſome of the ſtateſmen againſt her, who, having poſſeſſion of the church rents, and the richeſt benefices, contrived a method for ſecuring the poſſeſſion of them to themſelves, by getting in ſome Tulchan biſhops *, as they were called, who might have the name of the whole benefice, but receive only a ſmall part, leaving the reſt in the hands of theſe nobles. Accordingly the Earl of Morton got the Earl of Marr, then Regent, to call an aſſembly at Leith, by means of the ſuperintendent of Fife, who, upon their meeting the 12th of January 1571, nominated ſix of their number to attend ſix appointed by the council; and theſe twelve agreed to ſeveral things tending to introduce the Prelates; and, according to theſe reſolutions, the Earl of Morton procured one Mr Douglas to be made biſhop of St Andrews, Mr Boyd of Glaſgow, Mr Paton of Dunkel, and Mr Graham of Dumblain.

Mr Knox was then at St Andrews, and refuſed to have any hand in ſetting apart the biſhop; nay, bore an open teſtimony againſt it. The general aſſembly, held at St Andrews the 6th of March, appointed ſome of their number to examine into theſe things.

On the 24th of November, the famous, pious, learned, and zealous Mr John Knox departed this life. The day before he died, he ſighed and groaned much in his ſleep; and when he awoke, one Campbell and one Johnſton, who attended him, having aſked him the reaſon, he anſwered, "In my time I have been often aſſaulted by Satan, and oft he hath caſt my ſins in my teeth, to bring me into deſpair, but God gave me grace to overcome all my temptations: and now that ſubtle ſerpent, who never ceaſed to tempt, hath taken another courſe, he ſeeks to perſuade me that my labours in my miniſtry, and the fidelity I have ſhewn in that ſervice, have merited heaven and eternal life. But bleſſed be God who brought to my mind theſe ſcriptures, 'What haſt thou that thou haſt not received?' and, 'Not I, but the grace of God in me.' Which he hath gone away aſhamed, and ſhall no more return. And now I am ſure my battle is at an end, for that, without pain of body, or trouble of ſpirit, I ſhall ſhortly change this mortal life for that happy and immortal life." After prayer he was aſked whether he had heard it? he replied, "Would God that ye had heard it with ſuch an ear and heart as I have." Then he ſaid, "Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit.' After which he ſpoke no more, but without any emotion reſigned his ſoul into the hands of his God and Father. Thus the church was deprived of a burning and a ſhining light.

The above mentioned innovations were ſo diſagreeable, that they were condemned by ſeveral after aſſemblies; and particularly, it was agreed by the general aſſembly in October 1578, that all biſhops already elected ſhall be required particularly to ſubmit themſelves to the general aſſembly, and if they refuſe, after admonition, the cenſure of excommunication was ordered to be paſſed upon them. And in the year 1580, the aſſembly unanimouſly ordained, That all who were called biſhops ſhould demit ſimpliciter, becauſe that office had no warrant in the word of God; and at the ſame time ordained provincial ſynods to call before them ſuch biſhops as lived in their bounds, and ordered them to give obedience to this act; whereupon preſbyteries began to be eſtabliſhed in this kingdom.

On the 28th of January 1581 *, the Confeſſion of Faith, or National Covenant, was ſubſcribed by the king and his houſhold, together with a great many others, and afterwards by all ranks in the land. In this confeſſion, under the name of Hierarchy, is condemned Epiſcopal government; ſo that one might think that Preſbyterial church-government was now eſtabliſhed upon ſure and laſting foundations. But the king had no reliſh for the preſbyterial eſtabliſhment, and had thoſe about him who increaſed his prejudices. In ſhort, he was in the hands of the duke of Lenox, the earl of Arran, and others, who were diſagreeable to the reſt of the nobility.

Wherefore, on the 20th of Auguſt 1582, happened the famous raid of Ruthven, when the earls of Marr and Gowrie, the maſter of Oliphant, young Lochleven, &c. came to Perth, after the king had returned from a hunting match in Athol, and conveyed him to Ruthven caſtle. At the ſame time they preſented a declaration, ſignifying the reaſons of their conduct, and then carried him to Stirling, where they gave him the full liberty of his perſon and government, only taking the adminiſtration out of the hands of Lenox and Arran. The king never forgave this attempt, but reſented it againſt the miniſters, as if they had been the chief inſtruments concerned. However, he complied with their terms, and publiſhed a proclamation for reſtoring the liberties of the kirk, with the freedom of her judicatures. The aſſembly ſat down in October and recognized the reformation, erected preſbyteries in the north of Scotland, and impowered them to ſummon the biſhops before them. And thus prelacy was born down, and the church had a little ſun ſhine: but the king ſecretly hated them, and, notwithſtanding all his ſubſcriptions and proclamations, was determined to run them down.

Accordingly, in May 1584, his Majeſty having got a parliament to his mind, they diſcharged all church judicatures, gave the king power over all cauſes eccleſiaſtical as well as civil, diſcharged all declining of him and his council in any matter under pain of treaſon, and likewiſe all miniſters to meddle, in their ſermons, with the affairs of his highneſs or the eſtate. But in this parliament matters were ſo ordered underhand by the court, that it ſeemed rather a private council than a parliament; the miniſters had no acceſs to be heard, and ſuch as proteſted againſt their illegal proceedings, as Mr James Lowſon and Mr Walter Balcanquel, were forced to fly into England to eſcape the fury of the prevailing party: Mr Andrew Melvil was likewiſe obliged to make his eſcape. Upon this the biſhops were appointed, who immediately exerciſed their tyranny and rage againſt the reſt of the miniſters, obliging them to proteſt obedience to them as their ordinaries, upon pain of baniſhment, confinement, &c. ſo that many were forced to retire, and none durſt ſo much as pray publicly for thoſe miniſters who fled, under the pain of treaſon. From this the author of the Memoirs of the Church of Scotland, p. 104. juſtly obſerves, That no ſooner was Epiſcopacy upon any occaſion ſet up in Scotland, but it began always to perſecute the Presbyterian church.

* N. B. In the title of the National Covenant, in the Confeſſion of Faith, it is ſaid, That it was ſubſcribed by the king's majeſty and his houſhold in the year 1581. The reaſon of the difference of the calculation here ſeems to be this, that the Engliſh (amongſt whom the National Covenant, as prefixed to the Weſtminſter Confeſſion, was firſt printed) do not begin their year till the 25th of March, whereas Calderwood reckons by the Scots calculation.

The parliament ſat again the 24th of Auguſt, and enjoined all miniſters and other eccleſiaſtical perſons to appear within forty days, and ſubſcribe the new conſtitution of the church, as it was called, and ſubmit to their dioceſan, on pain of loſing their ſtipends. This brought no ſmall trouble upon thoſe who refuſed, and many went into a voluntary baniſhment.

However, it was not long before matters took another turn. Epiſcopacy was not able to ſupport itſelf, ſo that aſſemblies and provincial ſynods were reſtored, and the king again profeſſed a ſingular regard for the presbyterial eſtabliſhment. In ſhort, matters were carried on with ſo much ſucceſs, that,

In the year 1590, the National Covenant was again ſubſcribed by all ſorts of perſons. The general aſſembly met at Edinburgh on the 4th of Auguſt, and then the king and the church ſeemed perfectly reconciled; for to the eight ſeſſion his majeſty came in perſon, and being ſeated in a chair of ſtate, the moderator, Mr Patrick Galloway, propoſed to him theſe three things, viz. The ratification of the liberties of the kirk; the purging of the land of Jeſuits, ſeminary prieſts, &c. and providing ſtipends or ſalaries in every pariſh for the miniſters. To the firſt the king anſwered, That in all parliaments the liberties of the church were firſt ratified; that they knew his good will to purge the land of Jeſuits; and for the third he referred them to the council, and deſired that Meſſ. Bruce, Lindſay, Pont, and the moderator, might be ſent as commiſſioners to treat on the ſubject. In a word, to pleaſe the aſſembly, he ſtood up, and taking off his bonnet, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, ſaid, "That he praiſed God that he was born in the time of the light of the goſpel, and in ſuch a place as to be king of ſuch a kirk, the ſincereſt kirk in the world. The kirk of Geneva keeps Paſch and Yule: what have they for them? they have no inſtitution. As for our neighbour kirk in England, their ſervice is but an ill ſaid maſs in Engliſh, they want nothing of the maſs but the liftings. I charge you, my good people, miniſters, doctors, elders, nobles, gentlemen, and barons, to ſtand to your purity, and to exhort the people to do the ſame, and I, forſooth, ſo long as I brook my life and crown, ſhall do the ſame." Thus the king flattered the aſſembly; and they were ſo moved with this unexpected declaration, that, for a quarter of an hour, there was nothing heard but praiſing God, and praying for the king.

While his majeſty continued in this mood all things went on eaſy, the church flouriſhed, her judicatures were acknowleged, and her prelatical enemies fell before her. On the 21ſt of May 1592, the aſſembly met, and agreed to preſent the following articles to the king. 1. That the acts of parliament made 1584, againſt the authority, diſcipline, and government of the church be reverſed, and the preſent government eſtabliſhed. 2. That the act of annexation be aboliſhed, and the patrimony of the church reſtored. 3. That abbots, priors, and other prelates, have no more liberty to vote in parliament. And, 4. That the country, which is fearfully polluted with idolatry and blood, be purged.

The aſſembly directed their brethren, and others who were appointed to preſent theſe articles, to go immediately to his majeſty, and admoniſh him gravely, in the name of the eternal God, to have reſpect in time to the ſtate of the true religion, to the many murders and oppreſſions daily multiplied through impunity and lack of juſtice, and to diſcharge the kingly office in both, as he will eſchew the fearful challenge of God, and avert his wrath off himſelf and the whole land: and, that he might be the better informed, to lay down the particulars to him, and crave his anſwer. The king did not much reliſh this faithful warning. However,

The parliament ſat down on the 29th of May, and ratified the privileges and government of the church, and particularly the powers of general aſſemblies, ſynods, presbytries, and kirks or kirk-ſeſſions, and reverſed the act 1584, granting commiſſion to biſhops and other judges conſtituted in eccleſiaſtical cauſes, &c. The miniſters improved theſe advantages, and their judicatures exerted themſelves to the utmoſt to ſuppreſs popery and profaneneſs. And the better to gain this great and important point,

The provincial ſynod of Fife met 1593 and gave it as their opinion, that commiſſioners repair to the king, "To tell plainly to his majeſty, that which all his true ſubjects think, touching his too much bearing with, favouring and countenancing of papiſtical teachers, his negligence in ſuppreſſing of idolatry and eſtabliſhing the kingdom of Chriſt within the realm; and to declare freely to his majeſty the reſolution of all his godly and faithful ſubjects, viz. That they are ready to give their lives rather than to ſuffer the ſame." Accordingly Mr Melvil and others were appointed. The ſynod next proceeded to excommunicate the popiſh lords, without regard to the countenance they received from his majeſty.

This plain dealing could not but excite the church's enemies to contrive methods for her overthrow. The papiſts, on the one hand, plainly perceived that they could have no quiet ſettlement in Scotland, unleſs the authority of the church was broken: and profane politicians and courtiers, on the other, not being able to bear the ſtrictneſs of the diſcipline eſtabliſhed, prevailed with the king, notwithſtanding of all his former promiſes and proteſtations, to oppoſe, and at laſt to overthrow it.

The aſſembly 1596 ſolemnly renewed the National Covenant, and made a faithful repreſentation to the king of the ſins of his perſon and family. But after that the church had not another like it during his reign, for ever after this he encroached upon their liberties; and, about the end of this year, a bond was deviſed to be ſubſcribed by all the miniſters of Scotland, on pain of loſing their ſtipends, in which they were to acknowlege the king as their ſovereign judge in all cauſes of ſedition and treaſon,—and of all their ſpeeches which may import the ſaid crimes, though uttered in the pulpit or any other place. This faithful miniſters would by no means ſubſcribe; becauſe, when they ſubſcribed the Confeſſion of Faith and National Covenant, they there acknowleged his majeſty's lawful authority; and becauſe they perceived that it was deviſed on purpoſe for a ſnare, and their ſubſcription would be a virtual acknowleging of the king as ſupreme and only judge of miniſters in all cauſes. Thus early did the church of Scotland teſtify againſt the eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy.

On the 27th of December a proclamation was publiſhed at the croſs of Edinburgh, requiring all magiſtrates, barons, and gentlemen of power, to interrupt miniſters, if they ſhould utter any ſpeeches tending to ſedition from their pulpits, in reproach, contempt, or diſdain of the king, his parents, or progenitors, his council, and their proceedings, to put them in ſure firmance till the king and council were advertiſed to take farther order, or at leaſt to hinder them from preaching within their bounds or juriſdictions. Theſe were great encroachments. The moſt of the miniſters refuſed the bond with abhorrence,

After this the king called a convention of miniſters to meet at Perth, the 28th of February 1597, the generality whereof were nominated by the king, and members came from the north in unuſual numbers: and therefore the honeſt part of the miniſters denied this to be a lawful aſſembly, and proteſted againſt it, and whatever ſhould be tranſacted in it. Eight presbyteries entirely oppoſed it, but eleven approved of it under the name of extraordinary. And as the members of this meeting were ſuch as generally ſubſcribed the bond, they gave way to his majeſty's meaſures.

The lawful aſſembly had been appointed to meet at St Andrews, whither Mr Robert Pont, the moderator of the laſt aſſembly, went on the 27th of April. Though the number of commiſſioners was but ſmall, yet they met in form, conſtituted themſelves regularly, and having begun the aſſembly with prayer, as uſual, and with the confeſſion of ſins, which had cauſed the preſent ſad alteration of affairs, they proteſted for the liberty of the church, and referred all other affairs to the next meeting.

Mean while the king appointed another aſſembly of his own model to meet at Dundee, in the month of May. The king's deſign, at this aſſembly, was to get the popiſh lords, who who had been excommunicated, abſolved, and the aſſembly at Perth acknowleged. By this time, one way or other, he got ſeveral of the poorer ſort of the miniſters to come in to his meaſures, ſome complying for preferment, and others for honour and profit; and thus a rent was made in the church, which grew wider and wider every day. Accordingly this aſſembly abſolved the lords, ratified the Perth aſſembly, ordained, that there be no meeting of miniſters without his majeſty's conſent; and indeed all eccleſiaſtical matters, which were to be treated in general aſſemblies, were, hence forward, firſt propoſed and determined by the king.

At his majeſty's deſire, this aſſembly chooſe fourteen of their number, authoriſing them, or any ſeven of them, to adviſe with him about a method of preſenting the petitions and grievances of the church, ſettling miniſters ſtipends, &c. However plauſible the pretences were for this commiſſion, yet the event ſhewed what was the real deſign; for ſoon after they gave in a petition to the parliament then ſitting, in the name of the church, (though falſly, for the main body of the church abhorred the thought of ſuch a thing) that miniſters, as repreſenting the church, the third eſtate of the kingdom, might have liberty to ſit and vote in parliament. The eſtates in parliament aſſembled, judging that there was no inconveniency in complying, being of opinion that no honeſt miniſter would aſſume any prelatical title, paſt the ſame into a law, and ordained, That ſuch paſtors and miniſters, as at any time his majeſty ſhall pleaſe to provide to the office, place, title and dignity of a biſhop, abbot, or other prelate, ſhall at any time hereafter have vote in parliament, as much as ever any eccleſiaſtical perſon had in times paſt, &c. And this was approved by the royal aſſembly, which met at Dundee the following March. At this aſſembly the king would ſuffer nothing to be done till Mr Andrew Melvil was removed. Nay, this Mr Melvil, together with Mr John Johnſton profeſſor of divinity in St. Andrews, were charged to depart out of the town under the pain of horning. When the act of approbation paſſed by a ſmall majority, after many threatnings to ſome, and promiſes to others, then Mr John Davidſon entered a ſolemn proteſt in his own name, and in the name of all the miniſters of Scotland who adhered to him, againſt that and the two preceeding aſſemblies, as void and null. It is certain their acts were afterwards reverſed, both by the parliament and aſſembly.

In ſhort, there were ſeveral meetings, as one at Falkland the 29th of July 1598, where were ſome debates upon this affair, and ſome cautions limiting theſe parliamentary miniſters, to propoſe nothing in parliament without expreſs warrant from the church, to be accountable to the general aſſembly, and ſubject to their preſbytery and ſynod, and every way to behave as other miniſters; and all theſe, and other neceſſary points, they were bound to ſwear and ſubſcribe, but all this was artifice, the better to bring in Epiſcopacy by art and flattery, and by degrees; for even Spotiſwood ſays, It was neither the king's intention, nor the minds of the wiſer ſort, to have thoſe cautions ſtand in force, but to have matters peaceably ended, and the reformation of the policy made (i. e. Epiſcopacy eſtabliſhed) without any noiſe. From hence it is plain, that Prelacy was eſtabliſhed in Scotland on the foundation of royal flattery and diſſimulation, and of open avowed perjury.

In July 1599, Monſieur Bethune arrived ambaſſador from the moſt Chriſtian king, for renewing the ancient league between France and Scotland; and in September following the king wrote a flattering letter to the Pope, at the inſtigation of ſecretary Elphingſton, intreating him to promote the biſhop of Vaizon, a Scotſman, to the dignity of a cardinal, that by his means there might be a correſpondence between the king and the court of Rome. In this letter his majeſty ſtyles the pope, Beatiſſime Pater, Pontifex Maximus, &c. The king afterwards pretended that another perſon wrote this letter, and that he ſigned it in haſte, in a croud of other papers which were to paſs the ſign-manual. The curious reader may ſee the letter itſelf in Calderwood's hiſtory p. 427, ſince I have not room to inſert it here.

On the 17th of November following began the famous conference at Holy-rood houſe, to which ſundry miniſters were ſummoned, but the king took care to ſecure a majority of his own party. For formality's ſake thoſe things were debated and reſolved, which his majeſty had before reſolved without debating. The queſtions were not, if the giving miniſters votes in parliament ſhould be confirmed; that was paſt already: but how many they ſhould be who ſhould chuſe, and what title they ſhould bear. In a word, their number and choice were left to the king, and it was propoſed that they ſhould have the title of biſhops: and thus a foundation was laid for bringing in of prelacy.

On the 19th of November 1601 the queen was delivered of a prince, afterwards king Charles I. Matters continued much in the ſame ſituation during the time the king continued in Scotland: the aſſemblies were abridged of their liberty, and the parliamentary miniſters were appointed. But,

About the end of March 1603, an expreſs arrived from England, with the news of the death of Queen Eliſabeth, and with letters of recognition from the privy-council there; upon which James was congratulated by the lords, &c. and proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland.

On the 3d of April he made a ſpeech in the great church of Edinburgh, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, 'As God hath promoted me to a greater power than I had, ſo I muſt endeavour to eſtabliſh religion, and to take away corruption in both countries. Ye need not doubt, but, as I have a body as able as any king in Europe, whereby I am able to travel, ſo I ſhall viſit you every three years at leaſt, or oftner, as I ſhall have occaſion, (for ſo have I written in my book directed to my ſon, and it were a ſhame to me not to perform that which I have written) that I may, with my own mouth, take account of the execution of juſtice of them that are under me; and that ye yourſelves may ſee and hear me, and from the meaneſt to the greateſt, have acceſs to my perſon, and pour out your complaints in my boſom. This ſhall ever be my courſe.'

Theſe were fair promiſes, but not one word of them was performed; for no ſooner did he become a king of an Epiſcopal Church, but, as was always natural to the ſpirit of Prelacy in Scotland, he became a perſecutor of that very church, which in the moſt ſolemn manner, he had declared to be the ſincereſt or pureſt church upon earth.

In the month of July 1606, the parliament met at Perth, and acknowledged his majeſty's ſovereign authority, princely power, royal prerogative and privilege of the crown, over all eſtates, perſons and cauſes, and reſtored the biſhops to the antient and accuſtomed honour, privileges, livings, lands, &c. and repealed the act of annexation; by which they were reſtored to their votes in parliament, and had the title of lords of parliament. But though they were thus advanced to civil dignities, yet no eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction was given them. The commiſſioners from the ſeveral preſbyteries through Scotland, being met at Edinburgh, gave in a moſt excellent proteſtation againſt this, in the name of the church in general, and in name of their preſbyteries from whom they had commiſſion in particular. This was ſubſcribed by a great many miniſters, and among others by Mr Adam Bannantine, Mr John Abernethy, and Mr William Couper, who afterwards became biſhops themſelves.

When prelates were thus advanced to their civil dignities, methods were next fallen upon to advance them to ſpiritual power. Accordingly, on the 10th of December this ſame year, an aſſembly was called to meet at Linlithgow; but then only ſome preſbyteries, in whom the king moſt confided, had notice of it; nay, matters were ſo ſecretly managed, that the moderator of the laſt aſſembly knew nothing of the matter. Here it was agreed, that there ſhould be conſtant moderators in preſbyteries choſen, and that, where the biſhops reſided, they ſhould moderate both in ſynods and preſbyteries. When this act came down refined from court, about half a year afterwards, all ſynods and preſbyteries were charged under pain of rebellion, to admit the conſtant moderators

This was ſo diſagreeable to the church of Scotland, that not one of the provincial ſynods accepted the conſtant moderator, except the ſynod of Angus, and even there it met with with no ſmall oppoſition. But the ſynod of Perth remarkably diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion, at their meeting in April 1607. Lord Scoon came with a commiſſion from the king, and threatned them in his majeſty's name, if they refuſed to admit a conſtant moderator. But, notwithſtanding all threatnings and unjuſtifiable inſults, Mr Row, their laſt moderator, took the roll of the ſynod in his hand, and, when Scoon would have pulled it out, Mr Row kept his hold, and called all the names of the members, who choſe Mr Henry Livingſton for their moderator. He beginning with prayer, according to the cuſtom of the judicatories at that time, Scoon profanely interrupted him, and threw down the table, but he ſtill continued. In ſhort, when they returned to the next meeting, the church doors were ſhut againſt them, ſo that they were obliged to meet at the ſouth-church door, and agreed, that every preſbytery, at their firſt meeting after the ſynod, ſhould chuſe their own moderator.

In the month of February 1610, a commiſſion given under the great ſeal to the two archbiſhops, together with ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen, to hold two courts of high commiſſion, was proclaimed at the croſs of Edinburgh; by virtue of which the archbiſhops, &c. obtained power to excommunicate, impriſon, fine and confine, for cauſes eccleſiaſtic, whether in doctrine or manners, whether in noblemen, miniſters, or common people; and there was ſcarce any kind of injuſtice or oppreſſion that was not practiſed in conſequence of this.

And that the biſhops might have the ſanction of a general aſſembly, one of the king's appointment was held at Glaſgow in June. All the conſtant moderators, who had their hundred pounds a-year, reſorted to this pretended aſſembly. The earl of Dunbar was ſent thither with a ſtrong guard to intimidate the miniſters, ſo that ſeveral, who were coming from the weſt to proteſt, were forced to return back. There was likewiſe money brought to hire votes. At this corrupt meeting it was, among other things, agreed, that the calling of aſſemblies belonged to the king, that every miniſter, at his admiſſion, ſhall ſwear obedience to his ordinary; that ſynods ſhould be moderated by prelates; that no miniſter ſhall preach or write againſt the acts of this aſſembly; and that the queſtion about the parity or imparity of miniſters, ſhall not be mentioned in the pulpit, upon pain of deprivation, &c. But though theſe were great encroachments, yet there was not a word of this meeting concerning the conſecration of biſhops.

However, it was judged neceſſary that the biſhops elect ſhould be conſecrated by ſome of the ſame order; for this purpoſe the king ſent for three of them into England viz. Mr Spotiſwood archbiſhop of Glaſgow, Mr Lamb biſhop of Brechen, and Mr Hamilton biſhop of Galloway, and iſſued a commiſſion under the great ſeal, to the biſhops of London, Ely, Bath Wales, and Rocheſter, requiring them to proceed to the conſecration of the above mentioned biſhops according to the Engliſh ordinal. They were accordingly conſecrated in the Chapel at London-houſe, October 21. 1610. In the month of December the three conſecrated biſhops returned to Scotland, and conſecrated Mr George Gladſtones archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and in January and February 1611, the reſt of the biſhops were conſecrated, ſome at St. Andrews, and ſome at Leith.

Thus the original conſtitution of the church of Scotland was overturned by an uſurped authority, and other violent and indirect means, contrary to the inclinations of the people, and the repeated proteſtations of the aſſembly. Biſhop Burnet, though an adverſary, in the hiſtory of his own times, acknowleges that great oppoſition was made to all theſe ſteps; and adds, that the whole force of the government was ſtrained to carry elections to thoſe meetings, or to take off thoſe who were choſen, in which it was thought that no ſort of practice was omitted.

In the year 1612, a parliament met, and inſerted in their regiſters the oath which every miniſter was to ſwear at his admiſſion, by which they declared that the king was the ſupreme governor in all cauſes eccleſiaſtical, as well as civil, and that they held their churches of his majeſty and the crown royal of the realm. They were alſo to ſwear obedience to the biſhop of the dioceſe. Thus were matters carried on with a high hand in favour of prelacy, contrary to the general ſenſe both of miniſters and people.

On the 4th of March 1614, the miniſters were commanded by proclamation at the croſs of Edinburgh, to prepare the people for the Lord's ſupper, and to adminiſter it to them on Eaſter-day the 24th of April. The people were likewiſe charged to communicate on that day at their own pariſh churches, which was contrary to ſeveral acts of aſſembly.

In the year 1617, the king made a tour to Scotland, ſtill further to advance the cauſe of prelacy there. The chapel at Holy-rood-houſe was adorned after the manner of that at Whitehall, pictures being carried from London with the ſtatutes of the twelve apoſtles, and four evangeliſts, curiouſly wrought in timber, in order to be gilded and ſet up. But the people murmuring, the biſhops diſſuaded the king from ſetting them up. His majeſty made his public entry into Edinburgh on the 16th of May, and next day the Engliſh ſervice, ſinging of quiriſters, playing on organs, and ſurplices, were firſt ſeen and heard in the chapel royal. And the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper was adminiſtred on Whitſunday after the Engliſh form. However ſtill greater alterations muſt be made; for, when the parliament did meet, it was propoſed, that whatever his majeſty ſhould determine in the external government of the church, with the advice of the archbiſhops, biſhops and a competent number of the miniſtry, ſhould have the ſtrength of a law. About fifty five miniſters entered a humble and reſpectful proteſt againſt this, for which ſeveral of them ſuffered exceedingly; as Mr Archibald Simſon, Mr David Calderwood, Mr Peter Hewet and others, who, having been ſummoned before the high commiſſion, were deprived and confined, or impriſoned, and Mr Calderwood was ordered to depart furth of the kingdom. So that the biſhops being once got in, the king and they were reſolved to carry matters as far as poſſible. Accordingly

On the 25th of Auguſt 1618, a meeting was called at Perth, to which his majeſty ſent ſeven noblemen, ſeven barons and gentlemen. Here the honeſt party was borne down. Spotiſwood who took upon him to moderate, told them, that he would ſend the names of all who refuſed to the king. He aſked the votes of many who had not commiſſion, and ſo theſe five articles, viz. 1. Kneeling at the holy ſacrament; 2. Private communion; 3. Private baptiſm; 4. Confirmation of children; and 5. The obſervation of holy-days, had the approbation of all, except ſeven noblemen, one doctor, and forty-five miniſters. All theſe unſcriptural innovations Spotiſwood got ratified in the high commiſſion.

But theſe not being ſufficient to eſtabliſh the articles into a law, it was reſolved to uſe all the intereſt of the court to carry them through the parliament, which was not, however, attempted till the year 1621, and then they were ratified on the 4th of Auguſt, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made thereto by ſeveral faithful miniſters. But the methods uſed were contrary to the ordinary forms of parliament. Care was taken that none of the miniſters ſhould get into the houſe to proteſt, for they knew that they had a proteſtation ready to deliver. And in the parliament itſelf they met with great oppoſition. The lords Boyd, Monteith, Egliſton, Linlithgow, Kintail, Gray, Yeſſer, Cathcart, Couper, Burlie, Balmarino, Elphinſton, Torphichen and Forbes, all publicly voted againſt it. However, the act paſſed and the articles were thereby ratified. But it is remarked, that when the king's commiſſioner roſe to touch this act with the ſceptre, there came in at the window a great flaſh of lightning; after that a ſecond, and a third. Then there ſucceeded an extraordinary darkneſs, to the aſtoniſhment of all the houſe. The lightnings were followed by three loud claps of thunder, which ſome thought were the firing of the caſtle guns. Then there fell a ſurpriſing ſhower of hail, ſucceeded by ſuch rain as made the ſtreets run like rivers, ſo that the parliament were forced to ſtay within doors for an hour and an half, and afterwards to go home without their robes.

The prelates having now all power in their hands, tyrannized over all ranks in ſuch a manner, that the nobility were more afraid of diſobliging them than his majeſty, for they baniſhed or impriſoned what gentlemen or miniſters they pleaſed upon the ſlighteſt pretences, ſuch as having ing their own old miniſters and the like. The priſons were filled with deprived miniſters, and the remote parts with the baniſhed. And thus far king James went in eſtabliſhing prelacy, and thereby ſhewed his gratitude to thoſe by whom his life was preſerved in his infancy, and by whoſe means he obtained the crown; and what a regard he had for the National Covenant, and for that which he called the pureſt church upon earth. But I leave the reader to his own reflections. He died not without ſuſpicion of poiſon 27th march 1625. It is certain, ſays Biſhop Burnet, no king died leſs lamented or leſs eſteemed than he was. This took the credit of the biſhops of Scotland; who, as they were his creatures, ſo they were obliged to a great dependance on him, and even thought guilty of groſs and abject flattery towards him.

His ſucceſſor Charles I. was no leſs zealous than his father for prelacy, but being left embaraſſed in a war with Spain, and afterwards entering into another raſhly with France, he had not leiſure to purſue his deſigns upon the church of Scotland for ſome years. However, at length, he carried things in ſo arbitrary a manner, both there and in England, that he never deſiſted till he tumbled headleſs from the throne.

Though, about the end of the laſt reign, the perſecution was hot againſt ſome eminent miniſters; yet many, by the kind providence of God, had a peaceable reſidence at their former paſtoral charges. Some of them were protected by perſons of conſiderable diſtinction, but not a few of the meaner rank in Scotland diſtinguiſhed themſelves by a concern for the purity of goſpel ordinances, and remarkable ſucceſs attended the miniſtry of thoſe who had not conformed to prelacy. Solemn faſts were likewiſe obſerved through the land, on account of the deplorable ſtate of the church of Scotland, and for a revival of the Lord's work in that nation; and God was pleaſed to give a gracious return to their prayers, as we ſhall relate.

In the year 1633, the king made a tour to Scotland, attended by Laud, biſhop of London, together with the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Holland, Pembroke, Southampton, and other lords, where he was crowned on the 18th by the biſhops of Roſs and Moray. One Lacy in his 15th of June, by Spotiſwood archbiſhop of St Andrews, ſpeaking of the king's coronation, ſays, "The archbiſhop of Canterbury ought to have been on the right of the archbiſhop of St Andrews; but Laud, who had the direction of the ceremony, ſeeing he was not in his pontifical robes, as the others were, being a perſon who abhorred pomp, had the boldneſs to pull him forcibly from his place, and to ſubſtitute the biſhop of Roſs in his ſtead. To this outrageous inſult Laud added words that were not leſs inſulting. Are you a churchman, and dare you appear here without a habit ſuitable to the epiſcopal dignity, and the gravity of this day? The Scots ſaw, by this action, what was to be expected from ſuch a man, who was zealous for popery even to ſuperſtition; but they knew much more ſoon after."

On the 20th of June the parliament met and gave his majeſty the largeſt ſubſidy that ever had been granted to any king in Scotland before him. After which he propoſed ſeveral things relating to religion, the one concerning his royal veſture and the apparel of churchmen, and the other for ratifying the former acts touching religion. Theſe were the only acts that met with any oppoſition, on account of conſequences which ſome feared the king would afterwards draw from them. Some of the members of this parliament ſuſpected the king would make uſe of this act to impoſe the ſurplice. And being aſked, whether he intended it, he made no anſwer, but taking a liſt out of his pocket, ſaid, Gentlemen, I have all your names here, and know who will do me ſervice and who not this day. When it was carried in the negative, thirteen lords and ſeventy of the commons voting againſt it. The lords having agreed to the act ſo far as it related to his majeſty's prerogative, but diſſented from that part of it, which related to the apparel of churchmen, fearing leſt under colour the ſurplice might be introduced. But his majeſty, he would have no diſtinction, but commanded them to ſay yes or no to the whole bill. The king marked every man's vote, and upon calling them up, the clerk declared, that it was carried in the affirmative, which ſome of the members denying, his majeſty ſaid, the clerk's declaration ſhould ſtand, unleſs any of them would go to the bar, and accuſe him of falſifying the record of parliament, at the peril of his life. This method of proceding juſtly diſguſted all ranks of people, eſpecially as the king would not look upon the diſſenting lords, nor ſuffer them to kiſs his hand.

When the king left Scotland, he erected a new biſhopric at Edinburgh, and about two months after, Laud being advanced to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, framed articles for the reformation of his majeſty's royal chapel in that city, which were ſent to Scotland, with a declaration under the king's own hand, that they were intended as a pattern for all cathedrals, chapels, and pariſh-churches in that kingdom. The Liturgy was to be read in the choir, the ſacraments to be received kneeling, the dean to appear in his whites, &c. Matters were come to a ſorry paſs, when ſuch innovations were made by an Engliſh prelate, without the conſent of either parliament or general aſſembly in Scotland. Surely faithful miniſters had juſt reaſon to preach againſt the Engliſh hierarchy, and to warn the people againſt ſurrendering up their liberties into the hands of a neighbouring nation.

Accordingly, their endeavours were not fruitleſs; for, as Biſhop Burnet obſerves, though the Biſhops were cheriſhed by the king with all imaginable expreſſions of kindneſs and confidence, yet being charged with popery, Arminianiſm, and breach of Sabbath, they loſt all their eſteem with the people. Neither, ſays he, ſtood they in better terms with the nobility, who were at that time as conſiderable as ever Scotland ſaw them. They were offended, becauſe the biſhops ſeemed to have more intereſt with the king than themſelves. Spotiſwood, archbiſhop of St Andrews, was made chancellor, and Maxwell, biſhop of Roſs was fair for the treaſury. They were no leſs hateful to the miniſtry, becauſe of their pride, which was cried out upon as inſupportable; ſo that the reader cannot be ſurprized at the nation's being roufed, and at the methods which were afterwards taken to throw off the diſmal yoke of prelacy.

When the king was in Scotland, it was reckoned a blemiſh in the church, that it had no liturgy nor book of canons. To ſupply this defect, the king ordered the biſhops to prepare draughts of both, and remit them to London to be reviſed by the biſhops Laud, Juxon and Wren. The book of canons being firſt finiſhed, was preſented to the king, and by him delivered to Laud and Juxon to be examined, altered and reformed at pleaſure, and to bring it as near as poſſible to the Engliſh canons. The biſhops having executed their commiſſion, and prepared it for the preſs, the king confirmed it by letters patent under the great ſeal, dated at Greenwich, May the 23d, 1635. Theſe canons were ſubverſive of the whole conſtitution of the church of Scotland; for the firſt canon excommunicates all who affirm the power and prerogative of the king not to be equal with the Jewiſh kings, that is, abſolute and unlimited. The ſecond excommunicates theſe who ſhall affirm, that the worſhip contained in the book of Common-prayer, which was not yet publiſhed, or the government of the church by archbiſhops, biſhops, &c. to be corrupt ſuperſtitious, or unlawful.—The book farther decrees, that no aſſembly of the clergy ſhall be called but by the king; and that none ſhall receive the ſacrament but on their knees. After ſundry other canons of this nature as appointing fonts for baptiſms church-ornaments, communion-tables or altars, &c. the book appoints, that no perſon ſhall be admitted to holy orders, or to preach, or adminiſter the ſacraments, without firſt ſubſcribing the foreſaid canons. Theſe things could never go down with the people of Scotland. Nothing could be a greater evidence of infatuation, than to think that they would ſubmit to canons dictated for them by a few foreign biſhops, without ſo much as aſking their advice or conſent. Theſe proceedings, and ſuch an unprecedented ſtretch of the prerogative, and to them hateful ſupremacy could not miſs to enflame them.

And, to crown all, the king was reſolved to have a public Liturgy or book of Common prayer uſed in Scotland. This his father could never accompliſh, and his ſon ſoon found it impracticable. It was, however, appointed to be read on Eaſter-day, 1637, againſt which time all pariſhes were to be provided with two books at leaſt, It was firſt ſet up in the chapel-royal at Holy rood-houſe, but the more the people ſaw the ſervice performed, the more hateful and abominable it appeared to them.

On the 23d of July, there was a great concourſe of people in the great church at Edinburgh, and when the hour of ſervice was come, the dean in his ſurplice came out of the veſtry, the people gazing as at a great ſhow, paſſed through the croud to the reading deſk, and began the ſervice, the people as yet continuing quiet; but on a ſudden, at ſome words that diſguſted Janet Geddes, an old woman, ſhe ſtarted up and ſaid, Villain, doſt thou ſay maſs at my lug? And taking up a little ſtool, on which ſhe ſat, threw it at the deſk. Some that ſat next followed her example, till the whole church was in an uproar, and the dean obliged to leave the deſk and pull off the ſurplice, for fear of being torn in pieces. The biſhop of Edinburgh being preſent, went into the pulpit and beckoned for ſilence, but to no purpoſe: ſo both biſhop and dean were obliged to give over, and retire to the veſtry for their ſafety. As the lords of council complained to the king of this diſorder, they ſpared not to lay the greateſt blame of it upon the biſhops. After the ſtricteſt enquiry, it did not appear that any above the meaner ſort were acceſſory to this tumult. However, the lords of council thought proper to diſpenſe with the ſervice next Lord's day, till they ſhould hear from his majeſty. But Land diſpatched their meſſenger with all expedition, telling them, It was the king's firm reſolution that they ſhould go on with their work: and blaming them highly for ſuſpending it.

The country people having then been engaged in their harveſt, things went on pretty ſmooth; but when that was over, it was ſoon found that the generality of the nation was diſguſted at theſe impoſitions: accordingly, in the middle of September, a vaſt number of gentlemen of rank, and others, preſented a petition to the council, requeſting them, that the ſervice book might be no farther preſſed upon them, till theſe things might be repreſented to the king, and his pleaſure be farther known. The council not regarding this petition, and being averſe to a being importuned, removed the ſeſſion to Linlithgow; whereat the citizens of Edinburgh were ſo enraged, that a vaſt mob aroſe and ſurrounded the council-houſe, while the members were ſitting, and demanded a more favourable anſwer to their petition, and that the ſervice book might be laid aſide till the king was fully informed of the matter. Next day another petition was preſented, ſigned by nineteen noblemen, three hundred gentlemen of note and by the principal inhabitants of Edinburgh. But though this petition was ſent to the king, yet inſtead of returning a ſoft anſwer, he ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed from Stirling, to forbid all tumultuous meetings on pain of rebellion, &c.

Upon this ſundry noblemen, barons, miniſters, and burghers met together, and ſigned the following proteſt. '1. That it is the undoubted right of the ſubjects of Scotland to have immediate recourſe to the king by petition. 2. That archbiſhops and biſhops ought not to ſit in any judicatory in this kingdom, civil or eccleſiaſtical, till they have purged themſelves of thoſe crimes which are ready to be proved againſt them. 3. That no proclamation of council, in preſence of the archbiſhops or biſhops, ſhall be prejudicial to any of our proceedings. 4. That neither we, nor any that adhere to us, ſhall incur any damages for not obſerving the liturgy, or book of canons, as long as it is not eſtabliſhed by general aſſembly, or act of parliament. 5. That if any inconvenience fall out, which God prevent, upon preſſing the late innovations, we declare the ſame is not to be imputed to us. 6. That all our proceedings in this affair have no other tendency, but the preſervation of the true reformed religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom.'

The council being apprehenſive of danger from theſe large aſſemblies and combinations of people, agreed, That if they would return peaceably to their habitations, they might appoint ſome of their number, of all ranks, to repreſent the reſt, till his majeſty's pleaſure concerning their proteſt ſhould be more fully known. Accordingly they erected four tables at Edinburgh, one of the nobility, another of the gentry, a third of the boroughs, and a fourth of the miniſters. Theſe prepared and digeſted matters for the general table formed of commiſſioners from the other four, where the final reſolutions were taken.

Theſe, rightly judging that the main procuring cauſe of all the calamities of the nation was the violation of the National Covenant, unanimouſly reſolved to renew the ſame; and accordingly they drew it up, with ſome additions and confirmations out of the acts of parliament, and bound themſelves 'to adhere unto, and defend the true religion, and (forbearing the practice of all novations already introduced in the worſhip of God, or approbation of the corruptions of public government of the kirk, or civil places and power of kirk-men, till they be tried and allowed in free aſſemblies and parliaments) to labour, by all means lawful, to recover the purity and liberty of the goſpel, as it was eſtabliſhed and profeſſed before the foreſaid innovations, and promiſe and ſwear to continue in the profeſſion and obedience of the foreſaid religion, to reſiſt all contrary errors or corruptions; and that they had no intention to attempt any thing that might tend to the diſhonour of God, or to the diminution of the king's greatneſs and authority, and to defend themſelves mutually in the ſame cauſe,' &c. This was ſubſcribed by all preſent; and copies of it, being ſent to thoſe who were abſent, were read in the churches, heartily approved of, and ſubſcribed and ſworn to, with tears and great joy, on the firſt of March 1638, in the Gray friars church at Edinburgh. The flower of the nation was preſent. This ſolemn meeting conſiſted of the nobility, of the barons and gentlemen from the ſeveral ſhires, of burgeſſes from burghs, with miniſters and others. The town of Aberdeen was the only place of any note in the kingdom that declined to join in the covenant. Therefore the general meetings at Edinburgh ſent M.ſſ. Alexander Henderſon, David Dickſon, and Andrew Cant, to that town; and, notwithſtanding the oppoſition they met with from the doctors and miniſters of the place, ſuch was their ſucceſs, that ſeveral of ſpecial note cheerfully put their hands to the covenant, which was ſworn by the generality of all ranks through the nation before the end of April.

The king, being informed of all theſe proceedings, ſent the marquis of Hamilton, as his high commiſſioner, to uſe his utmoſt to diſſolve the tables, and get them to deſiſt from the covenant. The Covenanters, for ſo they were after this called, abſolutely refuſed, and inſiſted upon a free parliament, and a general aſſembly. The marquis, finding he could make no impreſſion on theſe faithful men, returned to court: mean while the general meeting agreed to publiſh a paper, intitled, 'Reaſons for a general aſſembly,' and came to a reſolution, That, if the king ſhould refuſe, or delay to call a general aſſembly, they would fall upon the moſt proper meaſures themſelves for convening a free national aſſembly of the church of Scotland. The marquis returned about the 12th of Auguſt, and propoſed from the king the granting of an aſſembly, but upon ſuch conditions as had an evident tendency to fruſtrate the deſigns of theſe faithful contenders for the cauſe of Chriſt. The marquis returning again to court, it was agreed, That if he did not come back by the 22d of September, they ſhould proceed in the election of commiſſioners for a general aſſembly. The marquis, according to his inſtructions, had made ſeveral conceſſions, ſuch as, the revoking the liturgy, the canons, the high commiſſion, and the five articles of Perth; but as the main thing was omitted, viz. the abliſhing of dioceſan Epiſcopacy, they juſtly rejected all propoſals. He returned at the time appointed, and publiſhed a proclamation for an aſſembly to meet at Glaſgow the 21ſt of November 1638.

The aſſembly met, conſiſting of 143 miniſters, together with profeſſors from the univerſities, and 95 ruling elders from the preſbyteries and burghs. Forty-eight burghs were preſent by their commiſſioners, ſo that there were only 47 elders from the preſbyteries. The Rev. Mr Henderſon miniſter at Leuchars was choſen moderator. The earl, afterwards marquis of Argyll, though a member of the privy council, attended all the ſeſſions of this aſſembly, in order to hear their debates and determinations concerning dioceſan Epiſcopacy, and the five articles of Perth, and declared his full ſatisfaction with their deciſions. It was here that this noble peer began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by a concern for the Redeemer's glory, and he continued ſtedfaſt ſtedfaſt unto the end, dying a martyr for that cauſe which he now eſpouſed; and, at their 8th ſeſſion, ſeveral others of the nobility expreſſed themſelves after the ſame manner with Argyll.

The marquis finding, after ſeven days attending upon the aſſembly, that they reſolved to carry on the deſign of the tables, thought it fit to diſſolve them in the king's name. But, as they found not his reaſons for diſſolving them of equal weight with thoſe which called them together, they entered a humble proteſt thereagainſt, and continued to ſit until they finiſhed their buſineſs. In their proteſt they ſay, That it is unlawful in itſelf, and prejudicial to the privileges that Chriſt has left his church, for the king to diſſolve or break up the aſſemblies of this kirk, or ſtay their proceedings; for then it would follow, that religion and church-government depended abſolutely on the pleaſure of the prince, &c. The aſſembly therefore continued ſitting till they paſſed the following acts: An act for diſannulling all the aſſemblies by which prelacy was countenanced and eſtabliſhed, particularly thoſe held in the years 1606, 1608, 1610, 1616, 1617, 1618: An act for abjuring and aboliſhing Epiſcopacy: An act for condemning the five articles of Perth, book of canons, book of ordination, and the high commiſſion: An act for reſtoring presbyteries, provincial and national aſſemblies; and ſeveral others of the ſame nature. They likewiſe pronounced ſentence of depoſition againſt the biſhops, eight of whom were excommunicated, four excluded from the miniſterial function, and two only allowed to officiate as paſtors or preſbyters. They then wrote to the king complaining of his majeſty's commiſſioner for declaring them traitors, and praying that he would look upon them as his good and faithful ſubjects.

But the king, partly from his averſion to Presbytery, and partly from his conſulting with none but the avowed enemies of Presbytery, publiſhed his reſolutions on the 26th of January 1639, to go in perſon againſt the Scots covenanters, at the head of an army. They, on the other hand, hearing of the preparations which were making againſt them, provided as well as they could for their own neceſſary defence. The king went againſt them with an army; but matters were ſo managed, that his majeſty thought proper to yield to a pacification, by which all differences were to be referred to a general aſſembly, to be held Auguſt 12. and a parliament to meet in a fortnight thereafter. Both armies were to be diſmiſſed; however the Scots, knowing with whom they had to do, prudently kept their officers in pay, that they might be ready in caſe of neceſſity.

The aſſembly met at Edinburgh, and the earl of Traquair was commiſſioner: they unanimouſly confirmed the aſſembly at Glaſgow, appointed the covenant to be taken throughout the kingdom, and, with one conſent, determined that diocеſan Epiſcopacy was unlawful; all which the commiſſioner aſſented to. The parliament ſat down on the 31ſt of Auguſt; but, things being managed contrary to the king's inclinations, it was prorogued to the 2d of June 1640.

Mean while the king reſolved to renew the war, in order to force the Scots to a compliance with his deſigns. Both parties made preparations accordingly. The Scots were victorious at Newburn, and took Newcaſtle. At laſt the king, finding it impoſſible to carry on the war, appointed commiſſioners to treat with the Scots at Rippon, who agreed to a ceſſation of arms for two months, and the treaty to be adjourned to London, where a free parliament was immediately to be called.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the parliament of Scotland ſat down on the 2d of June, which was the time to which it was adjourned, and, by their fourth act, they ratified, and ſpecially ratified an act of the general aſſembly 1639, condeſcending on the impoſing of prelacy, the ſervice-book, and book of canons, the five articles of Perth, &c. as the cauſes of their bygone evils, with the remedies thereof. They alſo ratified the covenant, and ordered it to be inſerted in their regiſters. So that, if we may not ſay with ſome authors, that, in this parliament, all the acts of the aſſembly 1639 were ratified, we may, at leaſt affirm, that the ſum and ſubſtance of the reformation then attained to, and contended for, was ſo.

The king not reliſhing the proceedings of the parliament at Weſtminſter, made another progreſs into Scotland, with a view, whatever was pretended, to break the confederacy that was then between the Scots and the Engliſh parliament. He arrived in Edinburgh in Auguſt, and on the 19th the parliament ſat down, and there he approved of all their late proceedings, in oppoſing the Engliſh liturgy, and erecting tables in defence of their liberties. And it was enacted, That every member of ſucceeding parliaments ſhall take and ſubſcribe the National Covenant, and give an oath in parliament relative thereunto. And thus Presbyterian government and diſcipline were re-eſtabliſhed by king, parliament, and aſſembly, and abjured Prelacy legally abrogated.

While Charles was at Edinburgh, it is ſaid that he ſifted the Scots, to ſee whether he could prevail with them to invade England, to aſſiſt him to ſubject the parliament there to his will; and that he offered them the three northern counties for this ſervice. Yea, the author of the Myſtery of Iniquity, printed at London 1643, ſays, 'That the king ſent propoſitions to the Scots while at Newcaſtle, of joining with the Engliſh army againſt the parliament, and that for this ſervice he offered them three hundred thouſand pounds to be paid down, the four northern counties, and the plunder of London, the quitting of his revenues and cuſtoms in that kingdom to their public uſe, the king's reſidence at York, for the better accommodation of both nations; but that the Scots not only refuſed theſe offers, but likewiſe acquainted thoſe who were moſt intruſted with the affairs of the Engliſh parliament, of their readineſs rather to aſſiſt them in ſecuring their juſt privileges, and in ſettling both nations in truth and peace.' Whatever be in theſe things, it is certain his majeſty's deſign, in this progreſs, was to gain over the Scots, that he might be at liberty to enſlave the Engliſh parliament, and therefore he complied with every thing. At this time the marquis of Hamilton was made a duke, and the earl of Argyll a marquis. But the king no ſooner returned to England, than he repented of all his conceſſions in Scotland.

During the civil war in England, the Engliſh parliament called an aſſembly of divines to ſit at Weſtminſter, for conſulting about religion and church government, in order to carry on a work of reformation in that kingdom. Theſe divines were men of eminent learning and godlineſs, miniſterial abilities and fidelity. In the year 1643 commiſſioners were ſent to Scotland to treat with the aſſembly there concerning theſe things. The commiſſioners arrived at Edinburgh, Auguſt 9th, and were favourably received. On the 12th they preſented their propoſals to the convention of eſtates, and on the 15th to the aſſembly, deſiring, That, becauſe the popiſh prelatical faction is ſtill purſuing their deſign of corrupting and altering the religion through the whole iſland, the two nations might be ſtrictly united for their mutual defence againſt them and their adherents, and not to lay down arms, till thoſe their implacable enemies be diſarmed, &c. It was agreed, at the firſt conferences, that the beſt and ſpeedieſt means for accompliſhing the union and aſſiſtance deſired, was, for both nations to enter into a mutual Covenant and League, which was ſoon drawn up and approved of, and ſent into England by the hands of Lord Maitland, afterwards duke of Lauderdale, and Mr Henderſon and Mr Gilleſpie, where it met with the approbation both of the parliament and the aſſembly then ſitting at Weſtminſter, and was ſolemnly ſworn and ſubſcribed almoſt in all parts of that nation.

When thus it was ſworn in England, the commiſſioners of the general aſſembly, October 11. 1643, ordered the ſame to be, with public humiliation, and all religious ſolemnities, received, ſworn, and ſubſcribed by all miniſters and profeſſors within the church of Scotland; and next day the commiſſioners of the convention of eſtates appointed the ſame thing. All this was approved and ratified by act of parliament, June 15. 1644, and by the general aſſembly 1645. And thus both nations, in a moſt ſolemn manner, abjured Popery and Prelacy, &c. and by this means the ſtrength of the popiſh and prelatical faction was in a great meaſure broken.

By this time the king's affairs grew deſperate, wherefore, on the 5th of May 1646, he ſurrendered himſelf to general general Leven, and marched with the Scots army from Newark to Newcaſtle; but he would by no means approve of the Solemn league and covenant, nor yet comply with the propoſitions made to him by the parliament of England. At laſt he was, upon the intreaty of the Engliſh parliament, and their promiſe for uſing him honourably, delivered up to them, and their commiſſioners conveyed him to Holmby houſe, where he continued for ſome time.

In the year 1648 the duke of Hamilton, by his intereſt and intrigues, prevailed with the convention of eſtates to raiſe an army and appoint him general of it, in order to reſcue the king from his captivity. This undertaking and engagement was entirely diſagreeable to many, and the commiſſion of the aſſembly remonſtrated againſt it; not that they were againſt the king's reſcue, as appears from their declaration, but they found, that, under the colour of acting againſt the independents of England, the royaliſts, the mortal enemies of Scotland and of all Preſbyterians, were to be reſtored: beſides this was chiefly promoted by thoſe who were never friends to the reformation then attained to; nay, they obſerved, that men were ſent for to Edinburgh, who were enemies thereto, as Langdale, Muſgrave, Glemham, and others; that the junction with the king's party, conſiſting of papiſts and epiſcopalians, was a moſt manifeſt breach of the covenant; that, in ſhort, by this the covenant, which was the baſis and foundation of the union between the two nations, would be deſtroyed, whilſt it was pretended to raiſe an army for its ſupport. And indeed providence blaſted the whole deſign; for though duke Hamilton invaded England with a numerous army, yet he was routed by Cromwel, taken priſoner, and afterwards beheaded.

Soon after this defeat, the parliament not only condemned the engagements, for the reaſons above mentioned, but likewiſe paſſed an act againſt the engagers, ranking them in ſeveral claſſes, whence it got the name of an act of claſſes, whereby they were excluded from all offices of public truſt and vote in parliament. Of this number were William earl of Lanerk, brother to the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Lauderdale, and ſeveral others who formed a faction, which Rapin calls the Hamiltonian. In ſhort, this act included all who had oppoſed the work of reformation. The commiſſioners of the aſſembly likewiſe, appointed church cenſures to be inflicted on thoſe who had been concerned in the engagement, in order to bring them to repentance.

At laſt the ſectarian party came to ſuch a height in the Engliſh army, that they over ruled the parliament of England; for they put down the houſe of lords as uſeleſs, modelled the houſe of commons as they thought fit, and erected a new court, which the called an high court of juſtice, before which they arraigned the king, and violently took away his life, Jan. 30. 1649. againſt which the commiſſioners both of the church and ſtate of Scotland did ſolemnly proteſt.

The prince of Wales received the news of theſe things at the Hague, and immediately received the title of king, being then 18 years of age and made thoſe of his father's council, who attended him, to be ſworn of his privy council, with the addition only of one perſon, viz. Mr Long, his ſecretary. In the mean time his condition was deplorable, not having wherewith to maintain his houſhold, or any table but that of the prince of Orange, his brother-in-law, and ſubſiſting intirely by his aſſiſtance, which could not laſt very long.

When advice came of the king's death to the parliament of Scotland, which was then ſitting, they, on the 5th February 1649: ordered prince Charles to be proclaimed king of Great Britain, France and Ireland, promiſing humbly and faithfully to obey, maintain and defend him, according to the National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant, with their lives and fortunes; and at the ſame time declaring, that, before he be admitted to the exerciſe of the royal power, he ſhall give ſatisfaction to the kingdom in thoſe things that concern the ſecurity of religion, the unity between the kingdoms, and the good and peace of the kingdom of Scotland, according to the covenants, &c.

Immediately commiſſioners were ſent to treat with his majeſty at the Hague, who returned without ſatisfaction. Next year commiſſioners were ſent to him at Breda. The parliament pitched upon the Earls of Caſſils and Lothian, Alexander Brodie of that ilk, Mr George Winram of Libberton, theſe two laſt being lords of ſeſſion, together with Mr John Smith and Alexander Jaffray. The commiſſion of the kirk choſe the reverend Mr John Livingſton, Mr James Wood, and Mr George Hutchiſon. Caſſils and Brodie ſuſtained the characters of ruling elders. It was with great reluctance that Mr Livingſton engaged in this ſervice. The day theſe commiſſioners landed at Campvere, Lothian and Libberton propoſed that letters might be written to duke Hamilton and the earl of Lauderdale, and ſome other malignants then at the Hague, to repair to Breda to aſſiſt at the treaty; which was rejected. However, after the commiſſioners got to Breda, duke Hamilton, &c. came likewiſe. The parliament had limited the time of treaty to thirty days, and yet it was ſeveral days before the firſt papers were delivered to the king, and ſome days after before his majeſty gave his anſwers. The king complied at laſt to all the conditions required, yet the Reverend Mr Livingſton, one of the commiſſioners, ſays, That, all the time of this treaty, he continued the uſe of the ſervice book and of his chaplains, and that there did not appear any thing of ſincerity on his part, for he granted nothing until he was in a manner compelled; and it was the very laſt day they had to treat before the treaty was concluded.

The king poſtponed the ſigning of the treaty, on account of the great hopes he had entertained from the expedition of the marquis of Montroſe, who had picked up 2 or 3000 men in Denmark and Holſtein, with intention to prepare the way for the king's reception in Scotland, without being obliged to comply with the terms propoſed. Part of theſe troops landed firſt in Orkney, and the reſt at Caithneſs, during the time of the treaty. The parliament having notice of this, ordered David Leſly to march againſt him; but before he could come up, Colonel Strachan fell upon, and entirely defeated them. Montroſe farrendered himſelf to Aſtin, by whom he was ſent under a ſtrong guard to David Leſly, who carried him to Edinburgh, where he was hanged drawn and quartered. It was found that he had the king's commiſſion; whereupon the commiſſion of eſtates determined to recal their commiſſioners from Breda, and break off the treaty; and for this end ſent an expreſs with letters, which falling into the hands of Libberton, were, without the knowlege of the other commiſſioners, delivered by him into the king's hands; who ſeeing how matters ſtood, thought proper to comply with all the propoſals. He engaged to remove from his council all who ſtood excommunicate by the kirk; that he would take the National Covenant and Solemn League and Covenant, and proſecute the ends thereof; that he would ratify and approve all acts of parliament enjoining the ſame and eſtabliſhing preſbyterian government, the directory of worſhip, the Weſtminſter Confeſſion of Faith and Catechiſms, &c. and that all civil matters ſhould be determined by the preſent and ſubſequent parliaments, and all eccleſiaſtical by the enſuing general aſſemblies of the church. But though he agreed to all this, it is plain he did not intend to perform the ſame. All was artifice and diſſimulation.

For on the Saturday before the king left Breda, the miniſters, who were commiſſioners for the church, having intelligence that his majeſty intended next day to communicate kneeling, went to him and ſhewed him the ſin of ſo doing; how it would provoke God to blaſt all his deſigns, was inconſiſtent with his conceſſions, and would offend ſome, who were of opinion that he was only dallying with God and them. They left him, to think of what they had ſaid, till after ſupper; and when they returned, they found him fixed in his reſolution. He ſaid, his father uſed always to communicate at Chriſtmaſs, Eaſter, and Whitſunday, and he behoved to do ſo likewiſe and that people would think ſtrange of him, if, having reſolved to communicate, he ſhould forbear it, and that he did it to procure a bleſſing from God on his intended voyage. In ſhort all they ſaid could not prevail, ſo that in effect his majeſty broke the treaty before he left Breda.

The king embarked, and, beſides the commiſſioners, was attended by duke Hamilton, the earl of Lauderdale, and other malignants, ſo that Mr Livingſton had no inclination

…ion to go aboard; for he says, that he thought, …ith in regard of the profane malignant company, and …ow matters stood in the treaty, they were taking the …ence of God with them to Scotland; and therefore he …ade to go back to Rotterdam, and come home with the …rst opportunity. However under some pretence used to …ecoy him, he was got aboard, and the king arrived in the …outh of the Spey on the 23d of June. There had been de…ates during the passage concerning the king's taking the …ovenant, to which he seemed refractory; however, at last …e declared his willingness. Mr Livingston would fain …ave had the king's swearing postponed, because he did not …ook upon him to be sincere, but the rest urged, that it …ould give great offence if the king's offer of swearing …he covenant should be rejected.

Mr Livingston, not being able to get this affair delayed, …as prevailed with to preach on the occasion; which hav…ing done, he distinctly read the National Covenant and So…lemn League and Covenant. His majesty standing, and lift…ing up his right hand, swore the same in the presence of the …ommissioners and others, in the following words subjoin…ed to both Covenants.

'I CHARLES, king of Great Britain, France and …Ireland, do assure and declare, by my solemn oath, …in the presence of the almighty God the searcher of hearts, …my allowance and approbation of the National Covenant, …and of the Solemn League and Covenant above written, …and faithfully oblige my self to prosecute the ends there…of in my station and calling: and that I, for myself and …successors, shall consent and agree to all acts of parlia…ment enjoining the national Covenant and Solemn League …and Covenant, and fully establishing Presbyterial go…vernment, the directory of worship, the Confession of …faith, and Catechisms in the kingdom of Scotland, as …they are approven by the general assembly of this kirk …and parliament of this kingdom. And that I shall give …my royal assent to the acts of parliament enjoining the …same in the rest of my dominions, and that I shall observe …them in my own practice and family, and shall never …make opposition to any of these, or endeavour any change …thereof.'

And immediately subscribed the same. We shall see …what regard he paid to this. However, for the present, he …did his part as well as he could, and submitted to every …thing required, even to part with Hamilton, Lauderdale …and others. But all this was against the grain. He had an …inward averſion to every thing that looked like strictness …in religion, and was uneasy at the faithful reproofs he re…ceived from time to time.

But while these things were a-doing in Scotland, the …parliament of England recalled Cromwel from Ireland to …take the command of an army which was to act against …the king. Accordingly, about the middle of July, that …general was at the head of an English army, consisting of …fifteen or nineteen thousand men, and marched to the …borders of Scotland, where he published his manifesto.

At this time both church and state were taking mea…sures for the further security of their religion and liberties, …and any encroachments that might be made by the young …king; accordingly the commission of the assembly made …the following act at the West kirk of Edinburgh, which I …shall here insert.

West kirk, August 13. 1650. 'The commission of the …general assembly, considering that there may be just …ground of stumbling from the king's majesty's refusing to …subscribe and emit the declaration offered to him by the …committee of estates and the commission of the general as…sembly concerning his former carriage and resolutions for …the future, in reference to the cause of God, and the ene…mies and friends thereof, doth therefore declare, that this …church and kingdom doth not own or espouse any malignant …party, or quarrel or interest, but that they fight merely …upon their former grounds and principles, and in the de…fence of the cause of God, and of the kingdom, as they …have done these twelve years past; and therefore, as they …disclaim all the sin and guilt of the king, and of his house, …so they will not own him nor his interest, otherways than …with a subordination to God, and so far as he owns and …prosecutes the cause of God, and disclaims his and his fa…ther's opposition to the work of God, and to the Covenant, …and likewise all the enemies thereof; and that they will, …with convenient speed, take into consideration the papers …lately sent unto them by Oliver Cromwel, and vindicate …themselves from all the falsehoods contained therein, espe…cially in those things wherein the quarrel betwixt us and …that party is mis-stated, as if we owned the late king's …proceedings, and were resolved to prosecute and maintain …his present majesty's interest, before and without acknow…ledgment of the sin of his house and former ways, and …satisfaction to God's people in both kingdoms.

ALEX. KER.

The same day, August the 13th 1650, 'The committee of estates having seen and considered a declaration of the commission of the general assembly anent the stating of the quarrel wherein the army is to fight, do approve the same, and heartily concur therein.

ALEX. HENDERSON.'

These were doubtless things of hard digestion with his majesty, especially at this time all his thoughts were bent to get in his old friends the Hamiltonian and Malignant faction; but he could not make the attempt now, for Cromwel was coming against him, and both church and state had declared themselves very plainly; wherefore Charles the better to disguise his intentions, emits a most remarkable declaration from Dunfermline, on the 16th of August 1650, of which I give the following extract, as far as it relates to his former oath.

CHARLES R.

'HIS majesty taking into consideration that merciful 'dispensation—by which he hath been recover'ed out of the snare of evil counsel.—doth, in refe'rence to his former deportments, and to his resolutions 'for the future declare as follows:

'Though his majesty, as a dutiful son, be obliged to 'honour the memory of his royal father, and have in 'estimation the person of his mother, yet doth he 'desire to be deeply humbled—before God, because of 'his father's hearkening to and following evil counsels, 'and his opposition to the work of reformation, and to the 'Solemn League and Covenant,—and for the idolatry of 'his mother; the toleration of which in the king's house, '—could not but be a high provocation to him, who is 'a jealous God, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon 'the children. And albeit his majesty might extenuate 'his former carriage and actions, in following the advice 'and walking in the way of those who are opposite to the 'covenant and to the work of God,—yet knowing that 'he hath to do with God, he doth ingenuously acknow'ledge all his own sins, and all the sins of his father's 'house, craving pardon, and hoping for mercy and recon'ciliation, through the blood of Jesu Christ.—

'And his majesty having, upon the full persuasion of the 'justice and equity of all the heads and articles thereof, 'now sworn and subscribed the National Covenant,—and 'the Solemn League and Covenant,—doth declare, that 'he hath not sworn and subscribed these Covenants and 'entred into the oath of God with his people, upon any 'sinister intention and crooked design, for attaining his 'own ends, but, so far as human weakness will permit, in 'the truth and sincerity of his heart, and that he is firmly 'resolved in the Lord's strength to adhere thereto, and to 'prosecute to the utmost of his power, the ends thereof 'in his station and calling, really, constantly and sincerely, 'all the days of his life. In order to which, he doth, in 'the first place, profess and declare, that he will have no 'enemies but the enemies of the Covenant, and—no friends 'but the friends of the Covenant; and therefore as he doth 'now detest and abhor all popery, superstition and idola'try, together with prelacy and errors, heresy and schism 'and profaneness, and resolves not to tolerate, much less 'allow any of these, in any part of his majesty's dominio'ns, but to oppose himself thereto, and to endeavour the 'extirpation thereof to the utmost of his power: so doth 'he as a Christian exhort, and as a king require, all such 'of his subjects as have stood in opposition to the solemn

'league and covenant, and work of reformation, upon a 'pretence of kingly intereſt, or any other pretext whatſo 'ever, to lay down their enmity againſt the cauſe and 'people of God, and to ceaſe to prefer the intereſt of man 'to the intereſt of God, which hath been one of thoſe 'things which hath occaſioned many troubles—and being 'inſiſted in, will be ſo far from eſtabliſhing the king's 'throne, that it will prove an idol of jealouſy to provoke '—him who is King of kings, and Lord of lords. The king 'ſhall always eſteem them beſt ſervants and moſt loyal 'ſubjects who ſerve him and ſeek his greatneſs in a right 'line of ſubordination to God, giving unto God the things 'that are God's, and unto Ceſar the things that are Ceſar's; and reſolveth not to love or countenance any 'who have ſo little conſcience and piety, as to follow his 'intereſt with a prejudice to the goſpel and the kingdom 'of Jeſus Chriſt, which he looks not upon as duty, but 'as flattery, and driving of ſelf deſigns, under pretence 'of retaining royal authority and greatneſs.

'Given at our court at Dunfermline, Aug. 16. 1650. 'and in the ſecond year of our reign.'

Now, who can compare theſe ſolemn oaths and proteſtations with this prince's after-conduct without horror, both on account of his wicked diſſimulation and horrid perjury? It is alledged, that the neceſſity of his affairs forced him to theſe compliances. But ſurely he was one that had no ſenſe of religion, in being capable of mocking God in this manner. When the rev. Mr Gilleſpie put the pen in his hand, to ſubſcribe the above declaration, he told him, 'That, if he was not ſatiſfied in his ſoul and conſcience, beyond all heſitation, of the righteouſneſs of the ſubſcription, he was ſo far from over-driving him to run upon that to which he had no light, that he obteſted him, yea, charged him in his maſter's name, not to ſubſcribe that declaration, no not for the three kingdoms.' To which the king anſwered, 'Mr Gilleſpie, Mr Gilleſpie, I am ſatisfied, I am ſatisfied, and therefore will ſubſcribe it.' The truth is, Charles could ſwallow any thing; for, notwithſtanding the above declaration, meaſures were, at this time, concerting for bringing the enemies of the covenant both into the army and judicatures, and to divide the preſbyterians among themſelves.

We have ſeen how Cromwel invaded the country. A good army was raiſed againſt him under the command of General Leſly, but it was intirely routed by Cromwel at Dunbar on the 3d of September. The king was pleaſed at this defeat of his ſubjects; for now he thought he would have an opportunity of accompliſhing his deſign of getting the Hamiltons and malignants both into his armies and counſels. Clarendon has a ſtrange remark upon this. 'Never, ſays he, was victory obtained with leſs lamentation: for as Cromwel had great argument of triumph, ſo the king was glad of it, as the greateſt happineſs that could befal him, in the loſs of ſo great a body of his enemies.' So that, according to the noble hiſtorian, his majeſty looked upon his ſubjects as his enemies.

As the king was well received by the marquis of Argyll, ſo he profeſſed, at this time, a great regard for his lordſhip, as appears from the following letter and declaration under his own hand, which I cannot but inſert, that the reader may ſee what regard his majeſty had afterward to his royal promiſes and engagements.

"HAVING taken into my conſideration the faithful endeavours of the marquis of Argyl, for reſtoring me to my juſt rights, and the happy ſettling of my dominions, I am deſirous to let the world ſee how ſenſible I am of his real reſpect to me, by ſome particular marks of my favour to him, by which they may ſee the truſt and confidence which I repoſe in him, and particularly, I do promiſe, that I will make him duke of Argyll and knight of the garter, and one of the gentlemen of my bed chamber, and this to be performed when he ſhall it think fit. And I do further promiſe him to hearken to his counſels—(worn out) —whenever it ſhall pleaſe God to reſtore me to my juſt rights in England, I ſhall ſee him paid the forty thouſand pounds ſterling which is due to him. All which I do promiſe to make good upon the word of a king.'

St. Johnstoun, 24th Sep. 1650. 'CHARLES R.'

We ſhall afterwards ſee how theſe fine things were performed

After the battle of Dunbar it was propoſed that the reſtraints ſhould be taken off, by which the malignants were hindered from ſerving his majeſty. This was at firſt refuſed: but the defeat at Hamilton, falling out in a little time, was made a new argument for admitting of malignants into the army, becauſe, as was alledged, the preſent ſtanding forces were not ſufficient for the defence of the kingdom, unleſs all the fencible men, without diſtinction were raiſed. The king therefore wrote from Perth, where the parliament then ſat, to the moderator of the commiſſion, deſiring him to call a commiſſion, pro re nata, to give their judgment in this matter. The oppoſers of the reſolutions alledged, that many members had no notice, and that the time for meeting was ſo ſoon after the notice, that the members could not attend.

When a quorum of the commiſſion was met at Perth, the parliament inquired, 'What perſons are to be admitted to riſe in arms, and to join with the forces of the kingdom, and in what capacity for defence thereof, againſt the armies of the ſectaries, who, contrary to the Solemn League and Covenant, and treaties, have moſt unjuſtly invaded, and are deſtroying the kingdom?'

The commiſſion on the 15th of December 1650, anſwered, 'In this caſe of ſo great and evident neceſſity, it cannot be againſt raiſing all fencible perſons in the land, and permitting them to fight againſt this enemy, for the defence of the kingdom, except ing, ſuch as are excommunicated, forfeited, notoriouſly profane or flagitious; or ſuch as have been, from the beginning, or continue ſtill, and are at this time, obſtinate and profeſſed enemies and oppoſers of the covenant and cauſe of God. And, for the capacity of acting, that the eſtates of parliament ought to have, as we hope they will have, ſpecial care, that, in this ſo general a concurrence of all the people of the kingdom, none be put in ſuch truſt and power, as may be prejudicial to the cauſe of God; and that ſuch officers as are of known integrity and affection to the cauſe, and particularly ſuch as have ſuffered in our former armies, may be taken ſpecial notice of.'

Upon this anſwer ſome of the moſt conſiderable Malignants were employed in the army. Some of the general officers, and more than half of the colonels, were of this ſtamp, and not a few of them had been with Montroſe; but their proceedings were very offenſive to many miniſters and preſbyteries, particularly thoſe of Stirling and Aberdeen. The Rev. Mr James Guthrie and Mr David Barnet miniſters at Stirling, in conjunction with the reſt of that preſbytery, wrote to the commiſſion at their next meeting, declared their diſſatisfaction with their reſolutions, which was likewiſe done by many other preſbyteries. Theſe two miniſters ſpoke their mind with freedom, and plainneſs, and preached againſt the public reſolutions, as involving the land in a conjunction with the malignant party.

About the end of this year matters were brought to this paſs, that a conſiderable number of noblemen, gentlemen and others, was to riſe and form themſelves into an army under Middleton's command, and the king was to throw himſelf into their arms. Accordingly, all of a ſudden, he withdrew from St Johnſton, and repaired to the place appointed. But not finding things to anſwer his expectation, he returned to St. Johnſton with major-general Montgomery, whom the committee of eſtates had ſent after him. This was a plain proof that all his majeſty's compliances were inſincere. Middleton was excommunicated by the commiſſion of the general aſſembly, and the ſentence was pronounced by the ſaid Mr James Guthrie; however, the commiſſion at their next meeting took it off.

Mean while on the 1ſt of January 1651 king Charles II. was crowned at Scoon; the noble marquis of Argyll put the crown upon his majeſty's head. After an excellent and ſuitable ſermon preached by the Rev. Mr Douglas, from 2 Kings xi. 12. 27. the ſolemnity began with the king's moſt ſolemn renewing of the National and Solemn League and Covenant, in this manner, The king kneeled, and lifted up his right hand, before the three eſtates of the kingdom, the commiſſioners of the general aſſembly, and all the congregation, and, by his ſolemn oath, in preſence of the almighty God the ſearcher of hearts, he aſſured and declared his allowance of the National Covenant and Solemn League and Covenant, promiſing faithfully to proſecute the ends thereof, and to eſtabliſh the ſame with the Preſbyterial Government, and the whole work of God in all his dominions: then he was preſented to the people, and the queſtion was put, Whether they were willing to have him for their king, and ſubmit to his authority? they expreſſed their willingneſs, by ſaying, 'God ſave king Charles II.' After this he took the coronation-oath; and, when the ſword was put into his hands, he was deſired to receive the ſame for the defence of the faith of Jeſus Chriſt and of the true religion, according to the covenants, and for the miniſtration of juſtice, &c. which he accepted accordingly. Juſt before the crown was ſet upon his head, the miniſter prayed, that the Lord would purge the crown from the ſins and tranſgreſſions of them that did reign before him; that it might be a pure crown; that God would ſet the crown upon the king's head, &c. and then the marquis ſet the crown upon his head. Upon this the noblemen came, one by one, and kneeling, with their hand touching the crown, ſwore by the eternal and almighty God, to be true and faithful ſubjects, according to the national Covenant, and Solemn League and Covenant: then the people's obligatory oath was proclaimed, whereby they all ſwore by the eternal God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, to be true and faithful to the king, according to the National and ſolemn League and Covenant. Thing after this inſtalled and ſet upon the throne, the miniſter exhorted him to remember that his throne is the Lord's throne, 1 Chron. xxix. 23. And, being a covenanted king, he ought, under God, to rule for God; and eſpecially to beware that he made not the Lord's throne a throne of iniquity, to frame miſchief by a law, even ſuch miſchievous laws as had been enacted by his predeceſſors, deſtructive to religion, and grievous to the Lord's people. Then the nobles, being called one by one, and kneeling before the king on the throne, and holding their hands between his hands, ſwore by the eternal and almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever and ever, to be true and faithful to the king, according to the National and Solemn League and Covenant. The ſolemnity was concluded with a ſolid and pertinent exhortation, both to the king and people, to keep the covenant, and beware of breaking it; and both king and nobles were certified, that if the king, and they who were engaged to ſupport his crown, ſhall conſpire together againſt the kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, both the ſupporters and ſupported ſhould fall together.

This was a very ſolemn action, and all the ſolemnities of it were ſo interwoven with the covenants, that it muſt be acknowleged, that never king and people under the ſun could be more ſtrictly bound to God, and to one another, than theſe were; but his majeſty, notwithſtanding all theſe oaths and declarations, ſtill perſiſted in his deſign of getting the malignants into the judicatures, as he had got them into the army. And, as Mr James Guthrie and Mr David Dickſon preached openly and faithfully againſt the public reſolutions, ſo, in the month of February, the chancellor, by a letter, ordered them both to repair to Perth on the 19th, and to anſwer, before the king and the committee of eſtates, for their letter to the commiſſion and their doctrine. The two miniſters, on account of the indiſpoſition of one of them, excuſed their appearing on that day, but promiſed to attend about the end of the week. Accordingly, on the 22d of February, they appeared at Perth, but gave in a proteſtation, ſignifying, that though they paid all due regard to his majeſty's civil authority, yet they did not acknowlege his majeſty, or their lordſhips, as proper judges of their doctrine, or of what concerned their miniſterial calling; that being the province of the judicatories of the church. This matter was put off for ſome days, till the king's return from Aberdeen, and, in the mean time, the two miniſters were confined to Perth and Dundee; whereupon, February 28th, they preſented a ſecond paper, containing a proteſtation to the ſame purpoſe with the former, though in ſtronger terms, and ſupported by a great many excellent arguments. After theſe proteſtations, the king and the committee of eſtates thought proper to diſmiſs the two miniſters, and to proceed no farther in this affair. However, we ſhall find that Mr Guthrie's declining the king's authority, at this time, in matters eccleſiaſtical, was made a principal article in his indictment ten years after this.

Mean while, the commiſſion of the aſſembly, finding their anſwer to the parliament's queſtions cenſured and condemned, publiſhed a warning, and a large anſwer to the letter from the preſbytery of Stirling, in their own vindication: this occaſioned many debates, eſpecially as all miniſters and preachers were, by the commiſſion, diſcharged to ſpeak or write againſt theſe reſolutions. And an act was made, ordaining preſbyteries to proceed, with the cenſures of the kirk, againſt thoſe who ſhould oppoſe them; and the copy of another act was tranſmitted to preſbyteries, ordaining thoſe who oppoſed the reſolutions to be cited to the next aſſembly at St Andrews: by which means many of theſe were prevented from being members of the aſſembly.

It is eaſy to ſee how agreeable this was to his majeſty, who, notwithſtanding his being a covenanted king, and ſworn to maintain and promote preſbyterial government, yet hated preſbytery, and would be glad of every thing that tended to its overthrow. Accordingly, while theſe things were a-doing, the gentlemen, who, by means of the former reſolutions, had got into the army, next wanted to get into the judicatures, from which they were excluded by the act of claſſes. In order, therefore, to get this act reſcinded, the king and parliament propoſed the following queſtion to the commiſſion of the general aſſembly, 'Whether or not it be ſinful and unlawful, for the more effectual proſecution of the public reſolutions, for the defence of the cauſe of the king and the kingdom, to admit ſuch to be members of the committee of eſtates, who are now debarred from the public truſt, they being ſuch as have ſatisfied the kirk for the offence for which they were excluded, and are ſince admitted to enter into covenant with us?'

The commiſſion delaying their anſwer, on the 3d of April the moderator received a letter from the king and parliament, deſiring the commiſſion to meet at Perth on the 17th, not only to give a poſitive anſwer to the laſt query, but their judgment and reſolutions, if it be ſinful and unlawful to repeal the act of claſſes; and on the 23d they received another letter to the ſame purpoſe.

To both which, the commiſſioners, after ſome previous cautions, anſwered, 'As for the Solemn League and Covenant, the ſolemn acknowlegement and engagement, and former declarations emitted by this church, (which are ſet down as grounds in the narrative of the act of claſſes) we find they do not particularly determine any definite meaſure of time, of excluding perſons from places of truſt for bypaſt offences, but only bind and oblige accordingly to puniſh offenders, as the degree of their offences ſhall require or deſerve, or the ſupreme judicatures of the kingdom, or others having power from them to that effect, ſhall judge convenient, to purge all judicatures, and places of power and truſt, and to endeavour that they may conſiſt of, and be filled with ſuch men as are of known good affection to the cauſe of God, and of a blameleſs Chriſtian converſation, (which is a moral duty commanded in the word of God, and of perpetual obligation) ſo that nothing, upon the account of thoſe grounds, doth hinder, but that perſons, formerly debarred from places of power and truſt for their offences, may be admitted to be members of the committee of eſtates, and the cenſures inflicted upon them by the act of claſſes may be taken off, and reſcinded, without ſin, by the parliament, in whoſe power it is to lengthen or ſhorten the time of their cenſures, as they ſhall find juſt and neceſſary, providing they be men that have ſatisfied the kirk for their offences, have renewed and taken the covenant, and be qualified for ſuch places, according to the qualifications required in the word of God, and expreſſed in the ſolemn acknowlegement and engagement,' &c.

Upon this anſwer, the act of claſſes, in all its articles, was repealed; ſo that great numbers, formerly excluded, were brought into parliament, nominated as members of the committee of eſtates, and made capable of places of truſt; and in a little time the bulk of the malignant party got the management of all into their own hands.

Theſe reſolutions and proceedings gave great offence to many many godly and eminent miniſters, and even to ſome preſbyteries. As they who adhered to the reſolutions were called Reſolutioners, ſo the oppoſers of them were called Proteſtors and Anti-reſolutioners. 'On the one hand it was ſaid, that every government might call out all that were under its protection to its defence. This ſeemed founded on the law of nature and nations. And, if men had been miſled, it was a ſtrange cruelty to deny room for repentance: this was contrary to the nature of God, and to the goſpel, and was a likely mean to drive them to deſpair.—But the Proteſtors objected, 'That to take men of known enmity to the cauſe, was a ſort of betraying it, becauſe it was putting it in their power to betray it; that, to admit them to a profeſſion of repentance, was a profanation and a mocking of God. It was viſible they were willing to comply, though againſt their conſcience, only to get into the army; nor could they expect a bleſſing from God on an army ſo conſtituted.' And, ſays the biſhop, this mock penitence was indeed a matter of great ſcandal. And the following hiſtory will abundantly ſhew, that the Proteſtors were not out in their ſentiments; for theſe men afterwards did betray the cauſe, and perſecuted thoſe that maintained it.

However, when the parliament met, they thought proper, in the month of June, to ratify all the preceeding treaties, tranſactions, engagements and actions concluded and enacted by the king, whereby the ſame did paſs into a perpetual law. And it was expreſsly provided, his majeſty being preſent, 'That, in all ſucceeding parliaments, every member, before they entered upon buſineſs, ſhould ſign and ſubſcribe the covenant, and without this the conſtitution of the parliament, and all they do, is declared void and null.' Thus the covenant became at laſt a fundamental conſtitution of the kingdom. Mr Wodrow ſays, that the acts of this parliament were not printed, (as indeed that could ſcarce, in the then unſettled ſtate of the kingdom, and eſpecially of the court, be obtained) but that, from perſons then alive, and ſeveral papers ſtill extant, he was fully aſſured that ſuch an act was made.

The general aſſembly met at St. Andrews in July, when the Anti-reſolutioners proteſted againſt the lawfulneſs of the aſſembly. Three of the ſubſcribers were, after citation, depoſed, and one ſuſpended, and the actings of the commiſſion approved.

Soon after this, the king and his army marched into England, and, on the 3d of September, 1651, were totally routed at Worceſter, his majeſty moſt narrowly eſcaping. By this blow his affairs were reduced to ſuch an extremity, that he found himſelf obliged to remove from the kingdom, which with difficulty he accompliſhed, and retired to France. In the mean time, general Monk, who was left in Scotland quickly reduced that kingdom to the obedience of the Engliſh republic.

Soon after this, the juſt privileges of the church were infringed, and commiſſioners, chiefly of the independent perſuaſion, were ſent into Scotland to viſit the univerſities, and to ſettle an unlimited toleration and liberty of conſcience, inconſiſtent with their eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, and contrary to the covenants. On the 26th of July, 1652, a declaration was preſented to the aſſembly in favour of the congregational diſcipline, and for liberty of conſcience; but the faithful members (whom Mr Neal, in deriſion, calls the ſtubborn aſſembly men) inſtead of yielding to the declaration, gave in a proteſtation againſt it. When the aſſembly met at Edinburgh next ſummer, and were juſt entering upon buſineſs, lieutenant-colonel Cotterel went into the church, and, ſtanding upon one of the benches, told them, that no eccleſiaſtical judicatories were to ſit there, unleſs by authority of the parliament of England; and, without giving them leave to reply, he commanded them to retire, and conducted them out of the weſt gate of the city with a troop of horſe and a company of foot, and enjoined them not to aſſemble any more above three in a company. In the like manner, on the 10th of April, 1655, the ſynod of Perth and Stirling was no ſooner met at Dumblain, but it was diſſolved, in a violent manner, by open force, (of which I have an account from the regiſters tranſmitted to me by a reverend miniſter of that ſynod;) for one lieutenant Belvia came with a band of ſoldiers, and commanded them to diſmiſs, alledging, that he had orders from their ſuperiors. But though the ſynod deſired to ſee them, yet he abſolutely refuſed, and, upon their demurring and delaying to obey orders, the ſoldiers laid hands on them, and thruſt them violently out of the church. Thus were the liberties of the church invaded.

Mean while the unhappy differences between the Reſolutioners and Proteſtors ſtill went on, till at laſt, in the years 1655 and 1656, conferences were agreed on for an union, and the matter was carried up to London before Oliver Cromwel, who had uſurped the government, and was declared protector, but without effect. However, both Reſolutioners and Proteſtors agreed on this, that they were enemies to the uſurpation, and loyal to the king though it was not yet in their power to contribute any thing to his reſtoration, which they ſincerely wiſhed for upon proper terms. But, as they had little reaſon for their zeal in behalf of his intereſt, ſo they were ill rewarded for it, as ſhall be afterwards ſhewn.

For, when the king arrived in France, he immediately threw off the maſk of a Preſbyterian, and never went to the proteſtant church at Charenton, though they invited him in the moſt reſpectful manner; but Lord Clarendon diſſuaded him, becauſe the Hugonots had not been hearty in his intereſt, and becauſe it might look diſreſpectful to the old church of England. But the truth is, the court, not having a proſpect of the king's reſtoration by the Preſbyterians, turned their eyes to the Roman catholics, and many of the king's retinue changed their religion, as appears by the legenda lignea, publiſhed about this time, with a liſt of fifty-three new converts, among whom were ſeveral names in red capitals, not to mention the king himſelf, of whoſe father Huddleſton, his confeſſor, writes in his treatiſe, intitled, 'A ſhort and plain way to the faith of the church,' publiſhed 1685, that he put it into the king's hand in his retirement; and that, when his majeſty read it, he declared he did not ſee how it could be anſwered. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'Before king Charles left Paris, (which was in June 1654), he changed his religion, but by whoſe perſuaſion is not yet known, only cardinal de Retz was in the ſecret, and lord Aubigny had a great hand in it. Chancellor Hide had ſome ſuſpicion of it, but would not ſuffer himſelf to believe it quite. Sir Allen Brodrick, when on his death-bed, ſent Doctor Burnet an account of this matter, which he believed was done in Fontainebleau before king Charles was ſent to Colen.' And it is certain, ſays Mr Neal, that he was reconciled to the church of Rome this year (1659), at the Pyrenean treaty concluded between France and Spain, whither he had repaired incognito to engage them in his intereſt. Here the king ſtayed twenty days, in which time he, with the earl of Briſtol, and Sir H. Bennet, embraced the Roman catholic religion; ſo that this covenanted king broke all his ſolemn engagements, and turned Papiſt before his reſtoration. However, his majeſty, rightly judging that it was not his intereſt to avouch what he had done, by making an open profeſſion of Popery, as his brother afterwards did, ſtill pretended to be a Proteſtant himſelf, and to have a real concern for the Proteſtant religion.

After Cromwel's death, which happened September 3d, 1658, things went pretty ſmooth, till the king, upon his return, declared his diſpleaſure with the oppoſers of the reſolutions ſome of whom were among the firſt of the ſufferers in the tragical period of which I am to treat, while other honeſt Preſbyterians were afterwards made partakers with them.

Mean while, England was embroiled in confuſions. In April 1659, Richard the young protector diſſolved his parliament, and ſoon after was himſelf obliged to reſign; after which matters took a new turn almoſt every month, till at laſt the whole government was managed by a committee of ſafety, appointed by the officers of the army; ſo that the Engliſh nation became ſick of theſe changes, and willing to prefer any government to the preſent anarchy. Many of the gentry, therefore, from ſeveral parts, ſent letters to general Monk, inviting him to march his army into England, to obtain a free parliament.

Monk managed every thing in Scotland, apprehended and impriſoned the earls Marſhal, Montroſe, Eglinton, Selkirk, Glencairn, and Loudon, lord Montgomery, lieutenant-general David Leſlie, viſcount of Kenmure, lord Lorn, [illegible] earl of Seaforth, Sir James Lumſden, colonel James [illegible] earl of Kelly, major Livingſton, and earl of Rothes. [illegible] of them as took the tender, and gave bond for their [illegible] behaviour, were ſet at liberty. However, the [illegible] had a great ſhare in the reſtoration of the royal [illegible], which was now approaching.

In Scotland, the Rev. Mr Robert Douglas was the firſt, [illegible] any author, as far as he could find, who adventured to [illegible] the king's reſtoration to general Monk. It is ſaid [illegible] travelled incognito in England, and in Scotland enga- [illegible] conſiderable numbers of noblemen and gentlemen in [illegible] project.

On the 19th of October the general aſſembled all the [illegible] of the army in Scotland, and engaged them by [illegible] to ſubmit to and ſerve the parliament, caſhiered all [illegible] ſuſpected, and managed every thing according to his [illegible] mind, and then reſolved to march up with his army [illegible] England, and reſtore the privileges of parliament. Be- [illegible] he departed, he ordered the commiſſioners of ſhires, [illegible] magiſtrates of burghs, and many of the nobility, to meet [illegible] at Edinburgh. They aſſembled in the parliament- [illegible] November 15th. He told them, that he was to [illegible] to England to re eſtabliſh the liberties of parliament, [illegible] recommended to them to maintain the peace, and ſup- [illegible] all riſings and commotions during his abſence.

On the 22d, he marched towards England, and when at [illegible]ington, received articles from the council in Eng- [illegible]. But theſe not pleaſing him, he returned with his [illegible] to Edinburgh. Mr Douglas met him, and inter- [illegible] with him to attempt the reſtoration. After con- [illegible]ation, he and his officers rejected the articles, as con- [illegible] to their principles, which were to be governed not by the ſword, but by a parliament lawfully called, in the [illegible]ntenance of which they were engaged by oath. Ac- [illegible]ingly he returned his anſwer on the 24th, and on the [illegible]d of December, he marched with his army to Berwick, [illegible]ere he continued ſome time. On the 12th, he ſent or- [illegible]ers to the commiſſioners of the ſhires for keeping the [illegible] during his abſence.

About this time, Portſmouth and part of the fleet re- [illegible]ed and declared for a free parliament, as did ſeveral de- [illegible]chments of the army, which made way for Monk's en- [illegible]ing into England. The committee of ſafety, ſeeing all [illegible] in confuſion, reſigned their authority, and reſtored [illegible] parliament, which met on the 26th of December, and [illegible]ed a committee to govern the army in their name, and [illegible]der their direction.

Monk entered England with his army, January 2d 1660, [illegible] ſome days after received a letter from the ſpeaker, [illegible]nking him for his kind intentions, and inſinuating, that [illegible] might ſave himſelf the trouble of coming to London, [illegible] the parliament was in peaceable poſſeſſion of their [illegible]ority: but this did not interrupt his march, ſince he [illegible]anded a new, as well as a free parliament.

While matters were thus carried on for bringing about [illegible] king's reſtoration, Mr David Dickſon, and Mr Robert [illegible]glas, in their letter to general Monk, dated January [illegible]th, 1660, ſignified their entire confidence in him as to [illegible] affairs in Scotland, and the neceſſity of one from them [illegible] be near his perſon, to put him in mind of what ſhould [illegible] neceſſary, and to acquaint them with the ſtate of things [illegible] time to time. Accordingly they deſired his paſs for [illegible] James Sharp; but, before the receipt of this, the [illegible]al ordered Mr Auditor Thomſon to write from York [illegible] Mr Sharp, and in his name to deſire him to undertake [illegible] ſhorter journey, and come to him at London with all [illegible]; and on the 17th wrote to Meſſrs Dickſon and [illegible]glas, aſſuring them, that the welfare of their church [illegible]ould be a great part of his care, and that he had ſent [illegible] paſs for Mr Sharp.

When the general got to Harborough, commiſſioners [illegible] to him from London on the 23d, with an addreſs to [illegible] the re admiſſion of the members ſecluded 1648. and [illegible] he continued his march, he received many addreſſes of [illegible] like nature; at laſt he entered the city of London in [illegible] ſort of triumph, on the 3d of February 1660. After [illegible] had given orders for quartering his troops, he repaired [illegible] the council of ſtate, but was refuſed admittance till he [illegible] had taken the oath of abjuration, renouncing the king's [illegible] title to the crown, and engaging to be faithful to the parliament and commonwealth.

On the 6th of February he went to the parliament, where, by the mouth of the ſpeaker, he received the thanks of the houſe for his many ſervices. He returned the compliment, and told them, among other things, that, as he marched from Scotland, ſeveral applications had been made to him for a free and full parliament, and that they would determine the time of their ſitting, and likeways for the admittance of the members ſecluded before the year 1648, without any previous oath or engagement. And proceeded the general, 'I muſt ſay, with pardon of you, that the leſs oaths and engagements are impoſed (with reſpect had to the ſecurity of the common cauſe) your ſettlement will be the ſooner attained to.' And after he had recommended the caſe of Ireland, he proceeds, 'As for Scotland I muſt ſay, the people of that nation deſerve to be cheriſhed; and I believe your late declaration will much glad their ſpirits; for nothing was to them more dreadful than a fear of being over-run with fanatic notions.

The ſame day that Monk was conducted to the parliament, ſeveral miniſters met at Edinburgh, and agreed to ſend up Mr. Sharp to take care of the affairs of the church of Scotland. His inſtructions were theſe:

1. You are to uſe your utmoſt endeavours, that the kirk of Scotland may, without interruption or encroachment, enjoy the freedom and privileges of her eſtabliſhed judicatures, ratified by the laws of the land. 2. Whereas by the late toleration, which is eſtabliſhed, a door is opened to very many groſs errors and looſe practices in this church, you ſhall therefore uſe all lawful and prudent means to repreſent the ſinfulneſs and offenſiveneſs thereof, that it may be timeouſly remedied. 3. You are to repreſent the prejudice the church doth ſuffer by the intervertiſing of the vacant ſtipends, which by law were dedicated to pious uſes, and ſeriouſly endeavour, that hereafter vacant ſtipends may be intromitted with by preſbyteries, and ſuch as ſhall be warranted by them, and no others, to be diſpoſed of and applied to pious uſes, according to the 20th act of the parliament 1644. 4. You are to endeavour that miniſters, lawfully called and admitted by preſbyteries to the miniſtry, may have the benefit of the 39th act of parliament, intitled, Act anent aboliſhing patronages, for obtaining ſummarily, upon the act of their admiſſion, decreet and letters conform, and other executorials, to the effect they may get the right and poſſeſſion of their ſtipends, and other benefits, without any other addreſs or trouble. If you find that there will be any commiſſion appointed in this nation, for ſettling and augmenting of miniſters ſtipends, then you are to uſe your utmoſt endeavours to have faithful men, well affected to the intereſt of Chriſt and his church, employed therein.' Theſe inſtructions, directed to Mr James Sharp, were ſubſcribed by Meſſrs. David Dickſon, Robert Douglaſs, James Wood, John Smith, George Hutchiſon and Andrew Ker. On the 13th Mr Sharp arrived at London, met with a kind reception from Mr Manton, and had immediate acceſs to the general, who recommended him to Mr Anthony Aſhly Cowper and Mr Weaver, two members of parliament. But inſtead of following the inſtructions he received from his conſtituents, he treacherouſly betrayed that very cauſe he was ſent to promote.

On the 21ſt of February Monk repaired to Whitehall, attended by the ſecluded members, who were moſtly preſbyterians, having made them previouſly to ſubſcribe theſe four articles. 1. To ſettle the conduct of the armies, ſo as might beſt ſecure the peace of the common wealth. 2. To provide for the ſupport of the forces by ſea and land, and money for their arrears, and the other contingencies of the government. 3. To conſtitute a council of ſtate for the civil government of Scotland and Ireland; and to iſſue out writs for the ſummoning a parliament to meet at Weſtminſter on the 25th of April. And 4. To conſent to their own diſſolution, by a time that ſhould be limited to them. But all this while the general, the better to diſguiſe his real deſign, ſtill profeſſed himſelf to be againſt the reſtoration.

When the ſecluded members took their place in the houſe, they were ſuperior in number to the rump, and ſo carried all before them. They annulled the engagement of 1649.—repealed the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart,—ordered the earls of Crawford and Lauderdale to be ſet at liberty,—agreed to a bill, March 2d, for approbation of public miniſters, and named Mr Manton, and ſeveral others of the preſbyterian perſuaſion for that ſervice, which paſſed into an act March the 14th. They declared for the aſſembly's Confeſſion of Faith, reſerving the 30th and 31ſt chapters for farther conſideration, declaring it to be the public Confeſſion of Faith of the church of England; and the ſame day ordered the Solemn League and Covenant to be reprinted, and ſet up in every church in England, and read publicly by the miniſter once every year. And thus the re-eſtabliſhment of preſbytery with the Solemn League and Covenant, was judged neceſſary for bringing in the king. After this the long parliament paſſed an act for their own diſſolution, and for the calling a new parliament to meet the 25th of April; the candidates for which were to declare, under their hands, 'That the war againſt the late king was juſt and lawful, and that all who had aſſiſted in any war againſt the parliament, ſince January 1ſt 1641, they and their ſons were made incapable of being elected, unleſs they had ſince manifeſted their good affection to the parliament.' Then they appointed a new council of ſtate, to take care of the government, and on the 16th of March diſſolved themſelves, after they had ſat, with ſundry intermiſſions, nineteen years, four months, and thirteen days.

All this time Sharp kept up his correſpondence with Mr Douglas, and acquainted him with the occurrences of the time, ſtill profeſſing a zealous concern for the intereſt of preſbytery, and for the covenants. In his letter of the 4th of March he named five whom he called warping brethren, and no friends to the covenant-intereſt. and that the great fear is, that the king will come in, and that with him moderate epiſcopacy, at the leaſt, will take place in England. But the Revd. Mr Douglas, in his letter to Sharp of the 15th, ſays, among other things, 'We know by experience that moderate epiſcopacy (what can it be otherways than biſhops with cautions?) is the next ſtep to epiſcopal tyranny which will appear very ſoon above board, if that ground once be laid, &c.' But though Mr Douglas inſiſted that commiſſioners ſhould be ſent from Scotland, yet Sharp, in his anſwer, declared, that this would be neither for their reputation nor advantage; and, in another letter after this, he ſays, 'I continue in my opinion, that Scotland ſhould make no application till the king come in.' Thus Sharp managed affairs.

The elections for the new parliament, or rather convention, went generally in favour of the royaliſts; and Mr Neal ſays, that in ſome places men were choſen who had no religion at all. They ſat down on the 25th of April, and appointed the 30th to be obſerved as a faſt. And the next day the king's declaration from Breda was read in the houſe, granting a general pardon to all his ſubjects who ſhould lay hold on it within forty days, except ſuch as ſhould be excepted by parliament, and declaring a liberty to tender conſciences, and that no man ſhall be diſquieted or called in queſtion, for differences of opinion in matters of religion which do not diſturb the peace of the kingdom. Immediately after reading this declaration, the commons voted, that, according to the ancient conſtitution, the government of this kingdom is, and ought to be, by king, lords and commons; that the king of Scotland is king of England, &c. And a committee was appointed to draw up a dutiful letter inviting his majeſty to return to his dominions; and a deputation of lords and commons was ſent to convoy him home. Thus the king was invited back in a hurry, without any terms.

Had the preſbyterians in England exerted themſelves as they might, on this occaſion, in all probability the miſeries that afterwards came upon themſelves and the whole nation, had been prevented. They had been kept under ſince 1648, and being by this time weary of the independants, and watchful to keep all republicans out of the parliament, they ſecretly courted the epiſcopalians ſays Mr Neal, who diſperſed papers among the people, proteſting their reſolutions to forget all paſt injuries, and to bury all rancor, malice and animoſities. In ſhort, they put that confidence in them, which afterwards turned out to their own unſpeakable diſadvantage; nay, the majority of them declared themſelves ſatisfied to yield to a moderate epiſcopacy, according to the plan of archbiſhop Uſher; but the church of Scotland ſtood to their principles.

In April and May the provincial ſynods met, and there appeared a very great diſpoſition towards making up the differences between the reſolutioners and proteſtors, had not Mr Sharp by his letters from London, diverted this upon the king's return, and put him and the managers about him upon beginning the perſecution, with attacking the remonſtrators or anti reſolutioners. For this vile apoſtate had a private pique againſt the Rev. Mr Samuel Rutherfoord, Mr James Guthrie, lord Wariſtoun, and others of the proteſtors, and therefore put the government upon thoſe meaſures we ſhall afterwards relate, by which all attempts for a reconciliation were rendered abortive, till both were thrown into the furnace together. Sharp was joined in this by thoſe noblemen who could not bear the ſcriptural ſtrictneſs of the preſbyterian diſcipline, and government.

The ſynod of Lothian ſat down on the 1ſt of May, when Mr Douglas preached an excellent ſermon from 2 Cor. iv. 1. where he bore an excellent teſtimony againſt prelacy, and warned his brethren againſt moderate epiſcopacy; for, ſays he, 'Tis a plant which God never planted and the ladder whereby antichriſt mounted his throne;' and farther obſerves, that kingly government in the ſtate, and preſbyterian in the church, are the greateſt crubs to profaneneſs; and ſo confuted that fooliſh propoſition, No biſhop, no king. He likewiſe bore his teſtimony againſt ſectarianiſm, which he compared to quickſands on the ſhore, which ſwallow up people before they are aware.

The king was proclaimed at London on the 4th of May, and at Edinburgh on the 14th. Many at this time went to compliment his majeſty; among others Sharp was ſent, of whom Dr Burnet writes thus. 'He carried with him a letter from the earl of Glencairn to Hyde, made ſoon after earl of Clarendon, recommending him as the only perſon capable to manage the deſign of ſetting up epiſcopacy in Scotland: upon which he was received into great confidence. Yet as he had obſerved very carefully the ſucceſs of Monk's ſolemn proteſtations, againſt the king, and for a common wealth, it ſeems he was ſo pleaſed with the original, that he reſolved to copy after it, without letting himſelf be diverted from it by ſcruples; for he ſtuck neither at ſolemn proteſtations, both by word of mouth and by letters, (of which there is a multitude in Mr Wodrow's introduction) nor at appeals to God of his ſincerity in acting for preſbytery, both in prayers and on other occaſions, joining with them many dreadful imprecations on himſelf if he did not premeditate. He was all the while maintained by the preſbyterians, as their agent, and continued to give them a conſtant account of his negotiations in their ſervice, while he was indeed undermining it. This piece of craft was ſo viſible, he having repeated his proteſtations to ſo many perſons, as then grew jealous of him, that when he threw off the maſk, about a year after this, it laid a foundation of ſuch a character of him, that nothing could ever bring people to any tolerable thoughts of a man's whoſe diſſimulation and treachery were ſo well known, and of which ſo many proofs were to be ſeen under his own hand.

The king landed at Dover May 26th, and on Tueſday the 29th rode in triumph, with his two brothers, through the city of London to Whitehall, amidſt the acclamations of an innumerable croud of ſpectators. As he paſſed along, the London miniſters, in their places, attended him with all demonſtrations of joy, and by the hands of old Mr Arthur Jackſon preſented his majeſty with a rich embоſſed Bible, which he was pleaſed to receive, and to declare it his reſolution to make that book the rule of his conduct. Thus was his majeſty reſtored; and we ſhall relate that he kept this laſt reſolution in the ſame manner that he obſerved all his other engagements.

After apoligizing for this ſtep, they ſay,—To your honours is our exhortation, that ye would endeavour —to advance the building of the houſe of God, reſerving always always into the Lord's own hand that glory which he will communicate neither with man nor angel, to wit, To preſcribe from his holy mountain a lively pattern, according to which his own tabernacle ſhould be builded; remembering always, that there is no abſolute—authority in this world, except the ſovereign authority of Chriſt,—to whom it belongeth as properly to rule the church according to the good pleaſure of his own will, as—to ſave her by the merit of his own ſufferings: all other authority is ſo encroached within the marches of divine commandment, that the leaſt overpaſſing of the bounds ſet by God himſelf, bringeth men under the fearful expectation of temporal and eternal judgments—

Next, remember that God hath ſet you to be nurſing fathers of the church, craving—ye would advance—that church which he hath faſhioned—but not that ye ſhould preſume to faſhion—a new portraiture of a church, and a new form of divine ſervice, which God in his word hath not before allowed,—as, namely, the eſtate of biſhops—thereby ye ſhould bring in—the ordinance of man—which the experience of former ages hath ſhewed to be the ground of idleneſs,—pride—tyranny and—ambition in the church of God; and, finally, to have been the ground of that Antichriſtian hierarchy which mounted up on the ſteps of preeminence of biſhops, until that man of ſin came forth as the firſt ripe fruits of man's wiſdom, whom God ſhall conſume with the breath of his own mouth.—

Above all things, my lords, beware to ſtrive againſt God with an open and diſplayed banner, by building up again the walls of Jericho, which the Lord hath not only caſt down—but laid them under an—execration; ſo that the building of them again muſt needs ſtand to greater charges to the builders, than the re-edifying of Jericho to Hiel the Bethelite—for he had nothing but the interdiction of Joſhua.—But the eſtates of this realm have the reverence of the oath of God, made by themſelves, and ſubſcribed with their own hands—to hold them back from ſetting up the dominion of biſhops.—This pre-eminence of biſhops is that Dagon which once already fell before the ark of God in this land, and no band of iron ſhall be able to hold him up again—the inſtitution of Chriſt was anterior thereto—and ſhall ſtand within the houſe of God, when this new faſhion of altar ſhall go to the door.—Remember, my lords, that in times paſt your authority was for Chriſt—God forbid that ye ſhould now leave off, and fall away from your former reverence born to Chriſt, in preſuming to lead him whom the Father hath appointed to be leader of you: and far leſs to trail the holy ordinances of Chriſt, by the cords of your authority, at the heels of the ordinances of men.—And albeit your honours have no ſuch intention,—yet remember that ſpiritual darkneſs, flowing from a very ſmall beginning, doth ſo inſinuate itſelf into the houſe of God, as men can hardly diſcern by what ſecret means the light is dimmed; and darkneſs creeping in gets the upper hand, and in the end, at unawares, all is involved within a miſty cloud of horrible apoſtacy.—

The HISTORY of the CHURCH of SCOTLAND.

CHAP. I.

Of the apprehending the Marquis of Argyll; the proceedings of the committee of eſtates; the ſupplication of the miniſters, and their impriſonment, and the ſufferings of others, to the end of the year 1660.

WHEN King CHARLES II. was reſtored on the 29th of May 1660, never any prince came to the poſſeſſion of ſuch large dominions with greater advantages to have done good to himſelf, to his ſubjects at home, and to his allies abroad: but he was no ſooner placed on the throne, than, through the influence of evil council, and his own effeminate and vicious diſpoſition, he abandoned himſelf to all manner of voluptuous pleaſures, and in a little time became a perſecutor of thoſe very perſons to whom he was obliged for being placed on the throne of his anceſtors.

The Engliſh Preſbyterians were not long before they felt the diſmal effects of their appearance for a monarch who had no ſenſe of gratitude for their kind ſervices, nor any regard to his moſt ſolemn oaths and engagements. And the church of Scotland, to whom he was ſo much indebted, and for the ſupport and eſtabliſhment whereof he had entered into covenant, was, in a little time, made to feel the direful conſequences of royal diſſimulation and perjury, though ſhe had an undoubted claim to all manner of favour and protection.

On the 19th of June a thankſgiving was obſerved at Edinburgh, for the king's reſtoration, which began with feigned devotion, and ended in open impiety. When the ſermons were over, the city magiſtrates and council, preceded by his majeſty's heralds and trumpeters, and diffrent kinds of muſic, and attended with the officers of ſtate, a multitude of nobility and gentry, judges and others, went in proceſſion to the croſs, where, a large theatre being erected for that purpoſe, and a table covered, they drank to the health of the day with the utmoſt pomp and levity poſſible, the trumpets ſounded, the bells rung, the guards fired, the very croſs run with wine, and all manner of demonſtrations of joy were ſhewed; from thence they repaired to the town-hall and chief inns in the city, where the evening was ſpent as if it had been a great ſacrifice to Bacchus; a direful preſage of the woful days a coming, and a literal verſification of that ſaying of the wiſeſt of mere men, 'Even in laughter the heart is ſorrowful, and the end of that mirth is heavineſs.'

Soon after the king's return, the noble marquis of Argyll was very much ſolicited to repair to court; and no doubt he was himſelf inclined to wait on a prince on whoſe head he had placed the crown. But ſeveral of his beſt friends, and particularly Mr Robert Douglas, uſed many arguments to divert him from his purpoſe, till matters were come to ſome ſettlement, eſpecially as his enemies at London had been at pains to raiſe calumnies on his lordſhip's perſon and conduct. However, Argyll being perſuaded that he was able to vindicate himſelf from all aſperſions, was he only admitted to his majeſty's preſence, ſet out for London, where he arrived on the 8th of July, and went directly to Whitehall.

When the king heard of his being come thither, he, notwithſtanding his former promiſes, ordered Sir William Fleming to apprehend and carry him directly to the tower, there he continued under cloſe confinement till he was ſent to Scotland. This noble peer was one of the chief of the covenanters, and had been ſingularly active in the reformation of his country from the inſupportable yoke of Prelacy.

From the tower he was conveyed in a man of war to Scotland, to be tried by the parliament. They landed at Leith on the 20th of December, and he was committed to Edinburgh caſtle the ſame day.

Sir John Swinton, one of the judges under Cromwel, who, from being a zealous profeſſor of the reformation, turned Quaker, and had been apprehended in a Quaker's houſe in London, was ſent down to Scotland with the marquis.

While theſe things were a doing, on the 24th of July orders came down to major-general Morgan to ſecure Sir James Stewart provoſt of Edinburgh, Sir Archibald Johnſtoun of Wariſtoun, and Sir John Chieſly of Carſwell, who proteſted againſt the death of king Charles I. and was knighted in the iſle of Wight. The firſt and laſt were ſeized, but Wariſtown eſcaped for ſome time. And therefore he was ſummoned by ſound of trumpet to ſurrender himſelf, and the general iſſued a proclamation for apprehending him, promiſing 100 pounds Scots to any who ſhould do it, and diſcharging all from concealing or harbouring him under the pain of treaſon. This was the firſt arbitrary ſtep; for here is not only a reward offered by a general for apprehending a worthy gentleman, but declaring it treaſon for any to harbour him, and that without any cauſe aſſigned.

On

On the 26th of July, one William Giffen, or Govan was apprehended, and committed to the caſtle of Edinburgh, upon a falſe information, that he had been on the ſcaffold when king Charles I. was beheaded.

About this time his majeſty ſettled the miniſtry in Scotland. The earl of Middleton was declared his commiſſioner for holding the parliament, and general of the forces that were to be raiſed. The earl of Glencairn was made chancellor, the earl of Lauderdale ſecretary of ſtate, the earl of Rothes preſident of the council; the earl of Crawford was continued in the treaſury, and Primroſe was clerk-regiſter. The reſt depended on theſe; but Middleton and Lauderdale were two heads of the parties. Dr Burnet farther ſays, that Middleton had a private inſtruction, to try the inclinations of the nation for Epiſcopacy, and to conſider of the beſt method for ſetting it up. If this be true, we may ſee what regard this prince had for the ſolemn engagements he had entered into.

How ſoon as the king had leiſure to conſider the ſtate of Scotland, he iſſued a proclamation, dated at Whitehall, the 2d of Auguſt, for the committee of eſtates, nominated by him and the parliament 1651, to meet at Edinburgh the 23d of that month, for managing the affairs of the kingdom till the parliament ſhould meet.

All the members of this committee had appeared hearty profeſſors of the true religion, had concurred with the king in taking the National Covenant, and Solemn League and Covenant, and ſome of them had adviſed him to make that remarkable declaration at Dunfermline in Auguſt 1650. So that every one might have expected ſome good from their adminiſtration; but their little finger became heavier than the loins of all the former oppreſſors, of which they gave a ſpecimen on the very firſt day of their meeting.

Thus, upon the 23d of Auguſt, Meſſ. James Guthrie at Stirling, John Stirling and Robert Trail at Edinburgh, Alexander Moncrieff at Scoon, John Semple at Carſphairn, Thomas Ramſay at Mordingtoun, John Scot at Oxnam, Gilbert Hall at Kirkliſtoun, John Murray at Methven, and George Nairn at Bruntiſland, miniſters, together with Mr Andrew Hay at Craignethan, and James Kirkco of Sandiwell, elders, aſſembled at a private houſe in Edinburgh, to draw up an humble addreſs and ſupplication to the king.

The occaſion of their meeting was this: The oppoſers of the public reſolutions, juſtly ſuſpecting the deſigns now hatching againſt the church, and the conduct of Mr Sharp at London, applied to the public reſolutioners either to concur with them in a dutiful addreſs to his majeſty, at ſuch a conjuncture as this, or addreſs him themſelves: But they, confiding too much in Mr Sharp, would not comply with either of theſe; and therefore theſe faithful men found themſelves obliged to do ſomething in ſuch a criſis. Accordingly they met, and drew up an humble ſupplication and addreſs, wherein they declared, 'how hateful the actings of the late uſurping Powers were to them, in offering violence to the parliament of England, in murdering the late king, in ſecluding his majeſty from his government, &c. and above all, in their impious encroachments upon the kingdom and liberties of Jeſus Chriſt—how thankfully they acknowleged the Lord's ſignal preſerving his majeſty's perſon.—and in bringing him back after a long exile.—How it was their ſincere purpoſe and reſolution, as it was their preſent practice, to power forth their fervent deſires and ſupplications for his majeſty, hoping that he would allow them that protection, countenance and encouragement, which they had reaſon to expect from a gracious king.—What dangers threatened religion, and the work of reformation in theſe kingdoms, from the deſigns and endeavours of the remnant of the popiſh, prelatical, and malignant party therein,—to re-introduce prelacy, the ceremonies, and the ſervice-book, which were formerly caſt out as inconſiſtent with that pure and ſpotleſs rule of church-government, diſcipline, and worſhip in the word of God,—and from the endeavours of the ſpirit of error, that poſſeſſeth the ſectaries in theſe nations, — and therefore, with bowed knees and bended affections, they humbly ſupplicate his majeſty, to employ his royal power, for the preſervation of the reformed religion in the church of Scotland, in doctrine, worſhip, diſcipline, and government, and for the reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland,—and that all places of truſt under his majeſty might be filled with ſuch as have taken the covenant, and are of approven integrity and known affection to the cauſe of God,—and that his majeſty would be pleaſed, for removing the beginnings of ſtumbling that had already been given to remove the ceremonies and ſervice book from his own chapel and family, and other places of his dominions, and give public ſignification of his approbation of the covenant, and of his purpoſe to adhere unto the ſame, which they put him in mind he had formerly done in a moſt ſolemn manner, — for it was the deſire of their ſoul, that his majeſty may be like unto David, a man according to God's own heart, to Solomon of an underſtanding heart to judge the Lord's people,' &c.

This is that which biſhop Burnet calls a warm paper, in which, after ſome cold compliments to the king upon his reſtoration, they put him in mind of the covenant, &c. But the reader may judge whether they could well ſay ſincerer expreſſions of loyalty. Did they put him in mind of any thing but what all honeſt and faithful ſubjects ought to have done? Had not his majeſty ſworn to every thing, which, in the moſt reſpectful manner, they deſired? Was there any thing treaſonable, like a ſeditious reflecting on his majeſty, or on the government of the kingdom of England, or the conſtitution of the preſent committee of eſtates?

The earl of Glencairn, the chancellor, and others, being informed of that meeting, ſent ſome perſons to apprehend thoſe who were met together. They who were ſent came upon them when the ſcrolls and other papers were before them. Theſe papers were no other than the firſt draughts of letters to ſome brethren, deſiring another meeting at Glaſgow, in September, about the ſupplication, with inſtructions to ſome of their number, when they went weſt with a copy of the ſupplication, that it might be conſidered by the ſynod of Glaſgow, in order to their joining with them in it, if they judged it needful.

When the unfiniſhed ſcrolls and ſupplication were read before the committee, they were directly ſent to court, and all who had been preſent at the meeting, except Mr Hay of Craignethan, who happily eſcaped, were committed to the caſtle of Edinburgh, without ever calling the miniſters before them, or hearing what they had to ſay in their own defence. So great injuſtice exerciſed towards thoſe who were manifeſting their love and reſpect to their prince, by putting him in mind of his moſt ſacred engagements, and of the duty he owed both to God and his ſubjects, juſtly alarmed all the faithful in the land, eſpecially the congregations who are now rendered deſolate.

Next day the committee of eſtates publiſhed a proclamation againſt all unlawful and unwarrantable meetings and conventicles, without his majeſty's ſpecial authority, and againſt all ſeditious petitions and remonſtrances, under what pretext ſoever. But can the reader imagine that it was unlawful for a ſmall number of miniſters to meet in a private room, when their only deſign was to congratulate his majeſty upon his being reſtored to the throne of his anceſtors, and put him in mind of his duty? Or that it was a ſeditious petition and remonſtrance, to intreat the king to obſerve his coronation-oath, when many uſed all their intereſt to get him to act a part inconſiſtent with what he had ſworn in the preſence of God?

The miniſters under confinement agreed upon a petition, and ſent it to the committee; but the chancellor inſiſted that they ſhould acknowlege their fault in meeting upon the deſign they did. This they could not in conſcience comply with, notwithſtanding the advocate, who had taken the tender, and thereby renounced allegiance to the king, when many of them were ſuffering for their loyalty, threatened to found a proceſs of treaſon upon the ſupplication. And therefore they continued a conſiderable time in priſon; at laſt ſeveral of them were let out of the caſtle, and confined to their lodgings in Edinburgh, till the ſitting of the parliament, when they were all liberated except Mr Guthrie, who remained in priſon till a glorious martyrdom ſet him free.

During the proceedings of the committee, that vile apoſtate Sharp arrived at Edinburgh on the laſt of Auguſt, and next day delivered the following letter from his majeſty, directed to Mr Robert Douglas, to be communicated to the preſbytery of Edinburgh.

CHARLES

"TRusty and well beloved, we greet you well. By the letter you sent us with this bearer Mr James Sharp, and by the account he gave of the state of our church there, we have received full information of your sense of our sufferings, and of your constant affection and loyalty to our person and authority; and therefore we will detain him here no longer, of whose good services we are very sensible, nor will we delay to let you know by him our gracious acceptance of your address, and how well we are satisfied with your carriages, and with the generality of the ministers of the church of Scotland, in this time of trial, whilst some, under specious pretences, swerved from that duty and allegiance they owed to us. And, because such, who by the countenance of usurpers, have disturbed the peace of that our church, may also labour to cause jealousies in the minds of well-meaning people, we have thought fit, by this, to assure you, that, by the grace of God, we resolve to discountenance profanity, and all contemners and opposers of the ordinances of the gospel. We do also resolve to protect and preserve the government of the church of Scotland, as it is settled by law, without violation; and to countenance, in the due exercise of their functions, all such ministers who shall behave themselves dutifully and peaceably, as becomes men of their calling. We will also take care, that the authority and acts of the general assembly at St Andrews and Dundee 1651, be owned and stand in force, until we shall call another general assembly, (which we purpose to do as soon as our affairs will permit); and we intend to send for Mr Robert Douglas, and some other ministers, that we may speak with them in what may farther concern the affairs of that church. And as we are very well satisfied with your resolution not to meddle without your sphere, so we do expect that church-judicatures in Scotland, and ministers there, will keep within the compass of their station, meddling only with matters ecclesiastic, and promoting our authority, and interest with our subjects, against all opposers; and that they will take special notice of such, who, by preaching, or private conventicles, or any other way, transgress the limits of their calling, by endeavouring to corrupt the people, or sow seeds of disaffection to us or our government. This you shall make known to the several presbyteries within that our kingdom; and as we do give assurance of our favour and encouragement to you, and to all honest deserving ministers there, so we earnestly recommend it to you, that you be earnest in your prayers, public and private, to almighty God, who is our Rock and our Deliverer, both for us and our government, that we may have fresh and constant supplies of his grace, and the right improvement of all his mercies and deliverances, to the honour of his great name, and the peace, safety, and benefit of all our kingdoms. And so we bid you heartily farewel."

"Given at our court at Whitehall, the 10th of August 1660, and of our reign the twelfth year.

"By his majesty's special command,

"LAUDERDALE."

This letter seems to have been penned by Sharp; and, though calculated to lull all asleep till matters were ripe for a thorough change, yet there is in it an inuendo, as if some of the ministers had deviated from their duty; howbeit, some of them had taken the tender, nor complied with the measures laid down by Cromwel, as Sharp did. The reader will likewise observe, that this covenanted king took care not to mention one word of the covenants, but only promised to protect the government of the church of Scotland as it is settled by law. And as for his calling an assembly, if it was intended, we are sure it was never performed. However, the presbytery of Edinburgh sent a loyal answer to the king's letter, with another to Lauderdale. But to return to the proceedings of the committee.

When his majesty's letter came down, it rather increased than lessened the committee's proceedings against gentlemen and ministers. The brethren for the public resolutions made too much of it; and those who opposed these resolutions were looked upon as enemies to the king, and therefore many of them were harassed and imprisoned.

Thus, on the 14th of September John Graham provost of Glasgow, and John Spreul town-clerk there, were imprisoned, by their order, in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, because they were reckoned to favour the remonstrance. The next day, Mr Patrick Gillespie, principal of the college of Glasgow, was made prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, and afterwards sent to Stirling castle, where he continued till the parliament sat down. Mr William Wisheart and Mr Robert Row were confined to their chambers at Edinburgh, and within a few days Mr Wisheart and provost Jaffray were imprisoned in Edinburgh jail; about the same time the Rev. Mr James Guthrie was sent from Edinburgh castle to Stirling, where he continued till near the time of his trial.

On the 19th of September a proclamation was published against two noted books, viz. Mr Rutherford's Lex Rex, and the causes of God's wrath, as if they contained many things injurious to the king, and laid the foundation and seeds of rebellion. But the truth is, the principles maintained in the first were never yet disproved, and the facts in the other were directly contrary to the measures now pursued; and therefore they were called in, and burnt at Edinburgh by the common hangman.

Next day a proclamation was issued against all whom the committee were pleased to call remonstrants, and their adherents; by this the most zealous of the ministers were laid open to persecution, and many gentlemen of the best estates and greatest interest in the nation, who appeared for the reformation since the year 1637, and had given the greatest evidences of concern for the royal family, were now struck at, with a view to model the elections for the ensuing parliament to the mind of the court. Accordingly some were summoned before the committee, and others confined, that their influence upon elections might be prevented. And if they had any tolerable information against them, with respect to their compliances in the time of the usurpation, or their inclination to the remonstrance and protestation, they were to sign a bond obliging themselves to do nothing tending to the prejudice of his majesty's person, family, and authority,—and that they shall not in any time coming, directly or indirectly, own, promote, or abet the remonstrance under the highest pains.

On the 10th of October Sir Archibald Johnstoun of Warristoun, colonel Ker, colonel Barclay, John Hume of Kello, Robert Andrew of Little-tarbat, and William Dundas late supervisor, were declared fugitives by the committee.

Many ministers were at this time brought to trouble; particularly, on the 13th of October, Mr John Dickson minister at Rutherglen was imprisoned at Edinburgh, upon an information given by Sir James Hamilton of Elistoun, of some expressions used in a sermon, which, as was alleged, reflected on the government and committee, and tended to sedition and division. Mr James Nasmyth minister at Hamilton was imprisoned for words alleged to have been spoken by him many years ago, and Mr James Simpson minister at Airth, when going to settle with a congregation in Ireland, was seized at Port patrick, without any cause shewn him. Now it cannot be alleged that these persons suffered for rebellion or treason; for all of them owned the king's authority, and many of them had suffered much for his majesty when in exile. After this the committee adjourned for some days.

On the 1st of November a proclamation was published, with much solemnity, for holding a parliament at Edinburgh on the 13th of December following: but the king being engaged in several important affairs at London, the affairs of Scotland were postponed till the 31st of December, when his majesty's high commissioner arrived at Holy-rood-house, and by that time all was ready for business.

I shall close this chapter by observing, that though, in November, George Campell, sheriff depute of Argyll, was imprisoned for being concerned in some things with the marquis, yet he was soon pardoned.

CHAP. III.

Of the acts of the first session of parliament, the conduct of the church judicatures, the sufferings of the marquis of Argyl, Mr James Guthrie and several others.

WE have had a short view of the arbitrary proceedings of the committee of estates, by which not a few suffered contrary to law: and therefore the first step of the managers was, to open a door for a more legal prosecution of honest people who stood up for religion, liberty, and property.

Accordingly when the parliament met upon the 21st of January 1661 they passed many acts, which were illegal, and subversive of the constitution both in church and state. To trace this matter more particularly—the greatest part of the members of this parliament were men of a very infamous character. The commissioner, the earl of Middleton, was of a fierce and violent temper, bishop Burnet says, 'His way of living was most splendid, but at the same time was most scandalous; for vices of all sorts were the open practices of those about him.' The nobility and gentry were remarkably changed to the worse. Few that had been active in former years were now alive, and these few were marked out for ruin. Several of the leading managers finding that the strictness of the presbyterian discipline stood in the way of their licentiousness, took a disgust thereat: besides great pains had been taken at the elections to get those chosen, who were entirely at the devotion of the court; and if any of another disposition had been chosen, some pretence or other was made to set aside the election.

When they had taken their seats in the parliament-house, Mr Robert Douglas preached an excellent sermon from 2 Chron. xix. 6. 'Take heed what you do, for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment.' After calling the rolls the earl of Glencairn, was chosen preses, and the commissioner had a speech recomending peace and unity.

It is to be observed, that according to former unrepealed acts, the covenants were to be taken and subscribed by every member of succeeding parliaments, before they entered upon business: but a new oath of allegiance, or rather supremacy, being now imposed, the same was taken by all present, except the earl of Cassils; so that this parliament sat down and proceeded in a method directly contrary to standing laws.

On the 8th of January the commissioner moved that the parliament might proceed to business, in the ancient way, by the lords of the articles, without devolving their power on them, which he declared was not his intention; accordingly after some debate, it was resolved, 'That 12 noblemen, 12 Barons, and 12 burgesses, with the officers of state, shall be in the place of the lords of the articles. These were authorised, in their several meetings, to hear all matters presented to them, to receive proof of what they found relevant, and report to the parliament twice a week.' And to these the nation was chiefly indebted for the laws made in this session.

It is very evident that the main design of this parliament was to make the king absolute: and this was not a little performed by the fulsom sermons preached by too many before them. The preachers were not then appointed by the assembly of commission, who used formerly to sit in time of parliament, but the king's advocate by his letter, appointed what preachers he pleased. Their ordinary themes were the wickedness of rebellion, the extensiveness of the king's power, passive obedience, &c. and bishop Burnet says, though they did not speak out, they insinuated the necessity of a greater authority than was then in the church for keeping them in order. One or two spoke plainer: upon which the presbytery of Edinburgh went to the earl of Middleton and complained of that as an affront to the law and the king's letter. He dismissed them with good words, but took no notice of their complaints. It will not be amiss now to consider some of the acts made in this session of parliament, since they laid the foundation for all the injustice and cruelty that were exercised afterwards.

The first printed act is concerning the president and oath of parliament, by which it was enacted, that all members should at their first down sitting, take an oath of allegiance in the following form:

'I——for testification of my faithful obedience to my most gracious and redoubted sovereign Charles king of Great Britain, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, do affirm, testify and declare, by this my solemn oath, that I acknowledge my said sovereign only supreme governor of this kingdom, over all persons, and in all causes; and that no foreign prince, power or state, nor person civil or ecclesiastic, hath any jurisdiction, power or superiority over the same: and therefore I utterly renounce and forsake all foreign jurisdiction, powers and authorities, and shall, to my utmost power, defend, assist, and maintain his majesty's jurisdiction foresaid, against all deadly, and never decline his majesty's power or jurisdiction, as I shall answer to God.'

Members of parliament were to add; 'and I shall faithfully give my advice and vote in every thing that shall be propounded in parliament, as I shall answer to God.'

The title of the act calls it an oath of parliament, the body of it, an oath of allegiance; and it is evident that it includes the supremacy. The words are general, but very comprehensive, and capable of different senses. Thus, when the king is affirmed to be supreme over all persons and in all causes, and to be assisted and maintained in that jurisdiction, this would require some limitation, restriction, or explication to clear the meaning; for though the commissioner and chancellor declared once and again in the face of parliament, that they did not intend to give his majesty any ecclesiastical, but only a civil power, yet in a little time, when ministers offered to take the oath in this sense, they were not permitted. And it would seem these declarations from the throne were made from other views than at that time appeared; for, when the earl of Cassils and the laird of Kilburny moved that these declarations might be entered into the registers, it was peremptorily refused. In fine, this oath came to be the Shibboleth of the state, and in a little time was imposed upon all subjects of any influence.

By their 4th act they decree, that no conventions leagues, or bonds be made without the sovereign. By the 6th act they declare the convention of estates 1643, who entered into the Solemn League and Covenant, void and null. By their 7th act they discharge the renewing of the Solemn League and Covenant, or any other Covenants, or public oaths concerning the government of the church or kingdom, without his majesty's special warrant and approbation, By their 11th act it is ordered, that all persons in public offices take the oath of allegiance before mentioned, and subscribe a declaration asserting his majesty's royal prerogatives; the substance whereof is as follows: 'Forasmuch as the estates of parliament—have—declared, that it is an inherent privilege,—and an undoubted part of the royal prerogative of the kings of this kingdom, to have the sole choice and appointment of the officers of state, privy councellors and lords of session; that the power of calling, holding and dissolving parliaments, and all conventions and meetings of the estates do solely reside in the king's majesty, his heirs and successors, and that —no acts nor statutes, to be passed in parliament, can be binding on the people, or have the authority or force of laws, without the special approbation of his majesty, or his commission—That the power of arms, the making peace or war, the making treaties with foreign princes and states, or at home by subjects among themselves, doth properly reside in the king's majesty, his heirs and successors, as their undoubted right, and theirs alone, and that it is high treason in the subjects of this kingdom, or any number of them, upon whatsoever ground, to rise or continue in arms, without his majesty's authority first interponed thereto. That it is unlawful for subjects, of whatsoever quality or function,—to assemble themselves to treat or determine in any matters of state, civil or ecclesiastical, (except in the ordinary judgments) or to make leagues or bonds—without his majesty's special consent. That the League and Covenant, and all the treaties following thereupon,—are not obligatory on this kingdom, or on the ſubjects thereof, to meddle or interpoſe, by arms, or any other ſeditious way, in any thing concerning the religion and government of the churches of England and Ireland,—and that none—preſume, upon pretext of any authority whatſoever, to require the renewing or ſwearing of the ſaid League and Covenant, or of any other covenants or public oaths—and that none offer to renew the ſame without his majeſty's ſpecial warrant and approbation, &c. I do, conform to the acts of parliament aforeſaid, declare, that I do, with all humble duty, acknowlege his majeſty's royal prerogative, right and power in all the particulars, and in the manner aforeſaid, and that I do heartily give my conſent thereto, by theſe preſents ſubſcribed by me at——.'

As the oath of allegiance before mentioned was in it ſelf unlawful, becauſe to ſwear unreſtricted and unlimited allegiance to any man is a manifeſt enſlaving of mankind to a ſervile obligation to maintain and uphold the perſons and government of mutable men, let them act as they pleaſe; and becauſe there is in it an acknowlegement of univerſal ſupremacy inherent in the king; ſo this inſtrument or declaration, aſſerting the king's prerogative is equally ſo; for, 1. all in public offices hereby acknowlege an abſolute and unlimited power in the king; 2. they renounce the ſolemn and lawful covenants; and 3. they condemn the moſt innocent means of ſeeking redreſs of grievances; for they are todeclare it to be treaſon for ſubjects, upon any pretence, to riſe in arms, and unlawful for ſubjects to aſſemble together to treat of any matters of ſtate, civil or eccleſiaſtical, without his majeſty's approbation; ſo that here all defenſive arms are condemned; and none of the judicatures of the church are to aſſemble but when the king pleaſes. By this alſo a door was opened for the utter overthrow of theſe judicatures, ſeeing the king is declared to be the fountain of all church power. And therefore it was no wonder, though many of thoſe who were bound by the national covenant and ſolemn league and covenant, refuſed to take the oath or ſubſcribe the declaration; and it is evident, that they who ſuffered for this refuſal can never be ſaid to ſuffer as evil doers, but only for conſcience ſake.

One might think that the parliament had made ſufficient progreſs, for one ſeſſion, in overturning preſbyterian government and diſcipline; but they were determined to make all ſure, and therefore by their 9th act, they annulled the parliaments and committees kept after the year 1648, and by their 15th act they annulled all the parliaments that had been held betwixt the year 1640 and 1648. And thus they took away the greateſt human ſecurities that could be given to a church and nation. Biſhop Burnet ſays of this laſt mentioned act, what he might with equal reaſon have ſaid of both, namely 'That it was a moſt extravagant act, only fit to be concluded after a drunken bout. It ſhook all poſſible ſecurity for the future, and laid down a moſt pernicious precedent.' When this act reciſſory was brought in to the houſe by the lords of the articles, great debates aroſe upon it, ſo that it could not paſs that night; however, after great ſtruggle it was carried next day.

By their 16th act, concerning religion and government, the true proteſtant reformed religion was ordered to be ſettled as it was before the year 1638, and the government of the church to be ſecured as the king finds moſt conſiſtent with Scripture, monarchy and peace. Hereby the king was ſet at the head of all eccleſiaſtical afairs; for the government of the church was entirely unfixed, and the ſettlement of it put into the king's power: and though ſeſſions, preſbyteries and ſynods were permitted for a few weeks; yet we ſhall ſee how their liberties were taken from them, and their proceedings violently interrupted, ſo that preſbyterian government ſcarcely lived out this year.

By their 17th act they ordained that the 29th of May be obſerved as an anniverſary thankſgiving for the king's reſtoration, and be for ever ſet apart as an holy-day unto the Lord, &c. Though many gave obedience to this act, yet others could not in conſcience ſubmit to it, not only becauſe it is not in the power of any, under heaven to appoint anniverſary holy-days, that being the prerogative of the Creator alone, but alſo becauſe, though the day was ſet apart, for ever to be kept holy to the Lord, yet diverſions were appointed for ſpending the day after the public worſhip was over.

And the better to ſecure the model of their church government, by the 56th act they reſtored the heavy grievance of patronages, which they knew had always been a dead weight upon, and inconſiſtent with preſbyterial government. Nay, this act ordained all who ſhall be preſented to take the oath of allegiance, before they were ſettled, under ſevere penalties. Inſtead of making any remarks upon this, I ſhall only lay before the reader what were the ſentiments of the parliament of Scotland when they aboliſhed patronages 1649. 'Conſidering, ſay they, that patronages and preſentations are an evil and bondage under which the Lord's people, and miniſters of this land have long groaned, and that it hath no warrant in God's word, but is founded only on the common law, and is a cuſtom popiſh, and brought into the kirk in time of ignorance and ſuperſtition, and that the ſame is contrary to the 2d book of diſcipline, in which, upon found and good grounds, it is reckoned among abuſes that are deſired to be reformed, and unto ſeveral acts of general aſſembly; and that it is prejudicial to the liberty of the people and planting of kirks, and unto the free calling and entry of miniſters unto their charge'—Nevertheleſs this parliament not only reſtored patronages, but impoſed the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy on all miniſters who ſhould be preſented.

Having then conſidered ſome of the moſt remarkable acts of this ſeſſion of parliament, by which the conſtitution of the church was overturned, and a foundation laid for introducing abjured prelacy, and proſecuting all who ſhould oppoſe the ſcheme then forming, it is proper that we next take a view of the conduct of the miniſters and judicatures while theſe things were a doing.

It is too evident they did not make ſuch a ſtand againſt theſe encroachments as they might have done. Some indeed, in their private capacity, bore an honourable teſtimony thereagainſt, but very little was done by ſynods and preſbyteries. However, for the honour of thoſe who made any ſtand for the liberties of the church, take the following account;

Mr Robert Douglas, in his ſermon at the opening of the parliament, dealt very faithfully with the members; and, in ſeveral parts of the country, miniſters gave full and faithful warning of the dangers threatning the church of Scotland, particularly Meſſrs Robert Mac Ward at Glaſgow, William Guthrie at Finwick, and John Livingſton at Ancrum, and not a few miniſters kept congregational faſts; but all this time very little was done in a judicative capacity. Nevertheleſs the following efforts were made, tho' they proved fruitleſs.

The parliament having paſſed ſeveral acts ſubverſive of the work of reformation the brethren in and about Edinburgh preſented ſeveral overtures to the commiſſioner, namely, that there might be an act of parliament explaining the meaning of the oath of allegiance, that the parliament would declare, that they had no intention to annul or make void the ſolemn League and covenant, and that they would approve and ratify the Confeſſion of Faith and Catechiſms, and the directory for worſhip, together with the diſcipline, government and liberties of this church. Theſe overtures the commiſſioner and chancellor promiſed to communicate to his majeſty, and afterwards return an anſwer, and at the ſame time deſired the brethren to draw up an act of ratification, as they would have it, and it ſhould be conſidered. This was accordingly done and given to the commiſſioner, but it all came to nothing; for the miniſters were kept in hopes, and got fair words, till matters were paſt remedy; and inſtead of this act of ratification, the act reciſſory, above mentioned, was made and ratified.

When the nature of this laſt act came to be known, the preſbytery of Edinburgh prepared a ſupplication to the houſe, and ſent it to the commiſſioner by three of their number; but partly by promiſes, and partly by threatnings, he prevailed upon them not to give it in that day, and preſently the parliament met, and in all haſte paſt the act. Upon which the preſbytery, next day, ſent Mr David Dickſon, and others to the commiſſioner, to intreat acceſs for having their ſupplication preſented to the houſe, but all to no purpoſe.

poſe. After this they ſent their ſupplication to the king, which met with no regard; and when they heard of farther intentions to alter the government of the church, they wrote to the earl of Lauderdale to interpoſe with his majeſty to put a ſtop to theſe proceedings, till all things be ſettled by a free and lawful general aſſembly; and in March following they ſent up an information to court repreſenting, among other things, the inconvenience and ſad conſequence of a change in the government and conſtitution of the church; in which alſo they were diſappointed: for the managers were reſolved to pleaſe the high-flyers in England, to follow Mr Sharp's ambitious deſigns, and to carry their project againſt all reaſon and juſtice.

Before April and May, when the ſynods were wont to meet, the parliament made great progreſs in their work. However, the ſynod of Glaſgow and Ayr met on the ſecond of April, and taking the ſtate of the church under conſideration, they appointed a committee to draw up an addreſs and ſupplication for a new ſecurity to religion and the church, ſeeing the old fences were taken away; and Mr William Guthrie having read, from the committee, a draught of ſuch addreſs, ſome of the reſolutioners, eſpecially theſe who were gaping after a biſhopric, vehemently oppoſed the ſupplication, and threatened to diſſent, becauſe they alledged, that now was not a proper time; and therefore urged that this matter might be delayed; whereto others yielded, from a conſideration, that without harmony their addreſs would loſe much of its weight: however, they agreed upon a conſideration of their being fixed in, and reſolved to adhere to the doctrine, worſhip, diſcipline and government of the church; but many were juſtly grieved, that they made no mention of dioceſan Epiſcopacy, nor of the obligation of the covenants. When they met again at Glaſgow in May, they were diſcharged by a proclamation from the market croſs. Thus were they deprived of an opportunity of conſidering their ſupplication. And though the miniſters in town ſent three of their number into Edinburgh, with a petition to his majeſty's commiſſioner, yet no return was given to it. This was the laſt ſynod of Preſbyterian miniſters who met at Glaſgow before the year 1687.

On the 11th of April the ſynod of Perth and Stirling met, and, out of their exceſſive loyalty, ordered the remonſtrance, which was drawn up by that ſynod the 9th of October 1650, and afterwards preſented to the king and committee of eſtates, to be razed out of their records, as containing ſeveral things reflecting on his majeſty and the eſtates. I ſhall only ſay, that it had been well if there had never been a cauſe for that remonſtrance.

The ſynod of Fife met at St Andrews in April, but, before they had formally voted their intended petition, and finiſhed the warning they deſigned to give, they were interrupted by the earl of Rothes, appointed inſpector by the commiſſioner. His lordſhip came in, while they were in the midſt of their buſineſs, commanded ſilence in the king's name, required they would inſiſt no more upon what was before them, and diſmiſs immediately; accordingly they obeyed, without proteſting againſt ſuch a plain invaſion of the liberties of Chriſt's houſe; however, the preſbyteries, in their bounds, at their firſt meeting, approved of what the ſynod could not get finiſhed; and all of them, in a very ſolemn manner, declared their adherence to the principles of the church of Scotland.

This new office of inſpector of ſynods had no act of parliament for its conſtitution; and, though it had, that could not juſtify the ſame, there being no precedent for it in the word of God; but that was what our managers did not conſult. They were much vexed that ſynods ſhould bear a teſtimony againſt their proceedings, and therefore theſe were appointed as ſpies, in order to diſſolve them when they determined to petition againſt threatening grievances, as was the practice when Prelacy was firſt introduced after the reformation, in the time of king James VI.

Accordingly the ſynod of Dumfries was diſſolved by Queenſberry and Hartfield, who were both drunk at that very time. The ſynod of Galloway was diſſolved by the the earl of Galloway, as they were drawing up a ſupplication againſt Epiſcopacy; but the moderator, Mr John Park, faithfully proteſted againſt what was done, as an injury to a court of Jeſus Chriſt, and the miniſters would not remove till he prayed, and regularly concluded their meeting.

In the ſynod of Lothian they were not ſuffered ſo much as to ſpeak of any teſtimony; nay, ſome of the members, who were ripe for a change, and devoted to the intereſt of the managers, moved that the proteſtors ſhould be cenſured. While this was in debate, the earl of Callendar and Sir Archibald Stirling came in, and required the moderator to purge the houſe of rebels, meaning the proteſting miniſters, elſe they would diſſolve them, and make them anſwer before other judges. Upon this the ſynod ſuſpended five miniſters of great piety, viz. Meſſ. Alexander Livingſton at Biggar, John Greg at Skerling, Archibald Porteous and James Donaldſon in the preſbytery of Biggar, and Gilbert Hall at Kirkliſton. They likewiſe removed two from their charges, upon the application of ſome malignant and diſaffected perſons in their pariſhes, viz. Mr William Weir at Linlithgow, and Mr William Creighton at Bathgate. Mr Weir, refuſing to deliver up to the magiſtrates the church emoluments and regiſters, was put into the thieves-hole by provoſt Glen; and, after being ſome time in that dungeon, he was carried to a room in the palace, where he was kept ſix weeks, till, at laſt, he was forced to make the beſt terms he could. But, notwithſtanding all this ſinful compliance of the ſynod, becauſe the majority would not yield to ſome propoſals made in favour of prelacy, they were diſſolved in the king's name, and forced to diſmiſs without prayer.

In the northern ſynods the proteſtors began to feel the oppreſſions of the times. I only mention, that Mr Thomas Hog, miniſter at Kiltearn, was depoſed by the ſynod of Roſs, who ſat down the beginning of this year, for refuſing judicially to diſown and diſclaim the proteſtation. At the ſame time a motion was made for depoſing Mr James Frazer of Lisy from his office as ruling elder, but what was the iſſue of it I know not.

By this time we may ſee the diſmal conſequences of admitting malignants into places of power and truſt, and what efforts were made againſt the before named encroachments. It is certain more might have been done, there being as yet no law againſt their meetings, or their petitioning for a redreſs of thoſe grievances that were coming upon them. However, the generality of the miniſters were againſt prelacy. Biſhop Burnet ſays, The ſynod of Aberdeen, at which he was preſent, was the only body that made an addreſs looking towards Epiſcopacy.

It is now proper that we give an account of what many ſuffered during this ſeſſion of parliament, when we ſhall find ſome attacked in their name and reputation, others in their liberties, and others in their lives; ſuch as the noble marquis of Argyll, the Rev. Mr James Guthrie, and Mr Govan.

We noticed that the marquis was committed to the caſtle of Edinburgh the 20th of December laſt.

On the 13th of February this year his lordſhip was brought to the bar of the houſe, where Sir John Fletcher, the king's advocate, accuſed him, in common form, of high treaſon; and, producing an indictment, craved that it might be read. The marquis himſelf begged liberty to ſpeak before that was done; but the houſe refuſed his reaſonable deſire, and ordered it to be read; and though he entreated them to hear a petition he had to preſent, yet that was too great a favour to be granted.

The indictment, which was more months in forming than Argyll had days allowed at firſt to bring in his defences, conſiſted of fourteen articles, wherein a heap of ſlander, perverſion of matters of fact, and miſrepreſentations, are collected together againſt this good and great man. 1. That he roſe in arms againſt the king's good ſubjects, the Anti-covenanters; and ſaid to Mr John Stuart, that it was the opinion of many divines that kings might be depoſed. 2. That he marched with an armed force and burnt the houſe of Airlie. 3. That, in 1640, he beſieged and forced his majeſty's caſtle of Dunbarton to ſurrender to him. 4. That he called, or ordered to be called, the convention of eſtates 1643, and entered into the Solemn League and Covenant with England, levied ſubſidies from the ſubjects, and fought againſt his majeſty's forces. 5. That, in 1655, he burned the houſe of Mar-

ſtrie. 6. That, in 1646, he, or thoſe under his command, beſieged and took the houſes of Towart and Eſcoge, and killed a great many gentlemen. 7. That he marched to Kintire, and killed 300 MacDonalds and MacCouls, in cold blood, and tranſported 200 men to the uninhabited iſle of Jura, where they periſhed by famine. 8. That he went to London and agreed to deliver up the king to the Engliſh army at Newcaſtle, upon the payment of 200,000l, pretended to be due for the arrears of the army treaſonably raiſed 1643. 9. That he proteſted againſt the engagement 1648 for relieving his majeſty; raiſed an army to oppoſe the engagers; met with Oliver Cromwel; conſented to a letter wrote to him on the 6th of October, and to the inſtructions given to Sir John Chieſly to the parliament of England; and, in May following, ſigned a warrant for a proclamation againſt the lords Ogilvie and Ire, the marquis of Huntley, John now earl of Middleton, declaring them, their wives and families, to be out of the protection of the kingdom. 10. That he clogged his majeſty's invitation to the kingdom of Scotland 1649 with many unjuſt limitations; conſented to the murder of the marquis of Montroſe; correſponded with Cromwel; approved and conſented to the act of the Weſt-kirk 1650, and the declaration following upon it. 11. That, in 1653 and 1654, he abetted, or joined with, or furniſhed arms to the uſurper's forces, againſt Glencairn and Middleton, and gave remiſſion to ſuch as had been in the king's ſervice. 12. That he received a preſent from the uſurper of 12,000l. ſterl. conſented to the proclamation of Richard Cromwel; accepted a commiſſion from the ſhire of Aberdeen, and ſat and voted in his pretended parliament. 13. That he rebuked the miniſters in Argyll for praying for the king. 14. That he poſitively adviſed Cromwel and Ireton, in a conference 1648, that they could not be ſafe till the king's life was taken away; at leaſt he knew and concealed that horrid deſign.

After the indictment was read the marquiſs had leave to ſpeak, and diſcourſed, at ſome conſiderable length, to exceeding good purpoſe. The parliament fixed the 26th of February for bringing in his defence, which was too ſhort a time for replying to a charge conſiſting of ſo many particulars. However, at his requeſt, they protracted it till the 5th of March, when he appeared before the lords of the articles, who ordered him immediately to produce his defence; whereupon he made a very moving ſpeech, and gave in a moſt affecting petition, remitting himſelf to the king's mercy, and beſeeching the parliament to intercede for him, which are too long to be inſerted here.

Next day, being brought before the parliament, it was reported from the articles, that he had offered a ſubmiſſion to his majeſty, with a deſire that the parliament might recommit it to the king; but his ſubmiſſion was voted not ſatisfactory, and he was commanded to give in his defences next day to the lords of the articles. When he came before them, and told that his defences were not yet ready, he was appointed to give them in on Monday, April the 9th, otherwiſe the lords would take the whole buſineſs before them, without any regard to what he ſhould afterwards ſay. But it ſeems, on the day appointed, his defences were given in, wherein the marquis's management is vindicated from all the falſehoods, calumnies, and miſrepreſentations in the indictment. Mr Wodrow does not give an abſtract of them, becauſe they contain thirteen pages of ſmall print, but inſerts a paper which contains the ſubſtance of them, of which I give the following abridgment.

Information for my Lord Argyll againſt the dittay given in againſt him by the king's advocate.

THE deeds alleged to be done, either before, or ſince his majeſty left Scotland, were either of a public or private concern. As for the public, he never acted without the approbation of parliament, and general aſſemblies, which were ratified by their late and preſent majeſties. As to particular perſons, he was never acceſſory to any thing but what is warranted by acts of parliament, approved by his majeſty and his royal predeceſſors. As to things, after his majeſty left Scotland 1651, the marquis was ſtill a priſoner on demand, and did never capitulate till Auguſt 1652, being ſurprized in his houſe lying ſick, and that long after the deputies had taken the tender, —and all others in arms had capitulated, and the whole kingdom was—under the power—of the uſurper.

The firſt deed is a ſpeech in 1640,—where it is affirmed that he ſaid, It was the opinion both of divines and lawyers that a king might be depoſed.—But it is not relevant to infer any crime, though thoſe words had been ſpoken in the abſtract terms related, no more than if any ſhould ſpeak the tenet of the Sorbonet or canon law upon the pope's power. — This deed is 1640, the act of oblivion 1641.

The 2d deed is the ſlighting the houſe of Airlie.—It is anſwered, Theſe houſes were kept out in oppoſition to the committee of eſtates, and ſo might be deſtroyed—and the ſaid ſervice had the approbation of parliament 1641, rege preſente—the king being preſent.

The 3d deed is the taking the caſtle of Dunbarton.—This was done by order of the committee of eſtates, and before the act of oblivion.—

As to the calling a convention of eſtates, and going into England with an army.—This was done by the conſervators of the peace, ſecret council, and commiſſioners of public burdens appointed by the king,—and ratified in parliament ſince,—and was allowed by the king in his agreement at Breda, and by his act of oblivion 1651.

As to the burning of Menſtrie by his command, he denies any ſuch command. Whereas it bears by men under his command, there is no law to make that treaſon, nor is it relevant or reaſonable; for noxa caput ſequitur, et delicta ſuos tenet auctores. It was remitted by the act of oblivion 1651. And general Baillie had the command, whoſe ſervice in that expedition was approved in parliament 1646. And though he had done this he had commiſſion from the parliament 1644.

As to the taking of Towart and Eſcoge, and murdering a number of men after capitulation, it is anſwered, The marquis was not in the country, but in England at that time. To the murdering of 200 men after the taking of Dunavertie, it is anſwered, That David Leſlie had the command there, and what was done was by a council of war, and Leſlie's ſervice was approved by the parliament 1648.—That my lord Argyll cauſed take 200 perſons from Iſlay to Jura, where they periſhed. This is falſe; for he knew nothing of the matter, nor ever heard of it till he received his dittay.

To the giving up of the king at Newcaſtle, it is anſwered, It was a parliament deed, and—a voice in parliament cannot be cenſured —But the truth is, my lord Argyll was not in Scotland when the king came to the Scots army at Newark—neither did the marquis ever meddle in that affair, but in the parliament 1647.

As to the proteſt in parliament 1648, calling in the ſectarian army, writing to Cromwel,—and emitting a proclamation againſt certain families, it is anſwered, That there was no proteſt, but a declaration before the vote, that the aſſembly ought to be conſulted anent the engagement. —As for the letter, no anſwer can be given till the letter be ſeen; and though there was a letter in the terms libelled, yet it is an act of the committee; and as matters went, the army being loſt at Preſton, and the enemy lying on the border, if they had demanded the ſtrengths of the kingdom,—it would not have been refuſed.—Beſides, he never ſaw Cromwel till 1648, and he was called in by the committee, and the marquis did what he could to ſtop his career. As to the proclamations, nothing can be ſaid till they be produced.—

To the clogging his majeſty's proclamation, murdering Montroſe, correſponding with Cromwel, and his acceſſion to the act of the Weſt-kirk and declaration, it is anſwered, That it was the act of the parliament then ſitting by which the firſt allegation was done, and the king acknowleged that to be good ſervice, by admitting the marquis to places of truſt, and accepting the crown from him —As to Montroſe, he had no acceſſion to his death, or the manner of it. —His correſponding with Cromwel is falſe.—As to the act of the Weſt-kirk, the marquis was at no committee of the kirk after his majeſty's happy arrival, until they came to Perth, nor did he know of it.—As to the declaration—he adviſed the king to go as far as he could; but would not adviſe him, for the world, to ſign the declaration claration againſt his mind—and deſires the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Dunfermline's depoſitions may be taken herein, and his ſacred majeſty conſulted as to the truth hereof.

To the oppoſition to Glencairn and Middleton, when appearing for their king, and his joining with the Engliſh, It is anſwered, That their commiſſion was never intimated to him,—that he ſent to Middleton to have a conference, but received no anſwer. As to joining the Engliſh in their expedition to the hills, he denies any joining with them; but being a priſoner, and required to be with them, he durſt not refuſe; and denied any kind of acting either by council or deed. As for taking pay from the uſurper for a foot company,—general Monk allowed payment for one hundred ſoldiers to guard the country, and becauſe they did not oppoſe the forces in the hills, the general diſcharged payment.——

As to the aſſiſting at Richard Cromwel's proclamation, his receiving a precept of 12,000l. ſterling, and ſitting in the parliament of England, it is anſwered, He was not at all at Richard's proclamation, but by command, indeed, he was at Oliver's, but not at Dunbarton. Being Monk's priſoner, he was commanded to come to the Engliſh council, and aſſiſt at the proclamation, and could not refuſe, without having his life and fortune made a prey. No law can make this a crime, far leſs treaſon; and it cannot be inſtructed, from any hiſtory, that a people overcome by an enemy, and commanded to do outward deeds of ſubjection, were ever queſtioned by their lawful prince when he hath pardoned the invader; or that the ſubject ſhould be proſecuted for doing what he, being a priſoner could not refuſe, without hazarding life and fortune. The 12,000 l. is falſely adduced. The parliament of Scotland gave the marquis, in payment of juſt debts, half of the exciſe on wine and ſtrong waters. As for his ſitting in the parliament of England, after ſo long an uſurpation, no precedent can be ſhewn, in any age in this country, whereby this was made a crime far leſs treaſon.——

To his forbidding to pray for the king, and the reſt of the alledged ſpeeches, it is anſwered, They are falſe and calumnious. His pariſh miniſter and chaplain did always pray for the king in the time libelled, and that in the face of the Engliſh.——

The laſt head: It is baſely falſe, and he oppoſes thereto the marquis's oath given in parliament 1649. and leaves it to all to judge how unlikely and improbable it is that he would ſpeak any thing contrary to the oath that he had ſworn.

From this information ſome tolerable view may be had of the defences of this worthy peer. Mr Wodrow declares that he had it from a very good hand, that upwards of thirty different libels were formed againſt him, for alledged injuries, oppreſſions, and the like; but, when they went to prove them, they all came to nothing, ſo that, after their moſt diligent ſearch, they were forced to fix upon his neceſſary compliance with the Engliſh, after Scotland had been obliged to yield to the conquerors. Biſhop Burnet ſays, that, in one ſpeech, excuſing his compliance with Cromwel, he ſaid, What could he think of that matter, after a man ſo eminent in the law as his majeſty's advocate had taken the engagement? This inflamed the other ſo much, that he called him an impudent villain, and was not ſo much as chid for that barbarous treatment. Lord Argyll gravely ſaid, He had learned, in his afflictions, to bear reproaches; and if the parliament ſaw no cauſe to condemn him, he was the leſs concerned at the king's advocate's railing.

When he was brought to the bar to receive his ſentence, on the 25th of May, the houſe was very thin; for all withdrew, except thoſe who were reſolved to follow the courſe of the times. He put them in mind of the practice of Theodoſius the emperor, who enacted, that the ſentence of death ſhould not be executed till thirty days after it was paſſed; and added, I crave but ten, that the king may be acquainted with it. This was refuſed; and he was told, that he muſt receive the parliament's ſentence kneeling. He immediately kneeled, and ſaid, I will, in all humility. Then the ſentence was pronounced, 'That he was found guilty of high treaſon, and adjudged to be execute to the death as a traitor, his head to be ſevered from his body, at the croſs of Edinburgh, upon Monday the 27th inſtant, and affixed on the ſame place where the marquis of Montroſe's head was formerly, and his arms torn before the parliament and at the croſs. Upon this he offered to ſpeak; but the trumpets ſounding, he ſtopped till they had ended, and then ſaid, 'I had the honour to ſet the crown upon the king's head, and now he haſtens me to a better crown than his own.' And, directing himſelf to the commiſſioner and parliament, he ſaid, 'You have the indemnity of an earthly king among your hands, and have denied me a ſhare in that; but you cannot hinder me from the indemnity of the King of kings, and ſhortly you muſt be before his tribunal I pray he mete not out ſuch meaſure to you, as you have done to me, when you are called to account for all your actings, and this among the reſt.'

As for his compliance with Cromwel, it was ſo far from being treaſonable, that the advocate himſelf, and other lawyers, had actually taken the engagement, and many of the members of this parliament were equally guilty. Was it not therefore ſtrange, that a parliament ſhould condemn one for a crime of which ſo many of themſelves were guilty, and that, of all the compliers in Scotland, not one was proſecuted but this noble peer? What law will make compliance with a conqueror, for the good and ſafety of the country, after all means of defence are taken away, an act of treaſon? It is therefore certain that the ſentence paſſed againſt the marquis was without all warrant of law. But it ſeems it was neceſſary the foundation of prelacy, and of thoſe arbitrary meaſures now on foot, ſhould be laid in blood.

The marquis, after his ſentence, was ordered to the common priſon, where his excellent lady was waiting for him. Upon ſeeing her, he ſaid, They have given me till Monday to be with you, my dear, therefore let us make for it. She, embracing him, wept bitterly, and ſaid, The Lord will require it, the Lord will require it. Which drew tears from all in the room. But, being himſelf compoſed, he ſaid, 'Forbear, forbear, truly I pity them; they know not what they are doing. They may ſhut me in where they pleaſe, but they cannot ſhut out God from me. For my own part, I am as well content to be here as in the caſtle, and as content in the caſtle as in the tower of London, and as content there as when at liberty; and I hope to be as content upon the ſcaffold as any of them all.' &c.

He ſpent all his ſhort time, till Monday, with the greateſt ſerenity and chearfulneſs, and in the proper exerciſes of a dying Chriſtian. He ſaid to ſome miniſters who were permitted to attend him. 'That ſhortly they would envy him who has got before them; and added, mind that I tell you, my ſkill fails me, if you who are miniſters will not either ſuffer much, or ſin much; for though you go along with theſe men in part, if you do it not in all things you are but where you were, and ſo muſt ſuffer; and if you go not at all with them, you ſhall but ſuffer.' At his own deſire his lady took her leave of him on Sabbath night. On Monday morning, though he was much engaged in ſettling his affairs, and in the midſt of company, yet he was ſo overpowered with a ſenſible effuſion of the joy of the Holy Ghoſt, that he broke out in a rapture, and ſaid, 'I thought to have concealed the Lord's goodneſs, but it will not do; I am now ordering my affairs, and God is ſealing my charter to a better inheritance, and juſt now ſaying to me,' 'Son, be of good cheer, thy ſins are forgiven thee.' Some time before he went to the place of execution, he wrote a moſt loving letter to the king, and dined precisely at twelve with his friends with the utmoſt chearfulneſs, and then retired a little in ſecret. Upon his opening the door, the Reverend Mr Hutchiſon ſaid, 'What cheer, my lord?' He anſwered, 'Good cheer, Sir; the Lord hath again confirmed, and ſaid to me from heaven,' 'Thy ſins be forgiven thee.' Upon this tears of joy flowed in ſuch abundance, that he retired to the window and wept there; from that he came to the fire, and made as if he would ſtir it a little to conceal his concern, but all would not do, his tears ran down his face; and, coming to Mr Hutchiſon, he ſaid, in a perfect rapture, 'I think his kindneſs overcomes me; but God is good to me, that he lets not out eat too much of it here; for he knows I could not bear it. Get me my cloak, and let us go.' Upon receiving notice to come down, he called for a glass of wine, and ask'd a blessing upon it standing, and in a very little said, 'Now let us go, and God go with us.'

When he took leave of those in the room who were not to be with him on the scaffold, he said, 'I could die like a Roman, but chuse rather to die like a Christian. Come away, gentlemen, he that goes first goes cleanliest.' When going down stairs he called the Rev. Mr James Guthrie, who at parting addressed the marquis thus, 'My lord, God hath been with you, he is with you, and will be with you; and such is my respect for your lordship, that, if I were not under the sentence of death myself, I could cheerfully die for your lordship.' So they parted to meet again in a better place on the Friday following. The marquis, attended by several noblemen and gentlemen all in black, mounted the scaffold with the greatest firmity and gravity, like one going to his father's house, and saluted all that were upon it. Then Mr Hutchison prayed. After that his lordship delivered a moving and pertinent Speech with the utmost composure, in which, among other things, he said, 'I was real and cordial in my desires to bring the king home, and in my endeavours for him when he was at home, and had no correspondence with the adversary's army, nor any of them, when his majesty was in Scotland; nor had I any accession to his late majesty's horrid and execrable murder.—I shall not speak much to these things for which I am condemned, lest I seem to condemn others. It is well known, it is only for compliance, which was the epidemical fault of the nation. I wish the Lord to pardon them: I say no more:—God hath laid engagements upon Scotland:—we are tied by covenants to religion and reformation.—Those that were then unborn are yet engaged:—And it passeth the power of all the magistrates under Heaven to absolve from the oath of God.—These times are like either to be very sinning or very suffering times, and let Christians make their choice. There is a sad dilemma in the business, sin or suffer; and surely he that would chuse the better part, will chuse to suffer: others that will chuse to sin, shall not escape suffering.'—When he had delivered his Speech, which is recorded at length in Naphtali *, Mr James Hamilton prayed; after him his lordship prayed himself, and then took his leave of all his friends on the scaffold, and having given the executioner an handkerchief with some money, and small presents to his friends, he went to the instrument, called The Maiden, kneeling down most cheerfully, and after he had prayed a little, he gave the signal, whereupon his head was severed from his body, and then placed on the west-end of the tolbooth, as a monument of the parliament's injustice and the land's misery. His body was delivered to his friends, and decently interred. Thus died the noble marquis of Argyll, the proto-martyr for religion after the Restoration, who was a great promoter of and support to the Work of Reformation during his life, and stedfast in witnessing to it at his death.

I am next to relate the martyrdom of the Rev. Mr. James Guthrie minister at Stirling.—Mr Guthrie was son to the laird of Guthrie, a very ancient and honourable family. For some time he taught philosophy in the university of St. Andrews, where he gave sufficient proof of his being a good philosopher and an exact scholar. Tho' bishop Burnet says, he was a resolute and stiff man, yet my author assures us, that his temper was very stayed and composed, and would reason upon the most controverted points with great solidity, and, when every one about him was warm, his temper was never ruffled; and that he had, perhaps, the greatest mixture of fervent zeal and sweet calmness of any in his time. He was entirely prelatical in his judgment when he first came to St. Andrews; but, by conversing with the Rev. Mr Rutherford and others, and especially by his joining the weekly societies there, for prayer and conference, he was entirely brought off from that way.

His conduct in the year 1650 and 1651 was now remembered: but the real spring of the hard measure this excellent man met with, was the sentence of excommunication, which by appointment of the commission of the general assembly, he had pronounced against the earl of Middleton in the year 1650, which Middleton never forgot; and his personal resentment abundantly discovered itself in his trial before the parliament.

In the beginning of the year 1661, Mr Guthrie was brought to Edinburgh, and had his indictment given him for high treason by the king's advocate. It was read before him in the house on the 20th of February. The heads of it were, 1. 'His contriving, consenting to, and exhibiting before the committee of estates, the paper called the western remonstrances, 2. His contriving, writing and publishing that abominable pamphlet, called, The causes of God's wrath. 3. His contriving, writing and subscribing a paper, called, The humble petition, of the 23d of August last, when he was apprehended. 4. His convocating of the king's lieges at several times without warrant or authority, to the disturbance of the peace of the state and of the church. 5. His declaring his majesty, by his appeal and protestation, incapable to be judge over him, which he presented at Perth. And, 6. some treasonable expressions he was alledged to have uttered in a meeting 1650 or 1651.' The curious reader will find the whole of his indictment and defences at large in Mr Wodrow's appendix.

His indictment being read, he made an excellent speech to the parliament, of which I shall insert the following brief abstract.

My Lord Chancellor,

'I Being indicted—upon things alledged to be seditious and treasonable, humbly desire—that my lord commissioner—will patiently, and without interruption, hear me as to a few things I have to say for myself.—I am glad that the law of God is named in the first place; —I hope your lordship, in all your proceedings, will have most respect to this, that I may be judged by the law of God especially, and by other laws in subordination thereto.'

'As to those laws—mentioned in the indictment, concerning his majesty's royal prerogative,—I hope—they are to be understood according to the sense and meaning given by posterior acts of parliament,—and—by our solemn public vows and covenants, contracted with God by his majesty and his subjects.—I am first charged, in general, of sundry seditious and treasonable remonstrances, &c. To which I say, that generalia non pugnant; they can have no strength in the inferring of a crime or guilt,—except they are instanced in particulars.'

'One thing there is in the general charge that I cannot and ought not to pass, to wit, that I have seditiously and traiterously purposed the eradicating and subverting of the fundamental government, &c.—It is an unjust charge; there was never any such purpose or design in my heart.—As I had never any compliance with the councils or designs of the late usurping powers against his majesty's royal father or himself,—so there was no part of their ungodly or unjust actings, but I did, in my station and calling, bear open and public testimony against both by word and writing. My lord,—I can hardly refrain expressing some grief of spirit,' (here he gives an account of what he suffered under the usurpation) 'that notwithstanding all those things, I should now stand indicted before your lordships, as intending the eradicating and subverting of the ancient civil government of this nation.—The God of heaven knows that I am free of this charge, and I defy all the world, allowing me justice and fair proceeding, which I hope your lordships will, to make out the same against me.

'The first particular wherewith I am charged,—is, that I did compile and draw up a paper, commonly called, The Remonstrance, and presented it, or caused it to be presented to his majesty and committee of estates the 22 of October 1650.—I never did compile or contrive that remonstrance, nor did I present it, or cause it to be presented—then, or at any other time. I indeed, being a member of the commission of the general assembly, when they gave their judgment upon it, did dissent from from their sentence, which cannot be reckoned any culpable accession thereto, every man being free, without hazard of punishment, to give his judgment freely in the judicature whereof he is a member.—

'The next particular I am charged with, is the book of The causes of God's wrath, especially the 5th and 6th articles—But I humbly profess to your lordship and this honourable court of parliament,—1. That—my accession thereto did not flow from any disrespect unto, or dissatisfaction with his majesty's person or government,—but merely and singly from a constraining power of conscience, to be found faithful, as a minister of the gospel, in the discovering of sin and guiltiness, that it being taken with, and repented of, wrath might be taken away from the house of the king, and from these kingdoms.—Next, my lord, I wish it may be seriously pondered, that nothing is asserted in these causes, as matters of sin and duty, but what hath been the common and received doctrine of the church of Scotland.

'The 3d particular—is the supplication at Edinburgh, August the 23d, to which I acknowledge my accession, but deny it to be treasonable or seditious, because—it doth contain nothing but a humble petition concerning those things to which his majesty and all the subjects of this kingdom are engaged, by the solemn and indespensible oath of the Covenant, with a sober and serious representation of the danger that threatens religion—The indictment is pleased to say, that I charged his majesty with dissimulation and perjury; but there is no such thing in the supplication, which doth only put him in remembrance of holding fast the oath of the covenant.

'As to what is alledged against the lawfulness of our meeting—That meeting cannot fall within those acts of parliament that strike against unlawful conventions; because every meeting, for business in itself lawful, is agreeable to the word of God, and the laws of the land, and, when kept without tumult and multitude, such as that was, needs no particular warrant from authority:—yea, such meetings are clearly exempted from a breach of those acts of parliament, by a posterior act of parliament, viz. act 29. parl. 2. Charles I.

'As to the last particular in my indictment. viz. my declining his majesty's authority, I confess I did decline the civil magistrate as a competent judge of ministerial doctrine in the first instance. His authority in all things civil, I do with all my heart acknowledge.—But that the declining of the civil magistrate's being a judge of ministers doctrine, in the first instance, may appear not treason and sedition, but lawful and warrantable, I humbly offer, 1. That such declinatures are agreeable to—God's word, and to the confession of Faith, and doctrine of this church confirmed and ratified in parliament—And therefore it hath been the ordinary practice of this kirk, in such cases, to use such declinatures since the time of the reformation from popery—2, Such declinatures are agreeable to, and founded upon the National Covenant, and Solemn League and Covenant by which the king's majesty himself, and all the subjects of this kingdom, are bound to maintain the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of this church.—Upon these grounds I did give in, and do assert that declinature for vindicating the crown, dignity, and royal prerogative of Jesus Christ'—But with all due respect to his majesty, his greatness and authority.

'As to that act of parliament 1584, it was made at a time when the settled government of this church—was wholly overturned—and hath been often repealed—and stands repealed now, at the down-sitting of this parliment, it was reversed 1592—and by the 4th act, parl. 2. Charles I. and by the 6th act, parl. 2. Charles I.—

'The sum of what I have said I comprise in these two. 1. That I did never propose, or intend to speak or act any thing disloyal, seditious or treasonable, against his majesty's person, authority or government, God is my witness.—Next—I have founded my speeches and writings, and actings in those matters, on the word of God, and on the doctrine, confessions of Faith, and laws of this church, and kingdom, upon the National Covenant of Scotland, and the Solemn League and Covenant between the three kingdoms of Scotland, England and Ireland. If these foundations fall, I must fall with them; but if they sustain and stand in judgment, as I hope they will, I cannot acknowledge my self, neither, I hope will his majesty's commissioner, and the honourable court of parliament, judge me guilty of sedition and treason, notwithstanding any thing contained in the indictment.'

This pointed and pathetical speech had some influence upon several of the members of the house; but his death was designed. It was resolved, says bishop Burnet, to make a public example of a preacher, and so he was singled out.

On the 11th of April, when the process against him was read in the house, he immediately delivered a speech so affecting and close to the purpose, which though it had not the influence that might have been expected, made such impressions upon many of the members, that they withdrew, declaring to one another, as they went out of the house, that they would have nothing to do with the blood of this righteous man: but his judges were determined to proceed, and accordingly, at that very time, his indictment was found relevent. Bishop Burnet says p. 127, 'The earl of Tweddale was the only man that moved against putting him to death, He said, banishment had been hitherto the severest censure that had been laid on the preachers for their opinions,—yet he was condemned to die.' Though the day of his execution was not named till the 28th of May, when the parliament ordained 'Mr James Guthrie and William Govan to be hanged at the cross of Edinburgh, Saturday June 1st, and the head of the first to be affixed on the Nether bow, his estate to be confiscate, and his arms torn, and the head of the second on the west-port of the city of Edinburgh.' A gentleman who was present at the trial, told my informer, one of the present ministers of Aberdeen, that when Mr Guthrie received his sentence upon his knees, he rose up with cheerfulness, and thus addressed the parliament, 'My lords, may never this sentence more affect you than it does me, and let never my blood be required of the king's family.'

The iniquity of this sentence is very obvious: nay, the king himself was so sensible of his good services to him and his interest, when at the lowest, and of the parliament's severity, that, when he got notice of it, he asked with some warmth. And what have you done with Mr Patrick Gillespie? It was answered that Mr Gillespie had so many friends in the house, his life could not be taken. Well said the king, if I had known you would have spared Mr Gillespie, I would have spared Mr Guthrie. But had his majesty known his true interest, he would have put the management of his affairs into other hands.

Mr Guthrie was in a most serene frame all the time between his sentence and during his execution on the 1st of June. Dr Burnet, who was present at his execution, observes, that he was so far from shewing any fear, that he rather expressed a contempt of death; that he spoke an hour upon the ladder, with the composedness of one delivering a sermon, rather than his last words. His last speech and testimony is in Naphtali, where, among other things becoming a martyr for the cause of Christ, he saith, 'One thing I would warn you all of, that God is—very wroth with Scotland, and threateneth to depart and remove his candlestick. The causes of his wrath are many; and would to God it were not one great cause, that causes of wrath are despised. Consider the case that is recorded Jer. xxxvi. and the consequence of it, and tremble and fear. I cannot but also say, That there is a great addition of wrath; 1. By that deluge of profanity that overfloweth all the land—in so far that many have lost not only all use and exercise of religion, but even of morality. 2. By that horrible treachery and perjury that is in the matter of the Covenant and cause of God, and work of reformation; 'Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this,' &c. 3. Horrible ingratitude. The Lord, after ten years oppression—hath broken the yoke of strangers from off our necks, but—the fruit of our delivery is to work wickedness, and strengthen our hand to do evil, 4 A most dreadful—sacrificing to the creature. We have changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the image of a corruptible man, in whom many have placed almost all their salvation—and have turned that which might have been a blessing into an idol of jealousy, by preferring it before him. God is also wroth with a generation of carnal, corrupt, time-serving serving ministers. I know, and bear testimony, that in the church of Scotland there is a true and faithful ministry —and I pray you to honour—these for their work's sake. But, oh! that there were not too many who mind earthly things, and are enemies to the cross of Jesus Christ, who push with the side and shoulder, who strengthen the hands of evil doers, who make themselves transgressors, by studying to build again what they did formerly warrantably destroy: I mean, Prelacy, and the ceremonies, and the Service-book, a mystery of iniquity that works amongst us, whose steps lead unto the house of the great whore Babylon, the mother of fornications; or whosoever else he be that hath builded this Jericho again, let him take heed of the curse of Hiel the Bethelite, and of that dying evil threatened Zech. v. &c. I do bear witness unto the National Covenant of Scotland, and Solemn League and Covenant between the three kingdoms. These sacred, solemn, public oaths of God, I believe, can be loosed nor dispensed with by no person, or party, or power upon earth, but are still binding upon these kingdoms, and will be for ever hereafter, and are ratified and sealed by the conversion of many thousand souls since our entering therein. I bear my witness to the protestation against the unconverted assemblies, and the public resolutions —I take God to record, upon my soul, I would not exchange this scaffold with the palace or mitre of the greatest prelate in Britain. Blessed be God who hath shewed mercy to such a wretch, and has revealed his son in me, and made me a minister of the everlasting gospel, and that he hath deigned, in the midst of much contradiction from Satan and the world, to seal my ministry upon the hearts of not a few of his people: and especially in the station wherein I was last, I mean the congregation and presbytery of Stirling.—Jesus Christ is my light and my life, my righteousness, my strength, and my salvation, and all my desire. Him! O him, I do with all the strength of my soul commend unto you;—' Bless him, O my soul! from henceforth, even for ever." He concluded with the words of old Simeon, ' Now let thy servant depart in peace, since mine eyes have seen thy salvation.'

At the same time was executed the above mentioned William Govan, in some papers called Captain Govan, who was reckoned a pious good man. There were different accounts of the reasons why the parliament condemned him. In his last speech he says, It was for laying down his arms at Hamilton, as all the company did; and takes notice, that he carried up Montrose's standard through the streets of Edinburgh. It was alleged that he was present on the scaffold when king Charles I. was beheaded; but, to the conviction of all he proved himself to be elsewhere. His last speech, being omitted in Naphtali, is inserted by Mr Wodrow in his appendix. When he went up the ladder, he said, ' Dear friends, pledge this cup of suffering before you sin, as I have done: for sin and suffering have been presented to me, and I have chosen the suffering part.' The rope being about his neck, he said, ' Now I am near my last, and I desire to reflect on no man: I would only acquaint you of one thing: the commissioner and I went out to the field together for one cause; I have now the cord about my neck, and he is promoted to be his majesty's commissioner; yet for a thousand worlds I would not change lots with him, praise and glory be to Christ for ever.' After he again prayed a little he gave the sign and was turned over. He concluded his last speech with these words: ' I bear witness with my blood to the persecuted government of this church, in general assemblies, synods and presbyteries, and also to the protestation against the public resolutions. I bear witness to the Covenants, National and Solemn League, and am now to seal them with my blood. I likewise testify against all popery, prelacy, idolatry, superstition, and the service-book; for I have taken not a little pains in searching out those things, and have found them to be but the relics of Romish superstition and idolatry, left in king Henry VIII'ths time.'

Mr Wodrow says it was confidently affirmed, that some weeks after Mr Guthrie's head had been fixed upon the Netherbow port, the commissioners coach coming down that way, several drops of blood fell from the head upon the top of the coach, which all their art and diligence could not wipe off; and that when physicians were consulted, whether any natural cause could be assigned for such a strange phænomenon, they declared they could think of none. This odd incident beginning to be talked of, and all methods being tried in vain to wipe the blood off, at last the leather was removed, and a new cover put on, which indeed was much easier done, than to wipe the guilt of this innocent blood from those who were accessory to the shedding it.

On the 15th the proclamation for keeping the 29th of May was published. On the 22d the Solemn League and Covenant was by order of two houses of the English parliament burnt with triumph, at London, by the hand of the common hangman; and thus the king's perjury was published in the face of the sun. The 29th of May was observed with the greatest solemnity at Edinburgh: but it is well known that the church of Scotland, since the reformation, had still vigorously opposed the observation of anniversary holy days, even though they were set apart in honour of Christ himself, such as Christmas and Easter; they could never therefore think of doing that for their king, which our Saviour did not require to be done for himself. Besides, this was a most dismal day to Scotland, being the triumph of the wicked between the unjust execution of Argyll and Mr Guthrie.

Many worthy gentlemen suffered greatly during this session of parliament, merely for compliance, which every one was obliged to give during the usurpation. In January the lairds of Ardkinglass and Mackdonochy were forfeited. On the 1st of February the indictment against the Lord Waristoun, William Dundas, and John Hume, was read in the house, none of them being present. Waristoun was forfeited, and his forfeiture was publicly proclaimed at the cross of Edinburgh, by the heralds, on the 31st of May. The indictment was much to the same purpose with that against the marquis of Argyll. On the 22d of February the laird of Swinton was brought before the parliament, and, when his indictment was read, had a very accurate and pointed speech in his own vindication, which so effectually prevailed upon them, that they recommended him to the king as a fit object of his mercy; and, according to Mr Wodrow, the papists at court interposed in the quaker's behalf, and he had favour shewn him, though he had as great a share in joining with the usurper as any man in the kingdom. Such was the partiality of those times! for little or no favour was shewn to those who had been active in the work of reformation, and faithfully adhered to their principles; as appears from the treatment several eminent ministers and others met with, which I am now to relate, beginning with those who were apprehended with Mr Guthrie on the 23d of August last. Though one or two of them fainted, and upon making some verbal acknowlegements, were permitted to retire to their own habitations, yet others suffered greatly for their faithfulness, particularly Mr Alexander Moncrieff, and Mr Robert Trail.

During the usurpation Mr Alexander Moncrieff minister at Scoonie in Fife, endured much persecution for his attachment to the royal family. He was then hunted as a patridge upon the mountains, and suffered imprisonment for praying for the king; but all the return he had, was to be apprehended when petitioning according to law. He had his indictment given him about the same time with Mr Guthrie. No solicitations could move him to retract his principles, though his life was in danger: and when the earl of Athol and others told his wife, that it was impossible to save his life, if he did not recede from some things, this excellent woman answered, ' That they all knew she was happy in a good husband; that she had great affection to him, and many children; yet she knew him to be so stedfast in his principles, where his conscience was concerned, that no body needed to deal with him upon that head; for her part, before she would contribute any thing that would break his peace with his Master, she would rather chuse to receive his head at the cross.' However, Providence so over-ruled this affair, that his life was spared; but then he was declared to be for ever incapable of exercising any public trust, civil or ecclesiastical, and discharged from going to his parish; and all this for owning his accession to the remonstrance and causes of God's wrath. Many were the hardships he underwent, and as many many the preservations he met with after this, as we shall relate.

About the beginning of March, Mr Robert Trail, Mr John Stirling, and other ministers, were before the lords of the articles; but it seems none of them were brought before the parliament except Mr Trail, who was indicted for high-treason, for being concerned in the remonstrance 1656, in the book of the causes of God's wrath, in the supplication of August last, and in the imperfect scroll of a letter and instructions which were found at that meeting.

Mr Trail, as appears from his speech in the house, was one of those who declared against the tender, when imposed in the time of the usurpation, and always endeavoured to keep in mind that great precept, 'Fear God and honour the king. As to the remonstrance, he told them, 'That he was neither at the contriving or presenting of it; that he was at that time besieged in the castle of Edinburgh by the unjust invaders of the land.—That he run a very great hazard by a dangerous wound he received in the defence of his king and country.—As to the book of the causes of God's wrath, he owned that he was present at that meeting when those things were spoke of, and confessed, and mourned for, and prayed against; but he could not see that this was either treasonable or seditious. As to what is said in the book of closing a treaty with the king, after he had given such evidences of his disaffection and enmity to the work of God, he said, That he never denied his majesty's just right and title to these kingdoms, but always acknowleged him to be the only righteous heir; but that he thought there was not care enough taken to get him brought off from his prejudices against the work of reformation.—The next article in that book, concerning taking malignants into the army and judicatories, he said, There is nothing asserted there, but what is consonant to the word of God, and the received doctrine of this church.—For, if it be a commanded duty to put into places of trust and power, men fearing God, men of truth, and hating covetousness, then the neglect thereof must be a sin, and so a cause of wrath. As to the supplication in August last, he said he most cheerfully subscribed it, as a testimony of his loyalty to his king, and of his ardent desire to have wrath kept from his throne and dominions, by a humble minding him of the sacred ties of the covenant, and by earnestly supplicating him to walk according to them, both in his court and family, and in the government of his kingdoms.—As to the imperfect scroll of a letter and instructions found in their meeting, he acknowleged they were intended to be sent to some of their brethren, in another part of the country, for procuring their subscription to the petition, without the least thought of disloyalty.'

This is the sum and substance of his defence; from which it plainly appears how unjustly he and others were at that time charged with treason. Whether the parliament passed any sentence against him at this time, my author does not say; only it appears that he was in prison after the session was over.

Mr John Murray minister at Methven, who was at the meeting in August last, was likewise charged with high-treason; but what the issue of the process was is not yet known.

But the ministers who were apprehended in August last were not the only sufferers during this session; for Mr James Simpson, minister at Airth, who had been apprehended at Port-patrick, after a copy of his indictment was sent to him to answer in prison, was, by this parliament, banished the king's dominions, without being allowed a hearing, or so much as being summoned before them. He died in Holland, and so had the same fate with the Rev. Mr Macward, whose singular case I am now briefly to relate.

Mr Robert MacWard, minister at Glasgow, was remarkable for his learning, zeal, and other ministerial abilities. This good man observing the design of the managers, to overturn the whole covenanted work of reformation, in February gave a faithful and seasonable testimony against the glaring defections of the times, in an excellent sermon in the Tron-church of Glasgow, from Amos iii. 2. He concluded his sermon with these words: 'As for my own part, as a poor member of this church of Scotland, and an unworthy minister in it, I do this day call you, who are the people of God, to witness that I humbly offer my dissent to all acts which are, or shall be passed against the covenants, and work of reformation in Scotland: And, 2. protest that I am desirous to be free of the guilt thereof, and pray that God may put it upon record in heaven.' This sermon, especially this conclusion of it, made great noise, and therefore he was brought in to Edinburgh under a guard, and committed to prison, and soon after had an indictment given him by his majesty's advocate, for sedition and treasonable preaching.

When he was before the parliament, June 6th, he delivered himself with great eloquence and judgment, as his very enemies acknowleged; and, among other things, said, 'I humbly desire it may be considered, that a ministerial protestation against, or dissent from any acts, or act, which a minister knows, and is convinced to be contrary to the word of God, is not a legal impugnation of that or those acts, much less of the authority enacting them, which it doth rather presuppose, than deny or impugn; but it is a solemn and serious attested declaration or witness and testimony against the evil and iniquity of these things; which, by the word of God, is a warrantable practice, and here, and at this time, a necessary duty; and for which way of protesting, or testifying, or witnessing, a minister hath the prophets a pattern for his imitation, as is clear, 1 Sam. viii. 9. 'Howbeit, yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them.' Where the Lord, to signify his great resentment and dislike at the people's course and carriage towards him, commands the prophet, in his name, to protest against their procedure. 'Howbeit, yet protest solemnly unto them,' saith he; or as the words are rendered on the margin of our Bible, 'Notwithstanding, when thou hast protested solemnly against them,' &c. which reading seems best to agree both with the scope, and what is said verse 19. It is clear also, Jer. xi. 7. when the Lord sums up all his serious exhortations to obey his voice, and all his sharp expostulations for not obeying his voice and keeping his covenant, in this very term of protesting earnestly: 'For I earnestly protested unto your fathers in the day,' &c. 'rising up early, and protesting, saying, Obey my voice.' So that my protestation, testimony, and dissent, not being without a precedent practice in the prophets, and so not without divine precept, cannot be called, nor ought to be accounted a contravention of the acts libelled in the indictment; neither can I, for this, come under the lash of the law; unless it be said and asserted, which I know will be denied with abhorrence and detestation, that these acts do discharge, under pain of treason, what God the supreme lawgiver commands his servants to do under pain of his displeasure, as they would not, by their unfaithful silence, lose their own, and betray the souls of others; so that, take the word protesting, in the scripture sense, for solemn declaring and witnessing against sin, and for duty, in which sense alone I take it, it will not be liable to any just exception—there being nothing more frequent in the word than such protesting, declaring, and witnessing against sin, and for duty.—And, besides, it will not a little contribute to remove what matter of offence is taken at the manner of my testimony, because, in the term of dissenting, and protesting, if it be consid red, that all the reformed churches of Christ this day have their denomination and distinction from the church of Rome, from a solemn public protestation against the decree which was made by Charles V. and the estates of the empire anno—in prejudice to religion and reformation, though I do not plead a perfect parallel between this and that.

'As to the matter of my protestation,—My practice seems neither contrary to reason nor religion, but consonant to both; it being commonly taken as a principle, rather than tossed as a problem, that, where there is a jus quæsitum domino, it is competent, incumbent and necessary, for the servant and ambassador, in the behalf and interest of his lord and master, to dissent from and protest against all acts made to the prejudice of that right. But so it is, that there was a right acquired to the Lord my master, whose servant and ambassador I am, though most unworthy, to wit, the confirmation civil of those covenants covenants and vows, made to and with him, for reformation in this church, according to his will revealed in his word, and the obligations civil of the lieges thereunto by the interpoſition of civil authority: therefore I humbly conceive, that, as a right cannot, at leaſt ought not to be taken away in prejudice to a third party, ſo far leſs in things concerning the Lord and his intereſts, the public faith of the kingdom being engaged to God to promote and ſecure that: ſo that in this caſe, for me to have proteſted for my maſter's intereſts, to whom there was a civil right made, and to diſſent from all acts prejudicial to the ſame, will, I hope, be thought to be the duty of the man who deſires to approve himſelf to God, and who expects, in the day of his accounts, the approbation of well done, good and faithful ſervant.'——

Mr Sharp and his friends reſolved now to be rid, as much as poſſible of the moſt eminent of the preſbyterian miniſters, and therefore Mr Mac ward was baniſhed; however, he was allowed to continue ſix months in the nation, one of which only in Glaſgow, and had power given him to receive the following year's ſtipend at his departure. Accordingly he ſubmitted to the ſentence, and tranſported himſelf and family to Rotterdam; where, upon the death of the Rev. Alexander Petrie, (the author of a compendious hiſtory of the catholic church, from the 600 to 1600, printed at the Hague 1662) he became miniſter of the Scots congregation there, where he wrote a hiſtory of this church, during his own time, which, if it had been publiſhed, and not concealed by the inconſiderate or ill deſigning cuſtodier thereof, might have been of very ſingular uſe, and ſuperſeded all other hiſtories for that time. He died about 20 years after this, having been eminently uſeful in his day and generation.

Thus the acts of this parliament were ſealed with blood, and with the many tears of numbers, who had their beloved paſtors violently taken from them and baniſhed into foreign countries, and that merely for the teſtimony of a good conſcience. But that the reader may have another proof of the partiality of this parliament, I cannot omit the caſe of Mr Patrick Gilleſpie.

He was firſt miniſter of the town, and principal of the college of Glaſgow, a man of great learning, ſolidity, and piety. It is plain that he made great compliances with Cromwel during the uſurpation, and therefore we need not be ſurpriſed that he was perſecuted by the preſent managers, when ſo many, who had firmly adhered to the king's intereſt, were ſo ungratefully uſed. Beſides, he was againſt the public reſolutions, and had no ſmall ſhare in the weſtern remonſtrance. We took notice of his impriſonment laſt year. On the 6th of March this year he was brought before the parliament, and his indictment was read, containing his compiling and ſubſcribing the Weſtern remonſtrance, his conſenting to the pamphlet called The cauſes of God's wrath, his conſtant correſpondence with Cromwel, &c. But he had friends in the houſe, and favour was ſhewn him. It muſt indeed be owned that he ſadly departed from his former teſtimony; for he acknowledged, 'he had given offence to his majeſty by the remonſtrance, and otherwiſe, which he now was ſorry for, and did diſclaim, and therefore caſt himſelf upon the king's mercy, &c.' The parliament upon this, interceded for him, and in a little time he was taken out of priſon, but confined to Ormiſtoun and ſix miles round it. His acknowledgment gave juſt offence to many, who looked upon it as an inſtance of great fainting, in a perſon of his forwardneſs, zeal, and activity in former years.

The parliament roſe on the 12th of July, after which the management of affairs were lodged in the hands of the council. On the laſt day of July their acts were proclaimed with great ſolemnity, at the croſs of Edinburgh. During all this ſeſſion there was not the leaſt motion made for an act of indemnity; the ſecret whereof according to biſhop Burnet, was this, That, ſince diocеſan epiſcopacy was to be ſet up, and as thoſe who were moſt like to oppoſe it were, on other accounts, obnoxious, it was thought beſt to keep them under that fear, till the change ſhould be made.

I ſhall conclude this chapter with ſome account of the great Mr Rutherford who died about the end of March this year, 1661, and may very juſtly come in among the ſufferers during this ſeſſion of parliament, for he was certainly a martyr, both in his own reſolution, and in the deſign of the managers.

This pious and learned, diligent and faithful miniſter of Chriſt, was a gentleman by extraction, and gave early proofs of his great abilities; for when he was very young, he was pitched upon for a profeſſion of philoſophy in the college of Edinburgh, where he was educated. From thence he was called to the miniſtry at Anwoth, and entered on that charge, by the means of the then viſcount of Kenmure, without coming under any engagement to the prelate. There he laboured with great diligence and much ſucceſs, and there he wrote his Exercitationes apologeticæ.

The prelates were ſo heterodox, as to accuſe him for writing that book, and ſo apoſtatized, as to find fault with him for preaching againſt the ſins of the land. He was ſummoned before the high commiſſion court 1636, and upon declining its authority, as none of the courts of Chriſt, was depoſed from his miniſtry, and ſent priſoner to Aberdeen; where, ſays my author, the doctors found, to their confuſion, that the puritans were clergymen as well as they. It was from thence that he wrote many of his admirable letters to his friends.

Upon the great turn of affairs 1638, he was reſtored to his former charge at Anwoth, and ſoon after appointed profeſſor of divinity at St. Andrews by the general aſſembly. He was likewiſe called to be colleague in the miniſtry with the worthy Mr Blair. And by the indefatigable pains of Mr Rutherford, both teaching in the ſchools, and preaching in the congregation, St. Andrews, the ſeat of the archbiſhop, and ſo the nurſery of all ſuperſtition error and profaneneſs, ſoon became, as my author expreſſes it, a Lebanon out of which were taken 'cedars for building the houſe of God through the whole land.

He was one of the commiſſioners ſent by the general aſſembly of the church of Scotland to the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter, where he was held in great reputation. In the year 1651 upon the death of the learned Mr Dematius, the magiſtrates of Utrecht being abundantly ſatisfied as to the learning, piety and zeal of this great man, invited him to the divinity chair there. But he choſe rather to ſuffer affliction in his own country, than to leave his flock and charge in time of danger. And therefore he continued at home till the day of his death.

The parliament this year 1661 were to have an indictment laid before them againſt this eminent perſon; for after his book, Lex Rex, had been ordered to be burnt at the croſs of Edinburgh, p 67. and at the gate of the new college of St Andrews, where he was divinity profeſſor they moſt barbarouſly ordered him to be ſummoned before them, to anſwer to a charge of high treaſon, though every body knew he was then in a dying condition; but, ſays Mr Woodrow, he had a higher tribunal to appear before, where his judge was his friend. Accordingly he died on the 29th of March, the very day before the act reciſſory was paſſed, and ſo was taken away from the evil to come.

Some of his laſt words are theſe. 'I ſhall ſhine, I ſhall ſee him as he is, and all the fair company with him, and ſhall have my large ſhare. It is no eaſy thing to be a Chriſtian: but, as for me, I have got the victory, and Chriſt is holding forth his arms to embrace me. I have had my fears and faintings, as another ſinful man, to be carried through creditably; but as ſure as ever he ſpoke to me in his word, his ſpirit witneſſed to my heart, ſaying, Fear not, he hath accepted my ſuffering, and the out-gate ſhould not be matter of prayer but of praiſe.' He ſaid alſo, 'Thy word was ound, and I did eat it, and it was to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart.' A little before his death, after ſome fainting, he ſaid, 'Now, I feel, I believe, I enjoy. I rejoice.' Turning to his colleague Mr Blair, he ſaid. 'I feed on manna, I have angels food, mine eyes ſhall ſee my Redeemer. I know that he ſhall ſtand, at the latter day, upon the earth, and I ſhall be caught up in the clouds to meet him, in the air.' Afterwards he had theſe words, 'I ſleep in Chriſt, and when I awake I ſhall be ſatisfied with his likeneſs. O for arms to embrace him!' and to one ſpeaking of his painfulneſs in the miniſtry, he cried out, 'I diſclaim all, the port I would be in at is redemption and forgiveneſs of ſins through his blood. His laſt words were, Glory, glory for dwelleth in Emanuel's land.' He regreted, when near his end, that he had not the honour of giving a public testimony to the work of R formatioo since the year 1638, and against the lamentable defections of the present times.

Thus lived the great Mr Rutherford a life of communion with God, and died in full assurance. The letters which he left behind him discover what manner spirit he was of; and however they were the rediculе of the graceless and profane, like pearls before swine; yet they breath an uncommon spirit of piety and seraphic love to his Lord and Master, and are much calculated for the support, encouragement and comfort of serious Christians, under their sorest afflictions.

CHAP. III.

Of the proceedings of the council and the regal erection of Prelacy, together with the sufferings of gentlemen and ministers during the rest of the year.

THE day after the parliament rose, his majesty's privy council met at Holy-rood house. The following is a list of them. The earl of Glencairn chancellor, earl of Crawford treasurer, earl of Rothes president of the council, the dukes of Lenox and Hamilton, the marquis of Montrose, earls Lauderdale secretary, Errol, Marschal, Mar, Athol, Mortoun, Eglinton, Cassils, Caithness, Murray, Linlithgow, Hume, Perth, Dumfermline, Wigtoun, Kelly, Roxburgh, Haddington, Tullibardin, Weems, Southesk, Hartfield, Callender, Tweddale, Middleton, Dundee, Newburgh, lords Sinclair, Halkertoun, Duffus, Sir Archibald Primerose, Sir John Fletcher, Sir William Bannantyne, Sir Robert Murray, Sir John Gilmour of Craigmillar, Sir William Fleeming, laird of Ley, laird of Blackhall, Sir John Wauchop of Niddrie knight, Gibson of Durie, Sir Georg Kinnaird of Rossie, Alexander Bruce brother to the earl of Kincardin, and Sir William Scot of Airdie. After the public reading of their commission, and their powers, all present took the oath of allegiance, formerly mentioned, and then the oath of council. They had now the whole executive power in their hands, and accordingly, at their first meeting, they ordered the citadels built by the English, during the usurpation, to be demolished.—But as the point of the greatest importance, at that time, was the getting Prelacy established,—I shall first give some account of that matter.

We have seen how the parliament, by their 16th act, put the whole power, as to church affairs, into the king's hands, by which he was to settle the ecclesiastical government, as he thought most proper; but then the parliament had by no act as yet established Prelacy, consequently it does not appear to have any proper parliamentary settlement in Scotland, but to be brought in by a mere act of the king's prerogative, as we shall presently see.

When the parliament was up, Middleton and the courtiers repaired with all speed to London, and, when they had the government of the church of Scotland under their consideration, the commissioners and chancellor were strenuously for bishops. Lauderdale, Crawford and duke Hamilton, for some time opposed them. 'The earl of Middleton, says Burnet, p. 131. assured the king, that episcopacy was desired by the greater and honester part of the nation. One synod had as good as petitioned for it: and many others wished for it, though the share they had in the late wars made them think it was not fit or decent for them to move for it. Sharp assured the king, That none but the protestors, of whom he had a very bad opinion, were against it: and that, of the Resolutioners, there would not be found twenty that would oppose it.—On the other hand, the earl of Lauderdale, and all his friends assured the king, That the national prejudices against it were still very strong, that those who seemed zealous for it ran into it only as a method to procure favour, but that those who were against it would be found stiff and eager in their opposition to it; that, by setting it up, the king would lose the affections of the nation, and that the supporting it would grow a heavy load on his government; which indeed came to pass. The bishop farther observes, p. 132. That upon this diversity of opinion, the thing having been posed in a Scots council at Whitehall, the earl of Crawford declared himself against it, but the earl of Lauderdale, duke Hamilton and Sir Robert Murray were only for delaying till the king should be better satisfied concerning the inclinations of the nation. All the rest were for the change.

These debates are said to have lasted for some days, and that here the foundation of discord was laid between Middleton and Lauderdale, which issued in the ruin of the former. A little after the chancellor, in a conversation with Lauderdale, desired him not to mistake his conduct in that affair, for he was not for lordly prelates, such as had been formerly in Scotland, but only for a limited, sober and moderate episcopacy. To which Lauderdale is said to have replied, 'My lord, since you are for bishops, and must have them, bishops you shall have, and higher than ever they were in Scotland, and that you shall find.' It being thus agreed to alter the government of the church of Scotland, a letter was sent from his majesty to the privy-council there, declaring his royal pleasure to have episcopacy established in this ancient kingdom. He did not demand their advice upon it, says bishop Burnet, but even required their obedience to it, as appears from the letter itself, which is as follows.

CHARLES R.

'RIGHT trusty and well beloved cousins and councellors, we greet you well. Whereas in the month of August 1660, we did by our letter to the presbytery of Edinburgh, declare our purpose to maintain the government of the church of Scotland settled by law; and our parliament having, since that time, not only rescinded all the acts since the trouble began referring to that government, but also declared all those pretended parliaments null and void, and left to us the settling and securing of church government: therefore, in compliance with that act rescissory, according to our late proclamation, dated at Whitehall the 10th of June, and in contemplation of the inconveniencies from the church government, as it hath been exercised these twenty three years past, of the unsuitableness thereof to our monarchial estate, of the sadly experienced confusions which have been caused, during the late troubles, by the violences done to our royal prerogative, and to the government, civil and ecclesiastical, settled by unquestionable authority, we from our respect to the glory of God, and the good and interest of the protestant religion, from our pious care and princely zeal for the order, unity, peace, and stability of that church, and in better harmony with the government of the churches of England and Ireland, have, after mature deliberation, declared to those of our council here, our firm resolution to interpose our royal authority for restoring of that church to its right government by bishops, as it was by law before the late troubles, during the reigns of our royal father and grandfather, of blessed memory, and as it now stands settled by law. Of this our royal pleasure, concerning church-government, you are to take notice, and to make intimation thereof in such a way and manner as you shall judge most expedient and effectual. And we require you and every one of you, and do expect according to the trust and confidence we have in your affections and duty to our service, that you will be careful to use your best endeavours for curing the distempers contracted during those late evil times, for uniting our good subjects among themselves, and bringing them all to a cheerful acquiescing and obedience to our sovereign authority, which we will employ, by the help of God, for the maintaining and defending the true reformed religion, increase of piety, and the settlement and security of that church in her rights and liberties, according to law and ancient custom. And, in order thereto, our will is, that you forthwith take such course with the rents, belonging to the several bishopricks, and deaneries that they may be restored and made useful to the church, and that according to justice, and the standing law. And, moreover, you are to inhibit the assembling of ministers in their several synodical meetings through the kingdom, until our farther pleasure, and to keep a watchful eye over all who, upon any pretext whatsoever, shall, by discoursing, preaching, reviling, or any irregular or unlawful way, endeavour to alienate the affections of our people, or dispose them to an ill opinion of us, and our government, to the disturbance of the peace, of the king-kingdom. So expecting your cheerful obedience, and speedy account of your proceedings herein, we bid you heartily farewel. Given at our court at Whitehall, August the 14th 1661, and of our reign the 13th year.

By his majesty's command.

LAUDERDALE.

On the last of August, the earls of Glencairn and Rothes, with Mr Sharp, returned from court; and next council-day, September 5th, the lord chancellor presented his majesty's letter, which being read, the clerk was ordered to draw up an act in obedience thereunto, to be proclaimed and made known to all the lieges. Accordingly next day the draught was presented and approved of, and proclaimed over the cross, with great solemnity, by the lion king at arms, with all the trumpets, and the magistrates of Edinburgh in their robes. This act of council is the echo of his majesty's letter. The council, the same day, ordered a just copy of their act and proclamation, to be transmitted to the king; for which his majesty returned them his thanks. And thus Prelacy was again brought in to Scotland; from which I cannot but make the following remarks.

As his majesty's letter, and the council's act and proclamation in consequence of it, was the foundation upon which prelacy was at this time established, so it is apparent, 1. That the king intended to deceive the ministers of the Church of Scotland; by his letter to the presbytery of Edinburgh, wherein he declared his resolution to protect and preserve the government of that church, as it is, settled by law: for in his last letter, these words, as it is, are artfully omitted, that there might be a fairer pretence for introducing bishops, upon that very ground which so many took to be an assurance given against them. When his majesty wrote to the presbytery of Edinburgh, Prelacy stood abolished, and presbyterian government established by law, and the king's solemn oath was engaged to preserve the same inviolable. But, 2. It is apparent, that Prelacy in Scotland, was now restored entirely by virtue of the regal supremacy, of which the king was so tender, that he neither advised with his council, nor sought their consent, but required them to publish his pleasure in this point; for, though the parliament had rescinded all the acts passed since the year 1643, yet, they had by no act as yet, established diocesan episcopacy; only the king interposed his authority for restoring that church to its right government by bishops, as it was by law before the late troubles; so that Prelacy was one of the first fruits of absolute and arbitrary power. 3. The reasons given for this remarkable change were absolutely false. Inconveniencies are first mentioned, though not one instance is given. It is plain, that profaneness was greatly suppressed, piety flourished, and many were converted, while the church of Scotland enjoyed her just and lawful liberties; and, perhaps, these were looked upon as inconveniencies by the present managers. It is also alledged, that presbytery, though never named, was unsuitable to his monarchial estate. How soon had his majesty forgot that the Presbyterians stood by him during his exile, and that they restored him to his crown! The confusions of the late times are also most unjustly laid to their charge, since they were almost the only body in the three kingdoms that stood out against Cromwel. And though his majesty pretended he was now moved from a regard to the glory of God, who, that observe him now interposing his royal authority for overturning that constitution, which upon his knees, and with his hands lifted up to heaven, he swore to maintain only a few years before, can give the smallest credit to his parents? For indeed he stuck at nothing. But not to trouble the reader with any farther remarks, Prelacy being thus restored by the royal authority, the next thing under consideration was to have bishops appointed and consecrated. Sclden, and the English bishops, had an aversion to all that had been engaged in the Covenant. Mr Thomas Sideserfe was the only man now alive of the old bishops, and at this time expected to be advanced to the Primacy of Scotland. But he had so disgusted the English bishops, that they did not espouse his interest, though they were much against a set of Presbyterian bishops. This affected Sharp sensibly; so he laid the matter before the earl of Clarendon, and managed matters with so much art and dissimulation, that he got the archbishopric of St. Andrews secured to himself, and was ordered to find out proper men for filling up the other sees. The choice were,

Mr James Sharp metropolitan; a monster of hypocrisy, perjury and vileness. He took the tender; made such a proposal to Cromwal, that he publicly declared him to be an atheist; was base with one Isabel Lindsay, as she publicly declared to his face, and had a share in the murder of the poor infant He betrayed the church of Scotland, and persecuted the true members of it. In a word, his wicked and cruel life, and the death he deservedly met with, would make a black and dismal story.

Mr Andrew Fairfoul was made archbishop of Glasgow, a man of some learning and neat expression, but never esteemed serious. Burnet says, he was a pleasant facetious man, insinuating and crafty; a better physician than divine; that his life was scarce free from scandal, and was eminent in nothing that belonged to his own function. He had both sworn the covenant, and persuaded others to do it; and, when it was objected to him, he said, That there were some very good medicines that could not be chewed, but were to be swallowed.

The person who filled up the other bishoprics, were Mr George Wisheart of Edinburgh, Mr Sideserfe of Orkney, Mr David Mitchell of Aberdeen, but did not enjoy it a full year. Mr. James Hamilton of Galloway *, Mr Robert Wallace of the Isles, Mr David Fletcher of Argyll, Mr George Haliburton of Dunkeld, Mr Patrick Forbes of Caithness, Mr David Strachan of Brechin, Mr John Paterson of Ross, Mr Murdoch Mackenzie of Moray, and Mr Robert Leighton of Dunblain. To this last, Burnet gives the most excellent character, that can be met with amongst them; and he was certainly the best of any of the bishops nominated; but he was judged by many to be void of any doctrinal principles; and his close correspondence with some of his relations at Doway, in Popish orders, made him suspected as indifferent to all professions which bear the name of Christians. It was the remark of a countryman, 'That the bishops of England was like the bishops of Judah, some good, some bad; but the prelates in Scotland were like the kings of Israel, not one of them good, but all followers of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.'

There were four of those who were appointed to be bishops at this time in London, to wit, Sharp, Fairford, Hamilton and Leighton. 'The English bishops finding, that Sharp and Leighton had not episcopal ordination as priests and deacons, the other two having been ordained by bishops before the wars, insisted, that they should be ordained first deacons and then priests. Sharp was very uneasy at this, and reminded them of what had happened when king James had set up Episcopacy, who declared, That he thought such a practice went too far towards the unchurching all those who had no bishops amongst them: but the bishops were positive in the point, and would not dispense with it, and the others at last yielded;' which, says Mr Wodrow, made the bishop of London tell Sharp, when he came to acquaint him with their consent to re ordination, That it was the Scots fashion to scruple at every thing, and to swallow any thing. And though this was an unjust and invidious reflection, yet these persons were justly reproved; for one of them frankly declared, he would be ordained, re-ordained and re-ordained again, if it was insisted upon. Accordingly Sharp and Leighton were privately ordained deacons and priests, and all the four were consecrated publicly in the abbey of Westminster, before a great confluence of Scots and English nobility, in December that year. The ceremony was performed in all the modes of the English church.

Though the Scots bishops, by submitting to a fresh ordination as presbyters, declared that they looked upon presbyterial ordination as invalid, yet it is plain their after

* Burnet says of Mr Hamilton, that when he formerly gave the sacrament, he excommunicated all who were not true to the covenant, using a form in the Old Testament of shaking out the lap of his gown, saying, So did he cast out of the church and communion, all that dealt falsely in the covenant.

ter-conduct was inconſiſtent with this principle; for, when they returned to Scotland, and entered upon their epiſcopal function, they re ordained none of thoſe miniſters who complied with them; and conſequently, according to their own principles, theſe were no lawful miniſters, ſince they had not prelatical ordination. It muſt therefore be left with the reader to determine, whether they could be juſtified in perſecuting thoſe people who would not ſubmit to thoſe compliers, when, according to their own principles, they were not lawful miniſters. It is in vain to alledge, that the biſhop's allowance was equivalent to ordination by the impoſition of hands; for, if that was the caſe, why were they themſelves re-ordained by the impoſition of hands, to the ſcandal of all the reformed churches? The party may anſwer this the beſt way they can.

Leighton told Dr Burnet, that, in the whole progreſs of this affair, there appeared ſuch groſs characters of an angry providence, that, how fully ſoever he was ſatisfied as to epiſcopacy itſelf, yet it ſeemed that God was againſt them, and that they were not like to be the men that ſhould build up the church, ſo that the ſtruggling about it ſeemed to him like a fighting againſt God.—He that had the greateſt hand in it, proceeded with ſo much diſſimulation, and the reſt of the order were ſo mean, ſo ſelfiſh, and the earl of Middleton, with the other ſecular men that conducted it, were ſo openly impious and vicious, that it did caſt a reproach upon every thing relating to religion to ſee it managed by ſuch inſtruments.

It is now proper, that we return to the proceedings of the privy council, before whom we ſhall find a remarkable proceſs, in the month of September, relating to the earl of Tweddale. It ſeems the court was informed, that, when the proceſs was depending before the parliament againſt Mr Guthrie, his lordſhip ſpake in favour of that gentleman. This was accounted ſuch a crime, that his majeſty ſent a letter to the council, dated the 7th of September, ordering them to commit the earl to the caſtle of Edinburgh, which was executed on the 13th. On the 17th his lordſhip petitioned the council, to interpoſe either for his enlargement, or that his impriſonment might be changed to a confinement to his houſe at Bothams. Accordingly they wrote to the ſecretary, and enclоſed his petition, and ſignified, that in the late meeting of council, when the matter of church government was before them, the earl had heartily complied with his majeſty's commands, behaving himſelf as a faithful counſellor and loyal ſubject. On the firſt of October two letters from the ſecretary were read in council, recommending them to examine his lordſhip's conduct at the late vote in parliament which condemned Mr Guthrie, and to confine him to Bothams, and three miles round, till further orders. Upon this a committee of the council, was appointed, to whom he gave in a declaration, ſignifying, 1. That there were ſome circumſtances in Mr Guthrie's caſe, that inclined him to vote for ſome other puniſhment than death. 2. That he did not remember his vote relating to the petition and inſtructions. 3. That having heard the proceſs relating to the declinature read but once, and it being the firſt criminal proceſs he was ever witneſs to, he therefore declined to vote in that article. Upon producing this declaration the earl was diſcharged from the caſtle, but confined to his own houſe at Bothams, and three miles round, and ordered to find bail, under the penalty of 100,000 merks ſcots, for his appearance, or returning to the caſtle, when his majeſty or the council ſhall ſee proper. And though afterwards his confinement was taken off, yet from this proceſs the reader cannot but ſee a manifeſt incroachment on the freedom of parliament, for this was the only thing that was laid to his charge.

On the 18th of September the council agreed to a proclamation diſcharging the election of any perſon to be magiſtrate or counſellor within any burgh, except ſuch as were of known loyalty and affection to his majeſty's government, qualified as is expreſſed in the late acts of parliament, and others made for that effect, and whoſe carriage, during the late troubles, has been no evidence to the contrary. The deſign of this proclamation was to exclude all preſbyterians, and ſuch as were not hearty for biſhops and the king's arbitrary power, from any management of burghs, and to entirely ſubject the royal burghs to the yoke of the courtiers.

On the 7th of November, information being given, that George Swinton and James Glen, booksellers in Edinburgh, have ordered to be printed ſeveral ſeditious and ſcandalous books and papers, ſuch as Archibald Campbell's ſpeech, Guthrie's ſpeech, the covenants plea, &c. it was ordered by the council that the lord advocate and proveſt of Edinburgh ſeize upon theſe books and papers, and diſcharge the above and other booksellers to print any more books or papers, till they received warrant from the king, parliament or council. And thus the liberty of the preſs was effectually taken away: for the conduct of theſe managers could by no means bear ſuch a public ſcrutiny.

During theſe things the Rev. Mr Robert Blair, miniſter at St Andrews, was ordered upon ſome information or other, where Sharp took care to keep himſelf behind the curtain, on account of particular obligations he was under to this worthy gentleman, to preſent himſelf before the lord chancellor, at Edinburgh, by the 9th of October. The earls of Linlithgow, Hume, &c. were, on the 5th of November, appointed to examine him, and gave in their report to the next meeting of the council, which was done accordingly on the 7th; but what reſolutions they came to is not known; for my author tells us, that he found a blank in the records of near half a page; and upon the margin, Act Mr Robert Blair, as if they had been aſhamed of their proceedings againſt ſuch a perſon, who was ſo univerſally regarded. We ſhall hear more of him next year.

The council, in conſequence of an application by the preſbytery of Linlithgow, diſcharged the Rev. Mr William Wiſheart from his confinement, after 13 months impriſonment, and afterwards Mr John Scot, and Mr Gilbert Hall, who had been apprehended on the remarkable 23d of Auguſt.

Several weſt country gentlemen, in the month of November, were brought to a great deal of trouble for their joining with Col. Strachan 1650. And while the council were proſecuting Mr Blair and other preſbyterians, they could not, for ſhame, evite doing ſomewhat againſt trafficking papiſts, whoſe numbers at this time greatly increaſed, and it muſt be owned that the council ſhewed ſome conſiderable zeal this way, they had not been much hindered by the remiſſneſs of the prelates. However, John Inglis and William Brown were apprehended and committed to priſon, and were both baniſhed this kingdom; and a proclamation was iſſued on the 19th of November againſt papiſts, and for ſeizing all popiſh books, writings, commiſſions, and others belonging to them, under the higheſt pains. Nevertheleſs papiſts were over looked, while they, who adhered to the true principles of the church of Scotland were perſecuted with the utmoſt rigour.

On the 10th of December the council deſired the chancellor to ſend a letter to the preſbytery of Peebles, ordering them to deſiſt from admitting Mr John Hay to the church of Manner, until the return of the archbiſhop. But it ſeems the preſbytery either had not received the chancellor's letter, or could not put a ſtop to the ordination, and therefore had proceeded to the admiſſion: wherefore all the members preſent were ſummoned to appear and anſwer for their conduct, under the pain of rebellion. This proceeding againſt preſbyteries was a ſtretch beyond the king's letter, by which ſynodical meetings were only prohibited. They might as well have forbid preſbyteries to take ſcandal under their conſideration, as limit them in the point of ordination, which was one great part of their miniſterial function as yet reſerved to them by his majeſty's letter. We ſhall find more preſbyteries writ to, in this manner, by the council next year, to the occurrences of which I proceed in the following chapter.

CHAP. IV.

Of the diſcharging of church-judicatures, the conſecration of the biſhops, the acts of the parliament, and the proceedings of the council, particularly the act of Glaſgow, and other things during the year 1662.

BEFORE the parliament ſat down, the council compleated the work of overturning the judicatures of this church, purſuant to the orders they received from London

London, where all things were concerted by Sharp, and the rest of the bishops who were there.

Accordingly, on the 2d of January, the council received a letter from the king, signifying his will and pleasure, for them to discharge, by proclamation, all ecclesiastical meetings in synods, presbyteries and sessions, till authorized and ordered by the archbishops and bishops. Thus, we find that synods were first interrupted, and then discharged: presbyteries were forbid to ordain any in vacant parishes, and now their meetings were prohibited, nay, their sessions likewise must die with the other judicatures of this church, and all in consequence of the royal supremacy, without the authority of parliament.

Bishop Burnet says, that Sharp procured this without my advice, and it proved very fatal; for when king James brought in the bishops before, they had still suffered the inferior judicatures to continue sitting till the bishops came and sat amongst them.—Whereas now, by silencing these courts, the case was much altered:—for these courts being now once broken, and brought together afterwards by a sort of connivance, without any legal authority, only as the bishop's assistants and officials, to give him advice, and act in his name, they pretended they could not sit in them any more, unless they should change their principles and become thoroughly episcopal. And here, by the way, Burnet had no reason to put in these words, they pretended; for the truth is, they could not countenance any such judicatures, consisting with presbyterial principles, Burnet adds, so fatally did Sharp, precipitate matters. He affected to have the reins of the church wholly put into his own hands, and Lauderdale was not sorry to see him commit errors, since the worse things were managed, his advice would be the more justified. And Middleton and his party took no care of any business, being almost perpetually drunk.—

The same day the above mentioned proclamation was published, the council discharged the presbytery of Kelso from proceeding to ordain a minister to the church of Yetum; for things were now carried on with an high hand: and, by this time, the public resolutioners began to see the dismal effects of opening a door to malignants to get into places of trust in the council and army, because though the protestors were the first who suffered, yet both were afterwards made to drink of the same cup. Accordingly Mr Douglas is reported to have said, when he saw things thus carried on, Our brethren the protesters have had their eyes open, and we have been blind. Mr Dickson used to say, The protestors had been much more prophets than they. And Mr Wood acknowledged to several of his brethren, who differed from him in judgment, that they had been mistaken in their views they took of matters.

And it is a matter of sad regret, that the most part of presbyteries, instead of making any stand for their religious liberties, silently yielded to the proclamation, and left off meeting in a judicative capacity; so that the wicked and unjust invasions made upon the crown and dignity of the Lord Jesus brought many of the faithful of the land with sorrow to the grave; for now, if any presbytery did so much as petition for a fair hearing, no regard was paid to it.

Thus, when the presbytery of Kircudbright sent two of their members, to wit, Mr John Duncan minister at Buick, and Mr James Buglos at Crossmichal, with a petition to the privy council, most respectfully and humbly intreating them in the name of Jesus Christ, 'That their honours would be pleased to grant unto them freedom and liberty to unfold their bosoms in those things that, relating to the work of God in the land did sadly aggrieve their spirits,—and particularly that they might have liberty, with freedom and safety, to express their minds against the re-introduction of prelacy upon this church and kingdom,'—instead of having a hearing allowed them, they were still more exposed to suffering and persecution. If such petitions as these can, with any shew of reason, be looked upon as seditious or treasonable, must be left to the reader.

Many worthy gentlemen in the west country were brought into trouble, on pretence of their having damaged the earl of Queensberry's estate, and being with the forces under colonel Strachan and Ker 1659. But the true cause was, because most of them was for the remonstrance, and enemies to prelacy. The parliament therefore computed the losses the earl sustained at 2000 l sterling, and the council to whom the parliament left the affair, rated every gentleman, whom they pretended had been concerned as above, in proportion to his estate real and personal. Thus Sir William Cuningham of Cuninghamhead was rated at above 200 l. Sir Hugh Campbell of Cessnok at above 130 l. Mr William Gordon of Earlstoun at above 120 l. sterl and others in proportion.

The rev. Mr Robert Blair was before the council the beginning of this year. On the 9th of January, the lord Bellenden, with the advocate and provost of Edinburgh, were appointed to examine the witnesses summoned to appear in his case, and make report accordingly; but after their most diligent search, nothing could be found against him. After the imprisonment of the ministers in August 1660 and the prospect of the re-settlement of prelacy, he preached a faithful and yet cautious sermon, from 1 Pet. iii. 14. Upon his examination, as to the matter of his sermon, he gave the committee of the council a distinct account. He was only confined to his room at Edinburgh, and afterwards removed to Musselburgh where he continued till September this year. While he was there Sharp found means to get his charge declared vacant. On hearing of this Mr Blair sent his presentation to the council. A little after he obtained liberty to reside at Kirkaldy, where he continued with great respect, till the order was published forbidding all presbyterian ministers to live in burghs, and then he removed to Couston. But the true ground of all this trouble was, because, the archbishop could not be easy while so good a man was near him. The council had little more before them till the parliament rose.

The melancholy change that was now made, and the dismal prospect of things for the time to come, made such impressions on many, that they died of grief. Among these was the noble John earl of Loudon, late chancellor of Scotland, who had been a prime instrument in the late work of reformation. He was a nobleman of great and peculiar endowments, joined with remarkable resolution and courage, and, next to the marquis of Argyll, was the object of the spite and rage of the present managers. He often intreated his excellent lady to pray that he might never see the next session of parliament; and accordingly he was taken away from the evil to come on the 15th of March, and was honourably interred among his ancestors.

Soon after this archbishop Sharp, and the other three who had been consecrated at London, came down to Scotland all in one coach. Leighton told Dr Burnet, that he believed they were weary of him, for he was very weary of them. But, finding they were to be received at Edinburgh, with some pomp, he left them at Morpeth, and came to Edinburgh a few days before them.

They got to Berwick on the 8th of April, were met upon the road to Edinburgh by a considerable number of noblemen, gentlemen and others, and received at their coming in with all pomp and solemnity, which was not a little pleasing to Sharp. The lord chancellor with all the nobility and privy counsellors then at Edinburgh, went out together, with the magistracy of the city, and brought the bishops in as in triumph. Dr Burnet was a spectator and says, That though he was truly episcopal, yet he thought there was something in the pomp of that entry, that did not look like the humility that became their function.

The commissioner Middleton came to Holy-rood house on Sabbath, May the 4th; and the 7th was fixed for the consecration of the rest of the bishops in the church of Holy-rood-house. The two archbishops who were the consecrators, went to the church in their pontifical habits. The primate made use of the English forms, and read all from the book; but it is remarkable, as bishop Burnet observes, that they were not ordained first priests and deacons. Three of the bishops nominated, not being present, were consecrated at St Andrews in the month of June following.

This ceremony made way for their admission into parliament, May 8th, which was performed with great ceremony ceremony. Six members of parliament, two noblemen, the earls of Kelly and Weems, two barons, and two burgesses, were sent to invite them to come and take their seats in the house. From the Nether-bow they went up in state. The two archbishops in the midst of the first rank; the gentlemen, magistrates, and town council of Edinburgh, mixed in with the rest of the bishops, who had all their black gowns and robes. When they came to the house a speech was made to them, the act restoring them read, and the house adjourned for that time. They were all invited to dine with the commissioner, who did them the honour to walk down the streets with them on foot. Six macers went first with their maces elevated; next three gentlemen-ushers, and then the purse-bearer uncovered. The commissioner and chancellor came next, with two noblemen upon their right hand, and the archbishops upon their left. And the other noblemen and members of parliament, invited, made up the rest of the cavalcade.

Thus prelacy was restored in triumph; but without the least shadow of the church's consent or authority, nay, in opposition to many ecclesiastical acts, as yet unrepealed; and therefore it was no wonder though many looked upon them as intruders. Besides, the managers knew too well that they durst not run the hazard of having this change made in any considerable meeting of the ministers of Scotland; and therefore prelates and prelacy were introduced entirely by the supremacy. And upon this footing the parliament gave their consent to, and settled Episcopacy in the second session; the proceedings of which I am now briefly to relate, when I have observed, that May the 7th, the commissioner in council declared, that it is his majesty's royal will and pleasure, that the earl of Tweeddale's restraint be taken off. But then he and others must be taught, by his 8th months imprisonment and confinement, how dangerous it would be to speak according to their conscience, and in any thing to contradict the measures of the court.

The parliament had been adjourned to March; but it being resolved that the bishops should sit in the house and matters not being as yet concerted for their consecration, it was deferred till that should be over. Accordingly, on the 8th of May, the parliament sat down; and if ever iniquity was established by law, it was remarkably so in this session, as appears by their following acts.

The very first which passed was, Act for the restitution and re establishment of the antient government of the church by archbishops and bishops; which begins thus: 'Forasmuch as the ordering and disposal of the external government and policy of the church doth properly belong unto his majesty, as an inherent right of the crown, by virtue of his royal prerogative and supremacy in causes ecclesiastical.'—So that this act was founded entirely upon the king's supremacy. The bishops were already set up by his majesty's sole authority, and therefore it was very fit that they should lean entirely upon that foundation. By this act the king was made the only fountain of church power, and that exclusive of Christ the only head of the church, of whom there is not the least mention. And the reader may judge, whether any could, with a safe conscience, take the oath of allegiance, or rather supremacy, formerly mentioned, who was persuaded that there was no visible head of the church upon earth, or, submit to prelacy, as thus established, especially when we consider the exorbitant power that was put into the hands of bishops; for by this act they were restored 'to the exercise of their episcopal function, precedence in the church, power of ordination, inflicting of censures, and all other acts of church discipline, which they are to perform with advice and assistance of such of the clergy as they shall find to be of known loyalty and prudence.—And farther, it is hereby declared, that whatever shall be determined by his majesty, with the advice of the archbishops and bishops, and such of the clergy as shall be nominated by his majesty, in the external government and policy of the church (the same consisting with the standing laws of the kingdom) shall be valid and effectual.' Bishop Burnet himself owns, that this was plainly the setting Episcopacy on another bottom than it had been ever on in Scotland before this time.

Their 2d act was for the preservation of his majesty's person, authority, and government; in which it was declared to be treason for subjects, upon pretence of reformation, or any other pretence whatsoever, to enter into leagues and covenants, or to take up arms against the king, or those commissioned by him; and, consequently, passive obedience and non-resistance were hereby established; and had this been observed in all time coming, the revolution had never taken place. It was likewise declared, That the National Covenant, and Solemn League and Covenant, were unlawful oaths, and that there lay no obligation on the subjects from these oaths. Thus they assumed the pope's power in dispensing with oaths. And, to compleat all, they repealed all acts, ecclesiastical and civil, approving the covenant, particularly the acts of the assembly at Glasgow 1638. In short, it was declared, That, if any should speak, write, preach, print, or pray any thing tending to stir up a dislike of his majesty's prerogative and supremacy in causes ecclesiastical, or the government by archbishops and bishops now settled, should be incapable of any public trust. All this plainly shews that prelacy in the church of Scotland was the road to tyranny in the state.

By their 3d act, all ministers entered since 1649 were ordered to take presentations from their respective patrons, and receive collation or admission from the bishops; so that they must either look upon all they had formerly done in the ministry to be invalid, and submit to prelacy, contrary to their consciences, or quit their charges. And, the better to transmit prelacy to posterity.

By their 4th act, all masters of colleges, who refuse to submit to Episcopacy, and take the oath of allegiance, were ordered to be turned out. Ministers were ordered to attend the diocesan synods, and assist in all things, as they shall be required by the bishops, under very severe penalties. In a word, all private meetings, or conventicles in houses, under pretence of religion, were, by this act, discharged, and none were to preach, keep school, or be pedagogues to persons of quality, without the bishop's licence. Remarks upon these arbitrary laws, and open restraints upon conscience, are, I suppose, needless. But, to compleat the work,

By their 5th act, all persons in public trust were ordained to subscribe to the following declaration.

"I——— do sincerely affirm and declare, that I judge it unlawful to subjects, upon pretext of reformation, or any other pretext whatsomever, to enter into leagues and covenants, or to take up arms against the king, or those commissioned by him; and that all those gatherings, convocations, petitions, protestations, and erecting or keeping of council tables, that were used in the beginning, and for the carrying on of the late troubles, were unlawful and seditious: and particularly, that these oaths, whereof the one was commonly called the National Covenant, (as it was sworn and explained in the year 1638 and thereafter) and the other entitled, A Solemn League and Covenant, were, and are, in themselves, unlawful oaths, and were taken by, and imposed upon the subjects of this kingdom against the fundamental laws and liberties of the same; and that there lieth no obligation upon me, or any of the subjects, from the said oaths, or either of them, to endeavour any change or alteration of the government, either in church or state, as it is now established by the laws of the kingdom."

By this all are obliged to condemn the covenants, and declare that they laid no obligation upon any. Surely nothing could be so unaccountable, as to declare that they who had taken these sacred oaths were loosed from their obligation. Here perjury of the deepest dye was made the necessary qualification of all in public office. In short, the whole work of reformation, since the year 1638 was thereby renounced, defensive arms declared unlawful, conscience enslaved, and tyranny allowed to reign triumphant.

Prelacy being thus settled towards the end of the session, they at last passed an act of indemnity and oblivion, which had been granted in England almost as soon as the king came home; but his antient kingdom must not enjoy such ſuch a favour, till the prelates had their main intereſts ſecured, though it is well known that the Scots Preſbyterians crowned him, fought for him, and ſuffered exceedingly under the uſurpation. So from this indemnity were excepted John Hume, William Dundas, the Campbells of Ardkinglas and Ormſay, and all who had been declared fugitives by the committees of eſtates and parliament ſince the year 1660. This indemnity was farther clogged by an act of fines for the relief of the king's good ſubjects who had ſuffered in the late troubles, as they generally termed the Reformation ſince the year 1638. The parliament appointed a committee for pitching upon the perſons to be fined, and the ſums each were to pay. Accordingly they made up a liſt of about 900 noblemen, gentlemen, and others, which the parliament readily approved of, together with the ſums they were to pay, which made in all 1,017,355 l. 6 s. 8 d. Scots money, which is above 84,779 l. Sterling: the curious reader may ſee the liſt in Mr Wodrow's appendix, N. 33. It was then obſerved, that ſome mentioned in the liſt were dead, or had never a being, ſome were ſucking infants, and others were ſubſiſted out of the weekly collections for the poor. And, generally ſpeaking, theſe fines were impoſed upon thoſe who were reckoned the ſoundeſt Preſbyterians. Middleton thought to have got this money, but it fell into other hands. How this act of fines was put in execution we ſhall ſee afterwards. In ſhort, this act of favour was farther clogged by the balloting act, by which 12 perſons were to be ſecluded from places of truſt, who were to be named in parliament by balloting. This was a contrivance of Middleton's to turn out Lauderdale, Crawford, and Sir Robert Murray: but it occaſioned his own diſgrace; for the king was ſo diſpleaſed thereat, that when the duke of Richmond, Sir George Mackenzie, and Lord Tarbat, delivered the balloting act to him, his majeſty ſaid, that their late actings were like madmen, or men that were perpetually drunk.

This parliament iſſued a proclamation for keeping the 29th of May, with certification, that thoſe miniſters who would not obſerve it ſhould be deprived of their benefices; whereupon many, without being either ſummoned or heard, were deprived of their ſtipends for that year, and the non obſervance of it became the occaſion of great trouble to many faithful miniſters.

This thankſgiving was obſerved with the uſual ſolemnities in cities and burghs; but the town of Linlithgow ſignalized itſelf by a moſt horrid contempt of the covenants and work of reformation, whereof I ſhall give both a juſt relation of fact, and a diſplay of the ſpirit of the party.

When divine ſervice was ended, the ſtreets were filled with bonefires. The magiſtrates invited the earl of Linlithgow to honour them with his preſence, which he did. Then coming to the market place, where was a table covered with confections, they were met by the curate, who having prayed and ſung a pſalm, they ate a few of the confections, and threw the reſt among the people, the fountain all that time running French and Spaniſh wines.—At the croſs was erected an arch ſtanding upon four pillars: on the one ſide of the arch was erected a ſtatue in form of an old hag, having the covenant in her hands, with this inſcription, 'A glorious reformation.' On the other ſide was a ſtatue in a Whigmuir's habit, having the Remonſtrance in his hand, with this inſcription, 'No aſſociation with Malignants.' On the top of the arch was placed a ſtatue repreſenting the devil as an angel of light, with this label at his mouth, 'Stand to the cauſe.'

The arch was beautifully adorned with ſeveral draughts of rocks, reels, and kirk ſtools, upon the pillar beneath the Covenant: and upon the pillar beneath the Remonſtrance was drawn brechams, cogs, and ſpoons. Within the arch was drawn a committee of eſtates, with this inſcription, 'Act for delivering up the king.' On the left hand was drawn a commiſſion of the kirk, with this inſcription, 'Act of the Weſt kirk.' In the middle of the arch hung a table, with this litany:

From Covenanters with uplifted hands,
From Remonſtrators with aſſociate bands,
From ſuch committees as govern'd this nation,
From kirk commiſſions, and their proteſtation,
Good Lord deliver us.

Upon the back of the arch was drawn the picture of rebellion, in a religious habit, with eyes turned up, and other fanatic geſtures, in its right hand holding LEX REX, and in his left 'The cauſes of God's wrath.' There lay, round about, acts of parliament acts of committees of eſtates, acts of aſſemblies, &c. during theſe 22 years of rebellion. Above her was this ſuperſcription, 'Rebellion is as the ſin of witchcraft.' At drinking the king's health fire was put to the frame, and ſuddenly all was conſumed to aſhes, and then appeared a table ſupported by two angels, bearing this inſcription,

Great Britain's monarch on this day was born,
And to his kingdoms happily reſtor'd:
The queen's arriv'd; the mitre now is worn;
Let us rejoice, this day is from the Lord.

Fly hence, all traitors who did mar our peace,
Fly hence, ſchiſmatics who our church did rent:
Fly, covenanting, remonſtrating race;
Let us rejoice that God this day hath ſent.

Then the magiſtrates accompanied the earl of Linlithgow to the palace, where was a great bonefire, and where were drunk the healths of the king, queen, &c.

From the whole, I queſtion whether ſuch a bold inſult upon religious matters is to be parallelled; for ſome who were chiefly concerned in this mock pageantry, particularly Robert Milne, one of the magiſtrates, and Mr Ramſay the miniſter, had taken the Covenants and, conſequently, now publicly avowed their perjury, and left a blot upon their memory.

During this ſeſſion of parliament the Rev. Mr Robert Baillie, who was juſtly reckoned among the great men of his time, died of grief, on account of the ſad alterations then made; he faithfully declared his ſentiments as to prelacy, in two letters to Lauderdale, which are inſerted by Mr Wodrow.

Soon after the act reſtoring Epiſcopacy was paſſed, the following miniſters, viz. Meſſ John Carſtairs at Glaſgow, James Naſmith at Hamilton, Matthew Mowat and James Rowat at Kilmarnock, Alexander Blair at Galſtoun, James Veitch at Mauchlin, William Adair at Air, and William Fullerton at St Quivox, were all ſummoned before the parliament, for a terror to others who ſtood firm to their principles; and, becauſe no indictment could be found againſt them, they were brought before the lords of the articles, and, as a teſt of their loyalty, were required to take and ſubſcribe the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy. They declared their willingneſs to comply, upon condition of being allowed to explain the oath, and accordingly they all, except Mr Adair, ſubſcribed their ſenſe of it in a paper, which they preſented to the houſe on the 28th of May. When the chancellor received the paper, and obſerved that Mr Adair had not ſigned it, he ordered him to withdraw by himſelf, and ſix of theſe miniſters (for Mr Fullerton was diſmiſſed) were cloſely confined, 3 and 3 in one room, to the great prejudice of their health without allowing any to have acceſs to them. After ſome weeks they were ſentenced to be baniſhed, when the commiſſioner and council ſhould think fit to order their tranſportation: however, Mr Carſtairs having fallen dangerouſly ill, he was permitted to go to Dalkeith for his health, and thereby eſcaped. And the managers, being apprehenſive of the conſequences of ſuch rigour, thought proper to allow them ſome more liberty, and ſuffer their friends to ſee them, and ſome of them to go out of town for their health.

At this time the parliament's proceeding againſt the lord Lorn, the eldeſt ſon of the late marquis of Argyll, was moſt unprecedented and ſevere; for, having wrote to the lord Duffus, complaining of the practices of his enemies, in endeavouring to poſſeſs the king againſt him by lies, this letter was intercepted, carried into parliament, and complained of as leaſing-making. Accordingly the parliament deſired the king to ſend him down to be tried upon it. Though his majeſty thought the letter indiſcreetly wrote, he could not ſee any thing in it that was criminal; yet, in compliance with ſo zealous a parliament, Lorn was ſent down upon his parole: but the king wrote poſitively to Middleton not to proceed to the execution of any ſentence that might paſs upon him. His lordſhip came down to Edinburgh July 17th, and was charged to appear, that very afternoon, at the bar of the houſe. After a handſome ſpeech he was committed cloſe priſoner in the caſtle; and on the 26th of Auguſt received ſentence of death. Burnet ſays, He was certainly born to be the ſignaleſt inſtance in this age of the rigour, or rather of the mockery of juſtice. However, as the time of his execution was left to the king's appointment, we ſhall find afterwards a remiſſion granted him.

On the 3d of September the Campbells of Ardkinglaſs and Ormſay were forfeited and declared traitors, for ſome alledged crimes long ago committed againſt ſome of the name of Lamont.

Mr James Hamilton, Mr George Hutchiſon, and Mr John Smith, miniſters of Edinburgh, were ſilenced and deprived by the parliament, for diſobedience to their biſhop; and the reſt were given to underſtand, that they were to meet with the ſame puniſhment and cenſure if they did not ſubmit to their ordinary. An end was put to * this ſeſſion of parliament on the 9th of September.

While theſe things were tranſacting the Preſbyterians in England were made to feel the ſad effects of reſtoring the king without terms; for Epiſcopacy having been re-eſtabliſhed upon his majeſty's return, about 2000 miniſters were, upon the 24th of Auguſt this year, ejected by the act of uniformity that took place that day, by which they were brought under great and intolerable hardſhips. Many holy and excellent miniſters, ſays Dr Calamy, were quickly after laid in goals in many counties in the land, for the heavy crime of preaching and praying. And thus, proteſtants perſecuted proteſtants through the whole iſland, when it was a rare thing to ſee a papiſt in the leaſt moleſted. But to return to the affairs of Scotland.

The next day after the parliament roſe the council met, and ordered all perſons, vicars, and miniſters, to repair to, and attend upon the diocеſan meetings, as they ſhall be appointed by the archbiſhops and biſhops, otherwiſe to be accounted contemners of his majeſty's authority, and to incur the cenſures provided in ſuch caſes, and all other meetings of miniſters were henceforth to be held as ſeditious. Accordingly the 2d Tueſday of October was appointed for the dioceſs of St Andrews, Glaſgow, Edinburgh, Dunkeld, Brechin, and Dumblain, and the 3d Tueſday for thoſe of Galloway, Aberdeen, Murray, Roſs, Caithneſs, Iſles, Argyll, and Orkney.

It is plain, that no preſbyterian miniſters could attend or give countenance to theſe aſſemblies, without renouncing their principles; and accordingly theſe meetings were very ill attended, except in the north.

In order therefore to put this act in execution, and to confer the greater honour upon the biſhops in the weſtern and ſouthern ſhires, where they were generally diſliked, the commiſſioner and chancellor, with the earls of Morton, Linlithgow and Calender, and the lord Newburgh, made a tour to the weſt country, with great pomp and ceremony, and were regaled in many places through which they paſſed. And, as theſe entertainments were generally to exceſs, this was particularly the caſe at Ayr, where, about the middle of the night, in one of their debauches, the devil's health was drank at the croſs. Such were the reformers of this period, and theſe the promoters of prelacy!

On the 26th of September they came to Glaſgow, where Fairfoul the archbiſhop complained to the commiſſioner that, notwithſtanding the act of parliament, there was not one of the miniſters ordained ſince 1649 had owned him for biſhop; that he had only the hatred which attends that office in Scotland, without the power; and that the new made biſhops would be mere cyphers, if his grace did not fall upon ſome more effectual method. The commiſſioner deſired he would make ſome propoſal, with which he would readily comply. Fairfoul moved that the council would agree upon an act and proclamation expreſsly baniſhing all thoſe miniſters from their houſes, pariſhes, and preſbyteries, unleſs they received collation or admiſſion from the biſhop before the 1ſt of November, aſſuring the commiſſioner there would not be ten in his dioceſe who would not comply.

Upon this the council met at Glaſgow, in the college hall, on the 1ſt of October. Biſhop Burnet ſays, That duke Hamilton told him they were all ſo drunk that day, that they were not capable of conſidering any thing that was laid before them, and would hear of nothing but the executing of the law without any relenting or delay. When the council met, the commiſſioner laid before them the motion made by Fairfoul, and urged the neceſſity of ſupporting the biſhops brought in by the king and parliament. Duke Hamilton, according to Burnet, as well as Sir James Lockhart of Lee, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the motion, However, no reaſoning could have any weight with men who were reſolved upon eſtabliſhing prelacy right or wrong; accordingly the act paſſed, ordering all the miniſters who had entered ſince the year 1649, and would not receive collation or admiſſion from the biſhop, before the firſt of November following, to be deprived of their ſtipends for the current year, and to remove from their pariſhes and preſbyteries, diſcharging them from exerciſing any part of their miniſterial office after that time; and that none of their pariſhioners repair to their ſermons, under the pain of being puniſhed as frequenters of private conventicles and meetings. But as duke Hamilton ſigned this act, as well as others, it would ſeem that he did not make that oppoſition which Burnet repreſents.

This was the famous act of Glaſgow, whereby the moſt part of the weſt and ſouth of Scotland was deprived of miniſters. However, the managers were ſoon convinced that they had taken a wrong ſtep; for, after the commiſſioner's return, accounts being daily brought of the diſmal conſequences of their late proceedings, they met on the 4th of November, and wrote to the archbiſhops of St Andrews and Glaſgow, to repair, as ſoon as poſſible, to Edinburgh, to give their advice at ſuch a critical juncture. However, nothing was concluded in this affair before the 23d of December, when the council gave miniſters till the 1ſt of February to come and receive collation or admiſſion from the biſhops, as above, or elſe to remove out of their pariſhes, preſbyteries, and the dioceſes of St Andrews and Edinburgh; and ordered all perſons to repair conſtantly to their own pariſh churches, &c. This was the laſt time that Middleton ſat in the council; for ſoon after he went up to London, where he ſuffered no ſmall inconveniencies; and, for ought appears, never returned any more to Scotland.

Beſides this general thruſt made, by the Glaſgow act, at all the miniſters who could not in conſcience comply with prelacy, many, both miniſters and others, met with cruel and unjuſt uſage. Accordingly, on the 16th of September, becauſe ſeveral who were perſecuted in the country repaired to Edinburgh, the council ordered the magiſtrates of that city to oblige all their burgeſſes and inhabitants, every evening, to give an account of their lodgers, under ſuch penalties as the ſaid magiſtrates ſhould inflict: and the ſame day ordered all the miniſters of the town, who would not own the preſent eſtabliſhment, not only to deſiſt from the exerciſe of their miniſtry, but alſo to remove from the city at Martinmas next, which was more than the act of parliament authorized. But the council made no ſcruple to exceed the penalties inflicted by the parliament, and to aſſume to themſelves a paramount power. The miniſters ſubmitted, except Mr Robert Lawrie, called the Neſt-egg by the common people, who conformed to prelacy, and ſoon after died under remorſe. Thus were the miniſters of Edinburgh turned out, and were ſucceeded by perſons that could in nothing be compared with them.

At Glaſgow the council, after ordering letters of intercommuning againſt James Campbell of Ardkinglaſs, and James Campbell of Ormſay, paſſed an act againſt Mr Donald Cargil miniſter of the barony church at Glaſgow, for not obſerving the 29th of May, and for not obtaining a preſentation and collation from the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, declaring his church to be vacant, and ordering him to tranſport himſelf, family, and effects, before the 1ſt of November following, to the north-ſide of the river Tay, under the penalty of being imprisoned and prosecuted as a seditious person. The reader will observe, that his preaching against the defection and sins of that time was what was then constructed sedition. The like act was passed against Mr Thomas Wylie minister at Kirkcudbright, who, with the other brethren of that presbytery, continued preaching, and kept their presbyteries, notwithstanding the act made against all such meetings. But through the interposition of lady Cochran that sentence was stopt as to Mr Wylie for two months longer.

* N. B. Such was the zeal of this parliament for Prelacy, that they made an order for razing the monument that had been erected on the grave of the Rev. Mr Alexander Henderſon, in the Grey-friar's church-yard, Edinburgh. He was moderator of the general aſſembly 1638, and of ſeveral after aſſemblies, and died Auguſt 18. 1646.

On the 6th of November the council commenced a process against Sir James Stewart late provost of Edinburgh, and his second son, for entertaining in their family Mr Hugh MacKail, who, they pretended, had, in a sermon, abused the king and the government in church and state; which, when strictly examined, came to nothing. So Sir James's son, whom they had imprisoned, was set at liberty, but died soon after; and Mr Mackail went abroad, to accomplish himself by travelling for some years, and, upon his return, became the greater object of the prelates malice, as we shall hear.

The same day the learned, zealous, and pious Mr John Brown, minister at Wamphray, was ordered to be imprisoned for speaking against those who countenanced the diocesan assemblies. Great were the hardships he underwent in prison, for he was denied even the necessaries of life; and though, because of the ill treatment he met with, he was brought almost to the gates of death, yet he could not have the benefit of the free air, until he signed a bond, obliging himself to a voluntary banishment without cause.

On the 18th of November the council ordered that the following ministers, viz. Messr John Livingston at Ancrum, Samuel Austin, John Neave at Newmills, John Carstairs, Matthew Mowat, Robert Trail, James Nasmith, Andrew Cant elder, Alexander Cant his son, John Menzies, and George Meldrum at Aberdeen, Alex. Gordon at Inverary, J. Cameron at Kilfennan, and James Gardiner at Saddle, do, upon notice given them, repair to Edinburgh, and appear before the council against the 9th of December next. They likewise ordered Mr Gilbert Rule and Mr John Drysdale to be secured; but neither of them was apprehended. The design whereof was to force them either to comply with the bishops, or be banished their country.

On the 11th of December, for it does not appear there was any sederunt on the 9th, to which the ministers above mentioned were summoned, the eminent and worthy Mr John Livingstone was examined before the council; and, though he acknowleged the king as the only lawful, supreme, civil governor over all persons, and in all causes, ecclesiastic as well as civil, yet, because he would not promise to keep the anniversary of the 29th of May for the future, nor take the oath of allegiance in the terms in which it was expressed, they ordered that, within two months, he should remove out of his majesty's dominions, and within 48 hours depart from Edinburgh to the north of the Tay, and remain there till he should leave the country, without being permitted to see his wife and family. Upon receiving this cruel sentence, he said, 'Well, although it be not permitted to me to breathe in my native air, yet, I trust, whatsoever part of the world I go into, I shall not cease to pray for a blessing to these lands, to his majesty, and the government, and the inferior magistrates thereof, but especially to the land of my nativity.' Upon this they told him, that he must either go to prison, or subscribe his acquiescence to the sentence: which last he complied with, and accordingly subscribed the following bond.

I Mr John Livingston, late minister at Ancrum, bind and oblige me, that I shall remove myself forth of his majesty's dominions within the space of eight weeks after the date hereof; and that I shall not remain within the same hereafter, without licence from his majesty or privy council, under the pain of death; and that I shall depart from Edinburgh to the north side of the Tay, and there remain while my departure; and that my going off from Edinburgh shall be within 48 hours after the date hereof.

Subscribed at Edinburgh, December 11. 1662.

Jo. LIVINGSTONE.

This Mr Livingstone was honoured remarkably of God to be the instrument of the conversion of thousands. In the year 1639, by his sermon on the Monday after the communion at the Kirk of Shots, from Ezek. xxxvi. 26. about five hundred persons dated their saving change. About two or three years after, such another, and a more plentiful effusion of the Spirit attended a sermon of his at a communion at Hollywood in Ireland, where about a thousand were brought home to Christ. And great success attended him in the ordinary course of his ministry. He was one of those who was sent to the king at Breda, and the person who tendered the Covenant to his majesty before he landed in Scotland. What to think of the Prelates, who could not be easy till they had got rid of such a man as this, must be left to the reader? He went to Holland, where he lived till August. 1672, and then entered the joy of the Lord. Whil. in Holland he made a Latin version of the Old Testament, which though approved by many great men, was never printed.

The same day Mr James Gardiner and Mr Robert Trail were in like manner sentenced to banishment for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, and obliged to subscribe each of them a bond as Mr Livingstone had done, with this difference, that they were to remove in a month; however, the council was pleased to give Mr Trail a little more time.

On the 16th of December, Mr John Menzies and Mr George Meldrum appeared before the council, and declaring their readiness to comply with the present established church government, so far as to join in presbyteries and synods, and to take the oath of allegiance, they were recommended to the archbishop of St Andrews in order to their restitution, We shall see how burdensome this compliance became to Mr Menzies before his death. Mr Meldrum was ordained by the presbytery of Aberdeen 1639, but was stopt in the exercise of his ministry by the abovementioned act at Glasgow, about fourteen days before the bishop of Aberdeen's first diocesan synod, at which the bishop passed a sentence of deposition against him and the learned and pious Mr Menzies, for their not subscribing to the oath of canonical obedience, though they offered submission to the present church government; however, the council, finding them so far willing, recommended them both to the primate, in order to their being restored. When this was presented to the bishop, he readily promised to obey it, and never spoke to them one word of the oath of canonical obedience: when, in his letter to the bishop of Aberdeen, he signified that they were willing to own the government, Mr Meldrum refused to receive it, unless he added this qualification, so far as to join in presbyteries and synods; to which the primate agreed, since they would take it in no other terms. However, Mr Meldrum declared his sorrow for that submission, though he never took the oath of canonical obedience. He was remarkably useful, with his colleague Mr Menzies, in Aberdeen, against the Quakers and Jesuits, till the self-contradictory test turned him out of that city. And after he had, with many faithful ministers, suffered no small persecution till king James's toleration, he was settled at Kilwinning, and from thence translated to Edinburgh, where he filled the chair of divinity with much reputation.

On the 23d of December, Mr John Neave appeared before the council, and was obliged to sign a bond to remove out of the nation against the first of February, upon his refusing the oath of allegiance; and for the same cause Mr John Cameron was ordered to confine himself within the bounds of Lochaber. Mr James Nasmith and Mr Samuel Austin were referred to the commissioner, who was to deal with them as he saw proper; but he soon left the country, and it seems he remitted Mr Nasmith to his council, who ordered him to confine himself within the bounds of the sheriffdom of Merse, Mr Alexander Dunlop minister at Paisley, was likewise sentenced to be banished, for the same reason with the rest, but happened to be overlooked. Mr. Alexander Gordon was prevented, by a violent fever, from being ordered before them. Thus Messrs. Livingstone, Trail, Brown, Neave and Gardiner went over to Holland, which, at that time, was the asylum of the banished, merely for refusing the oath of allegiance, though all of them were willing to take it in the ſame ſenſe the managers ſaid they had themſelves taken it.

all

CHAP. V.

Of the diſmal effects of the ejection of near 400 miniſters. Of the acts and proceedings of the council and parliament, the execution of Lord Wariſton, and the ſufferings of others during the year 1663.

BY the act of Glaſgow, ſpoke of in the preceeding chapter, above a third part of the miniſters in Scotland were thruſt from their charges, amounting to near 400. And the hardſhip was the greater, that, generally ſpeaking, they were perſons of remarkable grace and eminent gifts, godly and laborious, a great many of them learned and able miniſters, all of them ſingularly dear to their people, and moſt of them had ſuffered under the uſurpation for their loyalty to their king, and refuſing the tender; ſo that all the Preſbyterians in Scotland ſuffered in a moſt ſenſible part, by being deprived of them, eſpecially as thoſe who were intruded into their charges were men of a quite different character.

Biſhop Burnet ſays, that the prejudices of the people againſt epiſcopacy was out of meaſure increaſed by the incumbents who were put in the places of the ejected preachers, who were generally very mean and deſpicable in all reſpects; that they were the worſt preachers he ever heard; were ignorant to a reproach, and many of them openly vicious; they were a diſgrace to the ſacred functions, and were indeed the dreg and refuſe of the northern parts; thoſe of them who roſe above contempt or ſcandal were men of ſuch violent tempers, that they were as much hated as the others were deſpiſed.

It is eaſy then to perceive how diſmal the circumſtances of presbyterians were at that time, when ſo many places, eſpecially in the weſt and ſouth, were left deſtitute; for the moſt part in the north country conformed. They could not in conſcience hear the new incumbents, called by the country people curates, becauſe in ſo doing, they would have countenanced thoſe who had broken the covenant, and overturned the whole work of reformation: this would have been a virtual acknowledgment of the authority of the prelates, and an approbation of that wicked act by which their own lawful miniſters were ejected. Beſides, theſe curates had not the qualifications of miniſters for they were neither ſound in the faith, nor moral in their practice; neither had they a right to officiate in the places where they were thurſt in, becauſe, inſtead of having the conſent, and approbation of the people, they were impoſed upon them by compulſion and violence.

As the people could not bear the new incumbents, in many places they had 20 miles to go before they could hear ſermon; ſome of them repaired to the older miniſters, who were not affected by the act of Glaſgow; they who could not reach them frequented the family-worſhip, and exerciſes of the ejected miniſters. And the numbers that came to their houſes were ſo great, that ſeveral of them were obliged to preach without doors, and at length to go to the open fields. This was the original of field-meetings in Scotland, which afterwards made ſo great a noiſe, that, ſome years after, it was made death by law, firſt to the miniſter, and then to the hearers.

The ejection of ſo many excellent men could not fail to lay the foundation of much diſtraction and trouble, eſpecially as it was for adhering to their known and profeſſed principles, even to the doctrine, worſhip, diſcipline and government of the church of Scotland, and to thoſe ſacred covenants which they had frequently ſworn and often renewed. This was the cauſe for which they were obliged to wander, with their numerous families, many of them knew not whither, and that too, in the winter ſeaſon: but a good and gracious God wonderfully provided for them and theirs, to their own confirmation and amazement.

Scotland was never witneſs to ſuch a Sabbath as the laſt on which theſe miniſters preached it had not its parallel: except to the presbyterians in England on the 17th of Auguſt the preceeding year; for it was a day of mourning and lamentation, and the beginning of great ſorrow to the godly through the nation.

Before conſidering the acts of council and parliament, this year, I obſerve that in February died Mr David Mitchell, who was made firſt biſhop of Aberdeen after the Reſtoration, though his character did not merit any elevation in the church, and was ſucceeded by Mr Alexander Burnet.

This Mr Mitchell had determined to go to the church of Maryculter, in the presbytery of Aberdeen, and declare the ſame vacant, but, as I am aſſured by a worthy miniſter now at Aberdeen, he died the Saturday night before; ſo that the pious and excellent Mr Leaſk, miniſter of that pariſh, notwithſtanding his non-conformity, poſſeſſed his church till the year 1670, either, as my informer ſays, through ſome indulgence of biſhop Scougal, or ſome remarkable reſtraint he was under, When Mr Leaſk was on his death bed, the epiſcopal incumbent or peterculter went to ſee him, and aſked him what his thoughts were now. To which the holy man replied, I am dying in the faith of what I have held, and am as full of glory as a clay veſſel can hold, then bowed his head and died. There are other two inſtances of presbyterian miniſters in the ſynod of Aberdeen that kept their pariſhes notwithſtanding the act of ejection, of which I have an account from the ſame perſon, which may be depended upon, viz. that of Mr Dumbar miniſter at Kearn in the presbytery of Alford, who, partly protected by lord Forbes, whoſe pariſh-miniſter he was, and partly by his inſignificant benefice of 300 merks, continued many years, till he died, and Mr Gilbert Clerk, miniſter at New deer, in the presbytery of Deer, having been chaplain to colonel Keith, afterwards earl Marſhal, and called king in Buchan, was protected in his church by him till the time of the teſt, when the earl could not keep himſelf in any public office without taking that ſelf-contradictory oath. Mr Woodrow has given a large liſt of the ejected miniſters, &c. Appen. No 37. to which I muſt refer.

When the earl of Middleton went to London, about the end of the laſt year, he met with a very cold reception from his majeſty; for the earl of Lauderdale his rival, had opened up his unjuſt proceedings with reſpect to the act of fines, whereupon his majeſty wrote to his privy-council in Scotland, dated January the 23d, ordering them to iſſue out a proclamation for ſuſpending the execution of the ſaid act till further orders. The council received this letter on the 12th of February, and the ſame day drew up a proclamation accordingly. But next day they received a letter from Middleton, deſiring them, in his majeſty's name, to do nothing in that affair, and therefore they ſtopt the publiſhing of the proclamation, and recommended to the lord chancellor to write to the commiſſioner Middleton to ſignify the ſame to his majeſty. The king was ſo diſpleaſed, upon receiving this information, that, on the 10th of March he ſent another letter to the council requiring the orders he had given in his former to be punctually obeyed. And therefore the chancellor ordered the proclamation to be publiſhed at the croſs of Edinburgh, for which he had the council's approbation and thanks. Lauderdale, having now got the king's ear, managed his affairs ſo well that Middleton was obliged to reſign all his places.

During theſe things, Sharp was prevailed with to go to court. He promiſed to the earl of Middleton's friends that he would ſtick firm to him, and lay before the king that his ſtanding or falling muſt be the ſtanding or falling of the church. Of this the earl of Lauderdale, had advice ſent him. Yet when Sharp came to London, and ſaw that the king was alienated from Middleton, he reſolved to make great ſubmiſſions to Lauderdale. When he reproached him for his engagements to Middleton, he denied all, and ſaid, he had never gone farther than what was decent, conſidering his poſt. He alſo denied that he had wrote to the king in his favour; but the king had given the original letter to lord Lauderdale, who upon that ſhewed it to Sharp, with which he was ſo ſtruck, that he fell a crying in the moſt abject manner. He begged pardon for it, and ſaid, what could a company of poor men refuſe to the earl of Middleton, who had done ſo much for them, and had them ſo entirely in his power! Lauderdale, upon this, comforted him, and ſaid he would forgive them all that was paſt, and would ſerve them and the church church at another rate than lord Middleton was capable of doing. So Sharp became wholly his.'

Middleton after this lived in obſcurity, till the governor's place at Tangier fell vacant by the death of the Lord Rutherfurd, when the king was prevailed upon to confer that poſt upon him, as a reward for eſtabliſhing prelacy in Scotland. And thus, after he had baniſhed ſo many worthy and excellent miniſters, he was himſelf ſent to die in a foreign land. He lived in contempt there for a little while; and at laſt, by a fall, he broke the bone of his right arm, and the broken bone, at another fall down a pair of ſtairs, pierced his ſide, and wounded him in ſuch a manner, that he firſt turned ſtupid, and very quickly died. Mr. Wodrow ſays, that, at the time of taking the covenant, ſuch was his zeal for it, that, coming from the place where he and ſeveral more had taken it, he ſaid to ſome gentlemen and others about him, 'That this was the pleaſanteſt day ever he had ſeen, and if ever he ſhould do any thing againſt the bleſſed work he had been engaging in, holding up his right hand, he wiſhed to God that might be his death.' Thus fell the great overturner of the reformation in Scotland.

Upon Middleton's reſignation Lauderdale had the management of the Scots affairs committed to him, and came down to Scotland along with the earl of Rothes who was made the king's commiſſioner to the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament, and the earl of Tweddale was made preſident of the council.

During theſe things the council had ſcarce done with proſecuting the weſt country miniſters, before they commenced a new proceſs againſt a greater number in the ſynod of Galloway, to which it is likely they were inſtigated by the biſhop of that dioceſe, becauſe few or none of them had conformed, or attended on their meetings. Accordingly, on the 24th of February, the council ordered about 26 of them to remove, with their wives, children, ſervants and ſubſtance, from their houſes, and the bounds of their reſpective presbyteries, by the 24th of March, at the ſame time prohibiting them to exerciſe any part of their miniſterial office, and to appear on the ſaid day before the council. Accordingly 9 of them appeared, and declared, that rather than conform to the preſent eſtabliſhment, they were willing to remove; however the proſecution againſt them was poſtponed, and all the others, who did not appear, were obliged to leave their churches and habitations, though ſome of them had been ordained before the year 1649, and conſequently were not included in the Glaſgow act of ejectment. And about 14 miniſters of the dioceſe of Dunkeld were ſerved in the ſame manner. Such were the deſolations which were then made at the inſtigation of the prelates!

On the 3d of March the council appointed one Mr John Wilkie to collect the vacant ſtipends, which were now very many, and would amount to a conſiderable ſum, with power to diſtribute them among thoſe whom they called ſufferers in the late times; but though the presbyterians were amongſt the greateſt and were now brought under intolerable hardſhips, they got no ſhare thereof. At the ſame time the dioceſan meeting in Galloway was poſtponed to the 2d Wedneſday of May, becauſe few or none of the miniſters there would countenance it.

And though on the 24th of March, they recommended to each of the biſhops to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the dreadful growth of popery as they were for rooting out of presbytery, they would not have found much difficulty.

The ſame day they deſired the lord chancellor to write to Sir James Turner, or any other perſon he ſhould judge proper, to take notice of all perſons who kept up private meetings or conventicles, for alienating the hearts of the ſubjects from the preſent eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate, and to give an account of them to the council. Theſe it ſeems, were either the meetings for worſhip in the houſes of the ejected miniſters, or thoſe among the good people for prayer and religious conference: how far theſe tended to alienate the hearts of the people from his majeſty, muſt be left with the reader, but it is well known, that men of prelatic principles have ever been againſt ſuch religious ſocieties, though they had much of the Lord's countenance and preſence among them, eſpecially in this perſecuting period.

Theſe things conſidered, it needs not be ſurpriſing that the ſettlement of the curates did meet with oppoſition in ſeveral places. Accordingly at Irongray near Dumfries and at Kirkcudbright, the inhabitants openly oppoſed thoſe that were intruded upon them. The famous Mr John Welſh having been miniſter at Irongray, his ejection was moſt galling to the people; and when the curate found he could not obtain a peaceable admiſſion, he returned upon them with an armed force; but the women there headed by one Margaret Smith, oppoſed the party who were guarding the curate, and fairly beat them off with ſtones. A tumult of the like kind happened about the ſame time at Kirkcudbright.

Upon this the chancellor wrote to the magiſtrates of Kirkcudbright to apprehend the perſons principally concerned in the riot there, and at the ſame time gave a commiſſion to the earl of Linlithgow, Galloway and Annandale, the lord Drumlanerk and Sir John Wauchop of Niddery or any two of them, to repair to theſe places to examine into the affair, and to apprehend and impriſon all whom they ſhould find to have been concerned; and the more effectually to execute their commiſſion, Linlithgow was ordered to take along with him 100 horſe and 200 of the king's guards, to take free quarters in the pariſh of Irongray, or to raiſe from the burgh and pariſh as much money as would amount to half-a-crown a day for every horſeman, and one ſhilling for every foot ſoldier, during their ſtay there, beſides the ordinary pay of the officers, and, by force of arms, to ſuppreſs all meetings or inſurrections of the people, if any ſhould happen.

Thoſe that were found moſt guilty at Kirkcudbright, were John lord Kirkcudbright John Carſon of Sennick, and John Euart late provoſt there, and about five women, who were all carried priſoners to Edinburgh. There were about 14 other women who were found acceſſary, and ordered to be impriſoned till they found bail to appear before the council. One William Arnot was found chiefly concerned at Irongray, and was ſent to Edinburgh with the reſt; all who viſited them in priſon were, by order of council, watched leſt they ſhould pray with them. Margaret Smith was likewiſe carried to Edinburgh, and ſentenced to be baniſhed: but, when before the managers, ſhe told her tale ſo ſimply, that the ſentence was not executed. What was done with lord Kirkcudbright I cannot tell: but Carſon, Euart and Arnot were fined to a moſt immoderate degree. Arnot was ordered to acknowledge his offence two ſeveral Lord's days at the church of Irongray, and the five women to ſtand two hours in the pillory at Kirkcudbright, for two ſeveral market days, with papers on their foreheads ſignifying their fault. And though they had no proof againſt any particular perſon at Irongray, yet, becauſe there had been a tumult, the whole party of horſe and foot were ordered to take free quarters in the pariſh, and this beſides other oppreſſions. Such were the proceedings of the managers, becauſe a few women in two pariſhes had put ſome affronts on the curates. The reſt, after a conſiderable time's impriſonment, were ſet at liberty.

When theſe commiſſioners were in the ſouth the troubles of the excellent laird of Earlſtoun began. The commiſſioners on the 21ſt of May, wrote to him from Kirkcudbright, requiring that he would order an edict to be ſerved in favour of one Mr Hay to be admitted miniſter at Darly, of which he was patron. Earlſtoun returned a very reſpectful anſwer, in which he gave ſolid reaſons why he could not comply. But the commiſſioners knowing his ſteddy attachment in preſbyterian principles, were reſolved to bring him into trouble, and therefore ſummoned him before the council, where he met with very ſevere treatment, as we ſhall afterwards find.

On the 24th of May a petition was preſented to the council from Mr James Mac Gill late miniſter at Largo, for leave to attend a meeting of the tutors of the late viſcount of Oxenford's children, of which he was one; for the reader muſt obſerve, that thoſe miniſters, who were not reached by the Glaſgow act, were confined to their own pariſhes as priſoners at large, ſo that, upon every emergency, they were obliged to apply to the council for liberty to come out of their confinement.

On the 2d of June they made a very good act againſt the Quakers; but the biſhops gave the council ſo much to do againſt the Presbyterian non-conformiſts, that theſe people were ſuffered to reſt in quiet; that they mightily increaſed during this reign.

On the 15th of June were read in council the earl of Rothes' commiſſion, to be commiſſioner to the parliament in the room of Middleton, and lord high-treaſurer in the room of the earl of Crawford, who reſigned that office becauſe he could not ſign the declaration appointed by the parliament laſt year. At the ſame time Lauderdale took his ſeat in the council, with his brother Charles, afterwards lord Hattoun, John Hume of Rentown, and the two archbiſhops.

On the 18th of June the parliament ſat down, when the biſhop of Aberdeen preached before them. The buſineſs of this ſeſſion went on according to the direction of Lauderdale, and the whole former proceeding in the affairs of balloting was ſo laid open, as finiſhed Middleton's diſgrace.

The former ſeſſions had left very litle for this to do, in favour of the prelates, unleſs to ſcreen them from the oppoſition of the country, and lay a foundation for a more open and univerſal perſecution than was ever in Scotland ſince the reformation from popery.

Thus by their 2d act, intituled Act againſt ſeparation and diſobedience to eccleſiaſtical authority, all non-conform miniſters, that ſhall preſume to exerciſe their office in any manner whatſoever, were to be puniſhed as ſeditious perſons; and all withdrawing from, and not attending upon the worſhip of God in their own pariſh churches, was declared ſeditious and of dangerous example and conſequence; and therefore all who were found guilty, in this reſpect, were to incur the following penalties, viz. each nobleman, gentleman and heritor, the fourth part of his yearly revenue; every yeoman, tenent or farmer, the loſs of ſuch a proportion of his free moveables, after paying his rent, as the council ſhall think fit, not exceeding a fourth part; and every burgeſs the loſs of his freedom, and the fourth part of his moveables. And the council was authoriſed to put this act in execution, to inflict ſuch other corporal puniſhment as they ſhould ſee proper, and do every other thing that they ſhould ſee neceſſary for procuring obedience to this act, which was called The biſhop's drag net.

It is plain, this act ſtrikes both at miniſters and people, for they who received their miniſtry from Chriſt were forbid to diſcharge the ſame under ſevere penalties, unleſs they renounced their principles, and, in oppoſition to the dictates of their own conſcience, complied with abjured prelacy; the people muſt hear the intruders; and, in ſhort, an unlimited power was given to the council.

By their 3d act all in public truſt were required to ſign the declaration appointed laſt year againſt the 11th of November; returns were ordered to be made to the council by the 1ſt of January; and, if perſons elected to be councellors and magiſtrates refuſe to ſign, they were for ever declared incapable of being magiſtrates, and of merchandiſing. So that, if a party had a mind to get rid of any conſcientious preſbyterian who had a good trade, they had no more to do, but to get him choſen a magiſtrate or councellor, for they were ſure he would not ſign the declaration *.

The 5th act was for eſtabliſhing a national ſynod, conſiſting of the archbiſhops and biſhops, deans and archdeans, &c. but then nothing was to be enacted that could not be confirmed by the king or his commiſſioner. It was declared that it was neceſſary, for the honour of God and the good of ſouls, that there be a national ſynod; and if ſo, then the prelates had neither of theſe before their eyes; for, though it paſſed at their deſire, they took effectual care to prevent the meeting of any ſuch ſynod.

This parliament, ſays Mr Wodrow, ordered a levy to be made, if need be, of 20,000 foot and 2000 horſe, for the preſervation of Chriſtendom againſt the Turks; and adds, that, though it was never made, yet it had been much better employed this way, than in perſecuting Proteſtants. Burnet relates it thus: Another act was looked upon as a pompous compliment, and ſo it paſſed without any oppoſition. In it they made an offer to the king of an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horſe, to be ready upon ſummons to march with 40 days proviſion into any part of his majeſty's dominions, to oppoſe invaſions, to ſuppreſs inſurrections, or any other caſe in which his authority, power, or greatneſs was concerned. None dreamed, ſays the biſhop, that ever any uſe was to be made of this; yet Lauderdale had his own end in it, to let the king ſee what uſe he might make of Scotland, if he ſhould intend to ſet up arbitrary government in England. The reſt of the acts of this ſeſſion, relating to civil affairs, do not come under our preſent conſideration.

On the 24th of June lord Lorn, who was condemned the laſt ſeſſion, was ſet at liberty from the caſtle of Edinburgh, and, a few days after this ſeſſion roſe, a patent came down, reſtoring him to all his grandfather's eſtate; only, as his father was much in debt when he died, his lordſhip was reſtricted to 15,000 l. Scots a-year till the debts were paid off.

Mean while Sir Archibald Johnſtoun, lord Wariſtoun, met with quite different uſage. For having, after the ſentence of forfeiture and death paſſed againſt him by the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, gone abroad to eſcape the fury of his enemies, even there did their crafty malice reach him.

When at Hamburgh he was ſeized with a ſevere illneſs, during which Dr Bates, one of king Charles's phyſicians, gave him poiſon inſtead of phyſic, and then ordered to draw from him ſixty ounces of blood, by which he was brought to the gates of death, and ſo far loſt his memory, that he could not remember what he had done or ſaid a quarter of an hour before, and continued in that condition ever after.

At laſt, going unadviſedly into France, one Alexander Murray, being diſpatched in queſt of him, apprehended him at Roan, while engaged in ſecret prayer, a duty wherein he greatly delighted. In January he was brought over priſoner and committed to the tower of London, where he continued till the beginning of June, when he was ſent down to Edinburgh to be executed. His carriage, during his paſſage, was truly Chriſtian. He landed at Leith on the 8th of June, and was committed to the tolbooth of Edinburgh. From thence he was brought before the parliament on the 8th of July. His nephew, biſhop Burnet, ſays, he was ſo diſordered both in body and mind, that it was a reproach to any government to proceed againſt him. When at the bar of the houſe he diſcovered ſuch weakneſs of memory and judgment, that every perſon almoſt lamented him, except Sharp and the other biſhops, who ſcandalouſly and baſely triumphed over, and publicly derided him, though it is well known lord Wariſtoun was once in caſe to have reaſoned before the greateſt aſſembly in Europe, nay, and to have preſided in it.

It ſeems that many of the members of parliament were inclined to ſpare his life; for, upon the queſtion, Whether the time of his execution ſhould be juſt now fixed or delayed, Lauderdale interpoſed, upon calling the roll, and made a moſt threatening ſpeech for his preſent execution: accordingly ſentence was pronounced, that he be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 22d of July, and his head placed on the Nether bow port, beſide that of Mr Guthrie. He received his ſentence with ſuch meekneſs as all were filled with admiration; for then he deſired that the beſt bleſſings of heaven might be upon his majeſty, on the ſtate and church, whatever befel himſelf; and that God would give his majeſty true and faithful counſellors.

During the whole time of his impriſonment he was in a moſt ſpiritual and tender frame, to the conviction of his very enemies; and the nearer his death approached, the compoſure of his mind became the more conſpicuous. He reſted agreeably the night before his execution, and in the morning was full of conſolation, ſweetly expreſſing his aſſurance of being clothed with a long white robe, and of getting a new ſong of the Lamb's praiſe in his mouth mouth before night. He dined with cheerfulneſs, hoping to ſup in heaven, and to drink the next cup freſh and new in his father's kingdom. And, after he had ſpent ſome time in ſecret, about two o'clock he was taken from priſon, attended by ſeveral of his friends in mourning, though he himſelf was full of holy cheerfulneſs and courage, and in a perfect ſerenity of mind. When going to the ſcaffold, he ſaid frequently to the people, Your prayers, your prayers! When he was on the ſcaffold, he ſaid, I entreat you quiet yourſelves a little, till this dying man deliver his laſt words among you; and deſired they would not be offended at his making uſe of his paper, to help his memory, ſo much impaired by long ſickneſs, and the malice of phyſicians; then he read his ſpeech (which is recorded in Naphtali, and in Mr Wodrow's appendix) firſt from the one ſide of the ſcaffold, and then from the other, in which he bewailed his compliance with the uſurpers, and declared his adherence to the covenants, and work of reformation. After this he prayed with the greateſt fervency, and, in a very rapture, beginning thus, Abba, Abba, Father, Father, accept this thy poor ſinful ſervant coming unto thee, through the merits of Jeſus Chriſt, &c. There were no miniſters allowed to be with him, but thoſe preſent obſerved that God ſufficiently made up that want. He was helped up the ladder by ſome of his friends in deep mourning, and, as he aſcended, he ſaid, Your prayers, your prayers; I deſire your prayers in the name of the Lord. Such was the value he had for that duty. When he got to the top of the ladder, he cried with a loud voice, 'I beſeech you all, who are the people of God, not to ſcare at ſufferings for the intereſt of Chriſt, or ſtumble at any thing of this kind falling out in theſe days, but be encouraged to ſuffer for him; for I aſſure you, in the name of the Lord, he will bear your charges.' At laſt he bid the executioner do his office, and crying out, O pray pray! praiſe, praiſe! was turned off, and died almoſt without any ſtruggle, with his hands lifted up to heaven. He was buried in the Gray frier's church yard, and his head was fixed on the Nether bow beſide that of his dear friend Mr Guthrie. And thus fell the eminently pious and learned lord Wariſtoun: ſo that as the foundation of prelacy was laid in the blood of the noble marquis of Argyll and the worthy Mr James Guthrie, the building was cemented by the blood of lord Wariſtoun.

A little before the execution of this great man, the council, on the 14th of July, ordered Mr James Wood, principal of the college of St Andrews, and miniſter there, to be ſummoned before them on the 23d, for continuing to exerciſe his office. He was ſcarcely allowed to ſpeak in his own defence, and was ſentenced to confine himſelf within Edinburgh till farther orders. Whereupon he told them, He was ſorry they had condemned a perſon without hearing, whom they could not charge with the breach of any law.

At the ſame time the council, at the inſtigation of the biſhop of Glaſgow, ordered Meſſ. Alex. Livingſtone late in Biggar, Matthew MacKail at Bothwel, John Guthrie in Tarbolton, John Blair at Mauchlin, John Schaw at Stirk, George Johnſtoun at Newbottle, John Hardy at Gordon, Archibald Hamilton at Wigton, George Wauch in Kirkinner, and Anthony Murray at Kirkbean, miniſters, to appear before them on the 23d of July, under the pain of rebellion. Accordingly Meſſ. Hardy, MacKail, and Livingſtone appeared, and were confined within the city of Edinburgh till farther orders, and in the mean time diſcharged from keeping any private conventicles.

The ſame day a deputation was appointed to wait upon the commiſſioner, to take ſome general courſe with all the non-conform miniſters; and on the 30th of July, Meſſ. Matthew Ramſay at Old Kirkpatrick, James Walkinſhaw at Baldernock, Hugh Smith at Eaſtwood, James Hamilton at Eaglesham, and James Blair at Catheart, were ordered to anſwer for their ſeditious carriage, i. e. for continuing to preach the goſpel, under pain of rebellion. Mr Hardy appearing, and owning that he had preached, the council declared his church vacant, and ordered him, within 14 days, to remove 20 miles from his pariſh, fix miles from any cathedral church, and three miles from any royal burgh, in all time coming. And this was a prelude to the mile act we ſhall preſently hear of. On this 30th of July letters were ordered to be directed to ſummon Mr William Gordon of Earlſtoun to appear before them for his factious and ſeditious carriage, i. e. his refuſing to hear the curate, and his favouring the ejected miniſters.

Mr MacKail ventured back to Bothwel, and eſcaped for ſome time; Mr Livingſtone is ſaid to have been confined to his pariſh till farther orders; Meſſ. Johnſtoun, Cuninghame and Blair were confined to the north-ſide of the Tay; Mr Ramſay was remitted to the archbiſhop of Glaſgow; and Meſſ. Smith and Walkinſhaw were ordered to obey the mile act made a few days before.

For, on the 13th of Auguſt, the council taking under their conſideration, that ſeveral miniſters who by law (i. e. the laws lately made) have no right to preach or reſide in their pariſhes, do, notwithſtanding, preach, adminiſter the ſacraments, and keep diſorderly conventicles, &c. made an act, and publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all ſuch miniſters, within twenty days after the publication of the ſame, to remove themſelves, families, and ſubſtance, out of their reſpective pariſhes, and not to reſide within twenty miles of the ſame, nor within ſix miles of Edinburgh, or any cathedral church, or three miles of any royal burgh. This act extended to thoſe miniſters who were ordained before 1649, unleſs they attended the biſhop's courts.

Here we may ſee, 1. That the council had neither inſtructions from the king, nor authority from the parliament to make this act; yea, they agreed to it, and publiſhed the proclamation, even though the parliament was then ſitting; ſo that they aſſumed a power properly parliamentary under their very noſe. 2. This ſhews the perſecuting ſpirit and temper of the biſhops; for this was the firſt act of council after the two archbiſhops were members of it, and it is not unlikely that it was entirely owing to them, who could not endure preſbyterian miniſters in their neighbourhood. 3. Every perſon muſt ſee what hardſhips poor miniſters and their ſmall families were put to by this. They were removed, merely for conſcience-ſake, far from their beloved people, who might, and doubtleſs would, have relieved them in their neceſſities; nay, by this they were deprived of the means of educating their children, at leaſt they muſt be at double charges, and have them removed from under their inſpection when at ſchool; 'for the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel!'

The biſhops being vexed that any preſbyterian miniſters from Ireland ſhould have ſhelter in Scotland, and that numbers refuſed to hear the curates, the council, on the 7th of October, made an act, ordering all perſons who ſhould come from Ireland, without ſufficient teſtimonials, either to return within fifteen days, or be impriſoned and treated as ſeditious perſons; and declaring that all perſons who withdraw from their pariſh churches after three admonitions given them by the miniſters of the reſpective pariſhes, ſhall be proceeded againſt upon the miniſter's atteſtation of his having intimated the names of ſuch perſons; and all noblemen, ſheriffs, &c. and officers of the army, were required to aſſiſt and concur with miniſters, in ſeeing the law, in that caſe made and provided, duly put in execution. How equitable it was to make miniſters witneſſes in their own cauſe, and put the executive power in the hands of the army, muſt be left with the reader.

On the 29th of September Sideſerfe biſhop of Orkney died, and on the 9th of October following the parliament was diſſolved, which, ſays biſhop Burnet, gave a general ſatisfaction to the country, becauſe they were a furious ſet of people. We ſhall hear no more of parliaments for ſix years to come. When the ſeſſion was ended, ſeveral perſons of quality went to London, amongſt whom was the earl of Rothes, who met with a gracious reception from his majeſty, and was made a member of the privy council of England. But to return to the affairs of Scotland, where things were ſtill growing worſe and worſe, and the effects of prelacy appearing more and more diſmal.

On the 13th of October the council gave orders to the earl of Linlithgow to march with a number of foot to Kirkcudbright, which, with the ſoldiers there already, might make 160 men, to quarter till farther orders; and, at the ſame time, commanded Sir Robert Fleming to march one

one ſquadron of the life-guards to quarter at Kilmarnock, and another at Paiſley.

On the 2d of November archbiſhop Fairfoul died at Edinburgh, and was interred with great funeral ſolemnity in the eaſt end of the Abbey church.

On the 24th of November, the council being informed that the laird of Earlſtoun kept conventicles and private meetings in his houſe, notwithſtanding the laws againſt ſuch practices, ordered letters to be directed againſt him, to appear before them the—day of—to anſwer for his contempt, under the pain of rebellion. We ſhall find more concerning him afterwards.

On the ſame day Linlithgow was ordered to write a letter of thanks to Sir James Turner, for his care and pains in ſeeing the laws concerning church-government duly obeyed, &c.

This Sir James, as the author of the memoirs of the church of Scotland obſerves, was a tool to their minds, a ſtranger in the country, being an Engliſhman, bred to plunder and rapine in the ſervice of the French, perfectly void of the fear of God or man, and unacquainted either with religion or humanity. But though he was ready enough to execute his orders with rigour, yet we ſhall hear afterwards that he was obliged to exceed the bounds of his own inclinations to ſatisfy the biſhop of Galloway, who was fierce and cruel, as all apoſtates uſe to be.

The council, finding that the body of the people in the weſt and ſouth were moſt diſſatisfied with prelacy, and having given the army power to levy the fines appointed by parliament, ſent a conſiderable body of forces with the ſtricteſt orders, to oblige all perſons to ſubmit to the biſhops and their curates, which occaſioned the moſt grievous oppreſſions and exactions under colour of law.

The proceſs was very ſhort in caſes of non-conformity. The curate accuſed whom he pleaſed to Sir James, or any of the officers, and frequently to a private centinel. The ſoldier is judge, no witneſſes or proof is required, but the ſentence is ſummarily pronounced, and the ſoldier executes his own ſentence, and with the greater cheerfulneſs, that the money, generally ſpeaking, came into his own pocket; and often the fine exceeded what the law appointed. They behaved juſt as if they had been in an enemy's country. If a tenant or head of a family was unwilling or unable to pay, the ſoldiers were ſent to quarter upon him till they had deſtroyed ten times the value of the fine; and when poor families were no longer able to ſuſtain them, they were ſpoiled of their goods, which were ſold for a trifle.

In theſe quarterings family worſhip was ridiculed, and they who performed it were treated by the profane ſoldiery as if it had been a conventicle. Multitudes were cruelly beat, and dragged to church or priſon with equal violence. And thus hundreds of religious families in the weſt and ſouth were ſcattered and reduced to extreme neceſſity, and their landlords obliged either to conceal themſelves or leave the country. Now, whether this was not a more proper method for extirpating than eſtabliſhing of church-government, the reader may judge. If it be ſaid, that none can account for the extravagance of ſoldiers; then the more to blame were they who entruſted them with ſuch power, and did not caſhier the officers for not reſtraining them.

However, it muſt be granted that the blood thirſty curates had no ſmall ſhare in this oppreſſion; for in moſt pariſhes they made a liſt of the congregations, not for the performance of any part of their miniſtry, (that was the leaſt of their care) but to expoſe their non conforming pariſhioners to the ravages of the army. After ſermon this liſt was called over from the pulpit, and all who were abſent, except ſome favourites, were delated to the ſoldiers; after which no defences could be heard, the fine muſt either be paid, or their houſes quartered upon.

As the churches of the old preſbyterian miniſters, who were not as yet ejected, were much crouded, the ſoldiers, when the worſhip was near over, went armed thereto, and obliged the people to go out one by one, and declare, upon oath, whether they belonged to that congregation; and they who could not do this, though their own pariſhes were vacant, were immediately fined, and what money they had about them taken from them. If they had none, then their Bibles, the mens coats, and the womens plaids, were ſeized by theſe wretched executioners; ſo that the ſoldiers returned laden with ſpoil; nay, in ſome places they would enter the churches by force, and interrupt divine worſhip. One party would ſtand at one door, a ſecond at another, and a third entered the church, and obliged the people to go all out at one door, and they who would not preſently ſwear they belonged to that pariſh, were rifled of all that they had, and ſometimes dragged to priſon; and after all the poor people were ſometimes forced to give it under their hand that they were kindly uſed.

It would ſeem that even the council themſelves were aſhamed of the rigorous proceedings of theſe military gentlemen; for, on the 24th of November, they iſſued a proclamation, forbidding the officers of the ſtanding army to exact any of the penalties contained in the forementioned act, except the twenty ſhillings Scots from every perſon who abſents from his own pariſh church on the Sabbath-day. But when ſoldiers are once let looſe, reſtrictions will not eaſily tame them.

About the end of the year the council were at much pains to preſs ſubſcribing of the declaration impoſed by the parliament upon all in places of truſt. But it is time now to go on to.

CHAP. VI.

Of the erection and proceedings of the high-commiſſion and acts of council, together with the ſtate and ſufferings of the Preſbyterians till the year 1666.

THE king being pleaſed with the conduct of his privy-council, relating to the declaration againſt the Covenant, wrote to the chancellor, deſiring that they would take all poſſible pains, that thoſe who had not yet ſubſcribed it might be enjoined to do it, and that the places of thoſe who refuſed might be ſupplied with proper perſons; this they readily complied with, and gave his majeſty an account of their diligence; nay, they carried this point ſo far, that ſome who were choſen to be magiſtrates were proſecuted for not accepting, becauſe they could not, in conſcience, comply with theſe terms of acceptance; for when John Potter, Gilbert Wylie, John Reid elder, John Gray, Alexander Gardiner, Nairn Holmes, and ſome others, who were out of the kingdom were elected to be magiſtrates or members of the town-council of Irvine, the privy-council ordered them to be ſummoned before them, becauſe, rather than ſubſcribe againſt their conſcience, they had refuſed to accept the charge.

But the chancellor, and ſome others, were not for driving ſo faſt as the Prelates would have them, and Glencairn, in particular, was highly diſpleaſed with the inſolence of the primate. Wherefore, about the end of the laſt year, Sharp went up to London to complain of the privy-council, where he ſaid there was ſuch remiſſneſs, and ſo much popularity appeared on all occaſions, that unleſs ſome more ſpirit was put in the adminiſtration, it would be impoſſible to preſerve the church.' That was the word always uſed, as if there had been a charm in it. He moved that there might be a letter write giving him the precedence of the lord chancellor, and that the king would grant a ſpecial commiſſion to ſome perſons for executing the laws relating to the church. Accordingly the king granted a commiſſion 'to the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, the lord chancellor, the lord treaſurer, the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, duke Hamilton, the marquis of Montroſe, the earls of Argyll, Athol, &c. or any five of them, an archbiſhop or biſhop, being one of the number, to call before them, when and where they ſhould appoint, all popiſh traffickers, &c. (but papiſts lived very quietly under this reign) all obſtinate contemners of the diſcipline of the church—all keepers of conventicles—all who preached in private houſes, or elſewhere without licence from the biſhop—all who keep meetings at faſts and the adminiſtration of the Lord's ſupper, not approven by authority—all who ſpeak, preach, write, or print to the ſcandal and detriment of the preſent government in church and ſtate—all who do not attend divine worſhip at their pariſh-churches, &c. with power to the ſaid commiſſioners, or any five of them, an archbiſhop biſhop or biſhop being one, to cenſure miniſters with ſuſpenſion or depoſition; and to puniſh by fining, confining, &c. all who ſhall be found tranſgreſſors, according as they ſhall judge of their offence, not exceeding the fines and puniſhments appointed by the parliament and council:' (they frequently found pretences to exceed this reſtriction.) 'Commanding the captains of his majeſty's guards, the officers of the army and militia, &c. to ſearch for and apprehend all ſuch delinquents, and preſent them before the commiſſioners, upon warrant from any five of their number:—ordaining, farther, the lords of the privy-council to direct letters of horning for the payment of the fines appointed by the commiſſioners, in caſe delinquents ſhould refuſe to appear before them.—And, generally, the commiſſioners aforeſaid are authoriſed and impowered to do and execute what they ſhall find neceſſary for his majeſty's ſervice. And that a buſineſs of ſuch importance may take a ſpeedy and ſucceſsful effect—it is his majeſty's pleaſure, that this his commiſſion ſhall endure to the firſt of November 1664 and after till it be diſcharged by his majeſty, and that the firſt meeting thereof be at Edinburgh the firſt Wedneſday of March next to come, and the after meetings in ſuch places, and as often as ſhall be judged neceſſary.—Given at Whitehall, January the 16th—1664.'—

This was certainly one of the moſt infamous courts that ever was erected in any proteſtant nation. In it were nine biſhops to thirty five laymen; but the biſhops were made neceſſary members, and four, with any one prelate, were declared to be a quorum, which were too few of ſuch a number, though the better for the purpoſes of their appointment. After the clauſe about papiſts, who were generally overlooked, all that follows is levelled at the Preſbyterians. And, beſides the ordinary crimes of conventicles and miniſters exerciſing their office, all were expoſed to proſecution who keep meetings at faſts, and the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper. Theſe were too ſerious exerciſes for the biſhops, whoſe conſciences, probably, ſtung them, ſo that they were afraid of the joint prayers of the Lord's people. Their power was moſt extenſive. They were empowered to hear and determine cauſes without appeal, could ſuſpend and depoſe churchmen, fine, confine, and impriſon all who ſhould be accounted tranſgreſſors; nay, they were authoriſed to do and execute what they ſhould find neceſſary for his majeſty's ſervice. And what would not theſe prelates find neceſſary for ſecuring themſelves and their underlings, if we may judge from their former proceedings? This court was of a heterogeneous nature, and as one calls it, a hotch-potch mongrel ſenate. Here were biſhops and peers, inferior magiſtrates and military officers, &c. all blended together. Their proceeding was as unaccountable, unjuſt and cruel, as their power and authority was extravagant and illegal; for perſons were brought before them without any information, accuſation, witneſs or accuſer; but, being fetched in, were obliged to anſwer ſuper inquirendis, to whatever queſtions were propoſed. Lawful defences were neither received nor admitted; and if any offered to propoſe any thing of that nature, he was required firſt to take the oath of diligence or ſupremacy, the refuſal of which was reckoned guilt ſufficient. In ſhort, the oppreſſion and grievances of this deteſtable court, whereof I ſhall give a few inſtances, were, in many things, noways inferior to that of the Spaniſh inquiſition; mean time it will be proper to mention the moſt remarkable intervening occurrences.

We have ſeen, that when Sharp moved for the high-commiſſion court, he, at the ſame time propoſed that himſelf might have the precedence of all the officers of ſtate; which motion the king likewiſe complied with, and accordingly ſent a letter to the privy-council of the ſame date with the high commiſſion, ſignifying his royal pleaſure, that the archbiſhop of St Andrews ſhould have place, both at his council and all other public meetings, before the chancellor and all other ſubjects within the kingdom. This letter came down on the 26th January, and not a little diſguſted the nobility, eſpecially Glencairn the chancellor. However, they could not help themſelves, nor remonſtrate againſt the ſovereign prerogative. Thus was verified what Lauderdale, about three years ago, told Glencairn, that ſince he and Middleton would have biſhops, they ſhould have them with a vengeance.

About this time ſome changes were made among the biſhops; for Mr Alexander Burnet was tranſlated from Aberdeen to Glaſgow in the room of Fairfoul deceaſed, Mr Scougal ſucceeded to the biſhoprick of Aberdeen, and was reckoned one of the beſt of that order, and Mr Andrew Honeyman was made biſhop of Orkney in the room of Sideſerfe deceaſed.

On the 16th of February, a letter was read in council upon the ſubject of the act of fines, requiring them to iſſue a new proclamation, commanding ſuch fined perſons ſhould be charged, in the name of the treaſurer, or his deputy, or the advocate, before the firſt of Auguſt 1664, to make payment of the firſt half of the fines againſt Martinmas next to come, and the other half at or before the term of Candlemas following. Accordingly, next council day, being the 18th of February, a proclamation was drawn up, approved, and ordered to be publiſhed at the croſs of Edinburgh, declaring the ſame to be as ſufficient as if it had been publiſhed at all the head burghs of the kingdom.

Notwithſtanding the payment was poſtponed ſome time longer: for the king ſent another letter to the council; dated the 20th of July 1664, requiring ſuch as ſhould be charged betwixt that and the laſt day of Auguſt, to pay their firſt moiety at or before the 11th of December next and the 2d at or before the 2d of March, and a proclamation was publiſhed in the terms of the letter. What was the reaſon of this delay is not known, poſſibly the courtiers were not agreed about dividing the ſpoils. But what is delayed is not forgiven; for on the 3d of November, the king's letter dated the 17th of September, with a warrant incloſed, was read in the council, who iſſued a proclamation in terms of the incloſed warrant, commanding all thoſe mentioned in the liſt ſpecified in the warrant or the heirs and executors of ſuch as were dead, to pay the reſpective ſums impoſed upon them, the one half at or before Candlemas, and the other at or before Whitſunday 1665 under the pains and penalties mentioned in the act of parliament.

One would imagine that they who were thus fined had been guilty of ſome very notorious crimes, whereas they were chargeable with nothing but what the managers themſelves and the whole nation were guilty of, viz. a neceſſary ſubjection to the uſurpers. And though it be alledged in the warrant, that many of the king's ſubjects ſuffered greatly for their loyalty to the king and his father, yet it is plain, that, had theſe fines been diſtributed among ſuch ſufferers, the preſbyterian miniſters would have had no ſmall ſhare, and many who were fined muſt have been exempted. Beſides, how could perſons be fined without ever being brought to any trial? but this was a period where little juſtice or equity was to be ſeen. We ſhall afterwards hear with what ſeverity theſe fines were exacted, though the weſt and ſouth of Scotland were already ſufficiently drained by the army.

This was a time of trouble, the faithful of the land were born down like a torrent, and the vileſt men were exalted; and therefore, in ſuch a time as this preſbyterian miniſters, and others, uſed frequently to meet together for prayer in private houſes, but, at the inſtigation of the biſhops and their underlings, who could not bear the prayers of God's people, the council, upon the 23d of February, made an act, ordering the magiſtrates of Edinburgh to cauſe ſearch be made concerning the keeping of any private meetings and conventicles within the city, by the miniſters deprived by the Glaſgow act, whom they call late miniſters; and that they acquaint the lord chancellor with what they diſcover, and the perſons names, that order may be taken about the ſame.

And as a farther proof of their vigilance this way, upon the 1ſt of March they paſſed another act, whereby after narrating, 'That they had conſidered ſeveral accuſations exhibited againſt Mr William Gordon of Earlſtoun, for keeping of private meetings and conventicles, contrary to the laws and acts of parliament, with his own judicial confeſſion that he had been at three ſeveral conventicles, where Mr Gabriel Semple, a depoſed miniſter, did preach, viz. one in Corſack wood, and the other two in the wood of Airds, at all which there were great numbers of people; and that he did hear Mr Robert Paton, a depoſed miniſter, expound a text of Scripture, and perform other acts of worſhip in his mother's houſe, and that Mr Thomas Thomſon, another depoſed miniſter, ſter, did lecture in his own houſe to his family on the ſabbath-day; and, that, being required to enact himſelf to abſtain from all ſuch meetings in time coming, and to live peaceably and orderly conform to law, he refuſed to do the ſame. They did therefore order the ſaid Mr William Gordon of Earlſtoun to be baniſhed, and to depart forth of the kingdom within a month—and not return under pain of death, and that he enact himſelf to live peaceably and orderly during the ſaid month, under the pain of ten thouſand pounds, or otherways to enter his perſon in priſon.'

What times muſt theſe be, when a worthy gentleman had ſuch an act made againſt him for hearing preſbyterian miniſters!

Some time in the month of March died that learned and ſingularly pious Mr James Wood late principal of the college of St. Andrews, Sharp thought proper to viſit him, once or twice upon his death bed, and then induſtriouſly ſpread a report, that Mr Wood being within the views of eternity, expreſſed himſelf concerning church-government as a matter of indifferency, and that he was as much for epiſcopacy as preſbytery. Mr Wood coming to the knowlege thereof, thought himſelf bound in conſcience to leave a public teſtimony againſt this falſe and malicious ſlander. In his teſtimony, dated the 2d of March 1664, he declared, that, 'he looked upon the preſbyterian government as the ordinance of God, appointed by Jeſus Chriſt for governing and ordering his viſible church; that he never had the leaſt change of thought about the neceſſity of it, nor of the neceſſity of the uſe of it; and he declared before God and the world, that he ſtill ſo accounted of it—and that, if he was to live, he would account it his glory to ſeal this word of his teſtimony with his blood; and of this his declaration he took God, angels and men, for his witneſſes.' And ſubſcribed the ſame in preſence of Mr William Tullidaff miniſter of Dumbog, Mr John Carſtairs his brother-in-law, and Mr John Pitcairn the writer.

When this teſtimony was publiſhed the archbiſhop was ſo nettled, that he ordered thoſe who were preſent to be ſummoned before the high-commiſſion, alledging and even publicly reporting, that the notary told to himſelf, that, when Mr Wood was exceeding weak, Mr Carſtairs, having formed the above paper, had impoſed upon, and got him to ſubſcribe it.

But when Mr Tullidaff and the notary came before the commiſſion, they both declared that Mr Wood dictated the teſtimony (of which I have given an exact copy) and that the notary wrote it at his deſire, and atteſted it as was his office to do. Thus the primate once more, got the lie to his face. After theſe two laſt had continued for ſome time in priſon, the biſhop was forced to diſmiſs them without any further puniſhment, having ſhewn his malice and been proved a ſpreader of lying calumnies upon thoſe more righteous than himſelf.

Mr Carſtairs, for ſome reaſons, thought proper to abſcond; only, that his conduct might not be conſtructed as the effect of diſloyalty, he wrote a letter to the chancellor, wherein he excuſed his not appearing before the commiſſion; and declared that none perſuaded Mr Wood to emit this teſtimony, that it was his own motion, that he dictated every word of it, and that, more than once, in converſation he declared his ſentiments, as to Presbyterian government, more fully than in the teſtimony itſelf; ſo that, upon the whole, Mr Wood was vindicated from the falſe aſperſions of the primate.

The high commiſſion court ſhould have aſſembled on the firſt Wedneſday of March; but it does not appear that they ſat down before the 15th of April, when they entered upon buſineſs. Though very few inſtances of the iniquous proceedings of this diſmal court can be given, yet the following are ſufficient to ſhew their unprecedented cruelty and injuſtice.

Among their firſt proceedings they ordered Mr Wood's teſtimony to be burnt, and ſome miniſters acceſſory thereunto to be put in priſon, and the weſt-country gentlemen, who refuſed to give full conformity to the then church-government, to be fined in the fourth part of their yearly income. But it is proper to give the reader ſome particular inſtances of the hardſhips ſeverals endured.

Mr James Hamilton of Aikenhead, near Glaſgow, was ſummoned before them, though nothing could be alledged againſt him, only that he did not hear Mr Hay, curate in Cathcart; a man moſt rigorous in exacting his ſtipend, particularly upon Aikenhead's tenants, which occaſioned a ſquabble between the curate and ſome of them, from whom Mr Blair, the Presbyterian miniſter of the place, protected him, and got him in a ſolemn manner, to promiſe not to delate any of them. But Hay, contrary to his promiſe, went to Glaſgow and accuſed them to the biſhop, who immediately ordered Sir James Turner, with a party of ſoldiers, to go and apprehend ſome of them, whereof and of the curates cruelty and prevarication, Aikenhead being informed, he would never after own him as a miniſter, eſpecially as he was never called to that congregation.

When this gentleman was brought before the commiſſion, he was fined in a fourth part of his yearly rent; and when he afterwards was before them, he frankly owned that he neither did nor would hear that incumbent; and gave the court ſuch a diſtinct account of Hay's conduct, that the archbiſhop of Glaſgow promiſed he ſhould be removed: but the commiſſion urging this gentleman to engage to ſubmit to and hear his ſucceſſor, he told them, he thought it ſoon enough to engage, when he had heard him, and knew who he was; and peremptorily refuſed all ſuch previous contracts; whereupon he was fined in another fourth part of his yearly rent, and remitted to the archbiſhop of Glaſgow to give him ſatisfaction as to his loyal and peacable behaviour.

But the biſhop it ſeems, not being ſatisfied, he was again brought before this court and was charged with keeping up the ſeſſion book of Cathcart, and the meetings of the church, refuſing to aſſiſt the miniſter in ſeſſion when called, and ſuffering ſome of his family to abſent from the church. As to the firſt part of his accuſation, he offered to declare his innocence upon oath. But when the earl of Rothes required him to teſtify his loyalty, by taking the oath appointed by law, upon his refuſing the ſupremacy in the oath, and to become ſurety for all his tenants, that they ſhould attend the ordinances and live regularly, the court fined him in 300 l. ſterling, and ordered him to priſon till he paid it, and then to tranſport himſelf to the town of Inverneſs, being above 100 miles from his own houſe, and to remain there under confinement during pleaſure. He paid the half of his fine, and his eſtate was ſequeſtered for the reſt, and in three weeks he preſented himſelf to the magiſtrates of Inverneſs, where he continued about a year and a half, till his confinement was taken off. He was not long at home till he was confined to his own houſe, and a mile round it, for ſix months: and, before that time was elapſed he was one day carried in priſoner to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, without any reaſon aſſigned, and remained there nineteen weeks; at length, by the payment of 80 guineas he got out.

Another inſtance of the wicked ſeverity of this court appears in the caſe of Mr John Porterfield of Douchall in the ſhire of Renfrew. The reaſon why this gentleman was brought before the commiſſion, was his not hearing the curate of Kilmacolm, where his houſe and eſtate lay. He told them that he could not hear the curate, becauſe he had abuſed him with groundleſs, baſe, and injurious reproaches. The court looking upon this as a ſufficient defence, admitted him to bring in evidences; but the very firſt witneſs atteſted all, nay, more than what had been alledged: the court immediately interrupted the examination, and required Porterfield to take the oath of allegiance; which he refuſing to do, without ſome ſalvo as to the clauſe of ſupremacy therein, they immediately fined him in the ſum of 500l. ſterling, ordered his eſtate to be ſequeſtrated till payment ſhould be made, and confined him to the town of Elgin, in the ſhire of Moray, where he continued about four years. Reflections upon this are needleſs, as here the reader cannot but ſee the height of injuſtice, becauſe the examination of witneſſes was interrupted, a fine was impoſed for mere non-conformity, and a gentleman baniſhed purely for conſcience-ſake.

Their proceedings againſt the Rev. Mr Alexander Smith, miniſter at Cowend, may alſo be well worth our notice. His great crime was preaching privately in his own houſe, or, in the ſtyle of that time, for keeping of conconventicles. When this worthy person was before them, his examination was in a very odd manner interrupted; for, in answering several questions proposed to him by archbishop Sharp, he calling him only Sir, and not My lord, the earl of Rothes asked him, if he knew to whom he was speaking? Mr Smith replied, Yes, my lord, I do; I speak to Mr James Sharp, once a fellow minister with myself. This was reckoned such a very high crime, that, without any farther enquiry into the affair of conventicles, Mr Smith was ordered to be laid in irons, and cast into that nasty place commonly called The thieves hole, where he had for his company a poor furious distracted man. And, to use the words of the author of the memoirs of the church of Scotland, 'here the godly minister lay in danger of being destroyed by the poor demented wretch, who every moment threatened to kill him; but God, who stopped the mouths of Daniel's lions, restrained him, so as he hurt him not.' He continued for some time in that dismal place, until the kindness and respect of the people of Edinburgh made the bishops ashamed of this unaccountable step. He was therefore removed to another room in the prison, where, through cold and other hardships, he fell sick, and was in danger of his life; yet such was their cruelty that he could not get a few days liberty from prison. The author of the foresaid memoirs says, That these merciful judges hearing, that, by the grate of the thieves hole which looked to the street, he was relieved and comforted by the charity and compassion of many good people in the city, they were threatened for relieving him; and at length he was carried to a place called The iron house, in the same prison, where none could come near him. After some time, by another sentence, he was banished to one of the isles of Shetland, where he continued many years in a wretched starving condition; for this is the coldest and wildest of all the Scots islands; and, as the author just now mentioned adds, here his only relief as to this world, was the society of other blessed sufferers who were banished thither for the same good cause.

The treatment of some of the parishioners of Ancrum is not to be omitted. When their excellent minister Mr Livingstone was taken from them, one Mr James Scot, who was under the sentence of excommunication, was pretended to that charge. On the day fixed for his settlement several people did meet together to oppose it; and particularly a country woman, desiring to speak with him, in order to dissuade him from intruding himself upon a reclaiming people, pulled him by the cloke, intreating him to hear her a little; whereupon he turned, and beat her with his staff. This provoked two or three boys to throw a few stones, which neither touched him nor any of his company. However, it was presently looked upon as a treasonable tumult, and therefore the sheriff and justices of the peace in that bounds fined and imprisoned some of these people, which, one would think, might atone for a crime of this nature. But the high commission not thinking that sufficient, ordered those criminals to be brought before them. Accordingly the four boys and this woman, with two brothers of hers of the name of Turnbul, were brought prisoners to Edinburgh. The four boys confessed, that, upon Scot's beating the woman, they had thrown each his stone. The commissioner told them that hanging was too good for them. However, the sentence of this merciless court only was, that they should be scourged through the city of Edinburgh, burnt in the face with a hot iron, and then sold as slaves to Barbadoes. The boys endured their punishment like men and Christians, to the admiration of multitudes. The two brothers were banished to Virginia, and the woman was ordered to be whipped through the town of Jedburgh. Burnet, bishop of Glasgow, when applied to that she might be spared lest she should be with child, mildly answered, That he would make them claw the itch out of her shoulders.

Several presbyterian ministers were before them, of whom very imperfect accounts can be given. Mr George Hamilton, afterwards minister at Edinburgh, and some other ministers of Fife, were summoned and discharged from administering the Lord's supper, for the bishops were grieved at the vast numbers that came to partake of that ordinance.

Sir William Cuningham of Cuningham head was before them when they sat at Glasgow; he was obliged to produce his chaplain Mr John Hatridge, who beginning to say, 'My lords, I hope none of you will take it ill that I declare before you some things that are pressures to my conscience.' Sharp interrupted him, saying, What have we to do, Sir, with the pressures of your conscience? Go to the door presently. And as he was removing, he called to him, without ever consulting the court, 'Sir, you are discharged to preach without a licence from the archbishop of Glasgow; and so he was no more called.

In one of their meetings at Edinburgh they fined Mr Walter Pringle of Greenknows in some hundred pounds sterling, for no other reason but because he would not take the oath of allegiance without an explication.

I shall conclude this account with the case of Mr Black, mentioned by the author of the memoirs. This gentleman was charged by the commission with having been at a private meeting for prayer; whether any minister was with them or not was not alledged, neither had they any thing else to accuse him of, nor could they prove his being at that meeting, only they would have him confess, which he declined. Then they required he would declare upon oath who was at the said meeting: and because he said this was against his conscience, and that he would not be accuser of innocent men, he was sentenced to be scourged through the town, which he cheerfully suffered.

From these few instances of the proceedings of this inquisition-court, the reader may form a judgment of their cruelty, and of the sad state of the kingdom under the power of such oppressors. It is no wonder though the records of their proceedings are not to be found in the council registers for a long time. The council ordained letters of horning for the payment of all fines imposed or to be imposed by this judicature. And about the end of this year, Sharp got the power of the high commission court, termed likeways, The commission for church or ecclesiastical affairs, enlarged, by which they had authority to banish, stigmatize, and inflict all kinds of punishment, except death: but it is plain they took upon them all these powers before they received them.

It is now time to give some account of the more remarkable things that occurred during these proceedings of the high commission.

On the 29th of April, the council published an act forbidding to give charity, or make any contribution in favour of suffering ministers and others, who, they pretended, were disaffected to the government; so that now the poor sufferers were not only discharged to meet together, and pray to God in the time of their distress, but all subjects were expressly forbid to relieve them in their extremities.

At the same time the earl of Argyll and the archbishop of Glasgow were added to the council, and took the oaths and their places at that board; and a proclamation was published against that known and celebrated treatise of the great ornament of Scotland, Mr George Buchanan, De jure regni apud Scotos, ordering all persons to deliver what copies they had of the translation of that treatise to the clerk of the council, under the penalty of being prosecuted as seditious persons. But whether it had not been more proper to have ordered an answer to be made to the solid arguments in that dialogue against tyranny and arbitrary government, must be left with the reader.

On the 30th of May, the earl of Glencairn, lord high chancellor of Scotland, departed this life. At his death he earnestly desired to be attended by presbyterian ministers, especially by Mr Douglas, who was then in Fife; and before Mr Ker could be fetched from Haddington, he was speechless. Several other of the noblemen and gentlemen, however hard they were upon the presbyterian ministers in their life, wanted their fellowship when they came to die; which made the duke of York once say, That he believed all Scotsmen, be what they would in their life, were presbyterians at their death. Upon this Sharp, as bishop Burnet informs us, fearing lest the earl of Tweeddale should be advanced to that high post, wrote to Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury, signifying, that upon the disposal of the seals the very being of the church did so absolutely depend, that he begged he would press the king that he (Sharp) might be called up before that post should be disposed of. The king bid Sheldon assure him, he should take special care of that matter, and that there was no occasion for his coming up. However, Sharp ventured to go up, and was coldly received. The king asked him, if he had not received the archbishop's letter. Sharp said he had; but he would chuse rather to venture on his majesty's displeasure, than to see the church ruined—and that so much depended upon the good choice of a chancellor, that he could not answer it to God and the church, if he did not bestir himself in that matter: he knew many spake of himself for that post; but he was so far from that thought, that if his majesty had any such intention, he would rather chuse to be sent to a plantation: he wished that he might be a churchman in heart, but not in habit, who should be raised to that trust. These, says Burnet, were his very words, as the king reported them. However, he went from the king to Sheldon, and pressed him to move the king for himself. Sheldon did so; but his majesty suspecting Sharp to have set him on, asked if that was not the case; and when Sheldon owned it, the king told him what Sharp had said to himself. However, Sheldon prayed the king, that whatever he thought of the man, he would consider the archbishop and the church, which the king assured him he would do. Sheldon told Sharp, that he saw the motion for himself did not take, so he must think of somewhat else. Sharp then proposed that the seals might be put into the hands of the earl of Rothes, till his majesty should pitch upon a proper person, which was readily complied with. However, the great seal was, on the 1st of August, put into the archbishop's hands, till a chancellor should be named, and, about the latter end of the year, Rothes was made keeper of it. His lordship was likewise lord high treasurer, general of the forces by sea and land, and extraordinary lord of the session, commander of his majesty's life guards, and principal collector of the fines. The archbishop of Glasgow was made an extraordinary lord of session. But as these things do not so immediately concern this history, I shall pass them over; for, notwithstanding the alteration of hands, there was little or no change of measures.

On the 8th of June; the head of the noble marquis of Argyll was taken down from the tolbooth early in the morning, and conveyed to his body, and his son continued in favour till his appearance for the protestant religion at the duke of York's parliament.

On the 23d of June, the council sent a party of soldiers to force the parish of Dreghorn to submit to the episcopal minister thrust in upon them, with power to oblige every one to pay twenty pence for every time he should be absent from the church *. The same day the council ordered Mr John Crookshank and Mr Michael Bruce, whom they called Pretended ministers, to be summoned, at the cross of Edinburgh and pier of Leith, to appear before them on the 27th of July next, with power to the officers of the army to apprehend them. These worthy ministers were come from Ireland, and all their crime was preaching the gospel. This was the first time the council used the phrase, Pretended ministers. It does not appear that either of them answered the summons, or were apprehended. We shall afterwards hear of them.

On the 24th of July, that useful, faithful, and zealous servant of Christ, Mr William Guthrie, minister at Fenwick, was ejected. He wrote that excellent little treatise, known by the name of 'The trial of a saving interest in Christ. This worthy person, by the interest of several noblemen, had been sometime overlooked, notwithstanding his plainness and faithfulness in bearing testimony for Christ at that time.

But when Burnet was made archbishop of Glasgow, Mr Guthrie, and the few remaining ministers about him were attacked; as Mr Livingstone at Biggar, Mr Mac-Kail at Bothwel, Mr Gabriel Maxwel at Dundonald, Mr Gabriel Cuningham at Dunlop, Mr Hutchison and Mr William Cathcław at Stewarton.

No intercession could prevail with the bishop to spare Mr Guthrie. The earl of Glencairn, in particular, is said to have spoken to the bishop in his behalf, and received a short answer, which made his lordship say, We have set up these men, and they will trample upon us. Mr Guthrie, finding that he must part with his beloved people, appointed Wednesday the 20th of July to be observed by them as a day of solemn fasting and prayer. He preached from Hos. xiii. 9 'O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself;' from which he faithfully laid before them their and the land's sins; and indeed the place was a Rochin. The Lord's day following being fixed for his ejectment, he intimated that sermon would begin that morning betwixt four and five, and then he preached twice to them from the close of his last text, 'In me is thy help,' and dismissed the people before nine. The reader may easily conjecture what a sorrowful parting this was. But though they would have been ready to sacrifice their all for his sake, he would not permit them to use the least violence.

The archbishop of Glasgow, after dealing with several of his curates to intimate his sentence against Mr Guthrie, at last prevailed upon the curate of Calder, by the promise, as was said, of five pounds sterling, to perform this service. Accordingly, on the day appointed, he came with a party of 12 soldiers to Fenwick church, and, by commission from the archbishop, discharged Mr Guthrie to preach any more there, and declared the church vacant. The holy good man behaved on this occasion, like himself, and treated the soldiers with the utmost civility; but when the curate went to the church, to intimate the bishop's sentence from the pulpit, none came to hear him, except the party he brought with him: a few children, who created him some uneasiness, were driven out by the soldiers.

It was reported that Mr Guthrie, at parting, told the curate he foresaw some evident mark of the Lord's displeasure against him, and exhorted him to prepare for some sudden stroke. Be that as it will, this curate never preached after he left Fenwick; for in a few days he died, in great torment, of an iliac passion, or of a violent and dangerous kind of cholic; his wife and children died in about a year after, and none belonging to him were left. Thus, by the malice of the prelates, this bright and shining light of the west of Scotland was extinguished, and he entered into his Master's joy on the 10th of October next year.

This excellent person had been much afflicted with the gravel during his life, which obliged him, contrary to his inclination, to use some diversion. The last time he was with his cousin Mr James Guthrie, he happened to be melancholy, which made Mr James say, A penny for your thought, cousin. Mr William answered, There is a poor man at the door, give him the penny; which being done, he proceeded, and said, 'I'll tell you, cousin, what I am not only thinking upon, but am sure of it, if I be not under a delusion; and it is this, that the malignants will be your death, and this gravel will be mine; but you will have the advantage of me, for you will die honourably, before many witnesses, with a rope about your neck, and I will die whining upon a pickle straw, and will endure more pain before I rise from your table, than all the pain you will have in your death.' A certain minister observed, that this holy man died a sufferer, for he was deposed by the bishop, but in hope that one day the Lord would deliver Scotland from her thraldom.

Such was the inveteracy of the managers, that, on the 9th of August, the council made an act against selling or printing of the speech which Lord Warristoun delivered at his execution, though there was in it nothing either unreasonable or seditious. Sir Robert Murray of Cameron was by this act empowered to examine all booksellers and others, in order to find out how the said speech came to be printed, and to commit them to prison, as he should see cause: if any was prosecuted upon this act is not known, but this is certain, the bishops continued to persecute the ministers.

Thus, on the 10th of October, the bishop of Dunkeld deposed Mr Andrew Donaldson minister at Dalgety, to which he had been admitted in the year 1664. By the interest of Charles earl of Dunfermline he was favoured beyond many of his brethren; and therefore could not well escape the malice of the prelates at this time. Accordingly, when the earl was called up to London, the primate pushed

* The method of dragooning people to church was no less unknown to the Scots, than disagreeable to the spirit of Christianity, until Sharp and the other prelates introduced it.

ſhed the biſhop of Dunkeld, in whoſe dioceſs Dalgety
, to deprive him. The biſhop therefore wrote to him to attend the preſbyteries under pain of ſuſpenſion; which Mr Donaldſon diſregarded, and continued at his work till the dioceſan meeting in October, when the biſhop depoſed him, and gave him notice of it in a letter, which Mr Wodrow has inſerted at large; and that they might play ſure game, Sharp procured a party to be ſent to eject him, who came to the church on a Lord's day, when the people were aſſembled to hear him; however, for preventing diſturbance, Mr Donaldſon got leave to preach that day alſo, upon promiſing afterwards to withdraw.

But when the earl of Dunfermline got notice of theſe proceedings, he got a warrant from the king reſtoring Mr Donaldſon to Dalgety during his life, which his lordſhip brought down and ſhewed to the primate. The archbiſhop, knowing well how to diſſemble, profeſſed a great regard for the earl, and ſaid, the king muſt be obeyed; but craved, as a favour, that the earl would do nothing for three weeks in it, till he conſidered how to provide for a young man that was juſt ſettled in the pariſh, which his lordſhip yielded to. Mean while Sharp, by his agent at court in the earl's abſence, procured a warrant under the king's hand, and got it down by expreſs, before three weeks were expired, diſcharging all ejected miniſters from returning to their charges; and thus the mitre trick-ed the coronet; for though his lordſhip was vexed, yet he was obliged to ſubmit.

On the 3d of November, William Dobie, a weaver, who had been for ſome time under confinement, was ſet at liberty. And, the ſame day, the Rev. Mr Thomas Wylie, formerly mentioned, preſented a petition to the council, that they would be pleaſed, on account of the bad ſtate of his health, to permit him to reſide with his family in any place of Lothian, being 50 miles from his former charge. With this the council thought proper to comply, upon his giving a new bond for his peaceable behaviour.

The ſame day, Sir John Niſbet's patent to be king's advocate was read, and recorded in council; the former ad vocate, Sir John Fletcher, having been accuſed of bribery, partiality, and other pieces of miſmanagement, and not being able to acquit himſelf ſufficiently, was obliged to reſign.

On the 17th of November, the council iſſued a proclamation, ordering all miniſters, who had been ejected ſince 1661, to retire from Edinburgh within forty eight hours; and not to reſide either there, or in any other place prohibited by act of council 1663, without a proper licence, under the penalty of being impriſoned, and otherways puniſhed as ſeditious perſons. Such were the reſtraints now laid upon miniſters, that they were forbid to pray to God, or get relief from men, or to inſpect the education of their children at ſchools, unleſs they would ſo far own the prelates, as to get a warrant from them. Popiſh prieſts and profeſſed papiſts were entirely at liberty, while ſome of the king's beſt ſubjects durſt not reſide in Edinburgh, or any royal burgh, for no other crime but becauſe they adhered to their principles againſt prelacy.

The people of the Preſbyterian perſuaſion, were every where harraſſed, and the methods mentioned in the laſt chapter were continued. Every day the ſoldiers grew more and more inſolent at the churches where any old Preſbyterian miniſters ventured to continue. And through the weſt and ſouth of Scotland multitudes of families were diſperſed, the ſoldiers acting much in the ſame manner there, as the French dragoons did ſome years after among the Proteſtants of that kingdom. Sir James Turner acted a very ſevere part wherever he went, though I am not able to give particulars.

On the 18th of December, the council made an act a-gainſt Mr John Spreul, late town clerk of Glaſgow, for refuſing to take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, ordering him to oblige himſelf, under the pain of death, to depart out of the kingdom by the firſt of February next, and not to return without licence.

The ſame day the council granted a licence to the Rev.
Mr Alexander Moncrief to come to Edinburgh, and to continue there till the 24th inſtant, about his neceſſary affairs; for ſuch were the times, that, let a miniſter's affairs be ever ſo urgent, he durſt not go to any royal burgh without licence.

After this good man had ſuffered much from one of the heritors of his pariſh, as is related in the Fulfilling of the Scriptures, though his name be not mentioned, and had been diſcharged from his pariſh, &c. people began to reſort to him and hear him preach in his own family; wherefore he was obliged to remove from his houſe, and required to live 20 miles from his charge, and 7 or 8 miles from a biſhop's ſeat, or royal burgh; and after that was conſtrained to retire to a remote place in the Highlands, where he was in a ſurpriſing manner ſupported, and was ſingularly uſeful in the converſion of many.

At length he came with his family to Edinburgh, where he preached for ſeveral years in private. After he was intercommuned, in the year 1675, his houſe and many other places about the city were ſearched for him, but he was wonderfully kept out of their hands. He was much ſolicited, when in theſe hazardous circumſtances, to leave the kingdom, and had an ample call to Londonderry in Ireland; but he always declined to leave his native countey, and, in his pleaſant way, uſed to ſay, That he would ſuffer where he had ſinned, and eſſay to keep poſſeſſion of his Maſter's houſe till he ſhould come again. He left many ſeals of his miniſtry, being a moſt faithful and laborious miniſter. He was mighty in prayer, and had many remarkable turns. He lived till harveſt 1688, and ſo he may be ſaid to have kept poſſeſſion of his Maſter's houſe till he came again.

The year 1665 does not afford ſo many inſtances of cruelty as the former years. The earl of Rothes, who was loaded with places of truſt and power, and was the chief manager in Scotland, under the direction of Lauderdale, was ſcarcely ever ſo ſevere as when in the high commiſſion court, where he did not act like himſelf.

The firſt general calamity that befel the nation this year was the war with the Dutch, which the king entered into in the winter. It does not ly ſo immediately before me to ſpeak of the riſe of this war. It is by this time pretty well known that his majeſty was much under the influence of Lewis XIV. the young king of France, and that it was in concert with him that this war was undertaken. The declaration was dated the 22d of February, but was not publiſhed till the 2d of March; and on the 3d of May a proclamation was iſſued, appointing the 7th day of June to be obſerved as a public faſt, which was complied with by all the Preſbyterian miniſters who as yet kept their churches. Mr James Fergusſon, miniſter at Kilwinning, when intimating this faſt to his people, gave a particular account of the crying ſins of the time as the cauſes of the threatened judgments, which he reduced to this one general, the contempt of the goſpel, which was diſcovered by the rough handling of the meſſengers of Chriſt, the laying many congregations deſolate, contempt of the Sabbath and ordinances, and all kinds of profaneneſs.

Much about the ſame time the peſtilence broke out in England, which increaſed in the city and ſuburbs of London, till eight or ten thouſand died in a week. It was obſerved, in ſeveral papers written at this time, that the appearance of a globe of fire was ſeen above that part of the city where the Solemn League and Covenant was burnt, Whether that be true or not, it is certain the plague broke out there, and very few were left alive in the ſtreet where that open affront had been put upon the oath of God.

It may, perhaps, be thought trifling to obſerve, with my author, that ſeveral remarkable ſigns did preceed and accompany the peſtilence, ſuch as the appearance of a large comet in the end of the laſt year, and of another in the month of March this year, together with ſuch a violent froſt and ſnow, that there was no plowing from December till the middle of March. How far theſe things were the prognoſtics of ſevere judgments, I ſhall leave to the reader's own conſideration.

The raging of the peſtilence in England, the Dutch war, and ſome other occurrences, a little abated the fury of the managers in Scotland, ſo that ſome ſmall favours were granted to preſbyterian miniſters and gentlemen, and the prelates began to be jealous of ſome of the noblemen as not hearty enough in the interests of the church. Thus, on the 3d of May, Walter Pringle of Greenknows, who had been confined in the jail of Elgin, had his confinement enlarged, by obtaining the liberty of the whole town, and a mile round it, during the council's pleasure; and Mr John Smith minister was permitted to come to Edinburgh for the advice of physicians.

But there happened a little disturbance in the West kirk of Edinburgh, between the parishioners and Mr William Gordon their curate; some of them were put in the thieves hole, and a man and a woman were scourged through the city; and about this time several in Dumfries were imprisoned for not hearing the curates and submitting to prelacy.

Nothing could alter the cruel dispositions of the bishops; and Sharp pretending that the Fanatics, a name of reproach now given to the Presbyterians, would rise and join the Dutch against the king, orders were given for disarming the west and south of Scotland. The violent seizure of their arms, which ensued, was a very great loss to the country. But it does not appear that joining the Dutch was so much as thought of by them; howbeit, the prelates judged themselves to be more secure, and at greater liberty to do what they pleased.

The duke of York sailed with the English fleet in May, and before the Dutch could be ready, alarmed the coasts of Holland. In the beginning of June the two fleets engaged, and the Dutch were overthrown by the English. The duke, seeing it was in vain to continue his pursuits returned to the coasts of England, and after he landed, repaired to Whitehall to receive the acclamations of the court and city of London.

On the 20th of June, the council at Edinburgh published the king's proclamation for a thanksgiving to be observed on the 13th of July, recommending it to the bishops to order the ministers to read the same from their respective pulpits.

The same day Mr John Stirling minister was permitted to come to Edinburgh about his necessary affairs, and afterwards allowed to continue there for his health till the 1st of September. And on the 6th of July Mr John Cameron who had been confined to Lochaber since the year 1662, had his confinement changed to the city of Glasgow, and two miles round.

About this time Mrs Trail, wife of the Rev. Mr Robert Trail, formerly banished and who was now in Holland, was imprisoned for sending and receiving letters from her husband, though they contained nothing but what related to their family affairs.

On the 2d of August a convention of estates met at Edinburgh, in order to raise money for his majesty to support him in his war against the Dutch. Sharp was chosen preses; for it seems this was for the honour of the church, that a bishop should be at the head of the convention.

It may be thought that by this time episcopacy was established in Scotland upon as sure foundations as human laws could go; but care must be taken to perpetuate this to futurity. Accordingly this summer an order was made, appointing that no academical degrees be conferred upon any who would not take the oath of allegiance and supremacy; so that a great many of the most deserving youths of the nation were excluded from their degrees, and the rising generation became gradually disposed to take any the most dubious and self-contradictory oaths that were imposed upon them.

It was a great eye-sore to the bishops that some of the ejected ministers continued to preach openly, especially in the shire of Galloway: wherefore that country was grievously oppressed by Sir James Turner, and the soldiers under his command, at their instigation, and several in the parish of Stewartoun in Airshire were fined and others imprisoned, for hearing a presbyterian minister. Bishop Burnet says, That the whole face of the government looked liker the proceedings of an inquisition than of legal courts, and yet Sharp was never satisfied; to Lord Rothes and he went up to court the first year of the Dutch war. When they waited first on the king, Sharp put him in mind of what he had said at his last parting, that, if matters went not well, none was to blame but either Lauderdale or Rothes: and now he came to tell his majesty, the matters were worse than ever; and he must do the earl of Rothes the justice to say, that he had done his part. This exasperated Lauderdale, who, when Rothes and Sharp withdrew, told the king, he was now accused to his face, but he would quickly let him see what a man Sharp was. Accordingly he followed the archbishop home, and told him, it was the king's pleasure that he should put the accusation with which he had charged him in writing, and that he must either go through with it, else he would charge him with leasing making. All this Lauderdale delivered in such a tone, that the upright prelate fell a trembling and weeping. He protested he meant no harm to him; only was sorry that his friends upon all occasions, were pleading for favour to the Fanatics. Lauderdale told him that would not do; he was not answerable for his friends, except when they acted by directions from him. In short, Lauderdale carried Sharp to the king, where he retracted every thing he had said in so gross a manner, that the king said afterwards, that lord Lauderdale was ill natured to press it so heavily, and force Sharp to give himself the lie in such coarse terms.

The high-commission court was now upon the decline; and though many were summoned before them, yet few obeyed the summons. However, some were obliged to appear, particularly Mr Hugh Peebles minister at Lochwinnoch, in the shire of Renfrew, for preaching one Sabbath night in his own house, to some people who came to hear him. When this worthy person came before them, he used as much freedom as might have provoked them to banish him, had not this inquisition court been on the decline. He told them, he did not know what to make of their court; he could reckon it scarce either civil or ecclesiastiastic; yet, since his majesty's commissioner had commanded him, and self-defence was juris naturalis, he had appeared innocently to defend himself, and to give account of plain matter of fact. He told them, that, ever since he was a minister, he had exercised in his family on Sabbath evenings, and the people who lived near him generally came to hear him. He alledged that the law did not militate at all against this, if the reason of the law be considered. The reason of their law behoved to be either to prevent peoples leaving the public worship which could have no place in this case, or to prevent peoples being alienated from the minister of the congregation, which could have no room either, since there was no minister settled where he lived: and since his preaching to his neighbours, whom he could not exclude from his house, did not thwart with the reason of the law, it could not be said to thwart with the law itself. But all he could say had no effect, the archbishop of Glasgow was resolved to be rid of him; and accordingly he was ordered to leave the west country, and confine himself to the town of Forfar, near 100 miles from where he then lived, and had his estate.

When the high commission did not answer the persecuting designs of the prelates, other measures were fallen upon. Accordingly the prelates gave in groundless suggestions and invendo's against many excellent gentlemen, especially in the west, to such who found means to procure an order from the king to imprison them.

Bishop Burnet says, That his namesake the archbishop of Glasgow, was sent up to possess the king with the apprehensions of a rebellion in the beginning of the Dutch war. He proposed that about twenty of the chief gentlemen of those counties might be secured, and undertook for the peace of the country if they were clapped up. The earls of Argyll, Tweeddale, and Kincardin, were cold in all these things. However, about the beginning of September, the following gentlemen, without the least previous notice, were apprehended by a written order from the commissioner, viz. major-general Robert Montgomery brother to the earl of Eglintoun, Sir William Cuningham of Cuninghamhead, Sir George Maxwell of Nether-Pollock, Sir Hugh Campbell of Cesnock, Sir William Muir of Rowallan, major-general Holborn of Menstrie, Sir George Monro, colonel Robert Halket brother to Sir James Halket of Pitfirren, Sir James Stewart late provost of Edinburgh, Sir John Chiesly of Carsewell, James Dunlop of that ilk, and William Ralstoun of that ilk. Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, and others, were also imprisoned impriſoned about this time. Theſe excellent perſons, when brought to Edinburgh, were, without any accuſation or reaſon given, in a moſt arbitrary manner, impriſoned in the caſtles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dumbarton, and other places, where ſeveral of them lay for many years. This could not but increaſe the peoples hatred at the prelates.

On the 3d of October the council appointed the marquis of Huntley to be educated in the family of Archbiſhop Sharp. We ſhall afterwards find that this nobleman was created duke of Gordon, and lived in the profeſſion of popery; ſo that it would ſeem the primate took but little care of his education; he had ſomething elſe to mind than ſuch a triffle as this.

On the ſame day the council iſſued a proclamation, ordering all perſons who had not paid their fines, according to the act of parliament, to pay them in the manner following, viz. They that live in the ſouth of the water of Eſk, to pay their firſt moiety by the firſt of December, and thoſe on the north ſide by the firſt of February, under the penalties mentioned in the act. It was alſo publiſhed, that all who would take the oath of allegiance, and ſubſcribe the declaration, ſhould be remitted the ſecond moiety. There were ſome other regulations made on the 23d of November, but none were to have any part of their fines remitted unleſs they complied with the terms juſt now mentioned, which no Presbyterian could conſiſtently do: and as there were but few that paid the firſt moiety, Sir James Turner was ſent with an army to levy the ſame by military force, which produced diſmal effects as we ſhall hear.

On the 11th of October, Archbiſhop Burnet, at the diocеſan meeting at Glaſgow, got a ſentence of depoſition paſſed againſt the Rev. Mr Robert Maxwel, miniſter at Monkton, in the presbytery of Ayr, becauſe he refuſed to ſubmit to the biſhop, and baptized and married ſeveral who could not in conſcience favour the curates. He was one of the old miniſters, who had been ſettled before 1649, and having been a grave, pious and uſeful preacher in that place for almoſt 25 years, had juſtly acquired the hearty affections of his people. But there was no continuing among them when the ſentences of this period were executed by an armed force. His ſentence was intimated to him on Saturday 18th of February; next day he preached his farewel ſermon from Eccleſ. v. 4. and had a very moving diſcourſe at his ſorrowful parting with his beloved people.

By this time many of the old miniſters, who had ſeen the church of Scotland in her glory, were got to their reſt, ſeveral of whom died in peace, and in the ſolid hopes of a glorious deliverance to this church. Others of them were haraſſed by the prelates; for in October Mr Matthew Ramſay miniſter at Kilpatrick weſter, in the presbytery of Dumbarton, a perſon of a moſt amiable character, was depoſed by the biſhop in the ſynod of Glaſgow, merely for not attending on the diocеſan ſynods and preſbyteries. For the ſame cauſe Mr Robert Mitchel miniſter at Luſs was ſuſpended, in order to be depoſed next year; and on the 14th of that month, George Porterfield and John Graham, late provoſts of Glaſgow, who had retired to Holland, were ſummoned to appear before the council, and upon their not appearing they were declared rebels and fugitives.

In the beginning of November Rothes the commiſſioner made a tour with a ſplendid retinue to the weſt, and returned to Edinburgh about the end of the month, when ſome more ſevere acts were made againſt presbyterian miniſters, as had been the conſequence of Middleton's circuit ſome years before.

Accordingly on the 7th of December, they made an act againſt all the Presbyterian miniſters, extending even to thoſe who had been ſettled before the year 1649, who had relinquiſhed their miniſtry, or been depoſed by their ordinary, and all ſuch as ſhould hereafter relinquiſh their miniſtry, or be depoſed by their ordinary, commanding them to remove with their families, 20 miles from their reſpective pariſhes, 6 miles from Edinburgh, or any cathedral church, and 3 miles from any royal burgh, and not two of them to reſide together in any one pariſh; and all heritors and others were forbid to give them any countenance in their preaching, or in any part of their miniſterial office.

The ſame day a proclamation was ordered to be publiſhed and printed againſt conventicles, forbidding all meetings for worſhip except thoſe authoriſed by law; and declaring that all found at ſuch meetings ſhould be looked upon as ſeditious perſons, and be puniſhed by fining, confining, and other corporal puniſhments, as the council, or any having his majeſty's commiſſion, ſhould think fit; and farther declaring, that all miniſters that ſhall perform any part of the miniſterial office at ſuch meetings, and all who ſhall encourage them, ſhall be liable to the higheſt pains to be inflicted on ſeditious perſons; and ordering all ſheriffs, ſtewards, magiſtrates, and other officers, to ſearch for ſuch meetings and apprehend every perſon who ſhall be found at them.

In the preamble to this proclamation theſe conventicles are ſaid to be the ordinary ſeminaries of ſeparation and rebellion, and in themſelves reproachful to the king's government eccleſiaſtical and civil. That they were ſeparated from the prelates and their curates is certain; but the reader is to judge whether theſe had not ſeparated from the reformation of the church of Scotland, and given juſt ground to miniſters and people to withdraw from them: and whether it was not the greateſt reproach to the king's government to overturn that very reformation which his majeſty and the moſt of the managers, the primate himſelf not excepted, had ſo ſolemnly ſworn to maintain.

The ſame day an act paſſed in favour of the curates, wherein it was declared, 'That his majeſty with advice of his council, by virtue of his ſupremacy, allows the biſhops to depute ſuch of their curates as they judge qualified to convene for exerciſe, and to aſſiſt in diſcipline, as the biſhops ſhall direct them. But the whole power of eccleſiaſtical cenſure is reſerved to the biſhop, except the parochial rebukes, and he only muſt ſuſpend, deprive or excommunicate.' This was the form of the Prelatical preſbyteries, all flowing from the ſupremacy. They would not call it by the name of a presbytery, and in ſo far they were right; for the members of it were the creatures and the tools of the biſhops, as theſe were of the king. How unlike were theſe to the regular presbyteries that were formerly in this church! might it not now be ſaid, 'How is the gold become dim! how is the moſt fine gold changed!'

The ſame day the council granted a commiſſion for diſcipline, and authoriſed miniſters in each congregation to chuſe proper perſons for this end: of which more in the next chapter. And, at the ſame ſederunt, taking into conſideration, that there were ſeveral priſoners in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, who were willing to be tranſported to Barbadoes, they ordered the magiſtrates to deliver them up to George Hutcheſon, merchant for tranſportation. Theſe were the remains of thoſe who had been impriſoned by the high commiſſion-court; and, conſidering the hardſhips they underwent, it was no wonder though they preferred tranſportation to ſuch a confinement. The next chapter will open a more melancholy ſcene than any that has yet appeared.

CHAP. VII.

Of the conferrence preceeding the riſing at Pentland, of the riſing itſelf, the executions and other conſequences of it, together with ſeveral other tranſactions during the year 1666.

WE have ſeen what cruel and unjuſt oppreſſions the Presbyterians endured during the five preceeding years; how their liberties, both religious and civil were taken away, their miniſters ſcattered, baniſhed, or impriſoned, and the people expoſed to the mercileſs ravages of the army, and all this for maintaining their religious principles; and yet they bore all with ſurpriſing patience, hoping that providence would interpoſe for their relief; and therefore, as one juſtly obſerves, if the poor people, by thoſe inſupportable violences were made deſperate, who can juſtly reflect upon them, when oppreſſion makes a wiſe man mad? But the meaſures purſued this year were ſuch, as if there had had been a formed deſign to force the people into violent meaſures.

We have heard how the council granted a commiſſion for diſcipline, in which the eſtabliſhed miniſters were to make choice of proper perſons to aſſiſt them in the exercise of diſcipline; in caſe of refuſal or delay to acquaint the biſhop; upon his order to ſummon them before the brethren of the exerciſe; and, upon their not appearing, or perſiſting in their refuſal, to tranſmit their names to the council, in order to their being proſecuted according to their demerit, and as the caſe required. They well knew that no real Preſbyterians would ſo far abandon their principles as to incorporate themſelves with the prelates; becauſe that would have been a formal acknowledgment of the hierarchy, which they juſtly looked upon as contrary to the word of God. And ſo this was another deſigned occaſion of ſuffering to many, who choſe that rather that ſinning.

It was common, in this period, firſt to puniſh for what they reckoned criminal, and then to make laws againſt what they had already condemned. Accordingly, even before this commiſſion for diſcipline was granted in the year 1664, ſeveral ſuffered for not aſſiſting the Epiſcopal incumbent, as John Crosbie in Eaſtercotes in the pariſh of Cambuſlang, who was haraſſed from place to place. Robert Hamilton in Spital, in the ſame pariſh, was this year proſecuted on the ſame account: William Alexander and William Baird, in Drips of Carmonnock, were fined in 100 l. each; Jaſper Touch in the pariſh of Kilmarnock, and Andrew Tailor joiner and carpenter there, ſuffered on the ſame account; nay, it was for refuſing compliance with this order, among other things, that the laird of Aikenhead, with ſome other gentlemen, were confined to Inverneſs, Elgin of Moray, and other places at a vaſt diſtance from their own homes. But it is remarkable, that Mr John Paterſon biſhop of Roſs wrote to his ſon, deſiring him to acquaint Sharp, that the weſt country gentlemen confined in Elgin, &c. had done more miſchief by coming north, than they could have done in their own houſes, and begging that they might be recalled, that ſo they might not ſpread their infection farther.—So that the ſufferings of the perſecuted turned to the real prejudice of the cauſe of Prelacy.

As the council's commiſſion for diſcipline, ſo the other proclamations emitted with it, brought great diſtreſs upon the ejected miniſters. Accordingly on the 25th of January, the council directed letters for apprehending and proſecuting the following miniſters, viz. Meſſrs. John Welſh late at Irongray, for preaching every week in the ſaid pariſh and other places, and baptizing ſeveral children; Gabriel Sempill late at Kirkpatrick in the muir, for the like grievous crimes, and for riding through the country in diſguiſe with ſword and piſtols; John Blackader late at Traquair, Robert Archbald late at Dunſcoir, and Alexander Peden, all for preaching and baptizing; John Crookſhank for holding conventicles and keeping by him Buchanan de jure regni apud Scotos, and tranſlating the ſame into Engliſh; Samuel Arnot late at Kirkpatrick-Durham, John Douglas, William Reid and John Wilkie, with John Osburn in Keir, who preſumed to act as an officer, in giving notice to the people of what they called unlawful meetings. Though all theſe were diſaffected to prelacy, yet none of them, as was falſely alledged in the general charge, had either preached or declared againſt the king's authority.

On the firſt of February the council gave orders that the excommunicated Quakers ſhould be perſecuted according to act of parliament, and that the laws againſt the Papiſts ſhould be put in execution; but it is well known that quakers and papiſts ſtill increaſed. The biſhops were only in earneſt to bear down Presbyterians.

Accordingly on the 8th of February, a proclamation was publiſhed againſt a book intitled, An apologetical relation of the particular ſufferings of the faithful miniſters and profeſſors of the church of Scotland ſince Auguſt 1660. This book which was compoſed in Holland by the Rev. Mr John Brown, formerly baniſhed, was ordered to be burnt by the hand of the hangman, in the high-ſtreet of Edinburgh on the 14th of February, and all perſons who had copies of it were commanded to deliver them to the ſheriffs of their reſpective ſhires, or elſe be liable to the payment of 2000 l. Scots money. Nevertheleſs this method did not anſwer their purpoſe; for the people were the more eager in ſeeking after prohibited books. But ſuch was the popiſh and prelatic way of dealing with books which they were not able to anſwer. How vile it was to proſecute any for having that book before the proclamation was exhibited againſt it, muſt be left with the reader; yet, on the ſame 8th of February, the widow of the Rev. Mr James Guthrie, and her daughter Sophia Guthrie, were brought before the council, for no other reaſon but for having the ſaid book, in which Mr Guthrie is fully vindicated; and, upon their refuſing to diſcover the author or from whom they had it, they were ordered to be ſent to Zetland, where they were to be confined during pleaſure, and to be kept priſoners till they ſhould be ſent thither. But, next council day, the members, being ſenſible of the harſhneſs of this ſentence upon a petition from theſe gentlewomen, referred the matter to the commiſſioner.

The ejected miniſters, as yet, for the moſt part, preached only to their own families, and to a few neighbours, who now and then ſtole into their houſes. ſo that, unleſs in a few places in the ſouth, there were but few ſermons preached in the fields. However, the oppreſſions of the people were on the growing hand: and Mr Burnet, archbiſhop of Glaſgow, being now a member of the privy-council, had no ſmall ſhare in the weſt country perſecution. He was a mighty biggot for epiſcopacy, and ordained five or ſix of his curates publicly after the Engliſh pontifical, the better to inure the weſt of Scotland to theſe novelties. He likewiſe grievouſly oppreſſed the city of Glaſgow, ſo that ſome of the greateſt epiſcopalians proteſted againſt his encroachments upon the magiſtrates of that city. He turned out ſeveral preſbyterian miniſters who had been connived at before his acceſſion, ſuch as Mr William Hamilton, miniſter at Glaſford, and others: and his underlings were very aſſiſting to him in his cruelties and oppreſſions.

The hiſtorian Burnet ſays, that many of the epiſcopal clergy of Scotland were much offended at the proceedings of thoſe times, and that he himſelf obſerved the deportment of the biſhops was, in all points, ſo different from what became their function, that he had a more than ordinary zeal kindled within him upon it. They were not only furious againſt all that ſtood out againſt them, but were very remiſs in all the parts of their function.—Whereupon he took a reſolution of drawing up a memorial of the grievances he and the other clergy lay under by the ill conduct of the biſhops—of this he wrote out ſome copies and ſent them to all the biſhops of his acquaintance.—Whereupon he was called before the biſhops, and treated with great ſeverity; for Sharp propoſed that he ſhould be ſummarily depoſed and excommunicated, but none of the reſt would agree to that. — Let the reader judge whether matters were not bad, when a biſhop gives ſuch an account.

In the ſpring, Sir James Turner marched with his ſoldiers to the preſbyterians in the weſt, and laid them under the moſt grievous oppreſſions; and any curate, with two or three of theſe armed apoſtles, fined whom they pleaſed, and made as large exactions as they had a mind, for now the gentleman muſt pay, if his lady, ſervant or tenants did not attend at the pariſh-church; the tenant muſt be oppreſſed if his landlord withdrew, though he and his family attended ever ſo cloſely. The widow, the fatherleſs, the old and infirm were not ſpared, the very poor muſt beg to pay the church fines. The meat was snatched from the mouths of innocent children, and thrown to the dogs; many houſes were quartered upon, and when their proviſion was conſumed, the furniture was either ſold or burnt, ſo that multitudes of poor families were ſcattered and reduced to the utmoſt extremities. Who then can be ſurpriſed, though the biſhops, who were formerly hated for their perjury and immorality, were now the averſion of the people for their cruelty? for all this was by their inſtigation. I muſt refer the reader to Mr Wodrow's appendix, and to the account given in Naphtali, where he will find what prodigious ſums were extorted from the ſouth of Scotland, and what unheard of cruelties were exerciſed towards the poor people. In a few weeks the ſums rates and ſoldiers levied above 50 000 l. Scots from the two ſhires of Galloway and Dumfries.

The parliamentary fines, of which we have ſpoken were exacted with rigour this year; and, in order to this the troopers of the king's guard were ordered to different parts of the country, with a liſt of thoſe from whom they were to exact ſuch and ſuch ſums, and to take free quarters till they had paid the utmoſt farthing. Then they muſt go to Edinburgh, report their diſcharge, and ſatisfy the troopers beſides. This was called riding money, and ſome times the riding money was as much as the fine itſelf to the common ſort of people. No excuſe was ſuſtained, but taking the oath of allegiance and ſubſcribing the declaration; and they who would neither entertain the troopers, nor pay their fines, were immediately dragged to priſon where they lay a conſiderable time at the public charges.

While matters were thus managed the primate repaired to London; and, as the high commiſſion was diſſolved, ſome other method muſt be taken to carry on his wicked deſigns. Accordingly it was propoſed that ſome more forces ſhould be raiſed for ſecuring the quiet of Scotland. Burnet tells us, that, when the king aſked how they ſhould be paid, Sharp very readily ſaid, the money raiſed by fining was not yet diſpoſed of, ſo he propoſed the applying of it to that uſe, which was agreed to; and by this means our managers were baulked in their expectations of dividing the ſpoils among themſelves. Burnet goes on, and ſays, The blame of all this was laid on Sharp, at which they were out of meaſure enraged, and charged him with it. He denied it boldly, But the king publiſhed it ſo openly, that he durſt not contradict him. Many, to whom he denied that he knew any thing of the matter,—affirmed it to the king, and Lauderdale laid before his majeſty ſeveral of his letters which he had wrote to the presbyterians after the king knew he was negotiating for epiſcopacy,—ſo that the king looked on him as one of the worſt of men. And yet we will find he was afterwards repreſented as a ſaint.

In conſequence of the above reſolutions, two regiments of foot, and ſix troops of horſe were raiſed. Thomas Dalziel of Binns was made general, and William Drummond, brother to the lord Madertie, lieutenant general. Theſe, with the guards and the earl of Linlithgow's regiment, made up about 3000 foot, and eight troops of horſe; all were ordered to obey the general, who was a man naturally rude and fierce. This army was to be maintained by the fines collected and to be collected, and the general was to be accountable to the exchequer for every farthing; but, as moſt of theſe fines were otherways diſpoſed of before they came into the general's hands, it was found neceſſary to lay new burdens on the ſubjects for the ſupport of the army: accordingly about the end of the year, a proclamation was iſſued for calling a convention of eſtates to raiſe money for maintaining the ſoldiers in defence of the kingdom. But their ſitting was prevented for ſome time.

On the 8th of June the council paſſed an act forbidding univerſity degrees to be conferred upon any ſtudents who would not take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy: for eccleſiaſtical tyranny is generally accompanied with encroachments on civil liberty.

On the Lord's day, the 2d of September, a moſt dreadful fire began in Pudding lane behind the monument, London, which within three or four days conſumed 89 churches, the city gates, Guildhall, many public ſtructures, hoſpitals, ſchools, libraries, a vaſt number of ſtately edifices, 13200 dwelling houſes, 400 ſtreets; ſo that multitudes of people loſt their eſtates, goods and merchandiſe, and many families, once in flouriſhing circumſtances, were reduced to beggary. From the inſcription about the plinth of the lower pedeſtal of the monument, it appears that the Papiſts were the authors of this fire; for thus they ſay, 'This pillar was ſet up in perpetual remembrance of the moſt dreadful burnings of this proteſtant city, begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the Popiſh faction, in the beginning of September in the year of our Lord 1666, in order to their carrying on their horrid plot for the extirpating the proteſtant religion and old Engliſh liberty and introducing popery and ſlavery.' The parliament being of this perſuaſion, addreſſed the king to iſſue out a proclamation, requiring all popiſh prieſts and jeſuits to depart the kingdom within a month; and appointed a committee, who received evidence of ſome papiſts, who were ſeen throwing fire balls into houſes, and of others who had materials for it in their pockets. This ſad diſaſter produced ſome kind of liberty to the non-conformiſts about the ruinous metropolis, whereas the managers in Scotland continued to oppreſs their fellow ſubjects. Accordingly on the 13th of September the council wrote to the town of Ayr, ſignifying it was their pleaſure that provoſt Cunningham ſhould be continued this year as he was the laſt, and thus they were deprived of their right of election; nay, letters were ſent to each of the royal burghs, ordering them to ſend in to the clerk of the council the declaration appointed by parliament, ſigned by all the members of their town council and magiſtrates ſince the laſt returns were made.

On the 11th of October the council publiſhed a moſt rigorous proclamation, for procuring obedience to eccleſiaſtical authority; by which all maſters were charged to ſee that their ſervants give obedience to all the acts relating to conformity, and keep none in their ſervice but ſuch as did. All heritors are to ſee to their tenants conformity, and abſtain from conventicles, to oblige them to give bond for this effect, and to raiſe horning againſt them upon their refuſal, &c. This proclamation was in conſequence of a letter from the king, at the inſtigation of Sharp. Now by all theſe impoſitions, exactions and terrible encroachments upon every thing that was dear to men and Chriſtians, the ſpirits of many could not miſs being imbittered.

Nevertheleſs the poor people lay under all theſe miſeries for the ſpace of ſeven months and upwards, after Sir James Turner marched to the weſt in the ſpring, and not only diſcovered their patience towards God, but gave a greater teſtimony of their loyalty and ſubmiſſion to the king, than all the fulſom and flattering profeſſions of their enemies.

Sir James continued to make terrible havoc in the weſt and ſouth, inſomuch that the country was almoſt ruined, families were diſperſed, and many, both gentlemen and others, were forced to abandon their houſes, and wander from place to place among the moſſes and mountains, to eſcape the ravages of the mercileſs ſoldiers, without having the leaſt thoughts of reſiſtance, or riſing in arms for their own defence; for that which, in a little time, happened at Pentland, was entirely caſual. Thus.

Upon Tueſday the 13th of November, four countrymen, refreſhing themſelves in Darly a ſmall country village in Galloway, were informed that three or four ſoldiers had ſeized a poor old man, and brought him to his own houſe, where they were going to ſtrip him naked, and ſet him upon a red-hot grid-iron, and uſing other unheard of cruelties. Whereupon they immediately repaired to the houſe, and begged the ſoldiers to let the poor man alone; but, they, inſtead of complying with this humane deſire, attacked the countrymen, who got the better, diſarmed the ſoldiers, and thereby relieved their fellow ſufferer; and leſt the other ſoldiers in the pariſh, who were about twelve in number, ſhould fall upon them, they were joined that ſame night by ſeven or eight acquaintances, and, next morning early, ſurpriſed the party of ſoldiers, who all laid down their arms, except one who was killed in making reſiſtance.

The country upon this was alarmed, and being juſtly apprehenſive of the reprifals which Sir James Turner would make, they reſolved to ſtand upon their own defence the beſt way they could. Accordingly the laird of Barſcob, and ſome other gentlemen in the neighbourhood, joined the countrymen, and getting together about fifty horſe and a few foot, without loſs of time, went to Dumfries on the 15th of November, where they ſurpriſed Sir James, took him priſoner, and diſarmed his ſoldiers, without hurting any of them except one who was wounded. This being done, they went to the market croſs, and publicly drank the king's health and proſperity to his government.

This was the beginning of the inſurrection this year, and therefore it is falſe to pretend that it was in concert with the whigs in England, or the republicans in Holland, ſuch a correſpondence, as my author obſerves, not being practicable, conſidering the circumſtances above related. Rapin juſtly obſerves, that it may eaſily be judged that the Preſbyterians in England) would not have been ſpared if they could have been proved guilty, conſidering how the government ſtood affected towards them. Neither was this the effect of any previous conſultation with their miniſters, as biſhop Burnet intimates; ſo that he ſays, without any ground or proof, that Meſſrs. Sempill, Maxwell, Welſh, and Guthrie, were the chief incendiaries. The reader is to judge whether the informations Burnet had from the perſecutors, or thoſe of the ſufferers themſelves are moſt to be depended upon.

Steven Irvine, one of the magiſtrates of Dumfries, informed the council, on the 16th of November, of an inſurrection by a conſiderable number of armed men, particularly that he ſaw—Neilſon of Corſock, MacLellan of Barſcob, Mr Alexander Robertſon a miniſter's ſon—MacCartney of Blaiket, and James Callum glover in Dumfries, among them.

This news ſtruck a panic into the prelates and managers at Edinburgh, who immediately diſpatched an expreſs to court, The earl of Rothes had gone for London a day or two before the affair at Durly; ſo that the expreſs reached the king before his lordſhip, who was quite ſurpriſed when his majeſty told him of this horrible conſpiracy as the council termed it. At the ſame time the council wrote to the neighbouring noblemen to exert themſelves in maintaining the peace, and to concur with and ſupport the forces. Next day they ordered general Dalziel, with as many of the forces as could be got together, to march to Glaſgow; and from thence to the place where he ſhould find the inſurrection come to any head. After they had taken care to ſecure the metropolis and given orders to ſeveral of the nobility to contribute to their aſſiſtance by coming in with their men in arms. On the 21ſt they iſſued a proclamation againſt the rebels in arms in the weſt, commanding and charging them to deſiſt from their rebellion, lay down their arms, and ſurrender their perſons to the lieutenant general, or ſome other of the king's officers or magiſtrates, within 24 hours after this publication; and diſcharging all perſons from aiding, aſſiſting, reſetting, harbouring, or keeping any correſpondence with the rebels, or any of them, under the pain of treaſon.

This proclamation contained no promiſe of indemnity ſo that, upon the matter, it was commanding people to come to the ſcaffold, and requiring them to ſubmit to the ſeverities of the prelates, who were the fountain of all their miſeries Beſides 24 hours after the date of the proclamation was ſo ſhort a time, that it would be elapſed before it could reach them in Galloway; ſo that it was not poſſible for them to comply with the terms of it: biſhop Burnet therefore was miſinformed, in ſaying that the general publiſhed a proclamation of pardon to all who ſhould in 24 hours time return to their houſes.

After thoſe who were in arms had ſeized Sir James Turner, and were determined to defend themſelves, their firſt care was to increaſe their numbers, and get all the aſſiſtance they could from their friends: but ſeveral whom they hoped would have joined them thought it convenient to remain quiet. However they were joined by colonel Wallace, Mr John Welſh, Mr Robertſon and others. When they were got to Ochiltree, Mr John Guthrie miniſter at Tarbolton, came to them with ſome from that pariſh; Mr Gabriel Sempill preached to them, and here they moddeled themſelves, choſe their own officers, and held their firſt council of war, where, after prayer, they reſolved to march eaſtward to Edinburgh. When they were got to Douglas, after debating upon that important queſtion, whether they ſhould diſperſe or continue in arms, it was reſolved upon the latter believing that God was able to ſave by few as well as by many; and if, their deſign ſhould miſcarry, they had this for their comfort, that they had engaged in the cauſe of religion and liberty, and were now willing to die as ſacrifices to theſe. They alſo reſolved to carry Sir James Turner along with them; and though it was propoſed to take away his life, yet they ſpared him, becauſe it is ſaid, they found, that, notwithſtanding all the cruelties he had uſed, he had received orders from the biſhops, and others, for a great deal more than he had done. They alſo unanimouſly reſolved to renew the covenants.

Accordingly on Sabbath morning they marched for Lanerk, to which they came at night. In the way, Knockbreck's two ſons, with ſome few from Galloway, overtook them, and ſignified that no more were to be expected from the ſouth; and here their number where the largeſt being judged to be near three thouſand: however, one who was among them, ſays, 'When we came to Lanerk, I know not if we were much above fifteen hundred horſe and foot; ſeveral indeed were daily joining us.'

This night they gave intimation that they intended next day, being the 26th of November, to renew the covenant at that place. In the morning they were alarmed with the news that general Dalziel was within a few miles of them; whereupon ſome were for poſtponing the renewing of the covenants, but the motion was rejected. And therefore, after they had ſent out ſome parties, and placed proper guards, they began the ſolemn work. And as they could not, together with the townſmen and the people in the adjacent country, meet all in one place, they ſeparated into two companies. The foot aſſembled in the high ſtreet of Lanerk, to whom Mr John Guthrie miniſter at Tarbolton preached a ſermon ſuitable to the occaſion. After which he read the covenants, to every article of which, with their hands lifted up to heaven, they engaged with great ſolemnity and devotion. The horſemen met at the head of the town; Mr Gabriel Sempill and Mr John Crookſhank preached to them After ſermon the covenants were read and ſworn, as above. It is likely it was about this time that the principal perſons among them drew up and agreed to the following ſhort manifeſto or declaration, for preſent uſe, with a view to draw up a larger one afterwards; neither month nor day is mentioned.

Declaration of thoſe in arms for the Covenant 1666.

'THE nature of religion doth ſufficiently teach and all men almoſt acknowledge the lawfulneſs of ſelf-defence; yet we thought it our duty, at this time, to give an account unto the world of the occaſion and deſign of our being together in arms, ſince the rife and ſcope of actions, if faulty, may render a thing right, upon the matter ſignified.

'It is known to all, that the king's majeſty, at his coronation, did engage to rule the nation according to the revealed will of God in Scripture, to proſecute the ends of the national and ſolemn league and covenant, and fully to eſtabliſh the presbyterian government, with the directory for worſhip, and to approve all acts of parliament eſtabliſhing the ſame; and thereupon the nobility and others of his ſubjects did ſwear allegiance, and to religion was committed unto him as a matter of truſt, ſecured by moſt ſolemn indenture betwixt him and his people.

Notwithſtanding all this, it is ſoon ordered that the covenant be burnt, that the tye of it is declared void and null, and men forced to ſubſcribe a declaration contrary to it; epiſcopal government in its height of tyranny is eſtabliſhed, and men obliged by law not to plead, witneſs or petition againſt thoſe things; grievous fines, ſudden impriſonments, vaſt quarterings of ſoldiers, and a cruel inquiſition by the high commiſſion court, were the reward of all ſuch who could not comply with the government by lordly hierarcy, and abjure the covenants, and prove more monſtrous, to the waſting their conſcience, than nature would have ſuffered heathens to be. Thoſe things, in part, have been all Scotland over, but chiefly in the poor country of Galloway at this day; and, had not God prevented, it ſhould have in the ſame meaſures undoubtedly befallen the reſt of the nation ere long.

'The juſt ſenſe whereof made us chuſe rather to betake ourſelves to the fields for ſelf defence, than to ſtay at home burdened daily with the calamities of others, and tortured with the fears of our own approaching miſery. And conſidering our engagement to aſſiſt and defend all thoſe who entered into this league and covenant with us; and to the end we may be more vigorous in the proſecution of this matter, and all men may know the

the true ſtate of our cauſe, we have entered into the ſolemn league and covenant; and, though it be hardly thought of, renewed the ſame, to the end we may be free of the apoſtacy of our times, and ſaved from the cruel ſnares perſons reſolved to adhere to this have met with; hoping that this will wipe off the reproach that is upon our nation, becauſe of the avowed perjury it lies under. And being fully perſuaded, that this league, however miſrepreſented, contains nothing in it ſinful before God, derogating to the king's juſt authority, the privileges of the parliament, or liberty of the people; but, on the contrary, is the ſureſt bond whereby all theſe are ſecured, ſince a threefold cord is not eaſily broken, as we ſhall make appear in our next and larger declaration, which ſhall contain more fully the proofs of the lawfulneſs of entering into covenant, and neceſſity of our taking arms at this time for the defence of it; with a full and true account of our grief and ſorrow for our ſwerving from it, and ſuffering ourſelves to be divided, to the reproach of our common cauſe, and ſadning the hearts of the godly; a thing we ſorrowfully remember, and firmly reſolve againſt in all time coming.'

Though this paper ſeems to have been made in haſte, in the midſt of many inſurmountable inconveniencies, yet there is nothing in it againſt the king's authority. As for the larger declaration promiſed, it is probable that it was never drawn up, they having been a little after this routed at Pentland.

While they were at Lanark, William Laurie of Blackwood came up to them from duke Hamilton, to prevail with them to lay down their arms; but, as he did not apply to colonel Wallace, or any of their officers, he returned without ſucceſs.

In the afternoon Dalziel with his army were entering Lanark before colonel Wallace, and his men had all left it. The latter marched that night to Bathgate, where, having no accommodation, they renewed their march about midnight, and came, after inexpreſſible fatigue, to the Newbridge in the morning and it was reckoned that they loſt that night near the half of their little army. From thence they marched to Collingtoun, within three miles of Edinburgh.

By this time the king's forces were come to Calder, within five miles of them, and all gentlemen, and others in Edinburgh, who had horſes, were ordered by the council to mount them and march under the command of the marquis of Montroſe to join the general, ſo that they could not have any of their friends to join them; for though a few gentlemen in Renfrew-ſhire had aſſembled a ſmall company of horſemen, about fifty in number, in order to join colonel Wallace yet, hearing that Dalziel was between them and their friends, they thought proper to diſperſe. This ſmall party was commanded by William Muir of Caldwell, and with him were Robert Ker of Kerſland, Caldwell of that ilk, the laird of Ralſton, John Cuningham of Bedland, William Porterfield of Quarreltoun, Alexander Porterfield his brother, &c. together with Mr Gabriel Maxwell miniſter at Dundonald, Mr George Ramſay miniſter at Kilmawers, and Mr John Cuthairs miniſter at Glaſgow. The laird of Blackſtoun was likeways with this party, but was ſo far from being a friend to the cauſe they were appearing for, that, upon hearing of the defeat at Pentland, it is ſaid, that he went to the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, and upon promiſe of pardon, diſcovered and informed againſt the reſt.

But to return to colonel Wallace and his decreaſing army. While on their march to Collingtoun the laird of Blackwood came up again to them, with propoſals from duke Hamilton to lay down their arms, in hopes of an indemnity, which the duke promiſed to endeavour to obtain for them; but the colonel, and they who were with him, diſmiſſed Blackwood without complying with his propoſals. When they got to Collingtoun, and found themſelves diſappointed of any aſſiſtance from their friends about Edinburgh, both their hopes and counſels were at an end. And here Blackwood came a third time, and with him the laird of Barſkimming, to renew the former propoſal, withal ſignifying, that he had obtained the general's word of honour for a ceſſation of arms till next morning, and that he had undertaken as much for them. Upon this colonel Wallace, by appointment, wrote to the general by theſe two gentlemen, repreſenting their grievances, and ſignifying that their deſign was to apply to the council for redreſs, and deſiring a paſs for one of their number that might repreſent their grievances and deſires more fully; concluding with a requeſt that Blackwood might return with the general's anſwer as ſoon as poſſible.

But the general inſtead of returning any anſwer, ſent the letter directly to the council; and notwithſtanding the aſſurances given of a ceſſation of arms, marched his army ſtreight towards them. Colonel Wallace and his men reſolved upon the beſt retreat they could, and from Collingtoun they marched to the Houſe of the Muir, and from thence to Rullion green near Pentland hills, where they drew up the diſpirited remains of their army, not exceeding nine hundred men, ſpent and fatigued. They had no deſign of fighting, but were ſtill in hopes of a peaceable concluſion from Blackwood's negotiation.

They were ſcarce formed in this manner, when an alarm came that a body of horſe was approaching them; they found it was Dalziel's van, which had cut through the ridge of Pentland hills, and came upon them undiſcovered, till they were within a quarter of a mile, upon a hill over againſt them. Colonel Wallace upon this ſent captain Arnot, who repulſed lieutenant-general Drummond, who was ſent by the general with a ſelect party to begin the attack. Here Mr John Crookſhank and Mr Andrew MacCormock, two miniſters come from Ireland, were both killed. When the lieutenant general was driven back, there was no ſmall confuſion among Dalziel's army, of whom not a few threw down their arms. Major Learmont made the ſecond attack, and repulſed the enemy; duke Hamilton narrowly eſcaping. The laſt encounter was after ſunſet, when the general's foot, flanked with their horſe upon all hands, overpowered the colonel's little army, and compleatly routed them. There were ſome more than fifty of the colonel's men killed, and as many taken priſoners. The two miniſters, and others who had loſt their lives in this action, were buried at Rullion green. There was afterwards a ſtone put on their grave, with an inſcription, which the reader will find in the Cloud of Witneſſes; ſeveral of Dalziel's army were wounded, but few of them killed.

After this action the people in the adjacent pariſhes were very cruel to the flying army, many of whom they killed, and others they took priſoners. Colonel Wallace and Mr John Welch fled north: the former got ſafe to Holland, where he lived ſeveral years. We ſhall meet with the latter afterwards. Thus was this body of good people diſperſed and routed upon the 28th of November 1666, and an end put to this riſing, which by their enemies was termed A Rebellion, A Horrible Conſpiracy, and what not; though they always proteſted, that their only deſign was to preſent their grievances, and bear a teſtimony for their God and their country, for their religion and liberty.

The day after the engagement the council wrote to the king, giving him an account of the ſuppreſſing of the rebellion; in which, among other things, they ſay, 'Many of them are priſoners, againſt whom there ſhall be ſpeedy proceedings—but although this rabble be totally diſſipated for the time, yet we conceive ourſelves obliged, in the diſcharge of our duty, to repreſent unto your majeſty, that thoſe principles, which are pretended as the ground of this rebellion, are ſo rooted in many ſeveral places through the kingdom, and there be ſuch juſt grounds of apprehenſions of danger from perſons diſaffected to your majeſty's government, as it is now eſtabliſhed by law, as will require more vigorous application for ſuch an extirpation of it, as may ſecure the peace of the kingdom, and due obedience to the laws. And we ſhall not be wanting in any thing in our power; and your majeſty's commands ſhall be obeyed by

Your majeſty's moſt, &c.
ST. ANDREWS, &c.

Though this ſmall handful was provoked to riſe in arms, great care was taken, not only to brand the whole body of Preſbyterians as rebels and traitors, but alſo to prevent any any of thoſe who had been in the engagement from making their eſcape. On the 30th of November the lord treaſurer was appointed by the council to ſecure the goods and rents of all who had been at Pentland. After all this, it is eaſy to imagine that the hardſhips of theſe poor people muſt have been exceeding great. Beſides theſe who, having eſcaped from the field of battle, were moſt cruelly murdered by the country people, multitudes were forced for many years to lurk and conceal themſelves, and undergo intolerable difficulties.

On the 1ſt of December the council gave orders to general Dalziel to ſearch for and apprehend all perſons and their horſes, who have been in arms with the rebels or are ſuſpected, ſince or before their defeat, or who have reſet, and been aiding to them, and to intromit with their goods, and require him to quarter upon their lands with his forces; and duke Hamilton was appointed to ſeize all ſuch in Lanerk-ſhire.'

On the 4th of December a very ſevere proclamation was publiſhed, in which all and every one of the ſubjects were ſtrictly charged not to harbour, reſet, ſupply, or correſpond, hide, or conceal the perſons of colonel James Wallace, major Learmont —Maxwel of Moncrief younger.—MacLellan of Barſcob,—Gordon of Barbreck,—MacLelland of Balmaghan,—Cannon of Barnſhalloch younger,—Cannon of Barlay younger —Cannon of Mordrogget younger,—Welſh of Skar,—Welſh of Cornley,—Gordon of Garery in Kells, Robert Chalmer brother to Gadgirth, Henry Grier in Balmaclellan, David Scot in Irongray, John and William Gordons, John MacNaught, Robert and Gilbert Cannons, all in Midtoun of Daliy;—Gordon of Barelder in Kirkpatrick-Durham, Patrick MacNaught in Cumnock, and his ſon John,—Gordon of Holm younger,—Dempſter of Curridow, — of Dargoner. — of Sandiwal —Ramſay in the Mains of Arniſtoun. John Hutcheon in Newbottle,—Rew chaplain to Scotſtarbet, Patrick Liſtoun in Calder, and his ſon William, James Wilkie in the Mains of Cliftounhall, the laird of Caldwell, the goodman of Caldwell, the laird of Kerſland, the laird of Bedland Cuningham,—Porterfield of Quarreltoun, his brother Alexander, — Lockhart of Wickettſhaw,—Trail ſon to Mr Robert Trail, David Poe in Pokelly. and Meſſ Gabriel Semple, John Semple, John Guthrie, John Welſh, Samuel Arnot, James Smith, Alexander Peden. —Orr, William Veiten, —Patton, — Crookſhank, Gabriel Maxwel, John Carſtairs, James Mitchel, William Forſyth, or any others who concurred or joined in the late rebellion; but that they purſue, apprehend, and deliver them up to juſtice, otherways to be eſteemed and puniſhed as favourers of it. My author was informed, that ſeveral of the perſons above named were no ways concerned in the riſing. Mr John Crookſhank was killed in the action, ſo that none could be in hazard of correſponding with him. And as the John Semple named among the miniſters, might be miſtaken for one Mr John Semple miniſter at Carſphairn, who was noways concerned, he was obliged to crave redreſs, which was granted.

The ſame day, the council deſired the archbiſhops to order the biſhops in their reſpective ſees to oblige all the miniſters in their ſeveral dioceſes to give in a liſt of the names of ejected miniſters, with the places of their reſidence, and in what manner any of them have tranſgreſſed againſt the act of Auguſt 13 1663.

But to come to the caſe of the priſoners taken at this time. The victory was celebrated with almoſt as many guns from the caſtle as there were men ſlain in the field. The priſoners, about fifty in number, who were taken in the action, were brought in by the ſoldiers to Edinburgh, and the country people brought in about thirty more. Theſe were all crouded together in a place near the tolbooth, called Haddow's hole, now one of the churches of the city. When that worthy old miniſter Mr Arthur Murray, who lived in the ſuburbs, opened his window, and ſaw Dalziel's army marching with their banners diſplayed, and heard the ſhouts of the ſoldiers triumphing over the priſoners, he was ſo oppreſſed with grief, that he took his bed immediately, and died in about two days after.

Biſhop Burnet ſays, That the beſt of the epiſcopal clergy ſet upon the biſhops to lay hold on this opportunity for regaining the affections of the country, by becoming interceſſors for the priſoners, and the country, that was like to be quartered upon and eaten up for the favour they expreſſed to them; and that many of the biſhops went into this, particularly that Wiſheart biſhop of Edinburgh ſhewed a very Chriſtian diſpoſition at this time, by ſending every day ſupplies to the priſoners, which was likewiſe done by almoſt the whole town.—But Sharp, ſays Burnet could not be mollified; on the contrary, he encouraged the miniſters in the diſſaffected counties to bring in all the informations they could gather againſt the priſoners, and all who had been among them, that they might be ſought for and proceeded againſt.—And that the miniſters, in theſe parts, acted ſo unbecoming a part, that the averſion of the country to them was increaſed to all poſſible degrees. They looked on them as wolves, and not as ſhepherds. There is one thing more that my author aſſerts, upon good information, viz. that after ſeveral of the priſoners were condemned, and a few executed, a letter came down from the king diſcharging the taking any more lives. This letter came to Sarp as preſident of the council, who kept it up till as many as he had a mind ſhould die. Biſhop Burnet ſays, That Mr MacKail's death, of which we ſhall hear, was the more cried out on, becauſe it came to be known afterwards, that archbiſhop Burnet of Glaſgow, who had come down before his execution, had brought with him a letter from the king, in which he approved of all that they had done; but added, that he thought there was blood enough ſhed, and therefore ordered that ſuch of the priſoners as ſhould promiſe to obey the laws for the future ſhould be ſet at liberty, and that the incorrigible ſhould be ſent to the plantations. Notwithſtanding, Burnet let the execution go on, before he produced his letter. But I am apt to believe, if Burnet brought this letter from the king, he deliverd it into the hands of Sharp, who wickedly and baſely concealed it; but however this was, it appears the king was more humane than the biſhops.

On the ſame 4th of December the council ordered the king's advocate to proſecute eleven of the priſoners for high treaſon, viz. major John MacCulloch, captain Andrew Arnot brother to the laird of Lochbridge, Thomas Paterſon merchant in Glaſgow, John Gordon of Knockbreck, and his brother Robert, John Parker in Beſtie, Gavin Hamilton, James Hamilton in Kilmuir, John Roſs in Manchlin John Shields in Titwood, and Chriſtopher Strang. They likewiſe appointed Sir John Hume of Renton juſtice-clerk, and Mr William Murray advocate, juſtice-depute. to be their judges, and allowed four advocates to plead for them. On the ſame day the judges ſat down for form's ſake, heard the advocates plead a little, and very quickly pronounced ſentence, that they ſhould be all hanged at the market croſs on Friday the 7th of December; their heads and right arms to be cut off, and diſpoſed of as the council ſhould ſee fit. The council, the day before the execution, met, and ordered that the heads of major MacCulloch, John and Robert Gordon, be ſet up at Kirkcudbright; John Parker, Gavin and James Hamiltons, and Chriſtopher Strang, at Hamilton; John Roſs and John Shields at Kilmarnock; and captain Arnot's at the watergate; and the right hands of the above mentioned perſons were ordered to be affixed on the public ports of the town of Lanerk, being the place where they took the covenant. Thomas Paterſon received ſentence of death along with the reſt, but his dying of his wounds prevented the execution. The curious reader may ſee the whole proceſs againſt theſe excellent perſons in Mr Wodrow's appendix to book ſecond, Vol. I. No. 3.

Theſe ten were accordingly executed on the 7th of December. Biſhop Burnet ſays true, That it was a moving ſight to ſee ten of the priſoners hanged upon one gibbet at Edinburgh, eſpecially if we conſider that they were taken upon quarter, and ſolemn parole to have their lives ſpared, as was argued at their trial. In their joint teſtimony, which, together with the dying ſpeeches of ſome of them, are in Naphtali, they ſay, 'We are condemned by men, and eſteemed by many as rebels againſt the king whoſe authority we acknowlege. But this is our rejoicing, the teſtimony of our conſcience, that we ſuffer not as as evil-doers, but for righteouſneſs, for the word of God and the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, and particularly for our renewing the covenant, and, in purſuance thereof, for preſerving and defending of ourſelves by arms againſt the uſurpation and inſupportable tyranny of the prelates, &c. It is ſaid that when Knockbreck and his brother were turned off the ladder, they claſped one another in their arms, and thus endured the pangs of death.

Their heads and right arms were diſpoſed of according to the above order of council. The heads of John Parker, Gavin and James Hamiltons, and Chriſtopher Strang, were afterwards buried in the church yard of Hamilton, and a grave-ſtone was put on them, with an inſcription recorded in the Cloud of Witneſſes.

Great were the hardſhips which ſome of the families of theſe martyrs were brought to; for inſtance, major Mac Culloch, before Pentland, had ſeveral ſoldiers quartered upon him for thirty days, and, beſides their entertainment, had eight pence a day to pay to each of them, over and above 100 l. of fine to Sir James Turner. He payed likewiſe his whole parliamentary fine 1665, conſiſting of 1200 merks, together with 300 merks of riding money to the ſoldiers who enacted it. His eſtate lay under forfeiture from Pentland to the revolution. After Pentland, one Charles Campbell, without any warrant, ſeized a horſe and cloaths from his ſon William, who was not in the leaſt concerned in the riſing, to the value of 13 l. ſterling. His eldeſt ſon was kept a whole year in priſon after his father's execution, only becauſe he was his ſon. And in the year 1681, his lady had thoſe lands forfeited in which ſhe was happily infeft when her huſband ſuffered.

The haraſſings and loſſes of the family of Gordon of Knockbreck cannot be expreſſed; for beſides their parliamentary fine, and their common loſſes, with others in Galloway, by Sir James Turner, in a little after Pentland their whole crop for that year was ſeized, and their houſehold furniture diſpoſed of and deſtroyed; ſix ſoldiers were quartered upon the houſe from the 6th of March to the 9th of July; near 400 l. of ceſs and other impoſitions were levied from them and their tenants. In 1648. captain Strachan and his troop ſeized upon and deſtroyed their whole houſhold-furniture; next year Glenlyon, with near 200 Highlanders ſtayed at Knockbreck from Thurſday to Monday, conſumed and took along with them all the victuals they could find, broke the windows, and took the horſes to bear away the ſpoil; and, laſt of all, cruel Lagg came with a party, plundered the houſe, and was with difficulty prevented from ſetting it on fire. From theſe the reader may form a judgment of the calamities that befel the families of thoſe who ſuffered at this time.

The laſt execution being over, other five of the priſoners were proſecuted for high treaſon, and condemned to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 14th of December. The judges did not, it ſeems, now give themſelves the trouble of hearing advocates, but made ſhorter work, and went upon their own confeſſion; and the council, being weary of diſpoſing heads and arms, ordered the magiſtrates of Edinburgh to fix their heads where they thought fit, and to bury their bodies in the common place. Their names are as follows, viz. Mr Alexander Robertſon preacher of the goſpel, (who was betrayed by his friend the laird of Mortoun, to whom he ſurrendered upon promiſe of his life, and whom he expreſsly forgave at his death) John Neilſon of Corſack, George Crawford in Cumnock, John Gordon in the pariſh of Irongray, and John Lindſay in Edinburgh; the laſt named was reſpited, but the reſt were all executed at the time and place appointed. The ſpeeches of the firſt three are in Naphtali, where, with their laſt breath, they refuſed that their riſing was rebellion: they all acknowleged the king's juſt authority; particularly George Crawford ſaid, 'That which moved me to come along with theſe men, was their perſuaſion and my deſire to help them, (which, with a ſafe conſcience I could not well refuſe) who, being tyrannically oppreſſed by the prelates and their dependents and upholders, and ſeeing no other way was left to be taken, took up arms for their own defence. And if this be rebellion, I leave it to the great God the ſupreme judge to diſcern; for, in my weak judgment, I found it warrantable from the word of God, and without prejudice of the king's authority, (which I pray God to direct and guide in the right ways of the Lord, and to make him proſper therein, ſo that he may be ſurely ſet in his kingdom, having him whom no enemy can reſiſt to defend him) ſeeing there was nothing intended by us againſt his or any others juſt and lawful authority,' &c. He was ſo pleaſed to die, that he preſſed to be up the ladder, and when upon the top of it triumphed in Chriſt.

John Neilſon of Corſack a gentleman of excellent parts, was ſingled out to greater ſufferings than any of his fellow ſufferers. When Sir James Turner came firſt into Galloway, Mr Dalgliesh the curate of Parton delated Corſack for non-conformity; whereupon Sir James exacted 400 l. Scots from him, and, contrary to promiſe, ſent him priſoner to Kirkcudbright. After this, by the quartering of ſoldiers, which Sir James ſent upon him, he ſuſtained the loſs of above 1973 l. Scots. By theſe hardſhips he was oblig'd to leave his houſe, and wander from place to place. During his wandering he loſt his horſe worth 100 l. was himſelf apprehended, and for ſome time kept a priſoner. When they had turned his lady and children to the doors, they next fell upon his tenants, obliging them to bring in ſheep, lambs, meal, and malt to them, till they were almoſt ruined. And, laſt of all, they drove all his oxen and black cattle to Glaſgow, and ſold them; and all this for nothing but non conformity. Was it then any wonder that he, and many others in the like circumſtances, embraced the firſt opportunity to complain of, and relieve themſelves, if poſſible, from ſuch dreadful oppreſſions? But while attempting this he was taken at Pentland, and carried priſoner to Edinburgh. Sir James Turner uſed his intereſt to get his life ſpared, becauſe Corſack ſaved Sir James, when ſome moved to have cut him off, though none ſuffered more from Sir James than this good man. But the biſhops, at the deſire of Dalgleiſh the curate, prevailed above all the intereſt Sir James could make.

On the 4th of December the council ordered him and Mr Hugh MacKail to be tortured with the boots, (for they put a pair of iron boots cloſe on the leg, and drove wedges between theſe and the leg, until the marrow came out of the bone.) What moved the council to pitch upon theſe two is not known. A conſpiracy was pretended, and by this torture they were examined, in order to force them to make ſome diſcoveries. Corſack was dreadfully tormented ſo that his ſhrieks would have melted the hearts of any except thoſe preſent, who were ſo far from being moved, that they ſtill called for the other touch. Theſe were the times of prelacy!

His lady being in Edinburgh, after his death, Maxwell of Miltoun came to the houſe of Corſack with 30 men, took away every thing they could, and deſtroyed the reſt: nay, they turned the family, in which was a nurſe with a ſucking child, to the open fields. Sometime after this Sir William Bannantyne came, and took an inventary of every thing that was in the houſe, ſeized that year's crop, and arreſted the rents in the tenants hands. And becauſe Arthur M'Gachie in Glenhead, one of his tenants, had converſed with him a day or two before Pentland, he, his wife and young child, were carried off priſoners, and kept ſome weeks. Amongſt other hardſhips, lady Corſack had all her moveables ſeized, merely for converſing with her own ſon, who had been intercommuned or outlawed, and paid near 100 l. This family endured many other oppreſſions which I cannot inſert here. And therefore I go on to the proceedings againſt the other priſoners.

On the 5th of December a commiſſion was given to duke Hamilton, the marquis of Montroſe, the earls of Argyll, Linlithgow, Kelly, Galloway, Wigtoun, Nithſdale, Dumfries, Callander, Airly, Annandale, the lords Montgomery and Drumlanerk, the maſter of Cochran, general Dalziel, lieutenant-general Drummond, James Crichton brother to the earl of Dumfries, colonel James Montgomery, Charles Maitland of Haltoun, and Mungo Murray, or any three of them, with juſticiary power to go to any ſhire, burgh, or place, where there was any riſing or inſurrection, and there to hold courts, cite parties, and examine witneſſes, and take all other courſe which they ſhall think fit, for trying and diſcovering all ſuch perſons as were authors, aiders, or abettors of the rebellion &c.

Accordingly, on the 17th of December, the earls of Linlithgow and Wigtoun, the lord Montgomery and Mungo Murray, having conſtituted themſelves in a court at Glaſgow, found Robert Buntine in Fenwick pariſh, John Hart in the pariſh of Glaſford, Robert Scot in Dalſerf, and Matthew Paton ſhoemaker in Newmills, guilty of rebellion and treaſon, and condemned them to be executed at Glaſgow the 19th of December. They behaved in a becoming Chriſtian way, had great peace of conſcience, and died with much joy and comfort.

It was here that vile practice was begun, which turned afterwards common, of beating drums when the ſufferers began to ſpeak to the ſpectators. A plain evidence of an ill cauſe, which cannot bear to ſee the light! The perſecutors were afraid leſt the laſt words of theſe dying martyrs ſhould make deep impreſſion on the hearers, and confirm the faith of thoſe who were well affected to liberty and religion; and indeed, ſuch was the Chriſtian and manly behaviour of theſe noble ſufferers, that few were terrified by their death, and many were convinced of the goodneſs of their cauſe, and fixed in their reſolutions to adhere to it.

Upon the 18th of December the juſtice clerk and juſtice depute condemned Mr Hugh MacKail, Thomas Lenox, Humphrey Colquhon, Ralph Shields an Engliſh man, clothier in Air, William Peden merchant there, John Wodrow merchant in Glaſgow, Robert MacMillan, John Wilſon in the pariſh of Kilmawers, and Mungo Caipo in Evandale, to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 22d of December. Three of theſe, viz. Robert MacMillan, William Peden, and Thomas Lenox, together with John Lindſay formerly reſpited, got off, either on account of their making ſome partial compliances, or perhaps the reaſon was the king's letter formerly mentioned, wherein he declared he would have no more lives taken; the reſt were all executed, and died with Chriſtian reſolution and courage.

John Wodrow merchant in Glaſgow, in his teſtimony and letter to his wife, was obſerved to exceed one of his education and circumſtances; the reader will find both in Naphtali; he concludes his letter to his wife in theſe words, 'And now I give you and my four children unto the Lord, and commit you to him as your covenanted God and huſband, and my childrens covenanted father. I ſay no more, but either ſtudy to be indeed a ſincere Chriſtian, and a ſeeker of his face in ſincerity, or elſe you will be nothing at all. I recommend you and your young ones to him who is God all ſufficient, and aboundeth in mercy and love to them that love him and keep his covenant. The bleſſing of the covenant be upon you; ſo fare you well. So ſaith your loving and dying huſband,' &c. Humphrey Colquhon ſpoke not like an ordinary townſman, but like one in the ſuburbs of heaven, related his Chriſtian experiences, called for his Bible from one of his friends, laid it on his wounded arm, and ſpoke to the admiration of all that heard him. John Wilſon began his ſpeech with theſe remarkable words, 'Good people and ſpectators, I am here condemned to die upon alledged rebellion againſt the king and his authority, which God knoweth I never intended; for, in my judgment, a man's endeavouring to extirpate perjured prelates and abjured prelacy, according as he is bound by oath in a ſworn covenant, may very well ſtand with a man's loyalty to king and country; for I am ſure the king and his ſubjects may be happy, yea, more happy in the extirpation of prelates and prelacy, than in their ſtanding; yea, the throne ſhall not be eſtabliſhed in peace, until that wicked plant be plucked up by the roots, which hath ſo much waſted and made deſolate the Lord's vineyard. For my part, I pray that the Lord may bleſs our king with bleſſings from heaven, and make him a friend to the intereſt of Chriſt, as the beſt way for the ſtanding of his throne to many generations: and I pray for all that are in authority under his majeſty, that the Lord may not lay to their charge the innocent blood of his ſaints which they have ſhed,' &c. There was likewiſe ſomething very moving and affecting in the laſt teſtimony of Ralph Shields on this occaſion, in which he not only declared his reſpect for authority, as the ordinance of God, appointed for the puniſhment of evil doers, and his ſincere wiſhes for his majeſty's welfare, but likewiſe the encouragement he had in ſuffering at this time for the cauſe of Chriſt; and ſpeaking concerning his native country, for which he could not but have a real affection, he expreſſed himſelf thus, 'O that it were the happineſs of my nation of England, once to ſubject themſelves to the ſweet yoke of Chriſt's reformed government, under which this nation of Scotland hath enjoyed ſo much of the power and life of the goſpel, by a faithful miniſtry, according to the covenant ſworn by them both,' &c.

But as the circumſtances of Mr MacKail's ſufferings at this time are more ſingular, I muſt be excuſed for giving the particular relation ther of recorded in Naphtali.

Mr Hugh MacKail having finiſhed his ſtudies at the univerſity of Edinburgh, and under the care of his uncle of the ſame name, was licenſed by the preſbytery of Edinburgh 1661, being then 20 years of age. He was ſometime chaplain to Sir James Stewart of Kirkfield. All his public performances met with univerſal acceptance, until the 21ſt of September 1662, when he preached his laſt public ſermon in the great church of Edinburgh, from Song i. 7. in which, ſpeaking of the many and great perſecutions that had befallen the church, he ſaid, among other things, 'That the church and people of God had been perſecuted by a Pharaoh upon the throne, a Haman in the ſtate, and a Judas in the church.' And though he made no application, yet the caſes of Haman and Judas appeared to the conviction of his adverſaries to have ſuch a reſemblance to the condition of the rulers of the ſtate and church at that time, particularly of Lauderdale and Sharp, that, a few days after, a party of horſe was ſent to apprehend him, but he happily eſcaped, retired to his father's houſe, and ſoon after went abroad, where he accompliſhed himſelf in his ſtudies for a few years.

When he came home he was the more qualified to be the object of the prelates ſpite and malice. At laſt he occaſionally joined thoſe who roſe in arms in Galloway, and continued among them a little time, till Tueſday the 27th of November, when, not being able to endure the fatigues of conſtant marching, he left them near the new bridge upon Crammond water, and was taken by ſome country men as he was paſſing through a place called Braid's Craigs.

When he was brought to Edinburgh, he was carried firſt to the council-houſe, and, after being ſearched for letters, and none being found, was committed to the tolbooth.

Next day, by order of council, he was examined before the earl of Dumfries, lord Sinclair, Sir Robert Murray of Prieſtfield, and others; but he waved the queſtion, and refuſed to ſign any thing they wrote, becauſe he conceived he was not obliged to be his own accuſer. On the 29th he gave in a declaration under his own hand, teſtifying that he had been with the weſt-land forces, with whom he occaſionally met, and that he reſolved to have withdrawn from them upon the firſt opportunity, which he was about to do when he was taken, without either offering to fly or reſiſt, which he deſired the council to rather to believe, becauſe he had told ſo much to William Laurie of Blackwood: but though Blackwood owned this to be truth, yet the council, ſuſpecting Mr MacKail to have been a contriver of the inſurrection, and privy to all their deſigns, importuned him to be ingenuous in declaring who were the ringleaders of their late riſing, and what correſpondence they had either at home or abroad. And, in order to extort ſuch a confeſſion, on Monday the 3d of December the boots were laid before him on the council table, and they gave him to know, that if he did not confeſs he ſhould be tortured with them to morrow.

Accordingly, on Tueſday December the 4th, he was again brought before the council, and, after the torture of John Neilſon of Corſack, of which we have heard, he was again examined by the earl of Rothes, the marquis of Montroſe, and ſeveral others; and, being urged to confeſs, he ſolemnly declared that he knew no more than he had already confeſſed; whereupon they ordered the executioner ſooner to put his leg into the boot, and proceed to the torture. He received ten or eleven ſtrokes, with conſiderable intervals, to the extraordinary compreſſion of fleſh, ſinews and bones, all which he endured with a moſt Chriſtian patience. Before he got the laſt three ſtrokes he proteſted ſolemnly, in the ſight of God, that he could ſay no more, though all the joints of his body were in as great torture as that poor leg.

On the 10th of December he and other ſeven received their indictments of treaſon, and were ſummoned to appear before the juſtices on the 12th. But, his torture and cloſe impriſonment having thrown him into a fever, he was not able to make his appearance, and therefore, on December the 11th, he gave in a petition to the lords of council, begging a reſpite, ſince he was neither able to walk nor ſtand, and ſeeing his acceſſion to the crimes with which he was charged was ſo very ſlender, being only ſimple preſence, and that too but occaſional, which was mitigated by his purpoſe and actually coming off from them. Together with his petition there was preſented an atteſtation under the hand of ſeven ſurgeons, declaring his weak and ſickly condition; whereupon the council ordered two phyſicians and two ſurgeons, viz. Sir Robert Cuningham, doctor Hay, James Borthwick, and Thomas Kincaid, to viſit him, and return their atteſtation, upon ſoul and conſcience, to the juſtices, by 10 o'clock next day. They were alſo to give in their atteſtation concerning other three indicted with him.

But as their atteſtation did not bear ſoul and conſcience, and the phyſicians refuſing to rectify it in theſe terms, though they declared they could confirm the truth of it by their oath, the juſtices poſtponed their proceedings againſt Mr MacKail and the other two, but appointed John Neilſon of Corſack, though alſo contained in the meſtation, with other four, to be brought to the bar, when they were condemned to be hanged on the Friday following.

Mr MacKail was brought before the juſtices on the 18th, with the other three who were arraigned with him; and being permitted to ſpeak after the indictment was read, he declared, among other things, that he was not aſhamed to own, that he was one of that afflicted and perſecuted party and perſuaſion called Preſbyterian. Then he ſpoke of the ties and engagements that were upon the land to God, and having commended the inſtitution, dignity, and bleſſing of Preſbyterian government, he ſaid, that the laſt words of the National Covenant had always great weight upon his ſpirit. Whereupon the king's advocate interrupted him, and deſired he would forbear that diſcourſe, ſince he was not called in queſtion for his perſuaſion, but for the crime of rebellion, in riſing in arms againſt his majeſty's authority. To this Mr MacKail replied, that he was moved to ſpeak in the manner he had done, from that weighty and important ſaying of our Lord Jeſus, 'Whoſoever ſhall confeſs me before men, him ſhall the Son of man confeſs before the angels of God: but he that denieth me and my words before men, ſhall be denied before the angels of God.' As for rebellion, he ſaid, his acceſſion was only ſimple preſence with a ſword, and that occaſional. The advocate replied, that not only preſence, ſuch as he was charged with, was treaſonable, but all incommuning or keeping company with rebels, though for half an hour only.

Though they could prove no more againſt him than what he had owned, yet the jury brought him in guilty, and he was condemned to be hanged at the market croſs of Edinburgh, December 22d, with ſeveral others. When he received his ſentence, he cheerfully ſaid, 'The Lord giveth life, and the Lord taketh, bleſſed be the name of the Lord.' And as he was carried back to the tolbooth, he ſaid to the lamenting people, 'Though men cut us off, God will receive us; truſt in God, truſt in God.

Being returned to priſon he immediately ſpent ſome time in prayer, for himſelf and thoſe condemned with him, with great fervency and enlargement. Being afterwards aſked how his leg was that had been tortured, he anſwered with cheerfulneſs, 'The fear of my neck now maketh me forget my leg.' After that he ſaid to another friend, 'O how good news, to be within four days journey to enjoy the ſight of Jeſus Chriſt!' and proteſted he was not ſo cumbered how to die, as he had been ſometimes to preach a ſermon. His father got liberty to ſee him, and their meeting was very affecting.

On the 20th of December, to ſatisfy the importunity of his friends, he gave in to the privy council the following petition.

'That whereas upon Tueſday laſt, I was indicted and condemned for the treaſonable deeds contained in the general and ſpecial indictment, exhibited againſt me; in the which ſpecial indictment containing my whole acceſſion to the ſaid crimes, there is only libelled preſence in ſeveral places, with an ordinary ſword, likeas my own confeſſion, which is the naked truth, doth declare how the ſame was occaſional; and ſeeing that it was alſo in ſome ſort purged and retracted by my withdrawing and deſerting with the firſt conveniency, whereby not only my caſe appears to be different from that of others, but, alſo as favourable as poſſibly can be, next to innocence itſelf, as appeared to many of thoſe gentlemen who were upon my aſſize; and, ſeeing the torture I ſuſtained, and the ingenuity I then uſed, as in the ſight of God to the utmoſt of my knowledge, deſerve that favour that was at that time inſinuated: and that it is expected that his majeſty, whoſe mercy I beg, according to his great clemency and the moſt uſual practice in the like caſes, will interpoſe his mercy for the reſcue of many who are equally with me involved; may it therefore pleaſe your lordſhips, graciouſly to conſider the premiſes, and to pardon my great raſhneſs and precipitancy, and therefore to indulge ſuch a reprival as your lordſhips ſhall think convenient, until his majeſty's gracious pleaſure anent the premiſes ſhall be fully known, at leaſt till the commiſſioners grace do return. And your, &c.'

N. B. The words in Italick characters were inſerted without his knowledge, when the petition was tranſcribed by his friends: however, the petition was rejected, and all the intereſt made was to no effect.

The laſt night of his life, being Friday, December the 21ſt he propoſed and anſwered ſome queſtions. As 1. 'How ſhould he, going from the tolbooth through a multitude of gazing people and guards of ſoldiers to a ſcaffold and gibbet, overcome the impreſſion of all theſe?' To which he anſwered. 1. By conceiving a deeper impreſſion of a multitude of angels who are alſo onlookers; according to that, "We are a gazing ſtock to the world, angels and men; for the angels, rejoicing at our good confeſſion, are preſent to convey and carry our ſouls, as the ſoul of Lazarus, into Abraham's boſom, not to receive them, for that is Jeſus Chriſt's work alone, who will welcome them to heaven himſelf, with the ſongs of angels and bleſſed ſpirits; but the angels are miniſtring ſpirits, always ready to ſerve and ſtrengthen all dying believers. 2. As Stephen ſaw the heavens opened, and Jeſus ſtanding at the right hand of God, who then ſaid, Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit, ſo, ſaid he, do I believe, that Jeſus Chriſt is alſo ready to receive his dying ſufferers.' II. He enquired, 'What is the way for us to conceive of heaven, who are haſtening to it, ſince the word ſays, "Eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard &c." To this he anſwered, The Scripture helps us theſe two ways. 1. By way of ſimilitudes, as Rev. xxi. When heaven is held forth by a repreſentation of a glorious city there deſcribed; but in the ſame place it is alſo termed the bride. But O how unlike are theſe two, a bride and a city! which ſhews the inſufficiency and vaſt diſproportion of all ſuch ſimilitudes. And therefore he added, 2. That the Scripture furniſheth yet a more excellent way to conceive of heaven, viz. by conceiving the love of Chriſt to us, even the breadth and length, the depth, height and immenſeneſs of that love of Chriſt, which paſſeth knowlege, and which is alſo the higheſt and ſweeteſt motive of praiſe unto him that loved us, &c. and by holding forth the love of the ſaints to Chriſt, and teaching us to love him in ſincerity, which is the very joy and exultation of heaven, Rev. v. 12. "Worthy is the lamb, that was ſlain, to receive power and riches, and wiſdom, and ſtrength, and honour, and glory, and bleſſing." And no other thing but the ſoul breathing forth love to Jeſus Chriſt can rightly apprehend the joys of heaven.'

He went to bed a little after eleven, and, riſing about five five in the morning, he called his companion John Wodrow, and ſaid pleaſantly, Up, John; you are too long in bed; you and I look not like men going this day to be hanged, ſince we ly ſo long. He ſpent his time moſt comfortably in prayer and edifying diſcourſe. His father coming to him that morning, his laſt words after prayer and a little talk, were, 'That his ſufferings would do more hurt to the prelates, and would be more edifying to God's people, than if he were to continue in the miniſtry for 20 years.' And then he deſired his father to leave him, elſe he would trouble him. And, ſaid he, I deſire it of you, as the beſt and laſt ſervice, to go to your chamber and pray earneſtly to the Lord to be with me on that ſcaffold: for how to carry there is my care, even that I may be ſtrengthened to endure to the end.

About two o'clock he and his five fellow-ſufferers were carried to the ſcaffold: his countenance was moſt pleaſant and ſerene. When at the foot of the ladder, he directed his ſpeech northward to the multitude, who heard him with great attention. His ſpeech is printed in Naphtali, in which, among other things, he ſaid, that he heartily acknowledged his fainting in the day of trial, and in endeavouring to conceal his joining with thoſe who roſe in arms in their own defence; and farther expreſſed himſelf, 'Although I be judged and condemned as a rebel amongſt men, yet I hope, even in order to this action, to be accepted as loyal before God. Nay, there can be no greater act of loyalty to the king, as the times now go, than for every man to do his utmoſt for the extirpation of that abominable plant prelacy, which is the bane of the throne and of the country, which, if it be not done, the throne ſhall never be eſtabliſhed in righteouſneſs, until theſe wicked be removed from before it. Sure I am, theſe, who are now condemned as rebels againſt him, by them, are ſuch as have ſpent much time in prayer for him, and do more ſincerely wiſh his ſtanding, and have endeavoured it more by this late action, ſo much condemned, than the prelates by condemning them to death.

Having done ſpeaking to the people, he ſung a part of Pſalm xxxi. and then prayed with ſuch power and fervency, as drew tears from many. When taking hold of the ladder to go up, he ſaid, with a loud voice, I care no more to go up this ladder, and over it, than if I were going home to my father's houſe. And hearing a noiſe among the people, as he was going up, he called down to his fellow-ſufferers, ſaying, Friends and fellow-ſufferers' every ſtep of this ladder is a degree nearer heaven. Then, having ſeated himſelf upon it, he ſaid, I do partly believe that the nobles, counſellors and rulers of the land, would have uſed ſome mitigation of this puniſhment, had they not been inſtigated by the prelates, ſo our blood lies principally at the prelates door. But this is my comfort now, that 'I know my Redeemer liveth, and that he ſhall ſtand at, &c.' And now I willingly lay down my life for the truth and cauſe of God, the covenants and work of Reformation, which were once counted the glory of this nation; and it was for endeavouring to defend this, and to extirpate the bitter root of prelacy, that I embrace this rope (the executioner putting the rope about his neck.) Then hearing the people weep, he ſaid, Your work is not to weep, but to pray, that we may be honourably born through, and bleſſed be the Lord that ſupports me,— 'And that you may know the ground of my encouragment in this work, and what my hope is, I will read the laſt chapter of the Bible.' Which having done, he ſaid, 'Here you ſee the glory that it to be revealed upon me; a pure river of water of life, &c. where the throne of God is, and the lamb is in it, where his ſervants ſerve him, and ſee his face, and his name is in their foreheads, and the Lord God giveth them light, and they ſhall reign for ever, and ever; and here you ſee my acceſs to my glory and reward. "Let him that is a-thirſt come: and whoſoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." And here you ſee alſo my welcome, "The ſpirit and the bride ſay, Come." Then he ſaid, 'I have one word more to ſay to my friends, (looking down to the ſcaffold) where are you? You need neither lament me nor be aſhamed of me in this condition; for I may make uſe of that expreſſion of Chriſt, "I go to your Father and my Father, to your God and my God, to your king and my king, to the bleſſed apoſtles and martyrs, and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jeruſalem to an innumerable company of angels, to the general aſſembly and church of the firſt born, and to God the judge of all, and to the ſpirits of juſt men made perfect, and to Jeſus the mediator of the new covenant. And ſo I bid you all farewel, for God will be more comfortable to you than I could be, and he will alſo now be more refreſhing to me than you can be: Farewel, farewel in the Lord.' Then, the napkin being put over his face, he prayed a little within himſelf; after which he put up the cloath, ſaying he had one word more to ſay, in order to ſhew them the comfort he had in his death. And thus he ſaid, 'I hope you perceived no alteration or diſcouragement in my countenance and carriage; and as it may be your wonder, ſo I profeſs it is a wonder to myſelf; but I will tell you the reaſon of it. Beſides the juſtneſs of my cauſe, this is my comfort which was ſaid of Lazarus when he died, that the angels did carry his ſoul into Abraham's boſom; ſo that, as there is a great ſolemnity here, of a confluence of people, a ſcaffold, a gallows, and people looking out at windows; ſo there is a greater and more ſolemn preparation in heaven, of angels to carry my ſoul to Chriſt's boſom.' And, after ſpeaking a little to the ſame purpoſe, he concludes thus: 'And now I leave off to ſpeak any more to creatures, and turn my ſpeech to thee, O Lord! and now I begin my intercourſe with God, which ſhall never be broken off. Farewel father and mother, friends and relations; farewel the world and all delights; farewel meat and drink; farewel ſun, moon, and ſtars: Welcome God and Father; welcome ſweet Jeſus the mediator of the new covenant; welcome bleſſed Spirit of grace and God of all conſolation: welcome glory, welcome eternal life, welcome death.' Then he deſired the executioner not to turn him over till he ſhould put his own ſhoulders over firſt, which within a little he did, ſaying, 'O Lord, into thy hands I commit my ſpirit; for thou haſt redeemed my ſoul, Lord God of truth.'

I cannot but here inſert a paragraph of an Engliſh hiſtorian, in which he ſays, were the compleat hiſtorians ſenſible of the pathetic and ſublime in eloquence, they would own there is nothing like it (viz. the laſt words of this martyr, from farewel, &c.) in whatever they have ſeen of antiquity; and it being a ſuffering miniſter's dying words, adds a truth to the beauty, which cannot be met with in profane learning. This, adds he, is one of the covenant martyrs, which the Scots curates gave over to damnation, though I doubt not every good Chriſtian after reading the divine exultation of Mr MacKail will be ready to ſay to them, 'Be my portion with this good man, and take ye your lot with one another.'

Thus died Mr Hugh M'Kail, a youth of about 26 years of age, ſingularly pious, and of no ſmall ſhare of learning. He had ſeen the world. Never was a death more lamented; for, among all the ſpectators, there was ſcarcely an eye that did not run down with tears. It is ſaid, that he uſed to faſt one day in the week, and had frequently before this ſignified to his friends the impreſſion he had of his dying in this manner. His ſhare in the riſing was known to be ſmall. And when he ſpake of his comfort and joy in death, heavy were the groans of thoſe who were preſent.

Lord Rothes, the commiſſioner, being come from court reſolved upon a progreſs through the weſt and ſouth, that he might come at the bottom of ſome imaginary conſpiracy and plot; but no diſcoveries could be made. He came firſt to Glaſgow, and from thence to the town of Ayr, with a committee of noblemen and others, who were veſted with a juſticiary power.

Accordingly the earl of Kelly, lieutenant-general Drummond, Charles Maitland of Haltoun, and James Crighton brother to the earl of Dumfries, ſat down in judgment at Ayr on the 24th of December, two days after the execution of Mr MacKail. Twelve more of the priſoners were brought before them, who were found guilty of treaſon, and ordered to be executed at Ayr, Irvine, and Dumfries.

Thurſday the 27th of December was appointed for the exe-execution of James Smith, Alexander Mac Millan, James MacMillan, George MacCartney, John Short, John Graham, John Muirhead and Cornelius Anderſon, at the town of Ayr. But the executioner, being unwilling to embrue his hands in the blood of theſe men, got out of the way. And the provoſt not being able to find one that would undertake the hateful work, propoſed that one of the eight ſhould have his life on condition of executing the other ſeven. Accordingly, in the morning, the magiſtrates went to priſon and laid the propoſal before the priſoners. Upon which Cornelius Anderſon ſaid, if the reſt would forgive him he would do it. They anſwered if he did it they ſhould wiſh him repentance and forgiveneſs. He was kept intoxicate till the execution was over. When he came off the gibbet, the boys and others ſtoned him, out of their own. His conſcience after this troubled him, every one ſhunned him, at laſt he retired to Ireland, where he built a little houſe in ſome common place near Dublin, and there his houſe and he were afterwards burnt to aſhes.

James Blackwood and John MacCoul were executed at Irvine on the 31ſt of December. Some of theſe ſufferers were ignorant, and very much diſcouraged at the near views of eternity; but, by the pains taken by the miniſter Mr Nisbet who viſited them, they died full of joy and courage, to the admiration of all who were preſent. John Grier and William Welſh, the remaining pair of thoſe condemned at Ayr, were executed at Dumfries on Wedneſday the 2d of January 1667. And thus from the 7th of December to the 2d of January, were no leſs than 34 executed out of 40.

The ſteddineſs of William Sutherland, executioner at Irvine, is too remarkable not to be recorded here; for, when the executioner at Ayr deſerted, nothing could prevail with him to ſupply his place.

He came of poor parents in Strathnaver, the wildeſt part of the north highlands, and had no education till after he came to be executioner at Irvine, and then with difficulty he learned to read Engliſh, and took great delight in his Bible; and the more he became acquainted with it, the more he began to ſcruple to execute any, unleſs he was clear they deſerved to die. When he was preſſed to go to Ayr his ſcruples increaſed, becauſe he had heard the priſoners were godly men, perſecuted by the biſhops, whom, ſays he, I never liked ſince I loved my Bible. Theſe words, Heb. iv. 12 made great impreſſion upon him, ſo that he was reſolved not to have a hand in that execution.

He was brought from the church before the Provoſt of Irvine, and, refuſing to go to Ayr, was put in priſon till Monday night, when a ſerjeant with ſix ſoldiers came from thence to fetch him; but ſtill perſiſting in his refuſal, he was remanded to priſon till next morning, when they forced him to go. And, being then brought before the provoſt of Ayr, he continued reſolute to have no hand in executing the priſoners, notwithſtanding all the promiſes that were made him; ſo that he was committed again to priſon.

Upon this one Mr White a curate, came to perſuade him to do his office, ſaying, do not you know that theſe men are guilty of rebellion? and that rebellion is as the ſin of Witchcraft? to which he anſwered, That the rebellion ſpoke of there was Saul's rebellion againſt the immediate command and revealed will of God. In ſhort, he ſo baffled the curate, that, inſtead of anſwering him, he ſaid, Away with thee, the devil is in thee, and thou haſt dealing with familiar ſpirits. To which William replied, If the devil be in me, he is an unnatural devil; for, if he was like the reſt, he would bid me take as many lives as I could, that he might get many ſouls; but the ſpirit that is in me will not ſuffer me to take good men's lives.

He was next brought before the lord Kelly, the provoſt and others; and, after they had threatened and ridiculed him, the boots were called for. Then he ſaid, You may bring the boots and ſpurs too; you ſhall not prevail. They therefore threatened to pour a cruſe full of melted lead upon his hands; but when they ſaw how ready he was to receive it, they were aſtoniſhed. Then lord Kelly tried what wheedling might do; but all proved ineffectual. And, obſerving what pertinent anſwers he gave, the lieutenant general ſaid, tell me, quickly, who learned you theſe anſwers; I perceive you have got a paper from ſome of theſe rebellious miniſters, and have got your anſwers perquire. William ſaid, Not ſo, my lord; but God, that ſaid, 'Fear not; when ye ſhall be brought before kings and rulers, for my ſake, it ſhall be given you in that hour what you ſhall ſay, I will give thee a mouth and wiſdom, that thine adverſaries ſhall not be able to anſwer:' he makes his promiſe good to me. Then ſeveral gentlemen ſaid, Away with him; the devil is in him; he has dealing with familiar ſpirits. To this he ſpoke as to the curate. Then the lieutenant-general ſaid, Tell me, quickly, who put theſe words in your mouth, elſe you ſhall be hanged. To which he replied, 'Even he who made Balaam's aſs to ſpeak, can much more make me a reaſonable creature to ſpeak. It is he that gave me theſe anſwers, and likewiſe forbids me to do this; it is he and no other.' Then lord Kelly ſaid, He thinks no better ſport than to bring ſcripture to confound us with it, but you ſhall rue it when you are going to be hanged. To this he anſwered, If this confound you, you ſhall be better confounded yet; read ye never that chapter, 1 Cor. i. 26. 'How that not many wiſe men after the fleſh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath choſen the fooliſh things of the world to confound the things that are mighty,' &c. Then ſaid Kelly, take the devil out of my ſight, and put him in the narroweſt place of the ſtocks. At the ſame time the provoſt whiſpered him in the ear, and offered to give him 50 dollars, and ſuffer him afterwards to return to the Highlands. But the honeſt man anſwered with a loud voice, 'What, would you have me ſell my conſcience? Where can I fly from God? Remember Jonas fled from God, but the Lord found him out, and ducked him over the lugs; ſo ſhall he me if I go over the light of my conſcience.'

He was put therefore in the ſtocks. Then four ſoldiers were ſent, and having charged their pieces, brought a cap to cover his face, and threatened to ſhoot him; but finding him ſo undaunted as to open his breaſt to receive their fire, one of them ſaid he ſhall not be ſhot, but hanged and given to the dogs. While he was in the ſtocks, where he ſuffered much, ſome aſked him what he thought of the biſhops. His anſwer was, 'I truly think the biſhops take more on them than Chriſt did, who was a better preacher than any of them, for he would not meddle with dividing the inheritance among the brethren.—He being a ſpiritual teacher refuſed to meddle with civil law. But why will our biſhops ſit in parliament, and go in before earls? I am informed they ſit and ride in parliament, and judge in worldly affairs; they have their coaches to ride in, but neither Chriſt nor his apoſtles had them; they are lords over God's heritage; but our Saviour ſays to his miniſters, 'The princes of the Gentiles exerciſe dominion, but it ſhall not be ſo among you, but he that will be the greateſt ſhall be ſervant of all.' The biſhops are like the ſcribes and phariſees, againſt whom the Lord pronounced many a wo. 'Wo be to you ſcribes and phariſees, ye love the chief ſeats in the ſynagogues,' ſo love our biſhops the chief ſeats in parliament.—'Wo be to you ſcribes and phariſees, for you love to wear long robes, and to be called of men, Rabbi.' The biſhops deſire ſide gowns, and a man to bear up their tails too, and they think they never get their right ſtyle, till they be called my lord, and ſome of them your grace: you give grace to a graceleſs face: they oppreſs the poor people to feed their own bellies; for which the Lord pronounces many a wo againſt them.' Then ſaid they, Timothy and Titus were biſhops. To which he replied, they were preaching biſhops, but not biſhops over whole dioceſes. And, as the apoſtles ſays, 1 Tim. iii. 'A biſhop ſhould be blameleſs the huſband of one wife,' ſo I think a preaching biſhop ſhould have but one flock, &c.

Then they aſked what he thought of the king? He ſaid, Would you have me ſpeak treaſon? the king is ſet over us all by God, and all his ſubjects ſhould pray for him, and defend his perſon and government, and obey him in all things according to the word of God. But I wiſh his majeſty and all kings may take good heed to the law of the Lord, &c.

After a good deal of converſation to this purpoſe, he was next threatened to be rolled up and down in a barrel filled with iron pikes; however, he was in nothing terrified by his adversaries, but continued still resolute, till at last they thought proper to let him go.

Whereupon lord Eglinton sent for and examined him concerning what had befallen him, and said, Poor man, you did well in not doing what they would have had you. To this he replied, 'My lord, you say I have done well, whereas you persecute them from first to last; this tells me, in my experience, that you go against the light of your conscience. Wo will be to you that go against the light of your conscience.' Eglinton said, Know you not that I have kept you from being hanged, and are you telling me that? William replied, Keep me from drowning too, I will tell you the verity. Thus they made this poor man feel the fear of death, though he escaped the pain of it.

And thus I have given as particular an account of this rising, and of the executions that followed upon it, as this history will admit of. It is not to be expected that I should offer a full vindication of this rising, and of those worthy and excellent persons who suffered on account of it, that having been frequently done by others*, and as I shall afterwards have an opportunity to shew how far defensive arms are to be justified. It is therefore sufficient to observe, 1. That this attempt was no premeditated thing, but entirely accidental, occasioned by the violent oppressions of the country by the merciless soldiers. 2. Upon their first attempt they knew they had nothing to expect but all the cruelties their persecutors could inflict upon them; and therefore the law of self preservation required them to take the best measures they could for their own security and defence, all application to the king being discharged by the laws then in being. 3. It is plain they had no designs against his majesty's person or government; all they wanted was the redress of their grievances, the enjoyment of their liberties, and the free exercise of their religion, as is evident from their treatment of Sir James Turner, when in their power, from their readily agreeing to a suspension of arms, and their having, in part, proposed their grievances, and sent them to the council. 4. When, in some respects, they were under terms of accommodation, they were suddenly attacked, and obliged to resist force by force, when no indemnity was allowed them, and, when taken at the engagement, they got quarters and a promise of life; so that it was contrary to all rules to be treated as they were, after quarters given and taken; besides, several who were executed were not in the action, nor had born arms, but were only in company with the rest when going through the country, and some of them were put to death, merely to gratify Sharp's revenge, contrary to the king's express orders, that no more lives should be taken. 5. All of them owned the king's authority; so that, if matters be truly considered, they suffered, not so much for their rising in arms, as for their not renouncing their sworn covenant, and refusing to take the declaration; and therefore it is surprising how† Sir George MacKenzie could say in his Vindication, page 8, that, generally, no man was executed in this reign, who would say, God bless the king; for it is well known that none of these persons, who suffered at this time, had their life offered to them on that condition. The persecutors, saith the author of the Memoirs of the church of Scotland, for such this very thing will prove them to be, as if they were fond of having it said, that these men died for religion, and not for being in arms, ordered several of them to be offered their lives if they would take and subscribe, the declaration to renounce the covenant. Whether they did this fraudulently, or sincerely, Providence never gave them an opportunity to discover; nor whether if the weakness of any had brought them to yield, they would have performed their promise to them; for not a man they ever offered it to, (I mean of those condemned to die for the rising at Pentland) but refused it with indignation, and chose to die rather than to yield to that unconscionable proposal. So, in that point, they gained an undeniable testimony, that they suffered for religion, 'not accepting deliverance;' for none of them esteemed renouncing the covenant to be any thing more or less than renouncing God and his church, to whom, and for which that covenant was first entered into. 6. The very same reasons which vindicate the Revolution 1688, are in favour of those who rose at this time; and, had their measures been as well concerted, and their success been as great as their cause was just, nothing could have been said against them. But though the attempt of these worthy men was not so successful as that of the revolution, all that can be said is, that God's time was not yet come for rescuing a bleeding nation. 7. These valuable persons were fairly vindicated, whenever the nation recovered its senses, by the revolution parliament, in the act July 4th 1690, by which the forfeited persons were restored, not ex gratia, but ex justitia, and all decrees and sentences passed against them, by any judges, were declared void and null from the beginning. And thus I have given a pretty full account of this matter, which had no small influence upon the interest of episcopacy in Scotland; for, after so great a number of executions prelacy gradually and sensibly decayed till the revolution, when the prelates, the chief instruments of cruelty, were at last laid aside as a public nuisance. Whereas nothing more strengthened the interest of presbyterians, than the cheerful and stedfast behaviour of the sufferers, concerning whom it may be said, 'The more they were oppressed, the more they grew.' People began more generally to leave the churches, and the ejected ministers ventured to preach a little more publicly, particularly the Rev. Mr John Welsh, whose labours were blessed with eminent success; multitudes resorted to hear them, and the poor honest people, by way of ridicule, were called Whigs from wigg, the thin part of milk, which they were forced to drink in their wanderings. Bishop Burnet gives another original of this name; he says, that in the south west counties of Scotland, there is scarce corn enough to serve out the year, and therefore people repair to Leith to buy of the stores that come from the north. And from a word whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called whiggamores, and shorter the whigs, which afterwards became the name of all the patrons of liberty.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the cruelties of Dalziel, &c. The forfeitures of gentlemen, &c. The disbanding of the army, and the kind of peace.——Mr Blitchel's attempt on Archbishop Sharp,—the proceedings of parliament,—the first indulgence, and other things, to the end of the year 1679.

SOON after the victory at Pentland, Dalziel, with a considerable number of troops, marched to the west, took up his head quarters in the town of Kilmarnock, and grievously oppressed the country. From that place and the neighbourhood was extorted upwards of the value of 50,000 merks. All whom Dalziel suspected were brought before him, and if they were not guilty, were sure to be held so. He passed what sentence he pleased, and tortured whom he had a mind. Many, upon mere suspicion of being at Pentland, were put into the thieves hole at Kilmarnock, where they were obliged to stand night and day. And one of them, falling dangerously sick, was not suffered to go out till two persons became bail to return him either dead or alive. The poor man dying, the sureties were forced to bring the corps to the prison-door, where it lay some time till the general thought fit to let it be interred.

When one David Findlay, of the parish of Newmills, was brought before the general and examined, he acknowleged that he was by accident at Lanerk, when Colonel Wallace and his men came that way, but did not join them; but, because he would not tell whom he saw there, Dalziel ordered him to be shot to death, stript naked, and left on the place, though he was no soldier, nor under his command; and though the poor man begged but one night's time to prepare for eternity, it was absolutely refused him.

Another instance of barbarity was acted on a poor woman in the neighbourhood of Kilmarnock. A party of soldiers ordered her to be put into a deep pit under the house of Dean, full of toads and other vile creatures, for no other reaſon, but becauſe a man, whom they were in purſuit of, had run through her houſe, and ſhe could not tell what was become of him. Her ſhrieks were heard at a great diſtance; but none durſt interceed for her, for fear of being ſent to bear her company. Whether ſhe died there, or what became of her I know not.

Sir Mungo Murray, who commanded ſome ſoldiers under Dalziel, having intelligence of two men who had given a night's lodging to two of the Pentland people, ordered them, without any proof, to be bound with cords, and hanged up by the thumbs upon a tree all night; ſo that, in all probability, they would have died before next day, had not ſome, even of the ſoldiers, been ſo humane as to cut them down, at the hazard of their own lives. How ſad muſt the caſe of the country be, when the army was permitted to exerciſe ſuch cruelties upon poor innocent people! Mean while the poor whigs, either fled abroad or concealed themſelves in dens and caves of the earth, to eſcape the fury of the times, this being the ſevereſt winter of perſecution Scotland had known for a long time.

Much about this time Sir William Bannantyne was ſent with a conſiderable party to Galloway where he committed exceſſive cruelties, and took free quarters wherever he pleaſed. This party came to the houſe of Roger Gordon of Holm, conſumed his victuals and ſheep, though nothing could be laid to his charge. From thence they went to the houſe of Earlſtoun, which they made a garriſon of, and from whence they ſent parties through the pariſh and round the neighbourhood. And becauſe one David MacGill had, by his wife's means, eſcaped in woman's cloaths, they took the poor woman, bound her, and put lighted matches between her fingers for ſeveral hours; the torture made her almoſt diſtracted; ſhe loſt one of her hands, and died in a few days after. They pillaged the country at their pleaſure. Some they brought to their garriſons, though under heavy ſickneſs, ſtripped them almoſt naked by the way, and threw them into naſty places without the leaſt accommodation.

The ſoldiers exacted many fines in the moſt arbitrary manner. Thus, from two countrymen in the pariſh of Dalry, they raiſed about 363 l. Scots. In the pariſh of Carſphairn, Gilbert Moory in Marbrack, without the leaſt alledged fault, had fifty merks impoſed upon him; and, when he aſked the reaſon of his being fined; Sir William Bannantyne replied, Becauſe you have gear, and I muſt have a part of it. Alexander Gordon of Knockbreck ſuffered exceedingly; John Gordon in Carnevel had his eſtate worth 16,000 merks taken from him, and his brother Robert, who ſucceeded him, had his houſe often ſpoiled by the ſoldiers, and was himſelf forced to wander in the mountains. In ſhort, they made all the havoc they could; ſo that the gentleman was forced to retire to London, and, after he returned in 1683, was obliged to keep concealed till 1687.

In the pariſh of Balmagie, Sir William being in a public houſe, and attempting to commit lewdneſs with the miſtreſs, he ſtruck her huſband almoſt dead for offering to make reſiſtance; and a gentleman in company ſeizing Sir William and proving too hard for him, Bannantyne called in the ſoldiers, who took the gentleman, tied him neck and heel, bound his hands behind his back, and kept him on the ground in that poſture all Saturday night, and part of the Sabbath, till his friends came and gave bond for him. The reader muſt obſerve this gentleman was no Whig, but had been with the king's forces at Pentland. Bannantyne and his party drank in the houſe moſt of the Lord's day, and, when they could drink no more, let the liquor run on the ground, and rifled the houſe. In ſhort, his oppreſſions, rapes, adulteries, murders, &c. were ſo many, that the managers themſelves were aſhamed of him. The reader will find many more inſtances of this nature in Naphtali, edit. 1. 291, &c. to which I muſt refer him.

Theſe hardſhips continued on the weſt and ſouth of Scotland till the beginning of June, when a ſquadron of the Dutch fleet came into the frith, ſo that the army was obliged to march into the eaſt country to guard the coaſt.

But many other hardſhips were put upon good people by others as well as by the army. Many were impriſoned upon mere ſuſpicion, as James Grierſon of Dalgoner and John Hamilton of Aldſtane, and one Carmichael, though nothing could be proved againſt any of them.

John Gordon of Largmore, with his brother-in-law William Gordon of Robertoun, being at Pentland, William was killed, and John ſorely wounded; ſo that thro' the loſs of blood, and lying in the fields ſome nights after the engagement, he died a few days after he got to his own houſe, and thereby eſcaped the fury of the perſecutors, who were reſolved to carry him to Edinburgh in a litter. Mrs Mary Gordon of Robertoun was grievouſly haraſſed after the death of her huſband and brother, chiefly by the inſtigation of the curate of the place. We ſhall afterwards meet with more of the ſufferings of this family.

The family of Sundiwell ſuffered not a little on this occaſion. James Kirkco of Sundiwell had, during the laſt ſix years, gone through a ſeries of oppreſſions, by fining, quartering of ſoldiers, and the like. Laſt October he was forced to diſperſe his family, and to wander from place to place to avoid the depredations, and cruelties of the ſoldiers, which made him ſuſpected to have been at Pentland, though that could never be made appear. However, he was forced to leave the kingdom for the ſpace of three years, and, after his return, he was haraſſed by a proceſs of forfeiture; but a comfortable death put an end to all his ſorrows.

James MacClelland, who ſucceeded him in the lands of Sundiwell, being only ſuſpected, was forced to fly to the mountains, when only 16 years of age, where he and ſeveral others kept concealed from November till the 15th of February this year, that he was apprehended by a party of Sir William Bannantyne's men, brought to their garriſon at Earlſtoun, and put in a vault with other priſoners. Sir William moſt cruelly tortured him with fiery matches between his fingers, to force him to confeſs what he was entirely ignorant of. In ſhort, he was carried priſoner from place to place, and at laſt to Edinburgh; and being examined before the council in September, he, with 15 others, were baniſhed to the plantations, becauſe he refuſed the declaration. Mean while he happily broke priſon and eſcaped. This gentleman was haraſſed by proceſſes, fines, impriſonments and other oppreſſions, for many years. But that which went neareſt his heart of all was his ſinful compliance, ſome years after this, in taking the teſt, of which oath in the next volume.

James Callane merchant in Dumfries was forfeited, ſometime after Pentland, though it could never be proved that he was there; he ſuſtained great loſſes by the parliament fine, and other exactions by Sir James Turner. Upon his being declared rebel he left the kingdom, and lived ſeven years in the Eaſt Indies: and at his return he was taken by Claverhouſe, and impriſoned at Dumfries 14 months, and at Edinburgh a year and a half, and then baniſhed to Carolina, where he died. After his death, his wife and daughters, for their non-conformity, were deprived of their goods, and forced to wander up and down through the hills and mountains for three years and a half.

Robert Lenox of Plumpton ſuffered likewiſe at this time; for his eſtate, with 2,000 merks yearly, was taken from him, and he forced to fly into England, where he continued as a wanderer for three years. At length he went with his family to Ireland, but, being inſtrumental in getting a preſbyterian miniſter ſettled at Glenevie, he was excommunicated by the biſhop and his official, fined upwards of 430 l. ſterling, and thereby reduced almoſt to beggary. At laſt he ventured to Scotland; and, though a papiſt was in poſſeſſion of his eſtate, yet he, having produced the charter of his lands, was put in priſon, and when he got out lived upon charity till the revolution. One Thomas Lenox of the ſame place met with peculiar hardſhips, both before and after Pentland. By exactions and impriſonments he loſt above 679 l. beſides a year's crop and houſhold-furniture, and that without any proceſs. One time he was impriſoned at Edinburgh 33 weeks, and at another 3 months, for refuſing the teſt.

While theſe things were thus carried on, a convention of eſtates met at Edinburgh, on the 23d of January, in which, as Burnet relates, the king, by a ſpecial letter, appointed duke Hamilton to preſide, and, in a letter to lord Rothes, ordered him to write to Sharp to ſtay within his dioceſe, and to come no more to Edinburgh. Upon this, the hiſtorian ſays, Sharp was ſtruck with ſo deep a melancholy, that he ſhewed as great an abjectneſs under this ſlight diſgrace, as he had ſhewed inſolence before when he had more favour. The convention, according to my author, laid on a ſubſidy for the army, amounting to 64,000l. monthly, for a year's time, and, in the exceſs of their loyalty, offered to maintain all the forces the king ſhould be pleaſed to raiſe: ſo that a blank was put in his maj. ſty's hand to raiſe: and keep up as great a ſtanding army as his arbitrary counſellors ſhould, for their own ends, adviſe him to.

The biſhops and their party uſed all their intereſt to keep up the ſtanding army. 'Accordingly, when the convention was over, lord Rothes ſent up Drummond, as Burnet tells us, to repreſent to the king the ill affections of the weſtern parts;' for nothing could be more averſe to prelacy than they were. Drummond propoſed, as an expedient, the preſſing of the declaration, and the keeping up of a ſtanding army. Burnet ſays, 'A ſlight accident happened, that raiſed a jeſt which ſpoiled his errand. The king flung the cover of the letter from Scotland into the fire, which was carried up in a flame, and ſet the chimney on fire; whereupon it was ſaid, That the Scotiſh letter had fired Whitehall. And it was anſwered, The cover had almoſt ſet Whitehall on fire, but the contents would certainly ſet Scotland on a flame.'

The king was prevailed with by Lauderdale to ſend his letter to the council, dated March the 12th, in which he impowered them, 1. To tender the oath of allegiance and the declaration unto ſuch active and leading perſons of the diſaffected party as they ſhould ſuſpect, and to ſecure the recuſants. 2. To emit a proclamation, requiring all within the moſt diſaffected ſhires to bring in, by a limited day, all arms and powder, under what penalties the council ſhould ſee proper, only allowing gentlemen to wear their ſwords. 3. To ſeize all ſerviceable horſes belonging to diſaffected or ſuſpected perſons, after being appriſed by honeſt and indifferent perſons. 4. To model a militia of horſe and foot to join the regular forces, that they might ſpeedily proceed to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence. 5. To provide arms and ammunition for the defence of the kingdom. 6. To take effectual courſe that every pariſh ſecure the perſons of their miniſters from violence and affronts. And, 7. to give preſent orders for the criminal purſuit of all heritors, or men of eſtates, all preachers and military officers, who were in the late rebellion, before the juſtice general, that they may be tried according to law, and, being found guilty, be forfeited without delay.

This letter being read in council on the 20th of March they appointed a warrant for the advocate to purſue heritors, &c. in terms of the ſeventh article; and on the 25th two proclamations were publiſhed, the one for bringing in of arms from the ſhires of Ayr, Lanerk, Renfrew and Wigtoun, and ſtewartry of Kirkcudbright, againſt the firſt day of May, and that under very ſevere penalties. One pretence for this was, to prevent invading miniſters of the goſpel who were lawfully admitted preachers among them. It was added, 'That if any injury or affront was done to their miniſter, the pariſhioners who ſhall ſuffer the ſame to be done, and not oppoſe the ſame, ſhall be reputed as art and part of the ſame crime and violence.' So that if a curate's houſe ſhould be robbed, his pariſhioners muſt be charged with the robbery. There were but a few arms brought in, notwithſtanding this proclamation. By the other proclamation, of the ſame date, all who withdrew from public ordinances, and did not keep their own pariſh churches, were forbid keeping horſes above one 100 merks value. Though this gave ſome ſatisfaction to the prelates, yet it did not fill their churches; and, had this been rigorouſly executed, the king would have had a good many fine horſes from many of the managers, nay, and from ſome of the biſhops themſelves, who were not very punctual in their attendance on public worſhip. That ſame day they anſwered the king's letter, acquainting him with what they had done, and farther intended, as to every article of it. After which, there does not ſeem to have been any more ſederunts of council till the 6th of June.

When the council met at that time, a letter from the king, dated the 4th of May, was read, wherein his majeſty recommended to them the encouragement and ſupport of the ſober and orthodox clergy. Whereupon a proclamation was publiſhed, much of the ſame import with that of the 25th of March, wherein heritors and pariſhioners were made liable for all the damages done to miniſters. That the ſober and orthodox clergy, as they were now called, by their violent perſecuting temper, together with their immoralities, brought upon themſelves the odium of the people, is very certain, and conſequently there was no other way to ſupport them but by the ſecular arm, from which all their authority was derived. It was indeed hinted in the king's letter, and aſſerted in the proclamation, that many affronts had been given to thoſe ſober and orthodox clergy; and it was proper, for the deſigns of the managers, that ſuch things ſhould be alledged, let the proof of them be ever ſo ſlender.

That ſame day another letter from the king, of the ſame date, was read, preſſing, in the warmeſt terms, the forfeiting of thoſe who had been in the late riſing, and had hitherto made their eſcape.

But before any thing could be done in this affair, Sir Robert Murray came from court, to get a true account of the ſtate of the country, and, in the month of June, was admitted to the office of juſtice clerk. While he was in Scotland, all pains were taken, by the prelates and their military aſſeſſors, to ſhew the neceſſity of continuing the forces now in pay, there being a deſign on foot for diſbanding the army. But this was not thought proper to be put in execution, till once peace was concluded with the Dutch.

Mean while ſeveral of the Pentland priſoners were ſet at liberty upon their ſigning the declaration, and ſome favour was ſhewn to other gentlemen under confinement, ſuch as William Laurie tutor of Blackwood, and James Hamilton of Aikenhead. And on the 11th of July the council gave the following orders relating to the Pentland priſoners, viz. 1. That they who refuſe the allegiance and declaration, be ſent, with the firſt opportunity, to Barbadoes. 2. That the two priſoners, who were willing to take the allegiance and declaration ſhould have the king's pardon. 3. That they who were taken up upon ſuſpicion ſhould remain in priſon till farther examination. And, 4. That theſe ſuſpected perſons ſhould be ſet at liberty upon their taking the allegiance and declaration.

After theſe things on the 15th of Auguſt, the earl of Athol juſtice general, and Sir John Hume of Renton juſtice-clerk, with the earls of Linlithgow and Dumfries, held a juſtice court at Edinburgh, before whom Sir John Niſbet, the king's advocate, produced a commiſſion, ſigned by Rothes the commiſſioner, for purſuing criminally, and forfeiting the following perſons in their lives and fortunes, as being in the late inſurrection in the weſt, viz. Colonel James Wallace, major Joſeph Learmont, William Maxwell, of Monerief younger, John MacClelland of Barſcob, John Gordon of Knockbreck, Robert MacClelland of Balmagachan, James Cannon of Brunſhalloch younger, Robert Cannon of Mordrogget younger, John Welſh of Jar, — Welſh of Cornley, — Gordon of Garey in Kells, Robert Chalmer brother to Gadgirth, Henry Grier in Balmaclellan, David Scot in Irongray, John Gordon in Middleton of Dalry, William Gordon there, John MacNaught there, Robert and Gilbert Cannons there, Andrew Dempſter of Carridow, James Grierſon of Dargoner (who was delayed) James Kirkco of Sundiwell, — Ramſay in Mains of Arniſtoun, John Hutcheſon in Newbottle, — Rew chaplain to Scotſtarbet, Patrick Linſtoun in Calder, with his ſon Patrick, James Wilkie in Mains of Cliftenhall, William Muir of Caldwell, the Goodman of Caldwell, Mr John Cuningham of Bedland, William Porterfield of Quarreltoun and his brother Alexander, Robert Ker of Kerſland, William Lockhart of Wickettſhaw, David Poe in Pokelly, and the following miniſters, viz. Meſſrs Gabriel Semple, John Semple, John Guthrie, John Welſh, Samuel Arnot, James Smith, Alexander Peden, —Orr, William Veitch, Paton, John Crookſhank, Gabriel Maxwell, Maxwell, John Carſtairs, James Mitchel, and William Parſyth.

Now the reader will obſerve, that in this liſt ſome were dead, as Mr Crookſhank, and others of them had no being; nay, ſeveral of their names were corrected in the indemnity, which came down in the end of the year. Beſides, all theſe perſons were abſent, and the advocate urged to have ſentence of death paſſed upon as many of them as he thought fit to proſecute; and, the better to juſtify this illegal proceeding, having beforehand practiſed upon the lords of ſeſſion, produced their anſwer in court to a query he had propoſed, viz. Whether or not a perſon guilty of high treaſon may be purſued before the juſtices, though he be abſent and contumacious, ſo that the juſtices, upon citation and ſufficient probation and evidence may pronounce ſentence and doom of forfeiture if the ditty be proved? to which the lords of ſeſſion gave it as their opinion, 'That, upon the juſtices citation, and ſufficient probation taken before the judges and aſſize, they may proceed and pronounce ſentence thereintil and forfeiture againſt the perſons guilty of high-treaſon, though they be abſent and contumacious.'

Things being thus prepared, the advocate purſued the following perſons, viz. Colonel Wallace, major Learmont, Barſcob, Mr John Welſh, Mr James Smith, Patrick Lilloun, his ſon, and Quarrletoun. It was with difficulty they could get a jury, and the one they got was made up of officers in the army, the general's ſervants, and ſome pupils. Sir James Turner was the firſt witneſs that was examined, though it is plain, he could not well * purge himſelf of malice, and was afterwards condemned for his oppreſſions, as we ſhall hear. Sentence was pronounced the ſame day, by which all theſe eight were forfeited in life and fortune. Next day, Auguſt the 16th, William Muir of Caldwell, John Caldwell of Caldwell younger, Robert Ker of Kerſland, Mr John Cuningham of Bedland, Alexr. Porterfield, Maxwell younger of Moncrief, Balmagachan, Mordrogget, Robert Chalmer, and Meſſ. Gabriel Semple, John Guthrie, Alexr. Peden, William Veitch, John Crookſhank and Patrick MacNaught, had the ſame ſentence paſſed upon them; but two years after this Robert Chalmer obtained the king's pardon. Why the ſame ſentence was not paſſed upon Mr Gabriel Maxwell till the 22d of December 1671, cannot now be accounted for. The reſt in the advocate's commiſſion were delayed till the month of November, when it does not appear they were proſecuted, the indemnity and bond of peace, being before that in agitation. Some time after this Caldwell's eſtate was given to Dalziel, Kerſland's to Drummond, Learmont's to Mr William Hamilton of Wooſhaw, Quarrelton's and his brother's to Mr John Hamilton of Halcraig.

By this time ſeveral civil alterations were made, which tended to make things run in a moderate channel. In England Clarendon's party were loſing ground; and of late a difference aroſe betwixt Lauderdale and ſeveral great men in Scotland, particularly with duke Hamilton, Rothes, Newburgh, Linlithgow, Dalziel, the officers of the army, and the moſt of the biſhops. Thoſe who adhered to Lauderdale in the council, were the earls of Argyll, Tweeddale, Kincardine, lord Cochran, Sir Robert Murray, and others. Lauderdale had ſuch intereſt with the king, as to be able to keep his ground againſt all his enemies, and ſeveral alterations were made to his advantage. The earl of Airly, and lord Cochran were made counſellors, Sir Robert Murray juſtice-clerk. And,

At laſt, when peace was made with the Dutch, a letter, dated the 13th of Auguſt, came from the king, peremptorily ordering the army to be diſbanded, except two troops of horſe and Linlithgow's foot guards, which was complied with. And by this means Rothes's authority as general, as well as his commiſſion, was now at an end. The prelates were greatly diſſatisfied therewith; and particularly the archbiſhop of Glaſgow was reported to have ſaid, Now that the army was diſbanded, the goſpel would go out of his dioceſe.

When the army was diſbanded matters were managed with ſome moderation, and the preſbyterians had a little breathing. But the firſt queſtion that aroſe, was, How ſhould the country be kept in peace without the army? this gave occaſion to both parties in the council to endeavour to the utmoſt to proſecute their reſpective deſigns. The biſhops and their party were for violently preſſing the declaration upon all ſuſpected perſons. Tweeddale and the other party propoſed a bond of peace to be taken and ſubſcribed by all to whom it ſhould be tendered, which laſt carried their point by a majority on the 13th of September. Of the which bond the tenor follows:

I A. B. do engage, bind and oblige myſelf, to keep the public peace, under the pain of a year's rent of all and whatſomever lands and heritages pertain to me, to be paid in caſe I contravene: and alſo I bind and oblige me, that thoſe who are, or at any time hereafter ſhall be, my men tenants and ſervants, during the time they ſhall be men-tenants and ſervants, to me, ſhall keep the public peace, under the pains reſpective after-mentioned, to be paid toties quoties, if they, or any of them, ſhall do in the contrair: that is to ſay, of the payment of the full value of a year's duty payable to me for the time by the tenant or tenants that ſhall happen to contravene: and for my ſervants, in caſe any of them ſhall contravene, the full value of a year's fee. Which ſums aforeſaid I bind and oblige me, my heirs, executors and ſucceſſors, in the caſe aforeſaid, to pay the commiſſioners of the treaſury, treaſurer or treaſurer depute, who ſhall happen to be for the time, for his majeſty's uſe. And conſent thir preſents be regiſtrate in the books of privy council.

This bond became a matter of warm debate among conſcientious people, who feared an oath; for the words were ſo general, as at firſt view they ſeemed to contain nothing inconſiſtent with preſbyterial principles, yet they were ſo ambiguous, that the judge who tendered this bond might affirm, that they who ſubſcribed it did homologate the preſent government both in church and ſtate, to obviate this ambiguity an expedient was propoſed by ſome, of a declaration of the ſubſcribers ſenſe and meaning, with a conſent of the impoſers to it, and a proteſtation taken againſt the ſuppoſed unlawful meaning of the words, and all done by way of inſtrument in the hands of a public notary, before witneſſes. But my author could not tell whether this method was taken.

They who pleaded for the bond ſaid, that it contained nothing but what every perſon is anteceedently obliged to by the ſecond table of the law, even to keep the public peace. It was urged, on the other hand, that when two perſons enter into a ſolemn treaty, they are bound not only to all moral duties lying upon them before, but even to every article of the treaty though to their own detriment. Accordingly ſome took it, and others refuſed; which laſt were repreſented by Sir George MacKenzie, and the Jacobites in after times, as a wilful obſtinate people, for refuſing ſuch a reaſonable thing, as to engage to keep the public peace. But then it was ſaid in their vindication, 1. That this bond of peace was a confederacy with God's enemies, whom we ſhould reckon as our enemies, and hate them, becauſe they hate him. Pſalm cxxxix. 21. 2. This cannot be taken in truth, judgment and righteouſneſs, becauſe of the fallacy and ambiguity of the terms; for there are divers kinds of peace, ſome of duty, and others not. It muſt then be peace rightly qualified; for we can profeſs and purſue no peace of confederacy with God's enemies, no peace inconſiſtent with the fear of God, no peace obſtructing the goſpel or teſtimony,—no peace prompting to prepoſterous prudence in palliating ſin, or daubing defections with untempered morter, no peace inconſiſtent with truth, &c. 3. If we farther inquire into their meaning by living peaceably,—it is plain they mean ſuch a peaceable living as gives obedience to their wicked laws, and is a compliance with their eſtabliſhed courſes; ſuch a peaceable living as is oppoſite to their ſenſe of ſedition rebellion, ſchiſm, &c. ſuch a peaceable living as is contrary to the duties of our covenanted profeſſion, as going to meetings, withdrawing from the curates, &c. which, according to them, is inconſiſtent with the public peace. 4. This is contrary to our covenants, by which we are obliged to a conſtant ſtant contending with, and oppoſition to all the ſupporters of popery, prelacy,' &c.

* According to the law of Scotland in criminal caſes, before a witneſs be admitted, he muſt ſwear that he has no malice againſt the defendant, and that he has received no good deed, to ſwear, &c.

The council had likeways ordered ſome propoſitions to be ſent to the king: among others, that a proclamation be iſſued, bearing a general pardon and indemnity to all in the late rebellion, except thoſe who were forfeited, or under proceſs of forfeiture, or who have ſince done violence to the perſons of miniſters, invaded their houſes, or robbed them of their goods. This laſt clauſe was inſerted to throw an odium upon all engaged in the late rebellion, al tho' nothing like this could be proved againſt any of them. Whereas it was alledged, that ſome of the army perſonating theſe people, had been thus employed, and ſo the innocent were falſely accuſed.

In conſequence of this an anſwer came from his majeſty, with a proclamation of indemnity to all concerned in Pentland, except thoſe mentioned p. 221. and all other who were forfeited, or under proceſs of forfeiture, and ſuch as between this and the firſt of December next to come ſhall be found guilty of having robbed miniſters houſes, or committed violence on their perſons: but with this expreſs condition, that this pardon ſhall only extend to thoſe who ſhall give bond for keeping the public peace before the 1ſt of January following.

Some made this obſervation concerning the indemnity, that in the beginning it pardoned all, in the middle very few, and in the end none at all. The bond they were to give was much the ſame with that mentioned above, except that they were likewiſe expreſsly to engage, never to riſe in arms againſt or without his majeſty's authority, under the higheſt pains.

The council, on the 9th of October, ordered ſome alterations to be made in the names of the perſons excepted in the king's proclamation of indemnity. Thus finding there was no ſuch perſon as—Row chaplain to Scotſtarbet, they ordered that name to be ſcratched out, and Caldwell and Kerſland to be deſigned younger, Mr Trail to be deſigned chaplain to Scotſtarbet, and Paton to be called late preacher; which are proofs of their raſhneſs and inconſiderateneſs. The clauſe of non reſiſtance in the bond to be ſigned by all who were to have the benefit of this indemnity, rendered it entirely uſeleſs to the moſt concerned, for few of them ever could comply with it.

Jointly with the indemnity the council publiſhed their act of the ſame date containing the names of the perſons, in the different ſhires, appointed to take ſubſcriptions from thoſe who claimed the benefit of the indemnity; and ordered all the priſoners to be diſmiſſed upon ſigning the bond. The ſame day they took off the reſtraint that was upon perſons in the weſtern ſhires, as to their carrying arms, allowing ſuch as ſhould take the oath of allegiance, &c. that privilege. They likewiſe gave orders to all magiſtrates and miniſters of juſtice, upon intimation made by the biſhops, to apprehend all perſons who were not only ſcandalous in their lives, but diſobedient to eccleſiaſtical authority. In conſequence of this, many, who could not ſubmit to the eccleſiaſtical authority, as then eſtabliſhed, were haraſſed and impriſoned, while papiſts, quakers, and the openly vicious, were ſcandalouſly overlooked.

In November the council iſſued ſome orders for the better regulating the army, viz. that no officer or ſoldier ſhall levy money from any of the ſubjects, but by expreſs order in writing from Sir William Bruce, for the ceſs and fines, or others authoriſed by parliament, &c. that ſatisfaction be made for any abuſe, and they who are guilty of any abuſe be puniſhed. But theſe and ſeveral ſuch regulations were little looked after by the managers, and as little obſerved by the ſoldiers.

Upon taking the bond of peace, ſeveral who were confined 1665, were ſet at liberty. Thus Sir Hugh Campbell of Ceſnock, James Dunlop of that ilk, James Holborn of Menſtrie, the laird of Blackſtoun, William Ralſtoun of that ilk, Robert Hacket, and major general Montgomery, were all releaſed from their confinement.

Mean while other gentlemen were ſtill kept confined without any reaſon given, ſuch as Sir George Maxwell of Nether-Pollock, Cuninghamhead and Rowallan, Sir James Stewart and Sir John Chieſley were ſent from the caſtle of Edinburgh to the tolbooth of Dundee. Mr Alexander Smith was brought from Zetland, whither he had been baniſhed, to Leith, and preſented before the council. And Mr Hugh Peebles was permitted to go to the weſt to ſettle his affairs.

In conſequence of a letter from the king, dated the 26th of November, requiring them to examine into the conduct of Sir James Turner, during his command in the weſt, the council appointed the lords Halkertoun, regiſter-advocate, juſtice-clerk, Cochran, lieutenant-general Drummond, and Sir Robert Murray, to examine Sir James, and to make report. Their report produced a commiſſion from the council, December the 8th, to the earl of Niddſdale, lord Kenmure, the laird of Craigdarroch, and others, to make trial of Sir James's conduct, &c. Before this committee many gentlemen and others appeared, and gave clear evidence of a great many grievous and attrocious things againſt Sir James, and thoſe under his command, which not a little vindicated thoſe who by theſe oppreſſions were driven to take arms in their own defence.

While this matter was under examination, the council, in the month of December, ordered the clerk to write to the two archbiſhops, to ſee that a liſt of all the papiſts of the kingdom be given in to the council, by every miniſter's giving in a liſt of thoſe in their reſpective pariſhes, that ſo the laws againſt papiſts might be put in execution. But the prelates had little zeal againſt papiſts, and therefore theſe orders were generally neglected; which could not but tend to the increaſe of popery, and to pave the way for a papiſt to mount the throne.

On the 12th of December a proclamation was emitted againſt that known book, intitled, Naphtali; or, The Wreſtlings of the Church of Scotland, ordering the ſame to be burnt, and all copies of it to be brought in to the next magiſtrates by the 1ſt of February next, and any who had copies after that were to be fined in 10,080l. Scots. This book was compoſed by two very great men; the reaſonings part by Mr (afterwards Sir) James Stuart of Goodtrees, one of the beſt lawyers of his time, and the hiſtorical part by Mr James Stirling miniſter at Paiſley. Biſhop Honeyman pretended to anſwer it; but the weakneſs of his performance was ſufficiently expoſed by Mr Stuart, in that uſeful book, intitled, Jus populi vindicatum.

On the 9th of January 1668, the council ordered Sir William Cuninghame of Cuninghamhead to be brought from the caſtle of Stirling to that of Edinburgh, becauſe of his buſineſs with the lawyers there; but in leſs than two months time, he and the laird of Rowallan were remanded back to Stirling.

Mean while, on the 16th of January, the council received a letter from the king, requiring them to tranſmit an account both of thoſe who had, and thoſe who had not ſigned the bond of peace, and of the perſons who had been acceſſory to the late riſing, and had, or had not, accepted of the indemnity; and likewiſe requiring them to reſtrain conventicles, which were called Rendezvouzes of Rebellion, and to execute the laws ſeverely againſt the ring-leaders of ſuch faction and ſchiſm.

But before an anſwer was returned to this letter, the council, on the laſt of January, ordered the magiſtrates to execute the act and proclamation dated 17th of November 1664, againſt outed or ejected miniſters, and to take ſpecial care that none be permitted to remain within their liberties without a licence from the council, the archbiſhop of St Andrews, or the biſhop of Edinburgh, and requiring them to take ſpecial notice that no conventicles be kept in the city or liberties.

On the 20th of February the committee appointed to examine into the conduct of Sir James Turner gave in their report, by which it appeared, that, upon informations from the ſtewartry of Kircudbright, given in upon oath, many illegal exactions had been made, and diſorders committed; ſuch as quartering ſoldiers for levying fines and impoſitions;—exacting ceſs, or quartering money, for more ſoldiers than were actually preſent;—fining ſuch as lived orderly, as appears by miniſters certificates;—fining fathers for their daughters having their children baptized by outed miniſters;—fining in whole pariſhes promiſcuouſly;—fining one that lay a whole year bedfaſt;—taking away cattle. The reader may ſee the whole report at large, large, and the defence that Sir James made, in my author's history; I have only excerpted these few particulars, from which he may form a judgment of what case the country must have been in when exposed to such oppressions; and, if such things appeared only from the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, what addition must have been made to the number of his disorders, if the like information had been taken from the shires of Dumfries and Galloway?

We may well conclude that his defences were poor; for, when the council transmitted the report, together with them, to the king, he ordered him to be discharged his service; accordingly, on the 10th of March, he delivered up his commissions. Bishop Burnet seems to intimate, that he could have made a better defence than he did, had he been able to produce his papers in time. It is certain he affirmed, that all the commissions and instructions were taken from him by the rebels, when he was made prisoner, and that therefore he had nothing to shew in his own vindication; and it is thought that his severities were not by far so great as his instructions bore him out in.

This inquiry, says Burnet, was chiefly levelled at lord Rothes and Burnet archbishop of Glasgow, to cast the odium of the late rebellion on their injustice and ill conduct. And it was intended that Turner should accuse them; but he had no vouchers to shew. These were believed to be withdrawn by an artifice of Lord Rothes; but, before the matter was ended, they in whose hands his papers were left sent them sealed up to his lodgings. However, he was by this time broken, and being a man of spirit, would not then shew his vouchers, nor expose his friends; so that matter was carried no farther.' Now, when we consider that it was entirely owing to these and the like oppressions, that the poor people were forced to take arms in their own defence, and that so much blood was shed, the reader is to judge, whether the punishment inflicted was adequate to the crimes; whether the breaking of an officer or two, without making a public example for deterring others, was a sufficient reparation for the mischiefs that were the consequences of their conduct.

After the council had sent up the report against Turner, on the 27th of February they returned an answer to the letter they received on the 16th of last month, wherein they signify that the bond of peace was generally signed; that of those who were accessary to the late rebellion 218 had accepted his majesty's indemnity, and 300 had refused. And, for the farther securing the peace of the kingdom, they proposed, 1. That a proclamation be issued, discharging all persons who would not sign the bond of peace from wearing any kind of arms, and from keeping any horses above the value of 50 l. Scots. 2. That a further time be granted for persons to come in and accept of the indemnity, by signing the bond required. 3. That his majesty may give warrant for a proclamation, wherein the names of all such of the rebels as shall not then take the bond may be inserted, and power may be granted to the magistrates to apprehend them; and that all who shall receive, or harbour them, may be declared rebels. They concluded, by signifying that they can do no more against conventicles, and that they would see the laws put in due execution; and acquainted his majesty with what they had enacted on the last of January. Accordingly the council had permission to receive persons upon their signing the bond of peace.

On the 10th of March, when the king signified his pleasure to have Turner dismissed his service, he ordered Sir William Bannantyne to be taken to account for his conduct: accordingly Sir William was imprisoned, and a committee appointed to examine his accounts; but, as the council came to no final resolution concerning him till the month of August, I shall therefore lay before the reader some of the principal occurrences in the mean while.

Though hitherto there were few field meetings, yet Presbyterian ministers ventured to preach to considerable assemblies in private houses and barns, at the pressing solicitations of the people; which practice was a great eyesore to the prelates and the other managers, who were at all pains to suppress them: accordingly May 7th —— Miller of Waxford was fined in 300 merks for being at a conventicle in the shire of Air, and obliged to give bond for 1000 l. Scots, that neither he nor any of his family should frequent these meetings for the future. The same day the council gave orders for apprehending and imprisoning all ejected ministers, or others, who should keep conventicles. And, on the 9th of May, all the officers and soldiers had orders to apprehend the said ministers, dissipate their conventicles, and seize on the principal persons at such meetings; nay, and to seize upon any person they had a warrant for apprehending from a privy counsellor. And, the better to execute these orders, the fines were as conveniently disposed of as they could.

The same day, May 9th, the council issued a proclamation, ordering all magistrates and officers of the standing forces to seize the following persons, who refused to accept of the indemnity, viz.

In Carsphairn parish.

Nathanael Cannon, James MacMitchell, John William, and Alexander MacMillans, and John MacMillan junior, James MacKilney, John Logan, John Crawford, John Cuningham, John Hannay, George James and —— MacAdams, George Ferguson, David Cubbison, William Smith, John Wylie, Roger and Robert Malcolms.

In Dalry parish.

In the shire of Dumfries.

In Lanerk parish.

John Wilson, Thomas and James Hastles, James Fisher.

In Carluck parish.

William Loch, William and John Gilkersons, William Frame, Archibald, Robert, and Gabriel Forrests, Thomas Martin, John Skouller, James Armstrong, William King, Archibald Hart, Robert Smith, William Brown.

As for the Pentland prisoners, Thomas Lenox, under sentence of death, was set at liberty upon signing the bond. Andrew Robertson got leave to transport himself to New England. John Bryce, William Ferguson and William Adam, for refusing to sign the bond, were banished to Virginia; nay, the council, a little after this, made a general order to banish all the prisoners who should refuse the bond, the king having referred every thing relating to the rebellion, as it was called, to their pleasure: and, at the desire of the prelates, particularly pressed them to rid the kingdom of preachers at conventicles: but, notwithstanding all these severe laws, conventicles increased.

Mr Michael Bruce, a worthy minister from Ireland, and one who was not afraid to preach to great numbers in houses, and sometimes in the fields, about the 2d or 3d of June was apprehended, in his own hired house, by captain G. Erskine. When he found his house in a manner besieged, he attempted his escape, but was sorely wounded, and confined to the castle of Stirling. It was the 18th of June before he could be carried to Edinburgh, and, when confined there, none were permitted to speak with him, unless in the presence of a privy counsellor. When he was examined he was always candid and open, without refusing to answer any question proposed to him.

Before he was brought to his trial, the council, on the 25th of June, ordered letters to be directed against lord Torphichen, and other heritors of West Calder, and others, to answer for harbouring, instead of apprehending, John Gilchrist, James Nimmo and Thomas Finlay, who were accessory acceſſory to the rebellion in 1666. This proceſs, being long in dependance, brought many innocent people to trouble.

But to return to Mr Bruce. On the 2d of July he was brought before the council, and, owning that he had preached and baptized both in houſes and in the fields, was ſentenced to be baniſhed out of the three kingdoms, and forced to ſign a bond never to return upon pain of death. When about to leave the kingdom he was ordered to be ſent priſoner to London, where he was confined to the Gate houſe; and, after continuing ſome time there, was ſentenced to go to Tangier in Africa. The reader muſt determine what to think of this matter. Here, a Scotſman, who had been tried and condemned by the council in Scotland, gets a new ſentence paſſed upon him at London. However, it ſeems, this good man met with ſome connivance, and retired after all to Ireland.

Notwithſtanding theſe hardſhips upon Preſbyterian miniſters in Scotland, the king this year allowed ſome breathing to the non conformiſts in England; and the earl of Tweeddale, in the month of June or July, called for ſome of the ejected miniſters of Scotland, who were concealing themſelves, and made propoſals to them concerning ſome favour and indulgence he hoped might be procured. The news was very agreeable; but the attempt of Mr James Mitchell, a preacher, interrupted all meaſures of this kind for ſome time.

This Mr Mitchell took a reſolution to diſpatch the archbiſhop of St Andrews. Accordingly, on the 11th of July when Sharp and Honnyman biſhop of Orkney were going into coach at the head of the Blackfriar's wynd in Edinburgh Mitchel diſcharged a loaded piſtol in at the north-ſide of the coach. Honnyman received the ſhot in the wriſt, which was deſigned for Sharp. Sharp was ſo univerſally hated, that, though this was done in the high ſtreet, and in full light of the day, yet none attempted to ſeize Mr Mitchel, who, with great deliberation, went down the wynd, changed his clothes, and eſcaped. The cry ſoon aroſe that a man was killed; upon which ſome replied, It was only a biſhop.

This accident made a little impreſſion on Sharp. Biſhop Burnet ſays, that he thought it decent to go and congratulate him on this occaſion, and tells us, that Sharp ſaid, with a very ſerious look, 'My times are wholly in thy hand, O thou God of my life.' This, ſays Burnet, was the ſingle expreſſion ſavouring of piety that ever fell from him in all the converſation that paſſed between them.

A proclamation was iſſued out, on the 13th of July, offering a reward of 5000 merks to any that ſhould diſcover the actor; and the ſame day the magiſtrates of Edinburgh were ordered to ſearch the town and ſuburbs, for all perſons concerned in the late rebellion, or who could not give an account of themſelves. The city gates were all ſhut, except the Nether-bow, where one of the magiſtrates was placed, to let none out whom he did not know, and 100 ſoldiers were appointed to give their aſſiſtance; ſo it was ſurprizing that great numbers were not apprehended, the town being full of Whigs, and of thoſe who had been concerned at Pentland, many of whom narrowly eſcaped, eſpecially William Maxwell of Moncrief, who eſcaped their ſcrutiny by getting under a meal barrel in the houſe of one Moffat.

People could not but obſerve the righteouſneſs of Providence in diſabling Honnyman at this time, who had appeared moſt zealous againſt prelacy when it was deſigned to be introduced, and yet, being ſeduced by Sharp with the temptation of a biſhopric, was the firſt who wrote againſt Preſbyterian government, which he once ſo keenly eſpouſed.

This affair made a great noiſe, and the odium of it was caſt upon the whole body of Preſbyterians, though not one knew any thing of the matter except the actor himſelf. Whether it is to be juſtified or condemned the reader may judge, after he ſees what he offered in his own defence when brought to a trial for it ſome years after this. But the meaſures taken with ſome, who were noways acceſſory to it, ſeem to be very ſevere and unjuſtifiable, as will appear from theſe following inſtances.

Soon after this there was a quarrel between one Mrs Gray and her ſervant, who thereupon quitted her ſervice, and went to Sharp, and told him ſhe could inform him of ſeveral houſes where the Whigs uſually reſorted, and concerning the perſon who made the attempt upon himſelf. Robert Gray, on this information, was brought before a committee of the council, and ſuſpecting what his ſervant had done, owned, that upon ſuch a day, his couſin major Learmont, one Welſh, and Mrs Duncan a miniſter's widow, had dined with him; but denied that he knew any thing of the aſſaſſination of the biſhop. Sir John Nisbet the advocate, after ſome pretended frankneſs, took his ring from his hand, telling him he had uſe for it; and immediately ſent it with a meſſenger to Mrs Gray, to acquaint her, that her huſband had diſcovered all he knew as to the Whigs, of which that ring was a token that ſhe might do the like. And accordingly the poor woman, being brought before the committee, told more than her huſband had done, particularly of Mrs Kello, where the Rev. Mr John Welſh lodged and preached, the foreſaid Mrs Duncan and John Crawford meſſenger, who, having notice given him, made his eſcape but his wife and the other two were apprehended. Mr Gray upon this broke his heart and died. Mrs Duncan, when before the council was threatened with the boots, and had been tortured with them, had not lord Rothes interpoſed, and told them, that it was not proper for gentlewomen to wear boots. Mrs Kello confeſſed that Mr Welſh had preached in her houſe; ſhe was fined in 5000 merks, ordered to be baniſhed, with the other two, and confined in priſon a long time; and it was with no ſmall difficulty they were at laſt ſet at liberty, after Mrs Kello had paid a good part of her fine.

About this time ſome ſoldiers, going from Edinburgh on pretence of ſearching for the aſſaſſins of the biſhop, apprehended one Mr John Gillon miniſter at Carers, who had gone to Currey, a few miles from the town, for the recovery of his health, and made him run the moſt of the way before them, for the ſpace of four miles, to the weſt port of Edinburgh, where he was forced to ſtay ſome hours before the gate could be opened. When he was, the next day brought before the council, and nothing, being alledged againſt him, he was diſmiſſed to his chamber, but was ſo exceſſively fatigued, that he died in 48 hours.

On the 23d of July Mr Alexander Smith was ordered to be tranſported to Orkney, and required to confine himſelf to the iſland of North-Ronaldſhaw. Several other miniſters were impriſoned in Forreſs for preaching in their own houſes, and keeping conventicles in Moray, as Mr Thomas Hog miniſter at Kiltairn, Mr Thomas Urquhart miniſter at ——and Mr John MacKilligan miniſter at Alves.

Another method uſed at this time againſt conventicles was, to oblige the magiſtrates of burghs to give bond to pay a certain ſum if any conventicle was kept within their juriſdiction, and ordinarily they were refunded from the perſons they could apprehend. Accordingly, on the 20th of July, the magiſtrates of Edinburgh gave a bond to the council to pay 50 l. ſterling if any conventicle ſhould be found within their privileges; and this practice was for ſome time renewed at every election; but, notwithſtanding all theſe efforts to ſuppreſs them, they increaſed the more.

About the end of July, Mr John Wilkie, ſome time miniſter at Twinham in the ſouth an old infirm man, having come into Edinburgh for his health, was impriſoned, and then examined, firſt before a committee, and afterwards before the council, on the 29th. Upon his examination he declared that he was no ways acceſſory to the attempt upon the biſhop, and that he only exerciſed as in his own family, which he did daily. He was aſked, whether he invited any to his family-exerciſe. He anſwered, he invited none, nor debarred any. And when they ſaid, that they ſuppoſed he was clear to admit all that came to his family worſhip, he replied in theſe words, Yes, my lord, you ſhould be welcome, and the archbiſhop of St. Andrews ſhould not be debarred. In ſhort, the only thing againſt this good man was his expounding the ſcripture, ſinging and praying in his own family, and in two or three others. Nevertheleſs, he was ordered to be confined to Cupar of Angus within ten days after he ſhould be let out of priſon; but, not being able to travel ſo far, he remained in priſon priſon for ſome time, at laſt his confinement was alter ed, firſt to Moffat and then to Muſſelburgh.

Mean while the council met on the 4th of Auguſt, when Sir James Stuart was ordered to be made cloſe priſoner in Dundee, and Sir John Chiefly in the tolbooth of Perth; and orders was ſent to the captain of the caſtle of Stirling to put Cunninghamhead and Rowllan in diſtinct rooms; and Sir George Maxwell of Nether-pollock was ordered, in eight days, to enter himſelf priſoner at Kirkcaldy, under the penalty of 500 l. ſterling, but next day his place of confinement was fixed to the caſtle of Stirling. The ſame day James Anderſon, John Wright and Robert Grier were baniſhed to Virginia for being at Pentland. And at the ſame time, the council fined Sir William Bannantyne of 200 l. Sterling; and, as he had given ſecurity for his removing from the kingdom by the 11t of September, they freed him from all other pains and puniſhments. This was juſtly looked upon as too mild a ſentence, conſidering the horrid extortions, filthineſs, rapes and cruelty he had been guilty of; for, beſides what has been above related, he made great fires and laid down men to roaſt before them, when they would not nor could not give the money he deſired, or give thoſe informations he wanted. He was barbarous to one gentleman in Galloway, ſuppoſed to be Gordon of Largmore, who, through the wounds he received at Pentland, and the hardſhips he endured before he got to his houſe, fell ſick, and was at the point of death when orders came from Bannantyne to bring him dead or alive. He raiſed himſelf a little on his bed, and told thoſe who were ſent, that he now defied Sir William and all his perſecutors, whom he forgave, ſince in a little he would be in better company. Having ſaid this, he leaned down, and in a few minutes expired.

Bannantyne upon this ſentence went to court, and put the beſt face he could upon his affairs; however, he was forced to leave the king's dominions, and accordingly, he repaired to the army then in the Low countries, and ſerved at the ſiege of Grave, where a cannon-ball came and drove his heart at ſome diſtance from his body, which, my author ſays, was anſwerable to a wicked imprecation he commonly uſed. So that however mild the ſentence was that was paſſed upon him, yet vengeance would not ſuffer him to live.

When Turner and Bannantyne were thus proſecuted, honeſt people began to hope that now they might lay their grievances before the council; but when John Ferguſon, one of the magiſtrates of Ayr, gave in his compleint againſt William Cunningham the provoſt, and had been at great charges in bringing above 40 witneſſes to prove him guilty of many violences and oppreſſions, he was told by one of the council, that unleſs he dropt his proſecution, the declaration would be put to him; and not being able to comply with this, he was forced to hold himſelf quiet.

Upon a falſe alarm of another riſing, the council, on the 12th of Auguſt, gave orders to the earl of Linlithgow to aſſemble the forces and diſperſe the rebels; and on the 3d of September lieutenant Mungo Murray was ſent with 60 horſe, and another party under one Cockburn, to ſearch for and apprehend any rebels in arms: however, there was not the leaſt ground for any of theſe fears. It was about this time that Robert Cannon of Mordrogget, who was always excepted out of the indemnity, was apprehended; but being ſeduced by the managers, he afterwards acted a very ill part.

In the month of November ſeveral concerned in Pentland were admitted to take the bond; and Robert Chalmer, (who was afterwards pardoned) William Millar and William Murdoch were baniſhed. John Denholm was baniſhed to Tangier, for receiving ſome of the others one night in his houſe. William and James Welſhes in Dungray, whoſe names were wrong inſerted in the proclamation May 9th, were diſmiſſed upon ſigning the bond of peace.

On the 23d of November, the council being informed againſt Mr Donald Cargil, for coming to Edinburgh and other places, at his pleaſure, ſince he was confined to the north ſide of the Tay, appointed him to appear before them on the 11th of January next. His only crime was coming to Edinburgh, without licence, after ſix years confinement. But when he appeared, and was heard in his own vindication, he was diſmiſſed, and only ordered to remain within the bounds of his appointment.

The year 1669, which I am now entering upon, was remarkable for the indulgence granted to ſeveral of the ejected miniſters; but, as the king's letter upon that ſubject did not come down before the middle of July it will be proper to mention the moſt remarkable occurences preceeding that event, in the order wherein they happened.

We took notice of the council's letter concerning ſending in liſts of the papiſts. Accordingly, on the 4th of February this year, ſome liſts were brought in; but the council recorded that many were wanting, for the zeal of the times ran in another channel.

The hardſhips of thoſe concerned at Pentland were ſtill continued, and all pains were taken to diſcover ſuch of them as had retired to Ireland. Accordingly John Cunningham of Bedlane was apprehended there. The council, being informed of this, on the ſaid 4th of February ordered the magiſtrates of Ayr to receive him as a priſoner. When he was brought over, he was committed to priſon, firſt at Glaſgow, then at Stirling caſtle, and after that in Dumbarton, where he continued a long time.

The weſt country gentlemen met with ſome favour; for, on the 25th of February, Sir George Maxwell got liberty to tranſact his affairs for ſome time in Edinburgh, and had his liberty continued from time to time, till the month of June. The ſame day Sir William Cuningham was allowed to repair to his houſe till the middle of March. However, they were remanded to priſon after the time of theſe favours was expired.

The perſecution for conventicles ſtill went on; for the council, being informed that Mr David Hume late miniſter at Coldingham had preached at a conventicle, in the houſe of Mrs Paton a widow gentlewoman in Edinburgh, on the 2d of March, fined the magiſtrates in the ſum of 50 l. ſterling, according to their bond. And the ſame day ſmall parties of ſoldiers were ſent to quarter in Glaſgow, Newmills, Manchlin and Kilmarnock, to ſuppreſs conventicles there, and a party was ordered to Inverneſs to keep the preſbyterians in awe in that part of the country.

The better to find out conventicles, an act of council was made on the 4th of March, diſcharging all perſons from having their children baptiſed by any other than their own pariſh miniſter; and ſignifying that every heritor, who ſhould act otherways, ſhould pay the fourth part of his yearly value rent, each tenant 100 l. Scots, and ſix weeks impriſonment, and each cottar, or ſub-tenant 20 l. Scots, and the like impriſonment. The reaſon given for this act was, becauſe baptiſm otherways adminiſtred was a ſcandal to the proteſtant religion, and tended to the encreaſe of popery, ſchiſm, and profaneneſs. But whether the ſcandal upon the proteſtant religion, conſiſted in childrens being baptized by perſons not authoriſed by a prelatical church, muſt be left with the reader. And it is an undoubtable fact that popery and profaneneſs never increaſed ſo much in Scotland, ſince the reformation, as under this period, when prelacy was eſtabliſhed.

This act was ordered to be publiſhed throughout the ſhires of Lanerk, Renfrew and Ayr, and the ſtewartry of Kirkcudbright, and the commiſſioners of the militia were ordered to inform themſelves of all conventicles and diſorderly baptiſms ſince laſt November, that thoſe who ſhould be found guilty, whether miniſters or hearers, might be proſecuted; and inſtructions were ſent to the ſheriffs and their deputes, in the weſtern ſhires, as to the manner in which they were to proceed againſt the non conformiſts.

The ſame day the council ordered more ſoldiers to the weſt, doubting perhaps that the militia would not be zealous enough in perſecuting their neighbours. And James Row and George Moſman merchants in Edinburgh were fined, the firſt in 100 l. and the ſecond in 200 merks, for being at Mrs Paton's conventicle, and John Row, agent, in 100 l. for the ſame crime, and threatened with baniſhment if ever they ſhould be found at another; and in the mean time they were impriſoned till they paid their fines.

About this time collectors of the fines, for non-conformity, appointed by law, were named, and ſent to thoſe places where conventicles were most frequent; and, the better to encourage these publicans and tax gatherers, they had 500 merks a piece from the council; however their reign was short, continuing only till the 1st of June.

But the archbishop of Glasgow stirred up the lord Cochran to harass the presbyterians in his diocese; and accordingly his lordship ordered major Cockburn to summon, before a committee of noblemen and gentlemen at Ayr, several ministers whom the bishop alledged had acted contrary to law, and preached and baptized irregularly; such as Messrs. William Fullerton late at St. Quivox, John Spalding at Dreghorn, Alexander Blair at Glatloun, Hugh Archbald at Evandale, James Alexander at Kilmacolm, Andrew Dalrymple at Auchinleck, John Hutchison at Maybole, James Veitch at Manchlin, Hugh Campbell at Riccartoun, John Gemble at Symington, and John Wallace at Largs. When the major came with his men to some of their houses, he compelled them to give bond for their appearance, without producing his warrant, and most rudely treated the families of others, obliging them to leave their houses in 24 hours, to their great detriment and loss. The council was so sensible of this, that Mr Veitch and Mr Blair were allowed 300 merks for their losses.

All the ministers appeared before the meeting at Ayr, and answered the questions put to them, with that meekness and candour, that most of the members were for dismissing them. But the archbishop wanting to get rid of these good men, Cochran prevailed to get them cited before the council next week at Edinburgh. They obeyed and appeared before a committee of the council on the 6th of April, and all frankly acknowledged they had preached, and admitted more to hear them than their own families, and promised that for the future, they would behave peaceably and soberly, as they had always done, and as became ministers of the gospel: then they subscribed their answers, upon which they were dismissed, and ordered to appear before the council on the 8th.

Being then called in, the lords told them that they deferred passing sentence at this time, but declared, that, if any of them should afterwards keep conventicles, they should be punished as the law directs. Upon this Mr Fullerton as had been concerted among themselves, desired liberty to speak; which being granted, he delivered himself thus:

My Lord Chancellor,

WE have already—confessed—what hath been our carriage, and—that as, in all our actings, we have carried with due respect to authority, as it became the ministers of the gospel, so we resolved to continue: and it is no small addition to our sufferings, that we should be—looked upon by any as justling with authority. Yet, considering that it hath been, in all the ages of the church, the case of the Lord's faithful servants, from which our Lord himself was not exempted, to be slandered as no friends to Cesar, we need not think it strange; for our witness is in heaven—that, as we desire to give 'unto God the things that are God's' so also unto Cesar the things that are Cesar's.—For we judge the fearers of God are the only loyal people in the world, only our loyalty is with subordination to our Lord Jesus Christ, who is 'King of kings and Lord of lords,'—and under him to the king's majesty and inferior magistrates, and in this line of subordination we shall deny nothing to the king that shall be demanded.—And, withal, our loyalty is not founded upon intrinsic grounds or self-principles and motives, but allenarly upon the basis of conscience.—Hence it was, that, when the royal family was in a low condition, we lay in the dust, and poured out our supplications to God in behalf of the king's majesty—

And now, seeing we have received our ministry from Jesus Christ, and must one day give an account to our Master how we have performed the same, we dare have no hand in the least to unminister ourselves, yea, the word is like a fire in our bosom seeking for a vent. And seeing, under the force of a command from authority, we have hitherto ceased from the public exercise of our ministry, and are wearied with forbearing,—it is our humble supplication to your lordship, that you would deal with the king's majesty in our behalf, that at least the indulgence granted to others of our way, within his dominions, may be extended to us also. Next, that Mr Nathaniel Fife be inhibited to meddle with us,—and that you would do something or other for the ease and relief of the poor oppressed people in our country, &c.

The council house was very full, and all were very attentive, so that at this time these ministers were dismissed. They went home and preached in their own houses; and thus the archbishop was disappointed; and Cochran is reported to have said in a pet, The ministers shall turn all upside down before I meddle with them again.

But though these ministers were thus dismissed, yet that very day, April the 8th, the council issued a proclamation against conventicles, declaring that every heritor in the shires of Lanerk, Renfrew, Ayr and stewartry of Kircudbright, upon whose estate any such shall be kept, should be fined in the sum of 50 l. sterling. There was no limitation nor restriction. Notwithstanding whereof ministers did preach, and the people received the word with all readiness of mind. Burnet says, this was plainly against law, for the council had no power, by their authority, to set arbitrary fines.

In the months of May and June several ministers were brought before the council; however, as they generally were not prosecuted, I shall not mention them. But, on the 3d of June, the council gave a commission to the archbishop and provost of Glasgow to make inquiry who were present at a conventicle lately kept in that city; for Mr James Hamilton late minister at Blantyre, had been informed against for preaching in his own house.

Next day Mr Thomas Wyllie obtained his liberty, upon giving bond to appear when call'd; and by this means several of the ministers and others got out of their long confinement.

On the 10th of June, Robert Gibson, Robert Paton, Robert Harper and William Cuthbertson were ordered to be transported for being at Pentland, as were several others whose names I know not.

Mr Hamilton, just now mentioned, was sent in prisoner to Edinburgh, and, without being in the least dampted, owned before a committee of the council, that he had preached in his own house at Glasgow. And, when they spoke to him of the bishop's lenity and favour, in permitting him to live so long in Glasgow, he replied, That it was easy to speak of lenity and favour: but he was assured he had not so much liberty and favour as Paul enjoyed under a violent persecuting heathen at Rome, where 'he remained two years in his own hired house,' and preached the gospel, and none was forbid to come to hear him; whereas the honest people of Glasgow and himself had been frequently threatned if they did not forbear. And, when they wanted him to give bond to preach no more this way, he said that he had his commission from Christ to preach the gospel, and he would not lay himself under any restrictions, whatever force others might bring him under. The chancellor asked him where his commission was. He answered, Matth. xxviii. 19. 'Go, teach and baptize. The chancellor replied, That is the apostles commission, Do you set up for an apostle? No, my lord, said he, nor for any extraordinary person either; but that place contains the commission of ordinary ministers of the gospel, as well as extraordinary ambassadors as the apostles were. Mr Hamilton, adhering to all this before the council, was, on the 24th of June, ordered to be kept in prison till he gave security not to exercise his public ministry; and a general rule was made that all ministers who should be apprehended, on account of conventicles, should be served the same way, which hindred ministers afterwards to appear when summoned; and this paved the way for denouncing and intercommuning of ministers, or declaring them out laws. Mr Hamilton after his health had been greatly impaired, was, by the interest of Robert Hamilton of Silvertoun hill, set at liberty, upon giving bond for 1000 merks to appear when called.

By this time the indulgence was expected, and the bishops in order to prevent one part of it from taking place place, viz. the 400. merks from the non indulged, got, it ſeems, the council, on the 8th of July, to appoint a committee to examine into the vacant ſtipends, which, by act of parliament, were ordered to be applied for the increaſe of the ſtock of univerſities.

Whether the indulgence that was now in agitation, was, by the firſt propoſers of it, as is very probable deſigned to divide the preſbyterians among themſelves, I ſhall not determine. Burnet ſays, that the people fell off entirely from all the epiſcopal clergy in the weſtern counties, and a ſet of hot fiery young teachers, went about among them inflaming them ſtill more and more, ſo that it was neceſſary to find a remedy for this. If the people were inflamed, it was by the irregular and cruel behaviour of the prelates, &c. and not by any hot fiery young teachers, as that hiſtorian is pleaſed to ſay, 'Leighton propoſed that a treaty ſhould be ſet on foot for accommodating differences. But this not being agreed to, the earl of Tweddale propoſed the granting to ſome of the ejected miniſters leave to go and ſerve in thoſe pariſhes, by an act of the king's indulgence.' Leighton was againſt this. Burnet ſays farther, that Mr Mitchel's attempt upon Sharp made him turn his thoughts to more moderate meaſures; and, being called to court, he, in general terms, approved of the methods of gentleneſs and moderation then in vogue. When he came back to Scotland, he moved in council that an indulgence might be granted to ſome of the public reſolutioners with ſome reſtraints, ſuch as, that they ſhould not ſpeak nor preach againſt epiſcopacy, though he could not but know that ſuch limitations would not be complied with. However, this author tells us, that the letter he (Burnet) ſent to the lord Tweeddale, giving a long account of the ſtate of the country, and adviſing to put ſome of the more moderate preſbyterians into the vacant churches, gave the deciding ſtroke to this affair.

Mr Woodrow ſays, that the earl of Tweddale had at this time frequent conferences with ſome preſbyterian miniſters, particularly Mr John Stirling, Mr Robert Douglas, and others, and prevailed with them to tend up a letter to court to be a handle to their friends at London. Tweddale went to court, either with this or ſoon after, and found his work the eaſier, that the preſbyterians in England were at preſent connived at in their meetings; ſo that his lordſhip upon the 15th of July, preſented to the council the following letter from the king.

CHARLES R.

RIGHT truſty and right well beloved couſins and counſellors, we greet you well. Whereas, by an act of council and proclamation at Glaſgow, in the year 1662, a conſiderable number of miniſters were at once turned out, and ſo debarred from preaching of the goſpel, and exerciſe of the miniſtry, we are graciouſly pleaſed to authoriſe you, our privy council, to appoint ſo many of the outed miniſters, as have lived peaceably and orderly in the places where they have reſided, to return and preach, and exerciſe other functions of the miniſtry in the pariſh churches, where they formerly reſided and ſerved (provided they be vacant) and to allow patrons to preſent to other vacant churches, ſuch others of them as you ſhall approve of; and that ſuch of theſe miniſters as ſhall take collation from the biſhop of the dioceſe, and keep preſbyteries and ſynods, may be warranted to lift their ſtipends as other miniſters of the kingdom: but for ſuch as are not, or ſhall not be collated by the biſhop, that they have no warrant to meddle with the vacant ſtipend, but only to poſſeſs the manſe and glebe; and that you appoint a collector for theſe and all other vacant ſtipends, who ſhall iſſue the ſame, and pay an yearly maintenance to the ſaid not collated miniſters, as you ſhall ſee fit to appoint.

That all who are reſtored, and allowed to exerciſe the miniſtry, be, in our name and by our authority, enjoined to conſtitute and keep kirk-ſeſſions, and to keep preſbyteries and ſynods, as was done by all miniſters before 1638. And that ſuch of them as ſhall not obey our command in keeping preſbyteries, be confined within the bounds of the pariſhes where they preach, any and while they give aſſurance to keep preſbyteries for the future.

That all who ſhall be allowed to preach be ſtrictly enjoined not to admit any of their neighbours, or any other pariſhes, unto their communions, nor baptize their children, nor marry any of them without the allowance of the miniſter of the pariſh to which they belong, unleſs it be vacant for the time. And if it be found upon complaint made by any preſbytery to you our privy-council, that the people of the neighbouring or other pariſhes reſort to their preaching, and deſert their own pariſh churches that according to the degree of the offence or diſorder, you ſilence the miniſter, who countenances the ſame, for ſhorter or longer time and, upon a ſecond complaint verified, that you ſilence again for a longer time, or altogether turn out, as you ſhall ſee cauſe, and, upon complaint made and verified, of any ſeditious diſcourſe or expreſſions in the pulpit, or elſewhere, uttered by any of thoſe miniſters you are immediately to turn them out, and farther puniſh them according to law, and the degree of the offence.

That ſuch of the outed miniſters who have behaved peaceably and orderly, and are not re-entered or preſented as aforeſaid, have allowed to them four hundred merks Scots yearly out of the vacant churches for their maintenance till they be provided of churches; and that even ſuch who ſhall give aſſurance to live ſo, for the future, be allowed the ſame yearly maintenance.

And ſeeing by theſe orders we have taken away all pretences to conventicles and provided for the wants of ſuch as are and will be peaceable, if any ſhall be found hereafter to preach without authority, or keep conventicles, our expreſs pleaſure is, that you proceed with all ſeverity againſt the preachers and hearers, as ſeditious perſons and contemners of our authority. So leaving the management of theſe orders to your prudence, and recommending them to your care, we bid you farewel. Given at our court at Whit hall June 7th 1669.

By his majeſty's command,

LAUDERDALE.'

Whether the following remarks, which have been made upon this letter, are juſt and well grounded, muſt be left with the reader: 1. That the civil magiſtrates take upon them to depoſe miniſters from, and reſtore them to the exerciſe of their miniſtry, as they ſee proper, and to what places they judge convenient. 2 This letter, ſays, That certain miniſters were turned out and deprived of the exerciſe of their miniſtry by an act of council and now the king gives authority to the council to reſtore them; and conſequently all the power granted to the council to act in his affairs was derived from the king alone, and therefore the indulgence itſelf was the effect of the ſupremacy. 3 That the miniſters to be indulged were laid under unlawful reſtrictions particularly to uſe no ſeditious diſcourſes or expreſſions in the pulpit, or elſewhere, which all preaching or ſpeaking againſt prelacy and the eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy was then accounted: that unleſs they keep preſbyteries and ſynods viz. thoſe held by the biſhops, they muſt be confined to the pariſhes where they preach: that they were not to admit any except thoſe of their own pariſhes, to partake of the ordinances unleſs thoſe who belonged to vacant pariſhes, under high penalties &c. 4. That the deſign of this favour to be granted to ſome miniſters was to prevent others from preaching to any but their own families, for, ſays his majeſty, by theſe orders we have taken away all pretences for conventicles. 5. that the 400 merks mentioned in the laſt paragraph ſave one, was ſeldom made good. Now, how far they were to blame who complied with this indulgence, is not for me to determine; the reader will afterwards hear what ſome ſaid in their own defence for refuſing to accept it. See the hiſtory of indulgence, p. 5 6, &c.

When the above letter was read in council it met with a good deal of oppoſition: ſo that the favour mentioned was delayed for ſome time, and a committee was appointed to conſider the contents of it, to pitch upon the miniſters to be indulged, and to make draughts of the acts of council relating to this matter. And the biſhops and others of the clergy met in the mean time to hinder its taking place as much as poſſible. They could not prevent it altogether; but Sharp, who was a compleat maſter of diſſimulation, to comfort his brethren, promiſed to make it a bone of contention: and, as I have hinted, this ſeems to have been the deſign of it.

About this time a propoſal was ſet on foot for uniting the two kingdoms. 'The king, ſays Burnet, liked it very well because he reckoned that, at leaſt in his time, he ſhould be ſure of all the members that ſhould be ſent from Scotland. The duke of Buckingham went in eaſily to a new thing, and lord keeper Bridgman was much for it. Lord Lauderdale preſſed it vehemently; but then this affair made it neceſſary to hold a parliament in Scotland, where he intended to be the king's commiſſioner.'

Accordingly, on the 15th of July, a proclamation was iſſued for calling a new parliament; and care was taken to manage the elections ſo as the king and biſhops might be well ſerved, and any arbitrary and illegal ſteps taken by the council approved of. But to return,

The committee above mentioned having prepared things, and the miniſters with whom they were to begin having notice given them on the 27th of July the lords of his majeſty's privy-council, in purſuance of his majeſty's letter, dated June the 7th, did appoint the following miniſters to preach and exerciſe their other functions at the following vacant kirks, viz. Meſſrs Ralph Rogers late at Glaſgow, at Kilwinning; George Hutchiſon late at Edinburgh, at Irvine; William Violant late at Ferrie, at Cambuſnethan; Robert Millar late at Ochiltree, at the ſame church; John Parkh..: at Stranrawer, at the ſame church; William Maitland late at Whitehorn, at Beith: John Oliphant late at Stonehouſe, at the ſame kirk; John Bell late at Ardroſſan, at the ſame kirk; John Cant late at Kells, at the ſame kirk, and John MacMichan late at Dalry, at the ſame kirk. The ſame day the council made an act concerning miniſters indulged, or to be indulged, almoſt in the terms of the king's letter; but without taking notice of the 400 merks.

On the 29th of July colonel Robert Barclay, who had been apprehended on ſuſpicion, was permitted to reſide at his own houſe at Ury till January, and ſome months after was wholly freed from his reſtraint. And on the ſame day William Wallace of Carnhill got up a bond that was extorted from him by Sir William Bannantyne.

On the 3d of Auguſt Mr Robert Duncan, late miniſter at Dumbernie, who had been ſeveral years under reſtraint was ſet at liberty, and the following miniſters were indulged, viz. Meſſrs John Scot late at Oxnam, there; William Hamilton late at Glaſsford, at Evandale; Robert Mitchel late at Luſs, there; John Gemble late at Symingtoun, there; Patrick Campbell late at Inverary, there; Robert Duncanſon late at Lochanſide, at Kildochrenan; and Andrew Cameron late at Kilfinnan, at Lochhead in Kintyre.

This day all the miniſters who were indulged appeared before the council to receive their acts of indulgence, or licences, of which there were two forms, the one relating to thoſe who were to ſerve at their own churches now vacant, the other relating to thoſe who were appointed elſewhere.

The tenor of Mr Roger's act as is follows,

'The lords of his majeſty's privy-council, in purſuance of his majeſty's commands, ſignified the 7th of June laſt, do appoint Mr Ralph Rogers, late miniſter at Glaſgow, to preach and exerciſe the other functions of the miniſtry at the kirk of Kilwinning.'

The tenor of Mr Millar's was,

'Forasmeikle as the kirk of Ochiltree is vacant, the lords of his majeſty's privy-council, in purſuance of his majeſty's commands, ſignified by his letter the 7th of June laſt, and in regard of the conſent of the patron, do appoint Mr Robert Millar, late miniſter there, to teach and exerciſe the other functions of the miniſtry at the ſaid kirk of Ochiltree.'

When the clerk had read both theſe, and then the act of council above mentioned, a copy was delivered to each of the miniſters. After which Mr George Hutchiſon, as had been concerted, aſked leave to ſpeak; which having obtained, he ſaid:

My Lords,

I AM deſired, in the name of my brethren here preſent, to acknowlege in all humility and thankfulneſs his majeſty's royal favour in granting us liberty and the public exerciſe of our miniſtry, after ſo long a reſtraint from the ſame; and to return hearty thanks to your lordſhips for the care and pains taken therein; and that your lordſhips have been pleaſed to make us, the unworthieſt of many of our brethren, ſo early partakers of the ſame.

'We having received our miniſtry from Jeſus Chriſt, with full preſcriptions from him for regulating us therein, muſt in the diſcharge thereof be countable to him: and as there can be nothing more deſireable or refreſhing to us upon earth, than to have free liberty of the exerciſe of our miniſtry, under protection of lawful authority, the excellent ordinance of God, and to us moſt dear and precious, ſo we purpoſe and reſolve to behave ourſelves, in the diſcharge of the miniſtry, with that wiſdom and prudence which becomes faithful miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, and to demean ourſelves towards lawful authority, notwithſtanding our known judgments in church-affairs, as well becomes loyal ſubjects, and that from a principle of conſcience.

'And now, my lords, our prayer to God is, that the Lord may bleſs his majeſty in his perſon and government, and your lordſhips in your public adminiſtrations, and eſpecially in purſuance of his majeſty's mind teſtified in his letter, wherein his ſingular moderation eminently appears, that others of our brethren may in due time be made ſharers of the liberty that, through his majeſty's favour we now enjoy.'

This ſpeech was much cenſured, as not being a ſufficient teſtimony againſt the plain eraſtianiſm in the indulgence. It is indeed certain that theſe miniſters owned the king's letter as the only riſe and fountain of the favour they were then partakers of; and therefore, how far their complying was conſiſtent with their principles as preſbyterians, or how far they could be juſtified in receiving this favour for themſelves, while their brethren were ſtill expoſed to ſevere hardſhips, muſt be left with the reader.

For this very day a ſevere proclamation was iſſued againſt conventicles, commanding all heritors to inform againſt any who, within their bounds, ſhould take upon them to preach or carry on worſhip in ſuch aſſemblies to the ſtewards, lords, bailies of regalities, &c. who were commanded, under the higheſt penalties, to ſearch for, apprehend and impriſon ſuch preachers in order to their being proſecuted. And indeed one deſign of the indulgence was to bear down and ſuppreſs all ſuch private aſſemblies, as is expreſly declared in the king's letter.

I cannot here omit the peculiar caſe of Mr John Park, one of the firſt ten indulged. The biſhop of Galloway, in order to prevent his return to Stranrawer, admitted one Naſmith to that church about three days after Mr Park was indulged by the council. The town and parish oppoſed this admiſſion, and unanimouſly adhered to their old miniſter. Upon which the biſhop ordered all parties to be ſummoned to Edinburgh, that the council might determine in this competition. When Mr Park was before the council, Mr Naſmith accuſed him with ordering the church doors to be locked after his admiſſion, and exciting ſeveral gentlemen to leave the church, &c. But though all appeared to be falſe, and though his act of indulgence was prior to the curate's admiſſion, yet the latter was ſuſtained.

On the 1ſt of September, Mr Donald Cargill, in conſequence of his petition, had his confinement taken off, providing he obliged himſelf not to reſide, on any account whatſoever, within the town of Glaſgow, nor in the town and ſuburbs of Edinburgh, without warrant from the lords of ſeſſion and exchequer.

Next day the following ſeven miniſters were indulged, viz. Meſſrs Robert Douglas late at Edinburgh, at Pancaitland, (though only during the preſent vacancy, till a proceſs ſhould be decided; Matthew Ramſay late at Kilpatrick, at Paiſley: Alexander Hamilton late at Dalmeny, there; Andrew Dalrymple late at Auchinleck, at Dalgen; James

Fletcher

Fletcher late at Newtborn, there; Andrew MacLean late at Craignies, at Kilchattan; and Donald Moriſon late at Kilmaglaſs, at Ardnamurchan.

The ſame day the council ordered the king's advocate to commence, before the parliament, a proceſs of forfeiture againſt thoſe guilty of rebellion 1666, who were excepted out of the king's indemnity, and have as yet neither been forfeited nor pardoned.

This month the epiſcopal ſynod of Glaſgow ſat down, and their proceedings iſſued in the deprivation of the archbiſhop, who with his clergy were out of meaſure enraged at the indulgence. To uſe the words of a noted hiſtorian, 'When it came to be diſcanted upon, it appeared to be plainly againſt law; for, by the act reſtoring epiſcopacy, none were capable of benefices but ſuch as ſhould own the authority of biſhops, and be inſtituted by them. So now the epiſcopal party, that were wont to put all authority in the king, as long as he was for them, began to talk of law. They ſaid, the king's power was bounded by law, and that theſe proceedings were the trampling of law under foot.' It was moved in the ſynod, 'that an addreſs might be drawn up, repreſenting to the king the miſeries they were under, occaſioned by the indulgence; they complained of it as illegal, and like to be fatal to the church.' It alſo bore hard upon the king's ſupremacy, which theſe very gentlemen had ſworn to ſupport and maintain. The true genius of paſſive obedience men! Such a paper as this could not but make a conſiderable noiſe.

Accordingly, on the laſt day of September, the council being informed that ſuch a petition, remonſtrance or grievances, had been debated in the late ſynod at Glaſgow, required the archbiſhop forthwith to call for the ſaid papers, in order to their being preſented to the council on the 14th of next October, and that Mr James Ramſay, dean of Glaſgow, and Mr Roſs parſon there, who drew up theſe papers, appear before the council the ſame day, and that the clerk do bring along with him the records of the ſynod.

On this ſame 30th of September, William Southram, who had been a priſoner in the Canongate jail for being at a conventicle, was ſet at liberty, upon finding bail to appear when called, under the penalty of 500 merks. And the ſame day the council granted their indulgence to Meſſrs John Stirling late at Edinburgh, at Hownam; Robert Mowat late at Temple, at Heriot; James Hamilton late at Egleſham, there; Robert Hunter late at Corſtorphin, at Dunning; and John Forreſt late at Tullialan, at Tillicultry.

On the 14th of October, Lauderdale, who was appointed commiſſioner to the enſuing parliament, produced before the council a paper ſent by the archbiſhop of Glaſgow; and, after reading, it was remitted to the conſideration of a committee, who made their report on the 16th, when the council declared it to be a paper of a dangerous nature and conſequence, tending to the depraving of his majeſty's laws, and miſconſtructing of the proceedings of his majeſty and his council; and, in the manner of the conveying thereof, to be moſt illegal and unwarrantable; and therefore ordered it to be ſuppreſſed, and that the principal paper, with the depoſitions of the dean and parſon of Glaſgow, be delivered to the commiſſioner, and an extract of this act of council tranſmitted to the king.

The parliament ſat down on the 19th of October, before his majeſty's pleaſure could be known in this affair; and the ſeſſion was opened with reading the king's letter, which chiefly related to the deſigned union, which the commiſſioner moſt earneſtly recommended; and, to engage the biſhops and their party, who were chagrined at the indulgence, he inſiſted upon the king's fixed reſolution inviolably to maintain epiſcopacy, and ſuppreſs conventicles. All the members ſigned the declaration, obliging themſelves to maintain prelacy.

The day after the parliament met, the council, being informed of an horrid inſolence committed upon Mr John Row miniſter at Balmaclellan in Galloway, ordered all acceſſory to it to appear before them: the pariſhioners were likewiſe commanded to come, and hear and ſee themſelves fined, and otherwiſe cenſured according to the acts of council in March and June 1667, Mr Row complained, that three perſons in womens cloathes came in the night time, took him out of his bed, beat him and broke open his trunks, and took away what they had a-mind. And Mr Thomas Warner, his father-in-law, James Grier of Milmark, Gordon of Holm, Gordon of Gordonſtoun, John Carſan and James Chalmer, heritors of the pariſh, were charged as being either actors or acceſſory to this violence. Though, conſidering their diſtance from Edinburgh, they could not come at the firſt ſederunt of council, yet they were all found guilty for not appearing; and the heritors and liferenters of the pariſh were ordered to pay to Mr Row 1200 l. Scots: and tho' they, and the other heritors, came as ſoon as poſſible, and offered to ſtand trial, they were not admitted; but were ordered to pay their part of the fine impoſed. Of the like nature was the complaint of Mr Lyon, curate at Orr, who was inſulted in the night-time: for which the pariſh was ordered to pay him 600 l. and letters were directed againſt one John Smith alledged to be concerned in the attempt. Though theſe attempts are not to be juſtified, yet why the innocent ſhould be puniſhed for the guilty, and why thoſe who offered themſelves to trial ſhould not be heard, muſt be left to the determination of the reader. But to return to the parliament.

Though one chief deſign of this parliament was to pave the way for an union between the two kingdoms, yet all that was done relating to that, was, that an act paſſed for a treaty about it; whereas the two firſt acts were of more importance, and had a deeper deſign.

The firſt explained and aſſerted the king's ſupremacy, but carried it in ſuch general words, that it might have been ſtretched to every thing, as the reader will ſee from the act itſelf, which I here inſert.

Act anent the ſupremacy, November 16. 1669.

THE eſtates of parliament, having ſeriouſly conſidered how neceſſary it is, for the good and peace of the church and ſtate, that his majeſty's power and authority, in relation to matters and perſons eccleſiaſtical, be more clearly aſſerted by an act of parliament, have therefore thought fit it be enacted, aſſerted and declared; likeas his majeſty, with advice and conſent of his eſtates of parliament, doth hereby enact, aſſert and declare, that his majeſty hath the ſupreme authority and ſupremacy over all perſons and in all cauſes eccleſiaſtical within this his kingdom and that, by virtue thereof, the ordering and diſpoſal of the external government and policy of the church doth properly belong to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors, as an inherent right to the crown; and that his majeſty and his ſucceſſors may ſettle, enact and emit ſuch conſtitutions, acts and orders, concerning the adminiſtration of the external government of the church, and the perſons employed in the ſame, and concerning all eccleſiaſtical meetings and matters to be propoſed and determined therein, as they, in their royal wiſdom, ſhall think fit; which acts, orders and conſtitutions, being recorded in the books of council, and duly publiſhed, are to be obſerved and obeyed by all his majeſty's ſubjects; any law, act or cuſtom to the contrary notwithſtanding. Likeas his majeſty, with advice and conſent foreſaid, doth reſcind and annul all laws, acts and clauſes thereof, and all cuſtoms and conſtitutions, civil or eccleſiaſtic, which are contrary to, or inconſiſtent with his majeſty's ſupremacy, as it is hereby aſſerted, and declares the ſame void and null in all time coming.

The reader cannot but ſee, that, by this act, the king may do what he pleaſes with reſpect to church-affairs. If he ſhould think fit to pull down epiſcopacy, and ſet up preſbytery, the biſhops could not complain, ſince they had voted him ſuch an abſolute ſupremacy; nay, did he, or his ſucceſſors, introduce popery, they might juſtly plead this act of parliament. Biſhop Burnet ſays, lord Lauderdale very probably knew the ſecret of the duke [of York's] religion, and had got into his favour; ſo it is very likely he intended to eſtabliſh himſelf in it, by putting the church of Scotland wholly in his power. But, ſays he, that was yet a ſecret to us all in Scotland. The method he took to get it paſſed was this. He told all thoſe who loved preſbytery, or that did not much favour the bishops, that it was necessary to keep them [the bishops] under, by making them depend absolutely on the king.—He made the nobility see they needed fear no more the insolence of the bishops, if they were at mercy, as this would make them. Sharp did not like it, but durst not oppose it. Leighton was against any such act; — yet he gave his vote for it. He farther says, At that time there was no apprehensions of the danger of popery. Many of the best of the episcopal clergy, Nairn and Charteris in particular, were highly offended at the act. They thought it plainly made the king our pope. So far the doctor. It is easy then for the reader to imagine what the sentiments of all true Presbyterians must be. I shall make no farther remarks on this act, than to observe, that the earl of Tweedale protested to Dr Burnet, as he tells us himself, that his chief end in it was to justify the indulgence, which was certainly granted contrary to several laws then in force; and consequently, as this indulgence flowed from the supremacy, so nothing but the act of supremacy, renewed and extended, could screen the members of council in granting it to ministers who had the laws against them; and this was one reason why their acceptance was condemned.

The next act that passed related to the militia, wherein the power of arming the subjects, and raising them in arms, is likewise placed among the inherent rights of the crown. Burnet says, 'It was enacted, that the militia should still be kept up, and be ready to march into any of the king's dominions, for any cause in which his majesty's authority, power, or greatness should be concerned; and that the orders should be transmitted to them from the council-board, without any mention of orders from the king. Upon this great reflections were made; for when jealousies broke out in England of the ill designs that lay hid under this matter, it was thought, that, if the king should call in the Scottish army, it would not be necessary that he himself should send any orders for it; but, that upon a secret intimation, the council might do it without order, and then, if the design should miscarry, it should not ly on the king, but only on the council, whom, in that case, the king might disown, and so those about the king would be blameless.

The 5th act was for the security of the persons of the clergy, ratifying the proclamation of the council the 25th of March and 6th of June 1667.

By the eleventh act, concerning the forfeiture of persons in the late rebellion, what the council and justiciary had formerly done was ratified and approved of, so that now there is a parliamentary forfeiture of these persons in absence. The parliament rose the 23d of December.

Mean while, on the 9th of December, the following five ministers were indulged, viz. Mess. James Veitch late at Manchlin, there; Alexander Blair late at Galstoun, there; John Primrose, late at Queensferry, there; David Brown late at Craigie there; and John Crawford late at ——, at Lamenton. But the same day, the council being informed that — Hamilton of Kinkell; John Balcanqual brother to the laird of that ilk, and John Geddie steward to the town clerk of Fife, had been present at a conventicle in that shire, they were summoned to appear on the 16th instant, under the pain of rebellion; but no more is mentioned concerning them.

However, on that day the council, considering that Mr Matthew Ramsay, who was appointed to be minister at Paisley, was not able, by reason of his bodily infirmities, to officiate, did, with the consent of the patron, and of Mr Ramsay, appoint Mr John Baird late minister at Innerwick, to the church of Paisley; so that this year there were 35 indulged by the council in consequence of the king's letter.

Some time this month, Sir William Cuningham of Cuninghamhead, Sir William Muir of Rowallan, Sir George Maxwell of Nether-pollock, Sir James Stewart and Sir John Chiesly, were all set at liberty.

Much about this time a letter came from the king laying aside the archbishop of Glasgow from acting any more in that station. The historian of his own time says, That, by the act of supremacy, the king was now master, and could turn out bishops at pleasure. This had its first effect on Burnet, who was offered a pension if he would submit and resign, and was threatened to be treated more severely if he stood out. However, he complied, and retired to a private state of life, and bore his disgrace better than he had done his honours. This change was very agreeable to the Presbyterians, who suffered exceedingly at the instigation of this man.

CHAP. IX.

Of the indulged, the proceedings against conventicles, the actings of the western committee, Leighton's accommodation, the laws and acts of parliament; with an account of the second indulgence, and other things, till the end of the year 1673.

THE indulgence granted last year afforded, doubtless, some relief to those who could accept of it, while others were still exposed to the hardships of the time, though not to that rigour as when Burnet was archbishop of Glasgow.

On the 1st of January 1670, Mr William Tullidef, late minister of Dunboig, was indulged to officiate at Kilbirnie; the same day the council ordered the stipends to be paid to the indulged ministers.

On the 6th of January the commissioner signified to the council that the archbishop of Glasgow had resigned his office and dignity, and desired his name might be taken out of the rolls of council, as being no more a member of it. At the same time the dean and parson of Glasgow was reprimanded by the council, but afterwards was pardoned and restored to their charges. The archbishop was, after some years, restored, as we shall relate in its proper place.

The same day the council being informed that Mr Robert Boyd, curate of Carmonnock, had been robbed by persons unknown, ordered letters to be directed against the heritors of the parish. Accordingly, the parish being fined in the sum of 50 l. sterling. Sir Archibald Stewart of Castlemilk paid the fine, which was given to Mr Boyd. This, with such like attempts, gave rise to the wilful committee, of which we shall hear in its place.

Mean while the indulged ministers soon found themselves in more straitening circumstances than at first they apprehended. Thus, when they received their licenses, they agreed among themselves to keep up the practice of lecturing, or expounding a portion of scripture before the forenoon's sermon, which had been out of use since the establishment of episcopacy. But the bishops complaining of this as an innovation, the council, on the 13th of January, passed an act forbidding this useful and edifying exercise, signifying, that whosoever used it should be discharged the exercise of their ministry within the kingdom. Though, according to the indulgence, ministers were to preach and perform the other functions of the ministry, yet they were forbidden to expound the scriptures; how consistent this was with their licence the reader must judge.

It is not to be denied but the indulgence was granted as the most effectual method to suppress conventicles, and therefore the same day the military received new instructions, upon information of a numerous conventicle kept since last November, to apprehend the minister and the most considerable heritors and tenants, and, upon their refusing to give security for their appearance before the council by a certain day, to send them in prisoners with a party, together with a list of persons to witness against them. This not only made the soldiers severe, but likewise obliged both ministers and people to repair to the fields, where they could, with the greater ease, disperse themselves, and excited some to take arms with them to defend themselves and their ministers.

The same day a very good proclamation was issued by the council against papists, but little or no pains was taken to put it in execution, the greater thing being to bear down the protestant non conformists.

Accordingly, the very next day, being January the 14th, Mr Andrew Mortoun, minister at Carmonnock, was, by the council's order, committed prisoner to Edinburgh, for preaching in the said parish, and was afterwards sent to Stirling, where he continued under confinement till November, when, by reason of his bodily indisposition, he was was set at liberty; only he must remain at his own house at Glasgow during pleasure. He preached there almost every day to such of the citizens as came to hear him, except on Wednesdays, which he reserved for those of his own congregation, who, being but four miles distant, came in great numbers. Much about the same time Mr Hugh Archibald minister at Strathaven, and Mr John Rae minister at Symington, were apprehended and sent prisoners to Edinburgh, and afterwards to Stirling, for preaching and baptizing in houses.

Mr Alexander Wedderburn, late minister at — was upon the 27th of January, indulged to officiate at Kilmarnock, and,

On the 3d of February, Kersland was sent from Edinburgh to Dumbarton castle. When this gentleman was forfeited, he thought proper to retire for safety to Utrecht, where he continued with his family some time, till his friends thought necessary he should come home, though as private as possible. His lady came over about the latter end of last year, and he followed her in a little time; but when he came to Edinburgh he found her in a fever. She lodged with a gentlewoman who was a well-wisher to the suffering cause, and he lodged in a more retired place, and generally came to see her in the evenings; which being observed by Cannon of Mordrogget, the chancellor got information, and an order was procured from Lauderdale, then in town, to apprehend Mr Welsh for a conventicle he kept in lady Kersland's chamber, though the chief design was upon Kersland himself. Accordingly a party was sent, and finding no conventicle there, the officer begged the lady's pardon, and retired. But Mordrogget having informed one of the party, that Kersland usually concealed himself behind the bed, he went and apprehended him. His lady behaved with a becoming calmness, comforted him, and entreated him to do nothing to wound his conscience, for her sake or his childrens, repeating that scripture, 'No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.' He was imprisoned at Edinburgh, and this day was sent to Dumbarton, where he remained near a year and a half.

The same day a very severe proclamation was agreed upon in council against conventicles; by virtue of which, not only the magistrates, but also the officers of the militia, were impowered to search out such meetings, and apprehend the preachers and principal persons who attended upon them. These violent measures obliged ministers and people to take to the fields, and defend themselves the best way they could.

On the 10th of February, the council, being informed of two numerous conventicles about Kirkintillock, near Glasgow, ordered Mr Hamilton and Mr Mitchel the preachers to be apprehended and sent to Edinburgh. Sundine after one Robert Bute of Glasgow was fined in 100 merks for being present. The beginning of next month the magistrates of Edinburgh renewed their bond anent conventicles. And,

On the 3d of March the following ministers were indulged, viz. Messr. John Lauder late at Dalziel there; George Ramsay late at ——, at Kilmawers; John Spalding late at ——, at Dreghorn; Thomas Black late at —, at Newtyle; Andrew MacLean late at ——, at Kilbro and Kilquhannan; Andrew Duncanson late at —, at Kilchattan in Lorn. These were the last who reaped the benefit of the first indulgence, who were in all 42; but, as we have already observed, they soon found themselves abridged in the liberty they expected, particularly by the act of council against lecturing.

Mr Gilbert Burnet, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, having been chosen professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, tells us, that the clergy came and laid their grievances and complaints before him, and that the gentlemen of the country made such complaints of the vices, irregularities, and indiscretions of the clergy, that though he could not believe all, yet it was impossible not to believe a great deal. He says farther, that they were very ill used; and it is not unlikely this might be the case of some, for the people were generally set against them. And therefore he proposed that a committee of the council might be sent round the country to examine matters, and give such orders as were at present necessary for the public quiet, and prepare a report against the next session of parliament, that proper remedies might be found out.

Accordingly, on the 7th of April, the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Linlithgow, Dumfries, Kincardin, Dundonald, the lord clerk-register, and lieutenant general Drummond, or any four of them, received a commission from the council to execute the laws against the keepers of conventicles, to examine into the abusive attempts committed against the orthodox ministers, to call before them such persons as they shall be informed have transgressed the acts of parliament, &c. And among other particular instructions, they were to enquire into the affair of the minister of Maybole, the abuse done to Mr Irvine minister at Kilmacolm, &c. and how the indulged ministers have observed the act of council against lecturing, &c.

At the same time orders were sent to the officers of the army to obey the commands of the said commissioners, or any one of them. And the same day the council passed an act in favour of such of the episcopal incumbents as had been thrust out from their charges, appointing them to be maintained in their benefices and stipends according to their rights thereunto.

When this committee was at Ayr, Mr Jaffray the curate at Maybole renewed his complaints, that some of his parishioners had attempted to murder him, by discharging a pistol at his breast. He said the ball came upon a book which he had in his breast, under his coat, which was the only thing that saved his life. But the story appeared to be forged; for though the book was pierced, yet it was found that the coat which was over the book was whole and entire; so that, the curate failing in his proofs, the matter ended in laughter.

Mr Irvine at Kilmacolm was very ill liked among his parishioners. While he was preaching one Lord's day, some boys threw a piece of a rotten stick at the pulpit; upon the noise it made Mr Irvine left the pulpit, and went to his own house, being followed by some of the boys with huzzas and cries. Upon this a report was spread, that a minister had been stoned out of his pulpit, and forced to flee for his life to the manse; but when the committee examined this affair, they found it only a frolic of idle boys. However, the matter being transmitted to the council, they found James Watson, James Ranken, John Hattrick, and William Sinclair, guilty of the riot, and ordered them to be transported to the plantations; but the last two, because of their youth, were pardoned, upon their making a public acknowlegement before the congregation. Whether the sentence was executed against the first two is not known. The parish was first fined in 50 l. sterling, and then encreased to 100 l. to be paid to the curate. And the lairds of Douchal and Carncurran, then at Edinburgh, were discharged to leave the town till they paid the said sum. Upon examination, the members of this committee plainly saw, that all, or most of the alledged disorders committed by the common people, were owing to the ill conduct of the incumbents.

As this committee examined into these abuses, so, according to their instructions, they took account of the indulged ministers with respect to their observing the act of council against lecturing. These ministers being apprehensive that they would be examined as to this, met together, and agreed to keep up the practice, although they used different methods. Some, it seems, forbore it, but others altered their former method, and, instead of one chapter, or part of a large one, read two or more chapters, which came nearest to the prescriptions in the directory. Others read a whole chapter, and pitched upon some verse of it for their text, and in opening the text explained the context. But these different practices neither satisfied the committee, nor were agreeable to many of their hearers. However when they were examined before the committee, they gave an account of their different practices, and yet, contrary to expectation, moderate measures prevailed.

While the committe sat at Glasgow, the curates gave in lists of many non conformists who were alledged to have kept conventicles. Several were fined on that account, but the particulars are not known.

The town of Edinburgh having been a great shelter to the the ejected ministers, the magistrates received orders from the council to turn them all out. And the provost having got a list of them from the bishop, sent the town-officers to seize them; however, none were apprehended except Mr George Johnstoun minister at Newbottle, who being examined, and owning his having preached on week days, and on the Lord's day, after four o'clock, when the public worship was over, and refusing to engage not to keep conventicles, the council banished him the town of Edinburgh, and confined him to the parish of Borthwick during their pleasure; and it was the end of the year before his confinement was taken off. The hardships of other presbyterian ministers, by the soldiers having orders to quarter in their houses till their families should remove, were so great, that they were forced to seek a new shelter; for many were in danger of their life. But though many of them were reduced to straitening circumstances, yet God wonderfully provided for them.

On the 13th of May, Mrs Elisabeth Cuningham, lady Hilderstoun, was fined by the council in 400 merks, for a conventicle in her house; as were Nichol Gardiner merchant in Edinburgh in 200 l. and to be imprisoned till he discovered the minister; and James Clarkson, Archibald Hendry, William Leick, and David Jamie, in 100 l. each, all for being at the same meeting. And the magistrates of Edinburgh, according to their bond, were fined in 50 l. sterling. Such were the hardships of the times! And, on the 9th of June, the heritors of the parish of Neilstoun were fined in 1000 l. Scots for a riot on Mr Kinnier the incumbent, and Allan Stewart of Kirktoun was ordered to continue at Edinburgh till it was paid.

The multitudes who went after the preaching of the word were so great that houses could not contain them, so that now field meetings, which, of all others, were most violently opposed, became frequent, three of which made great noise. About the middle of June, Mr John Blackadder and Mr John Dickson preached to a numerous assembly at Beeth-hill, in the parish of Dunfermline. One Lord's day a lieutenant of the militia rode upon horseback, and gave the meeting great disturbance: whereupon a person more courageous than the rest came up to him, and having in vain intreated him to withdraw peaceably, took his horse by the bridle, presented a pistol, and threatened to shoot him if he was not silent. The lieutenant continued upon this peaceably till the worship was over, and then had liberty to go where he pleased. The news of this horrid insult, as it was called, soon reached Edinburgh, and Sharp knew well how to improve it; so that many were brought to trouble on account of it. Robert Walwood of Touch was fined in 500 merks, and ordered to ly in prison till it was paid. Mr Alexander Hasty (after the revolution one of the ministers of Glasgow), Adam Stobie of Lusear, William Adam merchant in Culross, James Slop in Borrowstounness, David Mather elder in Brignies, John Ranken in Bonhard, and James Duncan in Grange, were taken, and, refusing to inform against others, were each fined in 400 merks, and ordered to ly in irons during pleasure; and afterwards they, together with Mr John Vernor and Robert Orr in Milbank, who had a child baptized there, were ordered to be banished the king's dominions, and not to return upon pain of death. James Dundass, brother to the laird of Dundass, was likewise ordered to be transported, but, upon giving his oath upon some interrogatories relating to this conventicle, was set at liberty. Many others were brought under great hardships for this conventicle, as Margaret Martin lady Colvil's gentlewoman, and Bessie Young her servant, who lay in prison a long time.

Another field meeting was held, much about the same time, at Livingseat in the parish of Carnwath, on account of which many suffered in the same manner as those mentioned in the last paragraph, particularly that pious youth Mr John Vernor, who, it seems, was at both; and, refusing to inform upon oath against any who were present was committed close prisoner, ordered to ly in irons during the council's pleasure, and to be fed with bread and water. During this confinement his leg gangrened, which had almost cost him his life; and notwithstanding all the intercession that was made for him, it was November before he and Robert Orr were set at liberty, upon giving security under the penalty of 500 merks each, to appear when called. John Carmichael in Blackburn and David Carmichael in Potishaw were fined in 100 merks each for being at this meeting.

The council being informed of a third field meeting at the Torwood ordered the earl of Callender to use his interest for suppressing conventicles in Stirlingshire; accordingly Charles Campbell in Airth, refusing to inform, was sentenced to be transported for being at this meeting.

Mr John Menzies, minister at Calverock near Dumfries, observing the severities against protestants, while the papists remained unmolested, notwithstanding the several remonstrances he had made to the bishop in the diocesan meeting, and to the brethren of the exercise, against the growth of popery, at first withdrew from their meetings, and at last, on the 12th of July, sent in his written testimony to the presbytery of Dumfries, in which he says,

"THAT which hath—been matter of lamentation to many, is, that when—the abominations of popery was almost rooted out of our land, that noisom weed hath, of late years, got a great footing among us again. And when not only—popery—but also profanity of all sorts abounds among all ranks and degrees:—and while many of the godly—are mourning in secret for these abominations, as being a sad prognostic of the Lord's departing from us, and a judicial stroke of his vengeance.—It is not unknown to some of you, that, in some of the late synods, I did regret the growth of these ills, and intreat that some effectual remedy might be used for preventing their farther increase; albeit much was promised, yet nothing hath been performed. I likewise often represented—the abounding of these in most parishes of this presbytery, and particularly within the bounds of my charge.—The last day I was at your meeting, I desired that, by an act of the presbytery, papists might be prosecuted, as well as the profane, &c. but was plainly refused of that day,—it being declared not to be seasonable; and some of you asserting them to be the presbytery's useful friends. In consideration whereof—my beholding this your way hath occasioned my more serious thoughts of the case of conformity with prelacy. And albeit popery and profanity may be very accidental to the course of conformity with prelacy; yet beholding that these two pernicious weeds thrive so kindly in your soil, it hath moved me now, more than ever, to search out what of God can be in that way. And—this is the result of what I have attained to, that I, through scripture light, and other engagements,—cannot any longer adhere to conformity with prelacy, without the grievous wounding of my own conscience,—and that by my former conformity I have exceedingly offended God, and have been a stumbling block in the way of his people, for which, as I desire to be humbled before God, so I crave pardon of all his people whom I have offended. This I declare upon account of no worldly advantage; but my witness is in heaven, I do it only for the glory of God, the edification of his people, and the exoneration of my own conscience."—

Upon this, in a most moving, faithful, and affectionate manner, he exhorted them to consider their ways; represented how dismal it was that so many of the faithful should be cast out of God's inheritance; and concluded with these words, 'Finally, brethren, as for prelacy, whereupon the Lord hath stamped this mark of his displeasure, that under it truth and godliness hath been under a sensible decay, so ye would consider and ponder the same impartially in the balance of the sanctuary, then, who knows but you shall discover it to be a plant not set by the hand of God, but of man, and which the Lord in his own time may cause to be plucked out of his vineyard again?' He desired that this his testimony might be registered in the presbytery records, but whether this was complied with is not known. Several others also fell off afterwards from the prelates.

The time of the sitting of the parliament drew near, and Lauderdale, when he came to Edinburgh, in order to ingratiate himself with the prelates, renewed the severities rities againſt the ejected miniſters; for, by proclamation, he diſcharged any of them from coming to town, without licence, upon pain of death. And as thoſe of them who were moſt frequent in preaching were ſummoned, at ſeveral times in the month of Auguſt, to appear before the council, ſo they, finding that they would either be baniſhed or impriſoned, reſolved among themſelves not to appear, and ſent a letter through all of their perſuaſion to ſtir them up to prayer and ſolemn faſting in this day of diſtreſs and treading down. See Wodrow's appendix, Vol. II. No. 40.

The parliament ſat down on the 28th of July. And the acts of this ſeſſion, though ſhort, continuing only for the ſpace of a month, were ſanguinary to the laſt degree, and while they remain on record, muſt brand the makers of them with indefatigable diſgrace. The firſt act impowered the king to name commiſſioners for treating of an union between the two kingdoms, but this came to nothing.

The 2d act related to thoſe who refuſed or delayed to depoſe or ſwear againſt delinquents when required; by which every perſon, of what quality or ſex ſoever, was obliged to anſwer upon oath, and ſwear as to their knowledge of any crimes againſt the public laws and peace of the kingdom, and particularly of any conventicles, or other unlawful meetings, and of the ſeveral circumſtances of the perſons preſent, upon pain of fining, impriſonment or baniſhment, at the pleaſure of the council. The reader cannot but ſee the iniquity of this act, by which the neareſt relations were obliged to ſwear againſt one another under the penalties mentioned in it; parents were obliged to accuſe their children, and children their parents.

But the 5th, intitled, Act againſt conventicles, was of all others the moſt barbarous. By this it was enacted, 'That no outed or ejected miniſter, not licenſed by the council, or tolerated by the biſhop, preſume to preach, expound ſcripture, or pray in any meeting, except in their own houſes, and to thoſe of their own family; and that none be preſent at any ſuch meeting.' So that if any ſuch miniſter ſhould be found praying in any family except his own, he was a tranſgreſſor of this law. Whether this be not a ſcandal to Chriſtianity itſelf, let the reader judge. Strange times! when a miniſter's praying in any houſe but his own was reckoned ſedition. However, this was the caſe, and the miniſter or preacher, by this famous act, was to be impriſoned till he found bail not to keep another conventicle, under the penalty of 5000 merks, (a greater ſum than moſt of them were worth) or elſe conſent to leave the kingdom, never to return without his majeſty's licence. And as for thoſe preſent at ſuch houſe-conventicles, they were to be fined according to their qualities; if heritors, in the fourth part of their yearly rent; if tenants, in 25 l. Scots; and if cottars, in 12 l. Scots. Theſe were peculiar ſeverities. But the other part of this act, relating to field preaching, was ſtill more ſevere; for thereby it was ordained that the miniſter or preacher be puniſhed by death and confiſcation of goods. And the fines for thoſe preſent were to be twice as much as for houſe meetings. And there are only theſe three things the reader is to obſerve: 1. That if any perſon ſhould be without doors when an ejected miniſter was preaching or praying in any houſe, that, by this act, was deemed a field conventicle, and the penalties were the ſame. 2. Five hundred merks were appointed for thoſe who ſhould apprehend any of the preachers at field-meetings. 3. The ſheriffs, ſtewards, and lords of regalities, for their better encouragement, were allowed all the fines below heritors, &c. for themſelves. This act was to continue in force only three years, unleſs his majeſty (or rather the prelates) ſhould think fit to prolong it.

I ſhall leave the reader to make his own reflections. The miniſters who could not accept of the indulgence had now their ſentence. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'That Sir Robert Murray told him, that the king was not well pleaſed with this act, as being extravagantly ſevere, chiefly in that of the preachers being to be puniſhed by death. He ſaid that bloody laws did no good, and that he never would have paſſed it if he had known it before hand. The half of the parliament abhorred this act; yet ſo abject were they in their ſubmiſſions to Lauderdale, that the young earl of Caſſils was the only perſon who voted in the negative.' This, however, did neither deter miniſters from preaching, nor people from hearing, as we ſhall relate in the ſequel. They choſe to ſuffer rather than ſin.

I ſhall ſay nothing of their act againſt diſorderly baptiſms; but their 7th act againſt ſeparation muſt not be omitted, becauſe all his majeſty's good ſubjects of the reformed religion are hereby commanded to frequent the ordinary meetings for divine worſhip in their own pariſh churches, under the penalties mentioned in the act in caſe of failure. Biſhop Burnet ſays, That Lauderdale, with his own hands, put in a word in the act that covered the papiſts, the fines being laid on ſuch of the reformed religion as went not to church. He pretended by this to merit with the popiſh party, with the duke of York in particular. Lauderdale told him, that he put in theſe words on deſign, to let the world know that they were to be worſe uſed than the papiſts themſelves. And ſo it was in reality; for thoſe of the reformed religion could neither in conſcience attend on the worſhip of God in pariſh-churches, nor yet refrain to attend upon ordinances where they could have them diſpenſed; and ſuch was the dilemma they were reduced to, that they were expoſed to the ſeverities of the laws then made whatever courſe they took. Thus, in this ſhort ſeſſion of parliament, a large foundation was laid for a moſt ſevere perſecution; the diſmal conſequences of it will be related in the ſequel.

On the 11th of Auguſt there was a decreet obtained by the advocate againſt Mr James Hamilton late at Blantyre, Mr James Mitchel, Mr James Porter, Mr John Dickſon late at Ruthergien, and Mr John Blackadder late at Traquair. They were charged for holding conventicles in houſes and in the fields; and not appearing when ſummoned, they were denounced and put to the horn, which obliged them to wander up and down the country, and preach in the fields as they had opportunity.

About the 15th of Auguſt Mr Robert Landaſs for performing worſhip in a private family about a year before, was apprehended and kept priſoner at Edinburgh for ſix weeks before he was ſet at liberty. And Mr Hugh Peebles was brought before the council on the 28th of Auguſt. And though nothing could be proved againſt him, yet, becauſe he would not engage not to keep conventicles, and refrain from preaching and worſhipping God in any family but his own, was confined to Dumbarton and a mile round it. The ſame day the heritors of Glaſford in Lanerk ſhire were fined in 1000 l. Scots, becauſe the curate's houſe had been robbed by thieves, ſome of whom, being afterwards apprehended for other crimes, confeſſed this robbery at their execution, and declared that there was not one perſon in the pariſh concerned.

This ſummer the laird of Meldrum, an officer of the guards, apprehended ſeveral good people in ſome parithes in the ſhire of Renfrew, for hearing the ejected miniſters, and put them to no ſmall trouble. Sundry other miniſters were likewiſe haraſſed; for, notwithſtanding all the difficulties to which they were expoſed, they could not but pity the crying neceſſities of the people who thirſted after the word, and their miniſtry was remarkably ſucceſsful among them.

As all methods of ſeverity were uſed to ſuppreſs the Presbyterians, ſo attempts of another nature were made for accompliſhing this end. Accordingly, when biſhop Leighton entered upon the adminiſtration of the dioceſe of Glaſgow, he received many complaints concerning the ſcandalous conduct of the clergy, and therefore appointed a committee of his underlings to receive theſe accuſations, and the council ordered ſeveral to aſſiſt them. However, when this committee met in September, it was urged, that none ſhould be permitted to give in a complaint, till they had firſt ſigned the declaration, but, finding they had no legal authority to require this, the motion was dropt, and they fell upon another way to diſcourage complaints of this kind; for, if any failed in this proof, he was to appear in ſackcloth before the congregation, as a ſlanderer. Notwithſtanding whereof, the proofs, in many caſes, were ſo clear, that there was no avoiding the evidence. The incumbent of Killellan was depoſed, and others removed from their charges: and particularly Mr Jaffray of Maybole, who had accuſed his pariſhioners, was himſelf now accuſed of profane ſwearing drunkenneſs, &c. and when the committee was like to have diſcharged him. Leighton interpoſed his authority, and forbid him the exerciſe of his miniſtry in that pariſh, notwithſtanding this the purging committee was of little effect.

Another method taken to retrieve the credit of the clergy, and to caſt a vail upon the presbyterian miniſters, was the ſending ſome of the moſt noted epiſcopal divines to the weſt, as doctor Burnet, Mr James Nairn, Mr Laurence Charteris, Mr James Aird Mr Patrick Cook, and Mr Walter Paterſon, who were ironically termed by the country people, The biſhops Evangeliſts. It was expected theſe would have made proſelytes of all the weſt, but they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken. Mr Burnet ſays, in his hiſtory, the people of the country came generally to hear us, though not in great crouds. We were indeed amazed to ſee a poor commonality ſo capable to argue upon the points of Government, and on the bounds to be ſet to the power of princes in matters of religion. This meaſure of knowledge was ſpread among the meaneſt of them, their cottagers and ſervants.

The laſt attempt biſhop Leighton made, was the accommodation propoſed to ſundry preſbyterian miniſters, about the end of this year, with a view to draw them into an unperceived ſubjection to prelacy; but the ſnare was ſeen and avoided. Lauderdale, at Leighton's deſire, wrote to Meſſrs. Hutchiſon, Wedderburn, Ramſay, Baird and Gemble, to meet him at Edinburgh on the 9th of Auguſt, which they did, And. upon hearing the propoſals, they replied, that, as theſe were of a general concern, they could not give their private judgment without conſulting their brethren. They further deſired the propoſals might be given in writing, which the biſhop promiſed to do, but did not perform. However, the commiſſioner allowed Preſbyterian miniſters indulged and not indulged, to meet among themſelves, and gave them till the firſt of November to think of an anſwer.

The miniſters, meeting among themſelves, put the propoſals in this ſhape, to be communicated to their brethren. 'Preſbyteries being ſet up by law as they were eſtabliſhed before the year 1638 and the biſhop paſſing from his negative voice, and we having liberty to proteſt and declare againſt any remainder of prelatic power retained, or that may happen at any time to be exerciſed by him for a ſalvo for our conſciences from homologation therefore: queritur, whether we can, with ſafety to our conſciences and principles, join in theſe preſbyteries? or what elſe it is we will deſire or do for peace in the church, and an accomodation, epiſcopacy being always preſerved? Accordingly, at a numerous meeting of miniſters, it was unanimouſly agreed, that the above conceſſions were not ſufficient to be a foundation for their ſitting and acting in preſbyteries and ſynods with the prelates; for they juſtly reckoned this accomodation inconſiſtent with their principles. They could not comply with this without complying with epiſcopacy itſelf, and owning the king's eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy, which was eſtabliſhed by law.

On the 14th of December biſhop Leighton, the provoſt of Glaſgow, Sir John Harper of Camnethan, Mr Gilbert Burnet, and Mr James Ramſay dean of Glaſgow, met with about 26 preſbyterian miniſters, indulged and not indulged, at Ayr; at which a conference began concerning the power of biſhops; and Mr Alex. Jamiſon reaſoned ſo cloſely with Leighton on that point, that he became very uneaſy, his noſe fell a bleeding, and he was obliged to retire for a little. And when ſeveral others were inclined to enter the liſts with him and profeſſor Burnet, they were told that the meeting was not for debates. The meeting was adjourned till next day, when, receiving further propoſals, they got till the 12th of January to conſider of them. In the mean time the miniſters, obſerving that the laſt were more unſatisfactory than the firſt, appointed Meſſrs Hutchiſon, Wedderburn, &c. to repair to Edinburgh, and deliver in their anſwers in writing.

Accordingly theſe miniſters got to Edinburgh by the 11th of January 1671, where they found the chancellor, duke Hamilton earl of Tweddale, and ſome other counſellors, with biſhop Leighton and profeſſor Burnet. There were two meetings at Holy rood houſe, beſides ſeveral private conferences. And in ſhort the miniſters gave in their reaſons why the propoſals were not ſatisfactory. At one of theſe meetings Leighton offered a diſpute with them, which Mr Hutchiſon modeſtly declined, obſerving that he was not ſafe to diſpute againſt epiſcopacy, conſidering the laws in force againſt ſpeaking or writing in oppoſition to it. The profeſſor inſulted upon this; whereupon Mr Wedderburn accepted the challenge, if the chancellor and counſellors preſent would allow him; but that not being granted the accomodation broke up.

About the beginning of this year Sir James Dalrymple of Stair was admitted a privy councellor. On the 12th of January the council fell foul on that noted book, intitled, Jus populi vindicatum, and on the 16th of February publiſhed a proclamation, ordering all who ſhall have any copies of it in their cuſtody, after ſuch a limited time, to be fined in 10,000 merks. The ſame day colonel Gilbert Ker, who had left the kingdom ſince the reſtoration, got liberty to reſide in Scotland.

When the accomodation was at an end, the preſbyterian miniſters were repreſented as obſtinate and unreaſonable men. Biſhop Burnet ſays, that their behaviour diſguſted all wiſe, moderate and good men, when they rejected propoſitions that came ſo home even to the maxims they themſelves had ſet up. But in this he was miſtaken; becauſe there was nothing offered in the propoſals that was inconſiſtent with prelacy; neither could preſbyterian miniſters yield to them, without renouncing their known principles and ſubmitting to the hierarcy.

However, the council upon this made an act, the 26th of January, confining all the indulged miniſters to their reſpective pariſhes, who would not keep preſbyteries and ſynods, thoſe namely which were held by the biſhops, inſomuch that Mr John Bell, miniſter at Ardroſſan, durſt not go to viſit his dying father, though within a mile of him, without a ſpecial order from the council. Some indeed received more favours than others. But as none of them kept the 29th of May according to act of parliament, and as they generally kept up the practice of leſturing, they were expoſed to no ſmall hardſhips, and it was with difficulty they could get their ſtipends.

But the ejected miniſters who were not indulged, were expoſed to ſtill greater hardſhips; for ſuch of them who reſided in the pariſhes where epiſcopal miniſters were ſettled, were ordered either to keep their pariſh churches, or remove with their families elſewhere; and not a few were brought to trouble for baptizing children.

Mr John Menzies, miniſter at Carlaverock, having been obliged to appear before the commiſſioner, was confined to his own chamber at Edinburgh. When he had continued there for ſome time, without any notice being taken of him, he went home and preached to his people: whereupon the council, finding he had broke his confinement, ordered him to appear before them upon pain of rebellion. But what was the conſequence of this I do not find.

Mean while the advocate preſſed for ſeverity againſt conventicles. Accordingly, on the 2d of March, the council appointed a committee to conſider what was further to be done for ſuppreſſing them, but what they did this year is not known; only, on the 7th of March, the ſureties for Meſſrs Haſty, Stobie, Adam, &c. were ordered to produce theſe perſons; and when they appeared before the council, they were commanded to attend the firſt meeting in May, but there is no more concerning them.

Several gentlemen were likewiſe brought to much trouble; for, on the 2d of March, Sir Charles Erſkine, lord Lyon, got a commiſſion from the lords of the treaſury to enter upon the eſtates, &c. of ſuch as were forfeited for the rebellion 1666, in the ſhires of Dumfries, Wigton, and ſtewartry of Kirkcudbright; and though Mr George MacCartney of Blaiket was neither at Pentland, nor forfeited on that account, yet, ſome way or another, his name having been inſerted, none of them ſuffered more than he. His father was fined in Middleton's parliament, and otherways haraſſed, and himſelf ſuffered exceedingly before this by fines, exactions, and depredations; and refuſing this year to compound for his eſtate with lord Lyon, he was carried in priſoner to Edinburgh. After ſome time, it being found that he had been neither forfeited, nor excepted, he was ordered his liberty upon giving bond to appear when called; nevertheleſs he was by ways and means detained in priſon for the ſpace of ſix years, during which time his eſtate was ſeized and his lands laid waſte, ſo that his loſſes, during this time of perſecution, amounted to no leſs than 9827 l. 16 s.

Mr Coningham of Bedlane was continued priſoner in Dumbarton caſtle, only got liberty to ride out ſome miles every day for his health, on giving a bond for 10,000 merks to return to the caſtle at night. Kerſland, his fellow priſoner, petitioned the council, on the 5th of September, to be ſent to ſome place more commodious for the education of his children. Accordingly he was ordered to Aberdeen, where he was kept cloſe priſoner in a cold room for three months, without being allowed a fire; and in the month of December he was brought from Aberdeen, and committed to the caſtle of Stirling, where he continued ſeveral years, of whom more will be related afterwards.

Under all this ſeverity towards proteſtant non-conformiſts popery ſenſibly increaſed; ſwarms of prieſts came over with large cargoes of relics, pictures, beads, and ſuch like trumpery, and vaſt numbers of Father Turbeville's manual of controverſies, were induſtriouſly diſperſed. It is true the council in Auguſt ordered four popiſh prieſts to be apprehended, and appointed Argyll and the lord-regiſter to ſeize ſome popiſh books and trinkets that were in a ſhip lately come to Leith. Some epiſcopal miniſters in the north, where popery was barefaced, did alſo appear againſt it, particularly Mr John Menzies at Aberdeen. But though ſeveral repreſentations were made upon this point, yet little regard was had to them at the council-board, where Sharp had the impudence to ſay one day, that his majeſty's government was by far in greater hazard from preſbyterians than papiſts; and that it was his opinion the council ought to look more narrowly to preſbyterian meetings, in which they were very ſlack, although the great danger lay there.

If the primate was let into the ſecret intrigues carrying on at this time, it is likely he ſpoke what he thought to be matter of fact; for the king had formed a deſign to render himſelf abſolute and to overturn the proteſtant religion; and, as he could not communicate his intentions with ſafety to his whole council, he eſtabliſhed a cabinet-council of five perſons only, viz Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Aſhly and Lauderdale. The initial letters of theſe five names compoſing the word CABAL, this ſecret council was from thence called by the name. If to theſe we add the king and the duke of York, it will be found that all the ſeven were for arbitrary government. And as to religion, the king, the duke, Arlington and Clifford were papiſts, and the other three of no religion at all. In this cabal, as Father Orleans has declared, a war with the Dutch was reſolved. The Abbot Primi tells us, at the ſame time, that, 'king Charles ſigned a private treaty with France, and to give him farther aſſurances in that matter, Henrietta of England, Ducheſs of Orleans, king Charles's ſiſter, went to England 1670, and in the name of the moſt Chriſtian king, made a propoſal to her royal brother, of enſuring to him an abſolute authority over his parliament, and re-eſtabliſhing the catholic religion in the three kingdoms; but that, in order to this, there was, a neceſſity of lowering the pride and power of the Dutch, and reducing that ſtate to the narrow compaſs of the province of Holland, &c.' It is not my buſineſs to enter into theſe intrigues; it is ſufficient to my purpoſe to obſerve that a deſign was now on foot to ſubvert the proteſtant religion; and if the managers in Scotland were privy to it, we need not wonder at their lenity to papiſts and ſeverity to preſbyterians.

About the end of this year the laird of Lee was made juſtice clerk, and Lauderdale captain of the Baſs, which the king bought and turned into a priſon; and indeed Lauderdale and his friends at this time poſſeſſed all the chief poſts in Scotland. But leaving theſe things,

I now go on to the tranſactions of the year 1672, about the beginning of which Mr Ramſay, the epiſcopal incumbent of Auchinleck, happened to have his houſe robbed in the night-time whereupon the council, on the 23d of January, gave a commiſſion 'to ſome officers of the army, in that neighbourhood, to hold courts, call witneſſes, and examine into the affair, and to fine the abſent heritors in 200 l. tenants in 40 l. and cottars in 10 l. and each woman according to the quality of her huſband, dead or alive.' So that here a juſticiary power was lodged in the military officers. Two days after this Gordon of Dundeugh in Galloway got up a bond of 600 merks, which had been extorted from him by Sir William Bannantyne.

The perſecution againſt conventicles ſtill went on; for the council being informed that ſeveral were kept in Glaſgow, ordered, on the 22d of February, the magiſtrates of that city to ſuppreſs them, and to enjoin all the ejected miniſters, either to attend the church, or remove out of the town, which put many of them to no ſmall difficulties.

The ſame day the learned and pious Mr Alexander Carmichael, having been apprehended at Kirkaldy, and brought in priſoner to Edinburgh, was before the council for keeping conventicles, and on the 26th was ordered to be tranſported by ſea to London, where he was ſingularly uſeful, and finiſhed his courſe with joy 1676 or 1677. This excellent perſon is well known to the world by his accurate treatiſe on mortification, publiſhed at London after his death 1677. His brother Mr John Carmichael and he had for ſome time conformed, but, diſcovering their error, quitted their livings and joined their ſuffering brethren.

In March many of the ejected miniſters about Edinburgh were obliged to leave the town, and go they knew not whither. However, ſeveral of them at this time got to their reſt out of the reach of all their enemies, as Mr Walter Grieg, Mr David Ferral, and Mr Robert Douglas.

On the 15th of March his majeſty's declaration of indulgence to non-conformiſts in England which had been communicated to and approved of by the French king, was publiſhed, in which the penal laws againſt all ſorts of non-conformiſts were ſuſpended; and though the papiſts were not to have public places for worſhip, yet they were allowed the exerciſe of their worſhip in private houſes. The proteſtant non conformiſts, though they had now liberty granted them, had no opinion of the diſpenſing power. They were ſenſible the indulgence was not granted out of love to them, nor would continue any longer than it ſerved the intereſt of popery. But the breaking out of the Dutch war made the court think it neceſſary to grant them an indulgence, that there might be peace at home while there was war abroad.

Two days after this the king publiſhed his declaration of war againſt the ſtates, dated the 17th of March, and the like was publiſhed by the French king at Paris, who, in the beginning of May, aſſembled an army of 120,000 men, and with a rapid fury over-run the greateſt part of the Netherlands; and the Dutch were reduced to ſuch extremities, that the populace roſe, and having obliged the ſtates to make the young prince of Orange ſtadtholder, they fell upon the two brothers Cornelius and John De-Wits, and tore them to pieces. This prince, by the bleſſing of God, was raiſed up, in that time of extremity, to check the progreſs of the French arms, and diſconcert the meaſures that had been formed, not only for ruining his country, but alſo for ſubverting the proteſtant religion, and eſtabliſhing popery and arbitrary power.

At this time lord-keeper Bridgeman loſt all credit at court; for he refuſed to put the ſeal to the indulgence, as judging it contrary to law; ſo he was diſmiſſed; and Shaftsbury was made chancellor, Clifford treaſurer, Arlington had a garter and was made an earl; and Lauderdale had a garter and was made a duke on the 2d of May. All the members of the cabal had great preſents from France, and the French ambaſſador gave each of them a picture of the king of France ſet in diamonds to the value of 3000 l. ſterling. And thus, to uſe the words of noted hiſtorian, was the nation and our religion, as well as the king's faith and honour, ſet to ſale and ſold. But to return to Scotland, the managers there took no notice of theſe things, but carried on their perſecution againſt the preſbyterians.

In the month of June the parliament ſat down at Edinburgh, burgh, and made several persecuting acts. By their first none were to be officers of the militia but episcopalians; both officers and soldiers were to take the oath of allegiance and declaration, and upon refusal to be imprisoned and banished. By their 9th act, against unlawful ordinations, none were to ordain to the ministry who were not authorised by law; all pretended ordinations since 1661 were declared to be void and null. The ordainers and ordained, contrary to this act, were to be imprisoned and banished by the council; and persons married by such were denuded of all they could claim jure mariti vel relictæ, &c. By the 11th act, about baptisms, it was ordained, 'That every person who wants a certificate, from the minister of the parish where he lives, that his child was baptized within 30 days of its birth, shall be fined, heritors in a fourth part of their yearly valued rent, merchants 100 l. Scots, &c.' By the 12th act, all who do not observe the anniversary of his majesty's restoration, were ordered to be fined, and otherwise punished, according to their condition and estate. By their 17th act, the acts passed in the last session, concerning conventicles and withdrawing from public ordinances, are to continue in force for three years after the expiration of the time limited by these acts. The last act of this session was against profaneness, and was an excellent act, had it been only put in execution; but the ecclesiastic gentlemen had something else to mind.

During this session of parliament a great many were imprisoned, fined and denounced on account of conventicles: accordingly on the 11th of July, Mr Patrick Hay laird of Lees was ordered to be confined to his chamber at Edinburgh, and Mr James Mercer, governor to the Laird of Meggins, to be confined to the town. His pupil Mr John Drummond of Meggins younger, Alexander Christie and Thomas Keltie merchants in Perth, were ordered to be carried prisoners to the tolbooth of Edinburgh. These who were at this time summoned and did not appear, who were not a few, were denounced and put to the horn. On the 14th Meggins elder was fined in 500 l. sterling for his lady's being at a conventicle, and his son, the said Mr Drummond, was imprisoned till his father should pay the fine. At the same time the said Alexander Christie and Thomas Keltie were fined in 500 merks Scots each, the laird of Lees in 1000 merks, and George Hay of Balhouse, afterwards earl of Kinnoul, in 1000 l. sterling; and all of them to remain in prison till their fines were paid. On the 24th of July, Anne countess of Wigtoun, an excellent widow lady, was obliged to appear personally before the council, and, upon owning her being at a conventicle in the house of Boghall, was fined in 4000 merks. Mr James Duncan at Dulpin, for being at another at the bridge of Earn, was fined in 2000 merks, and the following persons were imprisoned, viz. James Chrighton, John Dalziel, James Paterson, William Cleghorn, Malcolm Brown, Peter Gilles, Thomas Crighton, James Glasgow, James Lindsay, James Thomson, James Forrest, John Newbigging, John Hutchison, and Malcolm Gibson. They who did not appear were denounced. Such was the mildness of this administration!

During these proceedings against conventicles, on the 13th of July Mr John Rae and Mr Hugh Archbald were sent from Stirling castle to Dumbarton, along with Mr John Cuningham of Bedlane. The same day Mr John Scot, son to Andrew Scot in Tushilaw, having been imprisoned for writing to the Rev. Mr John Carstairs in Holland, was brought before the council, and after examination was set at liberty upon a bond of 1000 merks to appear when called. From this bishop Burnet would make the world believe that there were designs in Holland to raise a rebellion in Scotland. His words are these: 'That which gave duke Lauderdale juster ground of offence was, that one Carstairs, much employed at that time in greater matters, was taken in a ship that came from Rotterdam. He himself escaped out of their hands, but his letters were taken. They had a great deal writ in white ink, which shewed that the design of sending him over was to know in what disposition the people were, promising arms and other necessaries if they were in a condition to give the government any disturbance. But the whole was so darkly writ, much being referred to the bearer, that it was not to possible to understand what lay hid under so many mysterious expressions.' This must be a very dark story indeed. It is true Mr Scot was imprisoned for corresponding with Mr Carstairs, as, after the beginning of the Dutch war, sundry, amongst whom was Mr William Livingston, were brought to trouble for writing to their friends in Holland. But there is no ground to assert that there were any such designs as the bishop represents; neither is that historian obliged to his information, when he says that Mr Carstairs escaped out of their hands. When he came home, he did not seek to escape, but on the 3d of September this year appeared before the council, and found bail to appear again when called, under the penalty of 2000 merks; after which I find a little more concerning him.

As a second indulgence was granted on the 3d of September, I shall now give some account of it. When Lauderdale came down to Scotland, it was generally said he had one in his pocket. And as a toleration had been granted to the non-conformists in England, the like favour was expected in Scotland, exclusive of papists; but the bishops and lords of council that were of their party violently opposed it, and many letters were writ to the court against it. However, Lauderdale had full instructions in this matter, though he kept them close, and carried with great rigour to presbyterian ministers and others. Bishop Burnet says, Lauderdale looked on near two months after he came down to Scotland, waiting for an application for liberty of conscience; but the designs of the court were now clearly seen into. The presbyterians understood they were only to be made use of in order to the introducing of popery; so they resolved to be silent and passive: upon this he broke out into fury and rage against them, and carried matters so far, that when Burnet asked him, was that a time to drive them into rebellion? yes, said he: would to God they would rebel, that so he might bring over an army of Irish papists to cut all their throats.—But, says the historian, he calmed all of a sudden.

About twenty ministers met at Edinburgh on the 8th of August, and agreed to write to Sir James Dalrymple of Stair, now a privy counsellor, on whom they had great dependance, that the terms of the indulgence might be free from straitening conditions. But, as they could not agree upon the contents of the letter, they next resolved to send two of their number to represent their case to Stair. Accordingly Mr Gabriel Cuningham and Mr James Kirton waited upon him, and received very kind assurances that he would do what he could for them.

Mean while, on the 29th of August, Mr John Speed petitioned the council for his liberty, since he had submitted to banishment for eight years, and having come home for his health, had been taken up for conventicles though he had never been at any. His petition was granted upon giving bond and security to appear when called under the penalty of 2000 merks. The same day Mr Hugh Archbald and Mr John Murray, were set at liberty, only the former was confined to the parish of Galstoun in the shire of Ayr, and the latter to that of Queensferry, and both were ordered to abstain from conventicles.

At length, on the 3d of September, being the Lord's day, the council came to a determination as to the indulgence, and made the following acts.

Holy-rood-house, September 3. 1672.
